doomed to feel; 286

And plastered o'er with mud, from head to heel:

While the rude soldier gores us as he goes,
Or marks, in blood, his progress on our toes!
See, from the Dole, a vast tumultuous throng, 290

Each followed by his kitchen, pours along!
Huge pans, which Corbulo could scarce up-
rear,

With steady neck a puny slave must bear,
And, lest amid the way the flames expire,
Glide nimbly on, and gliding, fan the fire; 295
Through the close press with sinuous efforts wind,

And, piece by piece, leave his botched rags behind.

Hark! groaning on, the unwieldy wagon spreads

Its cumbrous load, tremendous! o'er our heads,

Projecting elm or pine, that nods on high, 300
And threatens death to every passer by.
Heavens! should the axle crack, which bears
a weight

Of huge Ligurian stone, and pour the freight
On the pale crowd beneath, what would remain,

What joint, what bone, what atom of the slain? 305

The body, with the soul, would vanish quite,
Invisible as air, to mortal sight!—

Meanwhile, unconscious of their fellow's fate,
At home, they heat the water, scour the plate, Arrange the strigils, fill the cruse with oil, 310

And ply their several tasks with fruitless toil:
For he who bore the dole, poor mangled
ghost,

Sits pale and trembling on the Stygian coast,
Scared at the horrors of the novel scene,
At Charon's threatening voice, and scowling mien; 315

Nor hopes a passage, thus abruptly hurled,
Without his farthing, to the nether world.

Pass we these fearful dangers, and survey
What other evils threat our nightly way.

And first, behold the mansion's towering size, 320

Where floors on floors to the tenth story rise;
Whence heedless garreteers their potsherds throw,

And crush the unwary wretch that walks
below!

Clattering the storm descends from heights unknown,

Ploughs up the street, and wounds the flinty
stone! 325

'Tis madness, dire improvidence of ill,
To sup abroad, before you sign your will;
Since fate in ambush lies, and marks his prey,
From every wakeful window in the way:

Pray, then,—and count your humble prayer
well sped, 330

If pots be only—emptied on your head.

The drunken bully, ere his man be slain,
Frets through the night, and courts repose
in vain;

And while the thirst of blood his bosom
burns, 334

From side to side, in restless anguish, turns,
Like Peleus' son, when, quelled by Hector's
hand,

His loved Patroclus prest the Phrygian strand.

There are, who murder as an opiate take,
And only when no brawls await them
wake:

Yet even these heroes, flushed with youth and wine, 340

All contest with the purple robe decline;
Securely give the lengthened train to pass,
The sun-bright flambeaux, and the lamps of brass.—

Me, whom the moon, or candle's paler gleam,
Whose wick I husband to the last extreme,
Guides through the gloom, he braves, devoid of fear: 346

The prelude to our doughty quarrel hear,
If that be deemed a quarrel, where, heaven
knows,

He only gives, and I receive, the blows!
Across my path he strides, and bids me
stand! 350

I bow, obsequious to the dread command;
What else remains, where madness, rage,
combine

With youth, and strength superior far to mine?

'Whence come you, rogue?' he cries; 'whose beans tonight

Have stuffed you thus? what cobbler clubbed his mite, 355

For leeks and sheep's head porridge? Dumb!
quite dumb!

Speak, or be kicked.—Yet, once again! your home?

Where shall I find you? At what beggar's
stand

(Temple, or bridge) whim'ring with outstretched hand?

Whether I strive some humble plea to frame, 360

Or steal in silence by, 'tis just the same;

I'm beaten first, then dragged in rage away;

Bound to the peace, or punished for the fray!

Mark here the boasted freedom of the poor!

Beaten and bruised, that goodness to adore,
Which, at their humble prayer, suspends its ire, 366

And sends them home, with yet a bone entire!

Nor this the worst; for when deep midnight reigns,

And bolts secure our doors, and massy chains,
When noisy inns a transient silence keep, 370

And harassed nature woos the balm of sleep,
Then, thieves and murderers ply their dreadful trade;

With stealthy steps our secret couch invade:—

Roused from the treacherous calm, aghast we start,

And the fleshed sword—is buried in our heart! 375

Hither from bogs, from rocks, and caves pursued

(The Pontine marsh, and Gallinarian wood).

The dark assassins flock, as to their home,
And fill with dire alarms the streets of Rome. 379

Such countless multitudes our peace annoy,
That bolts and shackles every forge employ,
And cause so wide a waste, the country fears
A want of ore for mattocks, rakes, and shares.

O! happy were our sires, estranged from crimes; 384

And happy, happy, were the good old times,
Which saw, beneath their kings', their tribunes' reign,

One cell the nation's criminals contain!

Much could I add, more reasons could I cite,

If time were ours, to justify my flight;

But see! the impatient team is moving on, 390

The sun declining; and I must be gone:

Long since, the driver murmured at my stay,
And jerked his whip, to beckon me away.

Farewell, my friend! with this embrace we part:

Cherish my memory ever in your heart; 395

And when, from crowds and business, you repair,

To breathe at your Aquinum freer air,

Fail not to draw me from my loved retreat,

To Elvine Ceres, and Diana's seat:—

For your bleak hills my Cumæ I'll resign, 400

And (if you blush not at such aid as mine)

Come well equipped, to wage, in angry rhymes,

Fierce war, with you, on follies and on crimes.

GAIUS SUETONIUS TRANQUILLUS (A.D. 75-140?)

The friend of Pliny, but younger, Suetonius became imperial secretary under Hadrian, and in 119-121 published The Lives of the Cæsars, a series of biographies beginning with Julius and ending with Domitian. He wrote also Lives of Eminent Men, of which the section on grammarians and the lives of Terence, Horace, and Lucan survive. In his capacity as secretary, Suetonius probably had special opportunities for documentary study. He seems to have been at pains to verify the extraordinary mass of detail that makes the lives really important in spite of their not very enlightened or artistic character. They are systematic rather than orderly, contain little that is reflective, do not analyze character, and manifest no distinction in style. They have great value nevertheless, for two reasons: they amplify and clarify what first century history we know from other sources by making us acquainted with the personal appearance and personal conduct of the emperors, and they contribute immensely to the power to visualize the city of Rome and the behavior of its citizens in the mass.

THE DEIFIED JULIUS

He lived at first in the Subura in a modest house, but after he became pontifex maximus, in the official residence on the Sacred Way. Many have written that he was very fond of elegance and luxury; that having laid the foundations of a country-house on his estate at Nemi and finished it at great cost, he tore it all down because it did not suit him in every particular, although at the same time he was still poor and heavily in debt; and that he carried tessellated and mosaic floors about with him on his campaigns. . . .

More than sixty joined the conspiracy against him, led by Gaius Cassius and Marcus and Decimus Brutus. At first they hesitated whether to form two divisions at the elections in the Campus Martius, so that while some hurled him from the bridge as he summoned the tribes to vote, the rest might wait below and slay him; or to set upon him in the Sacred Way or at the entrance to the theater. When, however, a meeting of the Senate was called for the Ides of March in the Hall of Pompey, they readily gave that time and place the preference. . . .

Both for these reasons and because of poor health he hesitated for a long time whether to stay at home and put off what he had planned to do in the senate; but at last, urged by Decimus Brutus not to disappoint the full meeting which had for some time been waiting for him, he went forth almost at the end of the fifth hour: and when a note revealing the plot was handed him by someone on the way, he put it with others which he held in his left hand, intending to read them presently. Then, after several victims had been slain, and he could not get favorable omens, he entered the House in defiance of portents, laughing at Spurinna and calling him a false prophet, because the Ides of March were come without bringing him harm; though Spurinna replied that they had of a truth come, but they had not gone.

As he took his seat, the conspirators gathered about him as if to pay their respects, and straightway Tillius Cimber, who had assumed the lead, came nearer as though to ask something; and when Cæsar with a gesture put him off to another time, Cimber caught his toga by both shoulders; then as Cæsar cried, 'Why, this is violence!' one of the Cascas stabbed him from one side just below the throat. Cæsar caught Casca's arm and ran it through with his stylus, but as he tried to leap to his feet, he was stopped by another wound. When he saw that he was beset on every side by drawn daggers, he muffled his head in his robe, and at the same time drew down its lap to his feet with his left hand, in order to fall more decently, with the lower part of his body also covered. And in this wise he was stabbed with three and twenty wounds, uttering not a word, but merely a groan at the first stroke, though some have written that when Marcus Brutus rushed at him, he said in Greek, 'You too, my child?' All the conspirators made off, and he lay there lifeless for some time, until finally three common slaves put him on a litter and carried him home, with one arm hanging down. And of so many wounds none turned out to be mortal, in the opinion of the physician Antistius, except the second one in the breast. . . .

When the funeral was announced, a pyre was erected in the Campus Martius near the tomb of Julia, and on the rostra a gilded shrine was placed, made after the model of the temple of Venus Genetrix; within was a couch of ivory with coverlets of purple and gold, and at its head a pillar hung with the robe in which he was slain. Since it was clear that the day would not be long enough for those who offered gifts, they were directed to bring them to the Campus by whatsoever streets of the city they wished, regardless of any order of precedence. At the funeral games, to rouse pity and indignation at his death, these words from the 'Contest for the Arms' of Pacuvius were sung:—

'Saved I these men that they might murder me?'

and words of a like purport from the 'Electra' of Atilius. Instead of a eulogy the consul Antonius caused a herald to recite the decree of the senate in which it had voted Cæsar all divine and human honors at once, and likewise the oath with which they had all pledged themselves to watch over his personal safety; to which he added a very few words of his own. The bier on the rostra was carried to the Forum by magistrates and ex-magistrates; and while some were urging that it be burned in the temple of Jupiter of the Capitol, and others in the Hall of Pompey, on a sudden two beings with swords by their sides and brandishing a pair of darts set fire to it with blazing torches, and at once the throng of bystanders heaped upon it dry branches, the judgment seats with the benches, and whatever else could serve as an offering. Then the musicians and actors tore off their robes, which they had taken from the equipment of his triumphs and put on for the occasion, rent them to bits and threw them into the flames, and the veterans of the legions the arms with which they had adorned themselves for the funeral; many of the women, too, offered up the jewels which they wore and the amulets and robes of their children.

At the height of the public grief a throng of foreigners went about lamenting each after the fashion of his country, above all the Jews, who even flocked to the place for several successive nights.

Immediately after the funeral the commons ran to the houses of Brutus and Cassius with firebrands, and after being repelled with difficulty, they slew Helvius Cinna when they met him, through a mistake in the name, supposing that he was Cornelius Cinna, who had the day before made a bitter indictment of Cæsar and for whom they were looking; and they set his head upon a spear and paraded it about the streets. Afterwards they set up in the Forum a solid column of Numidian marble almost twenty feet high, and inscribed upon it, 'To the Father of his Country.' At the foot of this they continued for a long time to sacrifice, make vows, and settle some of their disputes by an oath in the name of Cæsar.

Cæsar left in the minds of some of his friends the suspicion that he did not wish to live longer and had taken no precautions, because of his failing health; and that therefore he neglected the warnings which came to him from portents and from the reports of his friends. Some think that it was because he had full trust in that last decree of the senators and their oath that he dismissed even the armed body-guard of Spanish soldiers that formerly attended him. Others, on the contrary, believe that he elected to expose himself once for all to the plots that threatened him on every hand, rather than to be always anxious and on his guard. Some, too, say that he was wont to declare that it was not so much to his own interest as to that of his country that he remain alive; he had long since had his fill of power and glory; but if aught befell him, the commonwealth would have no peace, but would be plunged in civil strife under much worse conditions.

About one thing almost all are fully agreed, that he all but desired such a death as he met; for once when he read in Xenophon how Cyrus in his last illness gave directions for his funeral, he expressed his horror of such a lingering kind of end and his wish for one which was swift and sudden. And the day before his murder, in a conversation which arose at a dinner at the house of Marcus Lepidus, as to what manner of death was most to be desired, he had given his preference to one which was sudden and unexpected.

He died in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and was numbered among the gods, not only by a formal decree, but also in the conviction of the vulgar. For at the first of the games which his heir Augustus gave in honor of his apotheosis, a comet shone for seven successive nights, rising about the eleventh hour, and was believed to be the soul of Cæsar, who had been taken to heaven; and this is why a star is set upon the crown of his head in his statue.

It was voted that the hall in which he was slain be walled up, that the Ides of March be called the Day of Parricide, and that a meeting of the senate should never be called on that day.

Hardly any of his assassins survived him for more than three years, or died a natural death. They were all condemned, and they perished in various ways—some by shipwreck, some in battle; some took their own lives with the self-same dagger with which they had impiously slain Cæsar.

THE DEIFIED AUGUSTUS

PUBLIC WORKS

Since the city was not adorned as the dignity of the empire demanded, and was exposed to flood and fire, he so beautified it that he could justly boast that he had found it built of brick and left it in marble. He made it safe too for the future, so far as human foresight could provide for this.

He built many public works, in particular the following: his forum with the temple of Mars the Avenger, the temple of Apollo on the Palatine, and the fane of Jupiter the Thunderer on the Capitol. His reason for building the forum was the increase in the number of the people and of cases at law, which seemed to call for a third forum, since two were no longer adequate. Therefore it was opened to the public with some haste, before the temple of Mars was finished, and it was provided that the public prosecutions be held there apart from the rest, as well as the selection of jurors by lot. He had made a vow to build the temple of Mars in the war of Philippi, which he undertook to avenge his father; accordingly he decreed that in it the senate should consider wars and claims for triumphs, from it those who were on their way to the provinces with military commands should be escorted, and to it victors on their return should bear the tokens of their triumphs. He reared the temple of Apollo in that part of his house on the Palatine for which the soothsayers declared that the god had shown his desire by striking it with lightning. He joined to it colonnades with Latin and Greek libraries, and when he was getting to be an old man he often held meetings of the senate there as well, and revised the lists of jurors. He dedicated the shrine to Jupiter the Thunderer because of a narrow escape; for on his Cantabrian expedition during a march by night, a flash of lightning grazed his litter and struck the slave dead who was carrying a torch before him. He constructed some works too in the name of others, his grandsons to wit, his wife and his sister, such as the colonnade and basilica of Gaius and Lucius; also the colonnades of Livia and Octavia, and the theater of Marcellus. More than that, he often urged other prominent men to adorn the city with new monuments or to restore and embellish old ones, each according to his means. And many such works were built at that time by many men; for example, the temple of Hercules of the Muses by Marcus Philippus, the temple of Diana by Lucius Cornificius, the Hall of Liberty by Asinius Pollio, the temple of Saturn by Munatius Plancus, a theater by Cornelius Balbus, an amphitheater by Statilius Taurus, and by Marcus Agrippa in particular many magnificent structures.

He divided the area of the city into regions and wards, arranging that the former should be under the charge of magistrates selected each year by lot, and the latter under 'masters' elected by the inhabitants of the respective neighborhoods. To guard against fires he devised a system of stations of night watchmen, and to control the floods he widened and cleared out the channel of the Tiber, which had for some time been filled with rubbish and narrowed by jutting buildings. Further, to make the approach to the city easier from every direction, he personally undertook to rebuild the Flaminian Road all the way to Ariminum, and assigned the rest of the highways to others who had been honored with triumphs, asking them to use their prize-money in paving them.

THE EMPEROR AND HIS CHILDREN

In bringing up his daughter and his granddaughter he even had them taught spinning and weaving, and he forbade them to say or do anything except openly and such as might be recorded in the household diary. He was most strict in keeping them from meeting strangers, once writing to Lucius Vinicius, a young man of good position and character: 'You have acted presumptuously in coming to Baïæ to call on my daughter.' He taught his grandsons reading, swimming, and the other elements of education, for the most part himself, taking special pains to train them to imitate his own handwriting; and he never dined in their company unless they sat beside him on the lowest couch, or made a journey unless they preceded his carriage or rode close by it on either side.

But at the height of his happiness and his confidence in his family and its training, Fortune proved fickle. He found the two Julias, his daughter and granddaughter, guilty of every form of vice, and banished them. He lost Gaius and Lucius within the span of eighteen months, for the former died in Lycia and the latter at Massilia. He then publicly adopted his third grandson Agrippa and at the same time his stepson Tiberius by a bill passed in the assembly of the curiæ; but he soon disowned Agrippa because of his low tastes and violent temper, and sent him off to Surrentum.

He bore the death of his kin with far more resignation than their misconduct. For he was not greatly broken by the fate of Gaius and Lucius, but he informed the senate of his daughter's fall through a letter read in his absence by a quæstor, and for very shame would meet no one for a long time, and even thought of putting her to death. At all events, when one of her confidantes, a freedwoman called Phœbe, hanged herself at about that same time, he said: 'I would rather have been Phœbe's father.' After Julia was banished, he denied her the use of wine and every form of luxury, and would not allow any man, bond or free, to come near her without his permission, and then not without being informed of his stature, complexion, and even of any marks or scars upon his body. It was not until five years later that he moved her from the island to the mainland and treated her with somewhat less rigor. But he could not by any means be prevailed on to recall her altogether, and when the Roman people several times interceded for her and urgently pressed their suit, he in open assembly called upon the gods to curse them with like daughters and like wives. He would not allow the child born to his granddaughter Julia after her sentence to be recognized or reared.

HABIT AND PERSON

In the other details of his life it is generally agreed that he was most temperate and without even the suspicion of any fault. He lived at first near the Forum Romanum, above the Stairs of the Ringmakers, in a house which had belonged to the orator Calvus; afterwards, on the Palatine, but in the no less modest dwelling of Hortensius, which was remarkable neither for size nor elegance, having but a short colonnade with columns of Alban stone, and rooms without any marble decorations or handsome pavements. For more than forty years too he used the same bedroom in winter and summer; although he found the city unfavorable to his health in the winter, yet continued to winter there. If ever he planned to do anything in private or without interruption, he had a retired place at the top of the house, which he called 'Syracuse' and 'technyphion.' In this he used to take refuge, or else in the villa of one of his freedmen in the suburbs; but whenever he was not well, he slept at Mæcenas's house. For retirement he went most frequently to places by the sea and the islands of Campania, or to the towns near Rome, such as Lanuvium, Præneste or Tibur, where he very often held court in the colonnades of the temple of Hercules. He disliked large and sumptuous country palaces, actually razing to the ground one which his granddaughter Julia built on a lavish scale. His own villas, which were modest enough, he decorated not so much with handsome statues and pictures as with terraces, groves, and objects noteworthy for their antiquity and rarity; for example, at Capræ the monstrous bones of huge sea monsters and wild beasts, called the 'bones of the giants' and the 'weapons of the heroes.'

The simplicity of his furniture and household goods may be seen from couches and tables still in existence, many of which are scarcely fine enough for a private citizen. They say that he always slept on a low and plainly furnished bed. Except on special occasions he wore common clothes for the house, made by his sister, wife, daughter or granddaughters; his togas were neither close nor full, his purple stripe neither narrow nor broad, and his shoes somewhat high-soled, to make him look taller than he really was. But he always kept shoes and clothing to wear in public ready in his room for sudden and unexpected occasions.

He gave dinner parties constantly and always formally, with great regard to the rank and personality of his guests. Valerius Messala writes that he never invited a freedman to dinner with the exception of Menas, and then only when he had been enrolled among the freeborn after betraying the fleet of Sextus Pompey. Augustus himself writes that he once entertained a man at whose villa he used to stop, who had been one of his body-guard. He would sometimes come to table late on these occasions and leave early, allowing his guests to begin to dine before he took his place and keep their places after he went out. He served a dinner of three courses or of six when he was most lavish, without needless extravagance but with the greatest goodfellowship. For he drew in to the general conversation those who were silent or chatted under their breath, and introduced music and actors, or even strolling players from the circus, and especially story-tellers. . . .

He was unusually handsome and exceedingly graceful at all periods of his life, though he cared nothing for personal adornment. He was so far from being particular about the dressing of his hair, that he would have several barbers working in a hurry at the same time, and as for his beard he now had it clipped and now shaved, while at the very same time he would either be reading or writing something. His expression, whether in conversation or when he was silent, was so calm and mild, that one of the leading men of the Gallic provinces admitted to his countrymen that it had softened his heart, and kept him from carrying out his design of pushing the emperor over a cliff, when he had been allowed to approach him under the pretense of a conference, as he was crossing the Alps. He had clear, bright eyes, in which he liked to have it thought that there was a kind of divine power, and it greatly pleased him, whenever he looked keenly at anyone, if he let his face fall as if before the radiance of the sun; but in his old age he could not see very well with his left eye. His teeth were wide apart, small, and ill-kept; his hair was slightly curly and inclining to golden; his eyebrows met. His ears were of moderate size, and his nose projected a little at the top and then bent slightly inward. His complexion was between dark and fair. He was short of stature (although Julius Marathus, his freedman and keeper of his records, says that he was five feet and nine inches in height), but this was concealed by the fine proportion and symmetry of his figure.

THE END OF THE PLAY

Presently he crossed over [from Capri] to Naples, although his bowels were still weak from intermittent attacks. In spite of this he witnessed a quinquennial gymnastic contest which had been established in his honor, and then started with Tiberius for his destination. But as he was returning his illness increased and he at last took to his bed at Nola, calling back Tiberius, who was on his way to Illyricum, and keeping him for a long time in private conversation, after which he gave attention to no business of importance.

On the last day of his life he asked every now and then whether there was any disturbance without on his account; then calling for a mirror, he had his hair combed and his falling jaws set straight. After that, calling in his friends and asking whether it seemed to them that he had played the comedy of life fitly, he added the tag:

'Since well I've played my part, all clap your hands
And from the stage dismiss me with applause.'

Then he sent them all off, and while he was asking some newcomers from the city about the daughter of Drusus, who was ill, he suddenly passed away as he was kissing Livia, uttering these last words: 'Live mindful of our wedlock, Livia, and farewell,' thus blessed with an easy death and such a one as he had always longed for. For almost always on hearing that anyone had died swiftly and painlessly, he prayed that he and his might have a like euthanasia, for that was the term he was wont to use. He gave but one single sign of wandering before he breathed his last, calling out in sudden terror that forty young men were carrying him off. And even this was rather a premonition than a delusion, since it was that very number of soldiers of the prætorian guard that carried him forth to lie in state.

He died in the same room as his father Octavius, in the consulship of two Sextuses, Pompeius and Appuleius, on the fourteenth day before the Kalends of September at the ninth hour, just thirty-five days before his seventy-sixth birthday.

His body was carried by the senators of the municipalities and colonies from Nola all the way to Bovillæ, in the night time because of the season of the year, being placed by day in the basilica of the town at which they arrived or in its principal temple. At Bovillæ the members of the equestrian order met it and bore it to the city, where they placed it in the vestibule of his house.

In their desire to give him a splendid funeral and honor his memory the senators so vied with one another that among many other suggestions some proposed that his cortege pass through the triumphal gate, preceded by the statue of Victory which stands in the House, while a dirge was sung by children of both sexes belonging to the leading families; others, that on the day of the obsequies golden rings be laid aside and iron ones worn; and some, that his ashes be collected by the priests of the highest colleges. One man proposed that the name of the month of August be transferred to September, because Augustus was born in the latter, but died in the former; another, that all the period from the day of his birth until his demise be called the Augustan Age, and so entered in the Calendar. But though a limit was set to the honors paid him, his eulogy was twice delivered: before the temple of the Deified Julius by Tiberius, and from the old rostra by Drusus, son of Tiberius; and he was carried on the shoulders of senators to the Campus Martius and there cremated.

There was even an ex-prætor who took oath that he had seen the form of the Emperor, after he had been reduced to ashes, on its way to heaven. His remains were gathered up by the leading men of the equestrian order, barefooted and in ungirt tunics, and placed in the Mausoleum. This structure he had built in his sixth consulship between the Via Flaminia and the bank of the Tiber, and at the same time opened to the public the groves and walks by which it was surrounded.

TIBERIUS

He was large and strong of frame, and of a stature above the average; broad of shoulders and chest; well proportioned and symmetrical from head to foot. His left hand was the more nimble and stronger, and its joints were so powerful that he could bore through a fresh, sound apple with his finger, and break the head of a boy, or even a young man, with a fillip. He was of fair complexion and wore his hair rather long at the back, so much so as even to cover the nape of his neck; which was apparently a family trait. His face was handsome, but would break out on a sudden with many pimples. His eyes were unusually large and, strange to say, had the power of seeing even at night and in the dark, but only for a short time when first opened after sleep; presently they grew dim-sighted again. He strode along with his neck stiff and bent forward, usually with a stern countenance and for the most part in silence, never or very rarely conversing with his companions, and then speaking with great deliberation and with a kind of supple movement of his fingers.

The people were so glad of his death, that at the first news of it some ran about shouting, 'Tiberius to the Tiber,' while others prayed to Mother Earth and the Manes to allow the dead man no abode except among the damned. Still others threatened his body with the hook and the Stairs of Mourning. . . . When the funeral procession left Misenum, many cried out that the body ought rather to be carried to Atella, and half-burned in the amphitheater; but it was taken to Rome by the soldiers and reduced to ashes with public ceremonies.

GAIUS CALIGULA

On the ninth day before the Kalends of February at about the seventh hour he hesitated whether or not to get up for luncheon, since his stomach was still disordered from excess of food on the day before, but at length he came out at the persuasion of his friends. In the covered passage through which he had to pass, some boys of good birth, who had been summoned from Asia to appear on the stage, were rehearsing their parts, and he stopped to watch and encourage them; and had not the leader of the troop complained that he had a chill, he would have returned and had the performance given at once. From this point there are two versions of the story: some say that as he was talking with the boys, Cherea came up behind and gave him a deep cut in the neck, having first cried, 'Do your duty,' and that then the tribune Cornelius Sabinus, who was the other conspirator and faced Gaius, stabbed him in the breast. Others say that Sabinus, after getting rid of the crowd through centurions who were in the plot, asked for the watchword, as soldiers do, and that when Gaius gave him 'Jupiter,' he cried 'So be it,' and as Gaius looked around, he split his jaw-bone with a blow of his sword. As he lay upon the ground and with writhing limbs called out that he still lived, the others dispatched him with thirty wounds; for the general signal was 'Strike again.' Some even thrust their swords through his privates. At the beginning of the disturbance his bearers ran to his aid with their poles, and presently the Germans of his body-guard, and they slew several of his assassins, as well as some inoffensive senators.

He lived twenty-nine years and ruled three years, ten months and eight days. His body was conveyed secretly to the gardens of the Lamian family, where it was partly consumed on a hastily erected pyre and buried beneath a light covering of turf; later his sisters on their return from exile dug it up, cremated it, and consigned it to the tomb. Before this was done, it is well known that the caretakers of the gardens were disturbed by ghosts, and that in the house where he was slain not a night passed without some fearsome apparition, until at last the house itself was destroyed by fire. With him died his wife Cæsonia, stabbed with a sword by a centurion, while his daughter's brains were dashed out against a wall.

THE DEIFIED CLAUDIUS

The public works which he completed were great and essential rather than numerous; they were in particular the following: an aqueduct begun by Gaius; also the outlet of Lake Fucinus and the harbor at Ostia, although in the case of the last two he knew that Augustus had refused the former to the Marsians in spite of their frequent requests, and that the latter had often been thought of by the Deified Julius, but given up because of its difficulty. He brought to the city on stone arches the cool and abundant fountains of the Claudian aqueduct, one of which is called Cæruleus and the other Curtius and Albudignus, and at the same time the spring of the new Anio, distributing them into many beautifully ornamental pools. He made the attempt on the Fucine Lake as much in the hope of gain as of glory, inasmuch as there were some who agreed to drain it at their own cost, provided the land that was uncovered be given to them. He finished the outlet, which was three miles in length, partly by leveling and partly by tunneling a mountain, a work of great difficulty and requiring eleven years, although he had thirty thousand men at work all the time without interruption. He constructed the harbor at Ostia by building curving breakwaters on the right and left, while before the entrance he placed a mole in deep water. To give this mole a firmer foundation, he first sank the ship in which the great obelisk had been brought from Egypt, and then securing it by piles, built upon it a very lofty tower after the model of the Pharos at Alexandria, to be lighted at night and guide the course of ships. . . .

He was eager for food and drink at all times and in all places. Once when he was holding court in the forum of Augustus and had caught the savor of a meal which was preparing for the Salii in the temple of Mars hard by, he left the tribunal, went up where the priests were, and took his place at their table. He hardly ever left the dining-room until he was stuffed and soaked; then he went to sleep at once, lying on his back with his mouth open, and a feather was put down his throat to relieve his stomach. He slept but little at a time, for he was usually awake before midnight; but he would sometimes drop off in the daytime while holding court and could hardly be roused when the advocates raised their voices for the purpose.

NERO

THE ARTIST'S RETURN

Returning from Greece, since it was at Naples that he had made his first appearance, he entered that city with white horses through a part of the wall which had been thrown down, as is customary with victors in the sacred games. In like manner he entered Antium, then Albanum, and finally Rome; but at Rome he rode in the chariot which Augustus had used in his triumphs in days gone by, and wore a purple robe and a Greek cloak adorned with stars of gold, bearing on his head the Olympic crown and in his right hand the Pythian, while the rest were carried before him with inscriptions telling where he had won them and against what competitors, and giving the titles of the songs or the subject of the plays. His car was followed by his claque as by the escort of a triumphal procession, who shouted that they were the attendants of Augustus and the soldiers of his triumph. Then through the arch of the Circus Maximus, which was thrown down, he made his way across the Velabrum and the Forum to the Palatine and the temple of Apollo. All along the route victims were slain, the streets were sprinkled from time to time with perfume, while birds, ribbons, and sweetmeats were showered upon him. He placed the sacred crowns in his bed-chambers around his couches, as well as statues representing him in the guise of a lyre-player; and he had a coin, too, struck with the same device. So far from neglecting or relaxing his practice of the art after this, he never addressed the soldiers except by letter or in a speech delivered by another, to save his voice; and he never did anything for amusement or in earnest without an elocutionist by his side, to warn him to spare his vocal organs and hold a handkerchief to his mouth. To many men he offered friendship or announced his hostility, according as they had applauded him lavishly or grudgingly.

THE GOLDEN HOUSE

There was nothing, however, in which he was more ruinously prodigal than in building. He made a palace extending all the way from the Palatine to the Esquiline, which at first he called the House of Passage, but when it was burned shortly after its completion and rebuilt, the Golden House. Its size and splendor will be sufficiently indicated by the following details. Its vestibule was large enough to contain a colossal statue of the emperor a hundred and twenty feet high; and it was so extensive that it had a triple colonnade a mile long. There was a pond too, like a sea, surrounded with buildings to represent cities, besides tracts of country, varied by tilled fields, vineyards, pastures and woods, with great numbers of wild and domestic animals. In the rest of the house all parts were overlaid with gold and adorned with gems and mother-of-pearl. There were dining-rooms with fretted ceilings of ivory, whose panels could turn and shower down flowers and were fitted with pipes for sprinkling the guests with perfumes. The main banquet hall was circular and constantly revolved day and night, like the heavens. He had baths supplied with sea water and sulphur water. When the edifice was finished in this style and he dedicated it, he deigned to say nothing more in the way of approval than that he was at last beginning to be housed like a human being.

THE LAST DAY AND NIGHT

When meanwhile word came that the other armies had revolted, he tore to pieces the dispatches which were handed to him as he was dining, tipped over the table, and dashed to the ground two favorite drinking cups, which he called 'Homeric,' because they were carved with scenes from Homer's poems. Then taking some poison from Locusta and putting it into a golden box, he crossed over into the Servilian gardens, where he tried to induce the tribunes and centurions of the Guard to accompany him in his flight, first sending his most trustworthy freedmen to Ostia, to get a fleet ready. But when some gave evasive answers and some openly refused, one even cried:

'Is it so dreadful a thing then to die?'

Whereupon he turned over various plans in his mind, whether to go as a suppliant to the Parthians or Galba, or to appear to the people on the rostra, dressed in black, and beg as pathetically as he could for pardon for his past offenses; and if he could not soften their hearts, to entreat them at least to allow him the prefecture of Egypt. Afterwards a speech composed for this purpose was found in his writing desk; but it is thought that he did not dare to deliver it for fear of being torn to pieces before he could reach the Forum.

Having therefore put off further consideration to the following day, he awoke about midnight and finding that the guard of soldiers had left, he sprang from his bed and sent for all his friends. Since no reply came back from anyone, he went himself to their rooms with a few followers. But finding that all the doors were closed and that no one replied to him, he returned to his own chamber, from which now the very caretakers had fled, taking with them even the bed-clothing and the box of poison. Then he at once called for the gladiator Spiculus or any other adept at whose hand he might find death, and when no one appeared, he cried 'Have I then neither friend nor foe?' and ran out as if to throw himself into the Tiber.

Changing his purpose again, he sought for some retired place, where he could hide and collect his thoughts; and when his freedman Phaon offered his villa in the suburbs between the Via Nomentana and the Via Salaria near the fourth milestone, just as he was, barefooted and in his tunic, he put on a faded cloak, covered his head, and holding a handkerchief before his face, mounted a horse with only four attendants, one of whom was Sporus. At once he was startled by a shock of earthquake and a flash of lightning full in his face, and he heard the shouts of the soldiers from the camp hard by, as they prophesied destruction for him and success for Galba. He also heard one of the wayfarers whom he met say: 'These men are after Nero,' and another ask: 'Is there anything new in the city about Nero?' Then his horse took fright at the smell of a corpse which had been thrown out into the road, his face was exposed, and a retired soldier of the Guard recognized him and saluted him. When they came to a by-path leading to the villa, they turned the horses loose and he made his way amid bushes and brambles and along a path through a thicket of reeds to the back wall of the house, with great difficulty and only when a robe was thrown down for him to walk on. Here the aforesaid Phaon urged him to hide for a time in a pit, from which sand had been dug, but he declared that he would not go under ground while still alive, and after waiting for a while until a secret entrance into the villa could be made, he scooped up in his hand some water to drink from a pool close by, saying: 'This is Nero's distilled water.' Then, as his cloak had been torn by the thorns, he pulled out the twigs which had pierced it, and crawling on all fours through a narrow passage that had been dug, he entered the villa and lay down in the first room he came to, on a couch with a common mattress, over which an old cloak had been thrown. Though suffering from hunger and renewed thirst, he refused some coarse bread which was offered him, but drank a little lukewarm water.

At last, while his companions one and all urged him to save himself as soon as possible from the indignities that threatened him, he bade them dig a grave in his presence, proportioned to the size of his own person, collect any bits of marble that could be found, and at the same time bring water and wood for presently disposing of his body. As each of these things was done, he wept and said again and again: 'What an artist the world is losing!'

While he hesitated, a letter was brought to Phaon by one of his couriers. Nero snatching it from his hand read that he had been pronounced a public enemy by the senate, and that they were seeking him to punish him in the ancient fashion; and he asked what manner of punishment that was. When he learned that the criminal was stripped, fastened by the neck in a fork and then beaten to death with rods, in mortal terror he seized two daggers which he had brought with him, and then, after trying the point of each, put them up again, pleading that the fated hour had not yet come. Now he would beg Sporus to begin to lament and wail, and now entreat someone to help him take his life by setting him the example; anon he reproached himself for his cowardice in such words as these: 'To live is a scandal and shame—this does not become Nero, does not become him—one should be resolute at such times—come, rouse thyself!' And now the horsemen were at hand who had orders to take him off alive. When he heard them, he quavered:

'Hark, now strikes on my ear the trampling of swift-footed coursers!'

and drove a dagger into his throat, aided by Epaphroditus, his private secretary. He was all but dead when a centurion rushed in, and as he placed a cloak to the wound, pretending that he had come to aid him, Nero merely gasped: 'Too late!' and 'This is fidelity!' With these words he was gone, with eyes so set and starting from their sockets that all who saw him shuddered with horror. First and beyond all else he had forced from his companions a promise to let no one have his head, but to contrive in some way that he be buried un mutilated. And this was granted by Icelus, Galba's freedman, who had shortly before been released from the bondage to which he was consigned at the beginning of the revolt.

He was buried at a cost of two hundred thousand sesterces and laid out in white robes embroidered with gold, which he had worn on the Kalends of January. His ashes were deposited by his nurses, Egloge and Alexandria, accompanied by his mistress Acte, in the family tomb of the Domitii on the summit of the Hill of Gardens, which is visible from the Campus Martius. In that monument his sarcophagus of porphyry, with an altar of Luna marble standing above it, is enclosed by a balustrade of Thasian stone.

THE DEIFIED VESPASIAN

Yet even so he could not be rid of his former ill-repute for covetousness. The Alexandrians persisted in calling him Cybiosactes, the surname of one of their kings who was scandalously stingy. Even at his funeral, Favor, a leading actor of mimes, who wore his mask and, according to the usual custom, imitated the actions and words of the deceased during his lifetime, having asked the procurators in a loud voice how much his funeral procession would cost, and hearing the reply 'Ten million sesterces,' cried out: 'Give me a hundred thousand and fling me even into the Tiber.'

He was well built, with strong, sturdy limbs, and the expression of one who was straining. . . .

Not only at dinner but on all other occasions he was most affable, and he turned off many matters with a jest; for he was very ready with sharp sayings, albeit of a low and buffoonish kind, so that he did not even refrain from obscene expressions. Yet many of his remarks are still remembered which are full of fine wit, and among them the following. When an ex-consul called Mestrius Florus called his attention to the fact that the proper pronunciation was plaustra rather than plostra, he greeted him next day as 'Flaurus.' . . . On the report of a deputation that a colossal statue of great cost had been voted him at public expense, he demanded to have it set up at once, and holding out his open hand, said that the base was ready. He did not cease his jokes even when in apprehension of death and in extreme danger; for when among other portents the Mausoleum opened on a sudden and a comet appeared in the heavens, he declared that the former applied to Junia Calvina of the family of Augustus, and the latter to the king of the Parthians, who wore his hair long; and as death drew near, he said: 'Woe's me. Methinks I'm turning into a god.'

THE DEIFIED TITUS

Titus, of the same surname as his father, was the delight and darling of the human race; such surpassing ability had he, by nature, art, or good fortune, to win the affections of all men, and that, too, which is no easy task, while he was emperor; for as a private citizen, and even during his father's rule, he did not escape hatred, much less public criticism.

He was born on the third day before the Kalends of January, in the year memorable for the death of Gaius, in a mean house near the Septizonium and in a very small dark room besides; for it still remains and is on exhibition. . . .

Even in boyhood his bodily and mental gifts were conspicuous and they became more and more so as he advanced in years. He had a handsome person, in which there was no less dignity than grace, and was uncommonly strong, although he was not tall of stature and had a rather protruding belly. His memory was extraordinary and he had an aptitude for almost all the arts, both of war and of peace. Skilful in arms and horsemanship, he made speeches and wrote verses in Latin and Greek with ease and readiness, and even off-hand. He was besides not unacquainted with music, but sang and played the harp agreeably and skilfully. I have heard from many sources that he used also to write shorthand with great speed and would amuse himself by playful contests with his secretaries; also that he could imitate any handwriting that he had ever seen and often declared that he might have been the prince of forgers. . . .

He was most kindly by nature, and whereas in accordance with a custom established by Tiberius, all the Cæsars who followed him refused to regard favors granted by previous emperors as valid, unless they had themselves conferred the same ones on the same individuals, Titus was the first to ratify them all in a single edict, without allowing himself to be asked. Moreover, in the case of other requests made of him, it was his fixed rule not to let anyone go away without hope. Even when his household officials warned him that he was promising more than he could perform, he said that it was not right for anyone to go away sorrowful from an interview with his emperor. On another occasion, remembering at dinner that he had done nothing for anybody all that day, he gave utterance to that memorable and praiseworthy remark: 'Friends, I have lost a day.'

The whole body of the people in particular he treated with such indulgence on all occasions, that once at a gladiatorial show he declared that he would give it, 'not after his own inclinations, but those of the spectators'; and what is more, he kept his word. For he refused nothing which anyone asked, and even urged them to ask for what they wished. Furthermore, he openly displayed his partiality for Thracian gladiators and bantered the people about it by words and gestures, always however preserving his dignity, as well as observing justice. Not to omit any act of condescension, he sometimes bathed in the baths which he had built, in company with the common people.

There were some dreadful disasters during his reign, such as the eruption of Mount Vesuvius in Campania, a fire at Rome which continued three days and as many nights, and a plague the like of which had hardly ever been known before. In these many great calamities he showed not merely the concern of an emperor, but even a father's surpassing love, now offering consolation in edicts, and now lending aid so far as his means allowed. He chose commissioners by lot from among the ex-consuls for the relief of Campania; and the property of those who lost their lives by Vesuvius and had no heirs left alive he applied to the rebuilding of the buried cities.

DOMITIAN

The day before he was killed he gave orders to have some apples which were offered him kept until the following day, and added: 'If only I am spared to eat them'; then turning to his companions, he declared that on the following day the moon would be stained with blood in Aquarius, and that a deed would be done of which men would talk all over the world. At about midnight he was so terrified that he leaped from his bed. The next morning he conducted the trial of a soothsayer sent from Germany, who when consulted about the lightning strokes had foretold a change of rulers, and condemned him to death. While he was vigorously scratching a festering wart on his forehead, and had drawn blood, he said: 'May this be all.' Then he asked the time, and by prearrangement the sixth hour was announced to him, instead of the fifth, which he feared. Filled with joy at this, and believing all danger now past, he was hastening to the bath, when his chamberlain Parthenius changed his purpose by announcing that someone had called about a matter of great moment and would not be put off. Then he dismissed all his attendants and went to his bedroom, where he was slain.

Concerning the nature of the plot and the manner of his death, this is about all that became known. As the conspirators were deliberating when and how to attack him, whether at the bath or at dinner, Stephanus, Domitilla's steward, at the time under accusation for embezzlement, offered his aid and counsel. To avoid suspicion, he wrapped up his left arm in woollen bandages for some days, pretending that he had injured it, and concealed in them a dagger. Then pretending to betray a conspiracy and for that reason being given an audience, he stabbed the emperor in the groin as he was reading a paper which the assassin handed him, and stood in a state of amazement. As the wounded prince attempted to resist, he was slain with seven wounds by Clodianus, a subaltern, Maximus, a freedman of Parthenius, Satur, decurion of the chamberlains, and a gladiator from the imperial school. A boy who was engaged in his usual duty of attending to the Lares in the bedroom, and so was a witness of the murder, gave this additional information. He was bidden by Domitian, immediately after he was dealt the first blow, to hand him the dagger hidden under his pillow and to call the servants; but he found nothing at the head of the bed save the hilt, and besides all the doors were closed. Meanwhile the emperor grappled with Stephanus and bore him to the ground, where they struggled for a long time, Domitian trying now to wrest the dagger from his assailant's hands and now to gouge out his eyes with his lacerated fingers.

He was slain on the fourteenth day before the Kalends of October in the forty-fifth year of his age and the fifteenth of his reign. His corpse was carried out on a common bier by those who bury the poor, and his nurse Phyllis cremated it at her suburban estate on the Via Latina; but his ashes she secretly carried to the temple of the Flavian family and mingled them with those of Julia, daughter of Titus, whom she had also reared.

He was tall of stature, with a modest expression and a high color. His eyes were large, but his sight was somewhat dim. He was handsome and graceful too, especially when a young man, and indeed in his whole body with the exception of his feet, the toes of which were somewhat cramped. In later life he had the further disfigurement of baldness, a protruding belly, and spindling legs, though the latter had become thin from a long illness. He was so conscious that the modesty of his expression was in his favor, that he once made this boast in the senate: 'So far, at any rate, you have approved my heart and my countenance.' He was so sensitive about his baldness, that he regarded it as a personal insult if anyone else was twitted with that defect in jest or in earnest; though in a book 'On the Care of the Hair,' which he published and dedicated to a friend, he wrote the following by way of consolation to the man and himself:

10 'Do you not see that I too am tall and comely to look on? And yet the same fate awaits my hair, and I bear with resignation the ageing of my locks in youth. Be assured that nothing is more pleasing 15 than beauty, but nothing shorter-lived.'

He was incapable of exertion and seldom went about the city on foot, while on his campaigns and journeys he rarely rode on horseback, but was regularly carried in a litter. He took no interest in arms, but was particularly devoted to archery. There are many who have more than once seen him slay a hundred wild beasts of different kinds on his Alban estate, and purposely 25 kill some of them with two successive shots in such a way that the arrows gave the effect of horns. Sometimes he would have a slave stand at a distance and hold out the palm of his right hand for a mark, 30 with the fingers spread; then he directed his arrows with such accuracy that they passed harmlessly between the fingers.

At the beginning of his rule he neglected liberal studies, although he provided for 35 having the libraries, which were destroyed by fire, renewed at very great expense, seeking everywhere for copies of the lost works, and sending scribes to Alexandria to transcribe and correct them. Yet he 40 never took any pains to become acquainted with history or poetry, or even to acquiring an ordinarily good style. He read nothing except the memoirs and transactions of Tiberius Cæsar; for his letters, speeches and proclamations he relied on others' 45 talents. Yet his conversation was not inelegant, and some of his sayings were even noteworthy.

VII. THE DECLINE OF PAGANISM (A.D. 138-417)

The onsets of the North, which for the five hundred years since the descent of the Gauls in B.C. 390 Rome had been able to defy, increased in frequency and seriousness from the time of Marcus Aurelius, who died in camp defending the frontiers, to the actual taking of the city by the Goths under Alaric in 410, when the falling apart of Roman territories began which culminated with the end of the Western empire, whose date for convenience's sake is usually stated as 476. The whole long period was a gradual dying of classical civilization in which literature and all the arts as well as government and society marched wearily hand in hand toward the gloom of the Middle Ages. The third century and the earlier half of the fourth were especially a period of non-production, and the later fourth century was only the Indian summer of literature. The Words to My Soul of the Emperor Hadrian seem almost an utterance of the great empire itself as it looks back upon past glories and forward to struggle, decay, and death:

Soul of me, vague, debonnair,
Guest of this body, and friend,
Say whither now wilt thou fare,
Pallid and rigid, and bare,
Little soul,
All thy jests at an end?

MARCUS CORNELIUS FRONTO (About A.D. 100-167)

MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS (A.D. 121-180)

Fronto, tutor to Marcus Aurelius, was a native of Cirta, the modern Constantine, in Africa, and his pupil was one of the few emperors born in Rome. He was much honored by both governmental and intellectual circles in the capital, and was not only the able instructor of the young prince but his intimate and valued friend in later years. The letters here given reveal the character of Fronto's ambition as teacher and stylist, the frank disposition of his imperial pupil, and the affectionate relation between them.

The translation is by C. R. Haines, and is used with the consent of the Loeb Classical Library.

MARCUS AURELIUS TO FRONTO

Hail, my sweetest of masters. We are well. I slept somewhat late owing to my slight cold, which seems now to have subsided. So from five a.m. till nine I spent the time partly in reading some of Cato's Agriculture and partly in writing not quite such wretched stuff, by heavens, as yesterday. Then, after paying my respects to my father, I relieved my throat, I will not say by gargling—though the word gargarisso is, I believe, found in Novius and elsewhere—but by swallowing honey water as far as the gullet and ejecting it again. After easing my throat I went off to my father and attended him at a sacrifice. Then we went to luncheon. What do you think I ate? A wee bit of bread, though I saw others devouring beans, onions, and herrings full of roe. We then worked hard at grape-gathering, and had a good sweat, and were merry and, as the poet says, 'still left some clusters hanging high as gleanings of the vintage.' After six o'clock we came home.

I did but little work and that to no purpose. Then I had a long chat with my little mother as she sat on the bed. My talk was this: 'What do you think my Fronto is now doing?' Then she: 'And what do you think my Gratia is doing?' Then I: 'And what do you think our little sparrow, the wee Gratia, is doing?' Whilst we were chattering in this way and disputing which of us two loved the one or other of you two the better, the gong sounded, an intimation that my father had gone to his bath. So we had supper after we had bathed in the oil-press room; I do not mean bathed in the oil-press room, but when we had bathed, had supper there, and we enjoyed hearing the yokels chaffing one another. After coming back, before I turn over and snore, I get my task done and give my dearest of masters an account of the day's doings, and if I could miss him more, I would not grudge wasting away a little more. Farewell, my Fronto, wherever you are, most honey-sweet, my love, my delight. How is it between you and me? I love you and you are away.

FRONTO TO MARCUS AURELIUS

At this point, perhaps, you will have long been asking in what category I should place M. Tullius, who is hight the head and source of Roman eloquence. I consider him on all occasions to have used the most beautiful words, and to have been magnificent above all other orators in embellishing the subject which he wished to set out. But he seems to me to have been far from disposed to search out words with especial care, whether from greatness of mind, or to escape toil, or from the assurance that what others can scarcely find with careful search would be his at call without the need of searching. And so, from a most attentive perusal of all his writings, I think I have ascertained that he has with the utmost copiousness and opulence handled all other kinds of words—words literal and figurative, simple and compound and, what are conspicuous everywhere in his writings, noble words, and oftentimes also exquisite ones; and yet in all his speeches you will find very few words indeed that are unexpected and unlooked for, such as are not to be hunted out save with study and care and watchfulness and the treasuring up of old poems in the memory. By an unexpected and unlooked-for word I mean one which is brought out when the hearer or reader is not expecting it or thinking of it, yet so that if you withdrew it and asked the reader himself to think of a substitute, he would be able to find either no other at all or one not so fitted to express the intended meaning. Wherefore I commend you greatly for the care and diligence you show in digging deep for your word and fitting it to your meaning. But, as I said at first, there lies a great danger in the enterprise lest the word be applied unsuitably or with a want of clearness or a lack of refinement, as by a man of half-knowledge, for it is much better to use common and everyday words than unusual and far-fetched ones, if there is little difference in real meaning.

AULUS GELLIUS (About A.D. 130-180)

Possibly of African origin, educated at Rome, an admirer of Fronto, for some time a resident and student in Athens, Aulus Gellius compiled twenty books of miscellany which he called Noctes Atticæ, or Attic Nights, because he began them during winter evenings in Attica not far outside of Athens. The work shows him to have had a broad interest in language, literature, history, philosophy, science, religion. It is uneven in matter and execution, but is genial, frequently lighted by humor, full of human interest, and contains many items of curious and valuable knowledge which would otherwise be lost.

EPITAPHS OF THE POETS

Because of their distinction and charm, I think I ought to record in these commentaries the epitaphs of the three illustrious poets, Gnæus Nævius, Plautus, and Marcus Pacuvius, which they themselves composed and left to be carved on their tombs.

The epitaph of Nævius is full of Campanian pride: its testimony is warranted,¹⁰ only it was written by himself:

'If it were fit that mortals should mourn immortals, the heavenly Muses would weep for Nævius the poet: so true is it that since he passed to the treasure-house of Orcus they have¹⁵ forgotten at Rome how to speak the Latin tongue.'

The epitaph of Plautus we should hesitate to regard as his composition, were it²⁰ not set down by Varro in his first book on the poets:

'Since Plautus passed away, Comedy is in mourning, the stage is deserted, and Laughter, Gamesomeness, Jest, and meterless Numbers have²⁵ all been shedding tears together.'

The epitaph of Pacuvius is most modest and simple, and is worthy of his exceeding good taste and seriousness:

'Young man, though you be in haste, this stone asks you to look upon it and to read what is there written. Here are laid the bones of Marcus Pacuvius: I wished you to be not unaware of this. Fare you well.'

ROMULUS AND WINE

Lucius Piso Frugi in the first book of his Annals, writing about the life and the manner of living of King Romulus, is charmingly simple in both matter and style. The passage to which I refer is as follows: They say, too, that Romulus, invited once to dinner, did not drink much there because he had business on the next day. Said his friends, 'Romulus, if all men did as you are doing, wine would be cheaper.' He answered them, 'No, on the contrary, it would be dear—if every man should drink⁵ all he wanted; for I have drunk all I wanted.'

FOREIGN LANGUAGE

Quintus Ennius used to say he had three hearts, because he could speak Greek, Oscan, and Latin. But Mithridates, the famous king of Pontus and Bithynia who was conquered by Gnæus Pompeius, had a command of the languages of the two-and-twenty nations over which he ruled. He never employed an interpreter in his conferences with the men of all these nations, but whenever he had occasion to summon³⁰ any one of them he spoke with him in his own tongue and used his speech with no less expertness than if he were of the same race.

PERVIGILIUM VENERIS

Whether of the times of Hadrian or of two hundred years later, The Eve of St. Venus, as Mackail calls this poem, is regarded with him by all critics as 'the first clear note of the new romanticism which transformed classical into medieval literature,' 'the earliest known poem belonging in spirit to the Middle Ages.' The first few stanzas and the last illustrate the character of the poem—its permeation by nature, its colors and perfume, its alliterations and assonances, its artful repetitions, and its striking refrain. The original is in about one hundred trochaic seven-foot lines, with a frequently recurring one-line refrain. It may have been used in connection with the nocturnal festival of Venus.

Cecil Clementi, the translator (1911), was English assistant colonial secretary at Hong Kong.

THE VIGIL OF VENUS

Spring is new and comes with singing! In the spring the world takes birth:
In the spring birds mate: at spring-tide all the loves join heart in mirth:
And the wood unbinds her tresses at the wooing of fond showers:
For to-morrow Love's Queen Regent weaves her myrtle-trellised bowers, Plaited green with leafy tendrils, underneath the sylvan shade: 5
For to-morrow reigns Dione, high-throned, royally arrayed!
Know'st thou not love's joy and sorrow? Thou shalt learn of love to-morrow!

'Tis the eve of that day's nuptials whereon primal Æther wed:
For 'twas spring-tide when our Father all the year from rain-clouds bred.
Down he rained upon Earth's bosom, wooing thus his gentle wife, 10
Whereby, blent in one great body, gave he to all seedlings life.
Know'st thou well love's joy and sorrow? Thou shalt love again to-morrow!

Then from blood-froth on his surface, in a ball of lambent foam,
All among his azure squadrons, where his two-foot horses roam,
Ocean fashioned our Dione from the swelling surf-wave's womb. 15
She herself, Creation's Sovereign, inwardly the mind and veins,
Instinct with her permeant spirit, by her secret strength constrains:
And through sky, through earth and ocean, where her nether path is strown,
Hath she deep in nature's seed-track impress of her passage sown,
And hath bid the ways of child-birth to the whole wide world be known. 20
Know'st thou not love's joy and sorrow? Love will dawn for thee to-morrow!

Hers the hand that paints the season purpling into gems of flower:
Her own impulse swells the bosom, tumid by Favonius' power,
Into burgeoning luxuriance. She herself, when airs of night
Have bequeathed to earth their moisture, strews the dew in starry light. 25
Lo! the tears of dew flash trembling with their downward drooping weight:
Yet each drop with tiny orbit checks awhile its headlong fate.
Know'st thou well love's joy and sorrow? Love will weep for thee to-morrow!

Lo! the flow'ry purple-jewels have betrayed their purity:
For that moisture which the starlight rains from evening's tranquil sky, 30
Loosed at dawn their virgin-bosoms from the mantle's humid red:
By Dione's will at dawning dewy virgin-roses wed—

Roses made of Paphia's life-blood and the burning kiss of Love,
Made of gems, and made of fire-flames, and the sunlight from above,
Will to-morrow yield the crimson, hidden by their fiery stole, 35
Unashamed each to one husband, bound in bridal of the soul.
Know'st thou not love's joy and sorrow? Thine be love's pursuit to-morrow! . . .

She is singing: I am silent. Will my spring-time never come?
When shall I be like the swallow and my voice no longer dumb?
I have lost the Muse by silence: Phœbus will not heed my breath: 40
So Amyclæ, through its silence, found in very silence death.
Hast thou known love's joy and sorrow? Love be thine again to-morrow!

APULEIUS (Born About A.D. 125)

Born at Madaura in Africa, educated in Carthage and Athens, traveler in Greece and Asia Minor, advocate in Rome, initiate in various religions, priest of the imperial cult, rhetorician, student of Plato, writer, and lecturer, Apuleius lived a varied and interesting life, finally settling down in Carthage. He wrote the Apology, a diverting defence against the charge of magic, Plato and His Teaching, The Demon of Socrates, Flowers of Eloquence, an anthology of his own lectures and addresses, and The Transformations, or Metamorphoses, also called The Golden Ass. The eleven books of The Golden Ass, the fantastic tale of a commercial traveler in Thessaly turned by magic into an ass and restored to human shape after a series of most diverting adventures as the property of robbers, a miller, a gardener, a troop of charlatan priests, and others, are Apuleius' real title to fame. Besides the human interest of the various tales which are strung on the thread of the main tale, there are two features of special value: one, the story of Cupid and Psyche, a folk tale widely known and here told for the first time in literary form, and the other, the account of the apparition of Isis, the great procession of the goddess in which the hero is restored to human form by the eating of roses, and his preparation by retreat, fasting, and prayer for the priesthood into which he is initiated. Neither the style nor the morals of The Golden Ass are chaste, but the style is appropriate to the matter, and the whole is everything that sparkles and entertains.

The translation is by W. Adlington, 1566, revised by S. Gaselee, and is used with the permission of the Loeb Classical Library.

METAMORPHOSES; OR, THE GOLDEN ASS

LUCIUS BECOMES THE GOLDEN ASS

'But I pray you (which I had almost forgotten) tell me by what means, when I am an owl, I shall return to my pristine shape and become Lucius again?' 'Fear not for that,' quoth she, 'for my mistress hath taught me the way to bring all to pass, and to turn again the figures of such as are transformed into the shapes of men. . . .'

Which when she had often spoken she went all trembling into the chamber, and took a box out of the coffer, which I first kissed and embraced, and prayed that I might have good success in my purpose to fly. And then I put off all my garments and greedily thrust my hand into the box and took out a good deal of ointment, and after that I had well rubbed every part and member of my body, I hovered with mine arms, and moved myself, looking still when I should be changed into a bird as Pamphile was; and behold neither feathers did burgeon out nor appearance of wings, but verily my hair did turn into ruggedness and my tender skin wore tough and hard; my fingers and toes leaving the number of five grew together into hooves, and from the end of my back grew a great tail, and now my face became monstrous and my mouth long and my nostrils wide, my lips hanging down, and mine ears exceedingly increased with bristles; neither could I see any comfort of my transformation, save that the nature of my members was increasing likewise to the great discomfiture of Fotis, and so without all help (viewing every part of my poor body) I perceived that I was no bird, but a plain ass. Then I thought to blame Fotis, but being deprived as well of language as human gesture, I did all that I could, and looked upon her with hanging lips and watery eyes, as though to reproach her; but she (as soon as she espied me in such sort) smote her face angrily with her hands and cried out: 'Alas, poor wretch that I am, I am utterly cast away. The fear that I was in and my haste hath beguiled me, but especially the mistaking of the box hath deceived me. But it matters not so much, since sooner a medicine may be gotten for this than for any other thing: for if thou couldst get roses and eat them, thou shouldst be delivered from the shape of an ass, and become my Lucius again. . . .

And by and by the doors were broken down and a troop of thieves entered in, and kept every part and corner of the house with weapons.

The ass is taken by the thieves and used to carry their booty. From one raid they bring back to their cave a maiden, who, frightened by a dream, is comforted by her old-wife custodian's tale of Cupid and Psyche.

THE STORY OF CUPID AND PSYCHE

Then the old woman, rendering out like sighs, began to speak in this sort: 'My lady, take a good heart unto you, and be not afraid at feigned or strange visions or dreams, for as the visions of the day are accounted false and untrue, so the visions of the night do often chance contrary: and indeed to dream of weeping, beating, and killing is a token of good luck and prosperous change, whereas contrary, to dream of laughing, filling the belly with good cheer, or dalliance of love, is sign of sadness of heart, sickness of body, or other displeasure. But I will tell thee a pleasant old wives' tale to put away all thy sorrow and to revive thy spirits'; and so she began in this manner:

'There was sometime a certain king, inhabiting in the west parts, who had to wife a noble dame, by whom he had three daughters exceeding fair: of whom the two elder were of most comely shape and beauty, yet they did not excel all the praise and commendation of mortal speech; but the singular passing beauty and maidenly majesty of the youngest daughter was so far excellent, that no earthly tongue could by any means sufficiently express or set out the same: by reason whereof the citizens and strangers there, being inwardly pricked by zealous affection to behold her famous person, came daily by thousands to see her, and as astonished with admiration of her incomparable beauty did no less worship and reverence her, bringing their right hands to their lips, with the forefinger laid against the thumb, as tokens, and with other divine adorations, as if she were Lady Venus indeed: and shortly after the fame was spread into the next cities and bordering regions that the goddess whom the deep seas had borne and brought forth, and the froth of the foaming waves had nourished (to the intent to show her high magnificency and power in earth to such as before did honor and worship her) was now conversant amongst mortal men, or else that the earth and not the seas, by a new concourse and influence of the celestial planets, had budded and yielded forth a new Venus, endued with the flower of virginity. So daily more and more increased this opinion, and now was her flying fame dispersed into the next islands and well nigh into every part and province of the whole world. Whereupon innumerable strangers resorted from far countries, adventuring themselves by long journeys on land and by great travels on water, to behold this wonder of the age. By occasion whereof such a contempt grew towards the goddess Venus, that no person traveled unto the town Paphos nor unto Cnidos, no nor to the isle Cythera to worship her. Her liturgies were left out, her temples defaced, her couches contemned, her ceremonies neglected, and her bare altars unswept and foul with the ashes of old burnt sacrifice. For why, every person honored and worshiped this maiden instead of Venus, calling upon the divinity of that great goddess in a human form, and in the morning at her first coming abroad, offered unto her oblations, provided banquets, called her by the name of Venus which was not Venus indeed, and in her honor, as she walked in the streets, presented flowers and garlands in most reverent fashion.

'This sudden change and alteration of celestial honor unto the worship of a mortal maiden did greatly inflame and kindle the mind of very Venus, who (unable to temper herself from indignation, shaking her head in raging sort) reasoned with herself in this manner: "Behold I, the original of nature, the first beginning of all the elements, behold I, the Lady Venus of all the world, am now joined with a mortal maiden as a partaker of my honor; . . . but she, whatsoever she be, shall not for nought have usurped mine honor, but she shall shortly repent her of her unlawful love-liness."

'Then by and by she called her winged son Cupid, rash enough and hardy, who by his evil manners, contemning all public justice and law, armed with fire and arrows, running up and down in the nights from house to house, and corrupting the lawful marriages of every person, doth nothing (and yet he is not punished,) but that which is evil: and although he were of his own proper nature sufficient prone to work mischief, yet she egged him forward with words and brought him to the city, and showed him Psyche (for so the maiden was called) and having told him of her rival beauty, the cause of her anger, not without great rage, "I pray thee," quoth she, "My dear child, by the motherly bond of love, by the sweet wounds of thy piercing darts, 10 by the pleasant heat of thy fire, revenge fully the injury which is done to thy mother upon the false and disobedient beauty of a mortal maiden; and this beyond all I pray thee without delay, that she may fall in 15 desperate love with the most miserable creature living, the most poor, the most crooked, and the most vile, that there may be none found in all the world of like wretchedness." When she had spoken these 20 words, she embraced long and kissed often her son, and took her voyage towards the shore hard by, where the tides flow to and fro: and when she was come there, and had trodden with her rosy feet upon the top of 25 the trembling waters, then the deep sea became exceeding calm upon its whole surface, and at her will, as though she had before given her bidding, straightway appeared her servitors from the deep: for incontinent came the daughters of Nereus singing with tunes melodiously; Portunus with his bristled and rough beard of azure; Salacia with her bosom full of fish; Palæmon the little driver of the dolphin; 35 and the bands of Triton trumpeters leaping hither and thither, the one blowing on his shell with heavenly noise, another turning aside with a silken veil the burning heat of the fierce sun, another holding her mirror before his lady's eyes, others, yoked two 40 together, swimming beneath her car. Such was the company which followed Venus marching towards the middest Ocean.

Psyche, in obedience to the oracle, left on a lonely rock to be the prey of an unknown monster, is miraculously transported to the palace of Cupid.

Psyche's sisters prevail upon her to spy upon her husband, who takes flight and disappears. Venus at length overtakes her as she wanders in search of her lost Cupid, and persecutes her by setting endless tasks. Cupid, meanwhile, recovering from long illness and detention by his mother, appeals to Jupiter, who promises aid.

'Incontinently after, Jupiter commanded Mercury to bring up Psyche into the palace of heaven. And then he took a pot of immortality, and said: "Hold, Psyche, and drink to the end thou mayest be immortal, and that Cupid may never depart from thee, but be thine everlasting husband."

5 'By and by the great banquet and marriage feast was sumptuously prepared. Cupid sat down in the uppermost seat with his dear spouse between his arms: Juno likewise with Jupiter and all the other gods 10 in order: Ganymedes, the rustic boy, his own butler, filled the pot of Jupiter, and Bacchus served the rest: their drink was nectar, the wine of the gods. Vulcanus prepared supper, the Hours decked up the house with roses and other sweet flowers, 15 the Graces threw about balm, the Muses sang with sweet harmony, Apollo turned pleasantly to the harp, fair Venus danced finely to the music, and the entertainment was so ordained that while the Muses sang 20 in quire, Satyrus and Paniscus played on their pipes: and thus Psyche was married to Cupid, and after in due time she was delivered of a child, whom we call 25 Pleasure.'

This the trifling and drunken old woman declared to the captive maiden, but I, poor ass, not standing far off, was not a little sorry in that I lacked pen and book to write 30 so worthy a tale.

After passing through many hands, the ass becomes the property of strolling priests, by whose clever trickery he is diverted.

WITH THE PRIESTS

After that we had tarried there a few days at the cost and charges of the whole village, and had gotten much money by our divination and prognostication of things to come, those good priests invented a new means to pick men's purses; for they had one lot whereon was written this cheating 45 answer, which they gave for every enquiry; and it was: 'The oxen tied and yoked together: do plough the ground to the incient it may bring forth her increase.' And by these kind of lots they deceived many 50 of the simple sort: for if one had demanded whether he should have a good wife or no, they would say that his lot did testify the same, that he should be tied and yoked to a good woman and have increase of children: 55 if one demanded whether he should buy lands and possessions, they said that there was much reason in the mentioning of the oxen and the yoke, which foretold that he should have much ground that should yield his increase: if one demanded the advice of heaven whether he should have a good and prosperous voyage, they said he should have good success because that now these gentlest of beasts were joined together and ready to go, and that of the increase of the soil should be his profit: if one demanded whether he should vanquish his enemies, or prevail in pursuit of thieves, they said that the oracle foretold victory, for that his enemies' necks should be brought under the yoke, and that a rich and fertile gain should be gotten from the thieves' booty.

Thus by the telling of fortunes so cleverly and cunningly they gathered a great quantity of money; but when they were weary with giving of answers, they drove me away before them the next night through a lane which was more dangerous and stony than the way which we had gone before.

The next day I was carried to the market to be sold by the voice of the crier, and again my price was set; but I was sold at seven pence more than Philebus gave for me. There fortune to pass by a baker of the next village, who, after that he had bought a great deal of corn, bought me likewise to carry it home, and when he had well laden me therewith, he drove me through a stony and dangerous way to his bakehouse.

The wonderful adventures of the ass at length bring him to Corinth, where he escapes to the country and in a dream prays to Isis to restore his human shape.

THE GREAT PROCESSION

All things seemed that day to be joyful, as well all manner of beasts and the very houses, as also even the day itself seemed to rejoice. For after the hoar frost of the night ensued the hot and temperate sun, whereby the little birds, weening that the springtime had been come, did chirp and sing melodiously, making sweet welcome with their pleasant song to the mother of the stars, the parent of times, and mistress of all the world. The fruitful trees also, both those which rejoiced in their fertility and those which, being barren and sterile, were contented at the shadow which they could give, being loosened by the breathing of the south wind, and smiling by reason of their new buds now appearing, did gently move their branches and render sweet pleasant shrills; the seas were quiet from the roaring winds and the tempests of great waves; the heaven had chased away the clouds, and appeared fair and clear with his proper light.

Behold, then more and more appeared the beginnings of the pomps and processions, every one attired in regal manner, according to his proper habit. One was girded about the middle like a man of arms; another bare a spear, and had a cloak caught up and high shoes as a hunter; another was attired in a robe of silk, and socks of gold, with fine ornament, having long hair added and fixed upon his head, and walked delicately in form of a woman; there was another which wore leg harness and bare a target, an helmet and a spear, like unto a gladiator, as one might believe; after him marched one attired in purple, with the rods borne by vergers before him, like a magistrate; after him followed one with a mantle, a staff, a pair of pantofles, and with a beard as long as any goat's, signifying a philosopher; after him went one with reeds and lime, betokening him a fowler, and another with hooks, declaring a fisher. I saw there a meek and tame bear, which in matron habit was carried on a stool; an ape with a bonnet of woven stuff on his head, and covered with saffron lawn, resembling the Phrygian shepherd Ganymede, and bearing a cup of gold in his hand; an ass had wings glued to his back and went after an old man, whereby you would judge the one to be Pegasus and the other Bellerophon, and at both would you laugh well. Amongst these pleasures and popular delectations, which wandered hither and thither, you might see the peculiar pomp of the saving goddess triumphantly march forward. The women attired in white vestments, and rejoicing in that they bare garlands and flowers upon their heads, bespread the way with herbs, which they bare in their aprons, where this regal and devout procession should pass. Others carried shining mirrors behind them which were turned towards the goddess as she came, to shew to her those which came after as though they would meet her. Others bare combs of ivory, and declared by their gesture and motions of their arms and fingers that they were ordained and ready to dress and adorn the goddess's hair. Others dropped in the ways, as they went, balm and other precious ointments. Then came a great number, as well of men as of women, with lamps, candles, torches, and other lights, doing honor thereby to her that was born of the celestial stars. After that sounded the musical harmony of instruments, pipes and flutes in most pleasant measure. Then came a fair company of youth appareled in white vestments and festal array, singing both meter and verse with a comely grace which some studious poet had made by favor of the Muses, the words whereof did set forth the first ceremonies of this great worship. In the mean season arrived the blowers of trumpets, which were dedicate unto mighty Sarapis, who, holding the same reed side-long towards their right ears, did give forth a ditty proper to the temple and the god: and likewise were there many officers and beadles, crying room for the goddess to pass. Then came the great company of men and women of all stations and of every age which were initiate and had taken divine orders, whose garments, being of the whitest linen, glistened all the streets over. The women had their hair anointed, and their heads covered with light linen; but the men had their crowns shaven and shining bright, as being the terrene stars of the goddess, and held in their hands timbrels of brass, silver, aye and gold, which rendered forth a shrill and pleasant sound. The principal priests, leaders of the sacred rites, which were appareled with white surplices drawn tight about their breasts and hanging down to the ground, bare the relics of all the most puissant gods. One that was first of them carried in his hand a lantern shining forth with a clear light, not very like to those which we use in our houses and light our supper withal at evening-time, for the bowl of it was of gold and rendered from the middle thereof a more bright flame. The second, attired like the other, bare in both hands those pots to which the succoring providence of the high goddess herself had given their name. The third held up a tree of palm, with leaves cunningly wrought of gold, and the verge or rod of Caduceus of Mercury. The fourth showed a token of equity, that was a left hand deformed in every place and with open palm, and because it was naturally more sluggish, and that there was no cleverness nor craft in it, it signified thereby more equity than by the right hand: the same priest carried a round vessel of gold, in form of a breast, whence milk flowed down. The fifth bare a winnowing fan, wrought with sprigs of gold, and another carried a vessel for wine.

By and by after, the gods deigned to follow afoot as men do, and specially Anubis, the messenger of the gods infernal and supernal, tall, with his face sometime black, sometime fair as gold, lifting up on high his dog's head, and bearing in his left hand his verge, and in his right hand the green branch of a palm-tree. After him straight followed a cow with an upright gait, the cow representing the great goddess that is the fruitful mother of all, and he that guided her supported her as she leaned upon his shoulder, and marched on with much gravity in happy steps. Another carried after the secrets of their glorious religion, closed in a coffer. Another was there that bare in his bosom (thrice happy he!) the venerable figure of the godhead, not formed like any beast, bird, savage thing, or human shape, but made by a new invention, and therefore much to be admired, an emblem ineffable, whereby was signified that such a religion was at once very high and should not be discovered or revealed to any person; thus was it fashioned of shining gold: it was a vessel wrought with a round bottom, and hollowed with wondrous cunning, having on the outside pictures figured like unto the manner of the Egyptians, and the mouth thereof was not very high, but made to jut out like unto a long funnel; on the other side was an ear or handle which came far out from the vessel, whereupon stood an asp holding out his swelling and scaly neck, which entwined the whole as in a knot.

Finally came he which was appointed to my good fortune, according to the promise of the most puissant goddess. For the great priest, which bare the restoration of my human shape, by the commandment of the goddess approached more and more, carrying in his right hand both the timbrel and the garland of roses to give me, which was in very deed my crown to deliver me from cruel fortune which was always mine enemy, after the sufferance of so much calamity and pain, and after the endurance of so many perils. Then I, not running hastily by reason of sudden joy, lest I should disturb the quiet procession with my beastly importunity, but going softly as a man doth step through the press of people, which gave me place by the divine command on every side, I went after the priest. Then the priest, being admonished the night before, as I might well perceive, and marveling that now the event came opportunely to fulfil that warning, suddenly stood still, and holding out his hands thrust out the garland of roses to my mouth: which garland I (trembling and my heart beating greatly) devoured with 10 a great affection. As soon as I had eaten them, I was not deceived of the promise made unto me: for my deformed and assy face abated, and first the rugged hair of my body fell off, my thick skin waxed soft 15 and tender, my fat belly became thin, the hoofs of my feet changed into toes, my hands were no more feet but returned again to the work of a man that walks upright, my neck grew short, my head and mouth 20 became round, my long ears were made little, my great and stony teeth waxed less, like the teeth of men, and my tail, which before cumbered me most, appeared nowhere. Then the people began to marvel, 5 and the religious honored the goddess for so evident a miracle, which was foreshadowed by the visions which they saw in the night, and the facility of my reformation, whereby they lifted their hands to heaven and with one voice rendered testimony of so great a benefit which I received of the goddess.

When I saw myself in such estate, I was utterly astonished and stood still a good space and said nothing; for my mind could not contain so sudden and so great joy, and I could not tell what to say, nor what word I should first speak with my voice newly found, nor what thanks I should render to the goddess.

AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS (About A.D. 322-400)

Perhaps because he was a Greek of Antioch, the Latin of Ammianus is obscure and uningratiating; but parts of the eighteen surviving of his thirty-one books of history, which covered the time from Nerva to Valens, thus continuing Tacitus and Suetonius, are of exceeding interest as portraying the city of Rome at a period otherwise almost unilluminated. It is the last eighteen that survive, narrating the events of 353-378, including the visit of Constantius the Second to Rome, since 330 no longer the capital, the reign of Julian the reviver of paganism, and the times of Pope Damasus with the already intolerant and rioting Christians. Ammianus writes of what he has lived through, and his judgments on Roman society, proletariat and nobles alike, are interesting, if perhaps not entirely balanced, as coming from a veteran soldier and visitor who admired the great but now failing city and its past.

THE HISTORY OF ROME FROM CONSTANTIUS TO VALENS

HIGH LIFE IN THE ETERNAL CITY

(353 A.D.)

And since I think it likely that foreigners who may read this account (if, indeed, any such should meet with it) are likely to wonder how it is that, when my history has reached the point of narrating what was done at Rome, nothing is spoken of but seditions, and shops, and cheapness, and other similarly inconsiderable matters, I will briefly touch upon the causes of this, never intentionally departing from the strict truth. . . .

Last of all, they have arrived at such a depth of unworthiness, that when, no very long time ago, on account of an apprehended scarcity of food, the foreigners were driven in haste from the city; those who practised liberal accomplishments, the number of whom was exceedingly small, were expelled without a moment's breathing-time; yet the followers of actresses, and all who at that time pretended to be of such a class, were allowed to remain; and three thousand dancing-girls had not even a question put to them, but stayed unmolested with the members of their choruses, and a corresponding number of dancing masters.

And wherever you turn your eyes, you may see a multitude of women with their hair curled, who, as far as their age goes, might, if they had married, been by this time the mothers of three children, sweeping the pavements with their feet till they are weary, whirling round in rapid gyrations, while representing innumerable groups and figures which the theatrical plays contain.

It is a truth beyond all question, that, when at one time Rome was the abode of all the virtues, many of the nobles, like the Lotophagi, celebrated in Homer, who detained men by the deliciousness of their fruit, allured foreigners of free birth by manifold attentions of courtesy and kindness.

But now, in their empty arrogance, some persons look upon everything as worthless which is born outside of the walls of the city, except only the childless and the unmarried. Nor can it be conceived with what a variety of obsequious observance men without children are courted at Rome.

And since among them, as is natural in a city so great as to be the metropolis of the world, diseases attain to such an insurmountable degree of violence, that all the skill of the physician is ineffectual even to mitigate them; a certain assistance and means of safety has been devised, in the rule that no one should go to see a friend in such a condition, and to a few precautionary measures a further remedy of sufficient potency has been added, that men should not readmit into their houses servants who have been sent to inquire how a man's friends who may have been seized with an illness of this kind are, until they have cleansed and purified their persons in the bath. So that a taint is feared, even when it has only been seen with the eyes of another.

But nevertheless, when these rules are observed thus stringently, some persons, if they be invited to a wedding, though the vigor of their limbs be much diminished, yet, when gold is offered in the hollow palm of the right hand, will go actively as far as Spoletum. These are the customs of the nobles.

But of the lower and most indigent class of the populace some spend the whole night in the wine shops. Some lie concealed in the shady arcades of the theaters; which Catulus was in his ædileship the first person to raise, in imitation of the lascivious manners of Campania, or else they play at dice so eagerly as to quarrel over them; snuffing up their nostrils and making unseemly noises by drawing back their breath into their noses; or (and this is their favorite pursuit of all others) from sunrise to evening they stay gaping through sunshine or rain, examining in the most careful manner the most sterling good or bad qualities of the charioteers and horses.

And it is very wonderful to see an innumerable multitude of people with great eagerness of mind intent upon the event of the contests in the chariot race. These pursuits, and others of like character, prevent anything worth mentioning or important from being done at Rome.

—C. D. YONGE.

THE TRIUMPH OF CONSTANTIUS

(A.D. 356)

As if the temple of Janus were closed and all his eneques laid low, Constantius was eager to visit Rome, intending to celebrate a triumph because of Magnentius' destruction, though he lacked the right, inasmuch as the blood of the slain was Roman. . . He wished to display to the city an endless procession, with standards stiff with gold and brilliant guards and retinue, though the people, who were now in peace and quiet, at no time either expected or desired this or any such spectacle; not knowing, perhaps, that certain of the old-time emperors had been content in time of peace with lictors . . . and that many of them had made themselves illustrious by splendid deeds in order to hand down to posterity the memory of glories earned by their own achievements.

Accordingly, after long and elaborate preparation, in the second prefecture of Oritus, he passed through Ocriculum, elated by his great honors, escorted by a formidable array of marching columns, making his progress as if in order of battle, while from every direction the eyes of all were fixed upon him and never left his face. And when he drew near the city, as he contemplated with serene gaze the senate paying their respects, and looked on these figures, reverend because they were the likeness of the old patrician line, he did not think, like Cineas the famous ambassador of Pyrrhus, that a multitude of kings was assembled together, but that here was the asylum of the whole world. And when he had turned from them to the people, he was astounded to think in what throngs the whole human kind had come streaming together from all quarters to Rome. And as if he would have terrified with the sight of his arms the Euphrates or the Rhine, with standards going ahead on either side he himself came on, sitting alone in a golden car, which shone with various brilliant precious stones, and sparkled so that it gave a kind of flickering light. And after him came many others, around whom floated dragons embroidered in bright-colored tissues and tied to golden and begemmed spear-tips, and with mouths wide open so that they were inflated by the wind and on this account hissed as if stirred with anger, their tails coiling and streaming in the breeze. And next marched on the one side and the other two ranks of men-at-arms with shields and crests, gleaming and sparkling and in brilliant coats with breastplates, and at intervals among them the mailed cavalry called clibanarii, protected by cuirasses and girdled with iron belts, so that you would think them statues finished by the hand of Praxiteles, not men. They were so well encased in the delicate rounded plates, fitted to the curves of their bodies and covering all their members, that, in whatever direction they were compelled to move, their apparel adapted itself, the joints fitting perfectly.

And so, saluted as Augustus by voices of happy omen, though the hills and shores were filled with thunderous clamors, he did not move a muscle, but preserved the same unchanging countenance he was wont to show in his provinces. For, very short though he was, he bowed his body when riding under the high gates, and as if his neck were fixed, bent his gaze straight before him, turning his face neither to right nor left; and, as if the statue of a man, when the rolling wheels shook him, he was never seen either to nod, or to spit, or to wipe or rub his mouth or nose, or even to move a hand. . . .

Then, having entered Rome, the home of empire and of all virtues, when he had arrived at the Rostra, and saw before him that most famed scene of ancient power, he stood speechless with amazement, his eyes dazzled by the multitude of wonders that assailed them wherever he turned. After addressing the nobles in the senate, and the people from the tribunal, he was escorted amid resounding applause to the Palace, where he enjoyed himself as he had desired.

And often, as he was conducting the races, he expressed his delight at the piquant speech of the common people, who were neither presumptuous in their ways nor yet lacking in the sense of their native liberty. He himself, too, maintained a bearing of due respect toward them; for he did not, as was usual in other cities, allow the contests to be finished according to his own preference, but, following the custom, left them to various circumstances.

Then he went the rounds of the city, visiting the summits of the seven hills and the various places on their slopes and in the level parts, and the suburban districts also. Whatever his eyes first rested upon, he felt sure must excel all the rest. There was the temple of Jupiter on the Tarpeian Mount, as much greater than other temples as the heavenly is greater than the earthly; baths built up like whole provinces; the great pile of the amphitheater, a mass reared solidly in Tiburtine stone, to whose summit human vision found it hard to reach; the Pantheon, like a whole region, rounded and polished, and reared on vaulting of wondrous height; the lofty monuments whose summits, ascended by winding stairways, supported effigies of former emperors; and the temple of the City and the forum of Peace, and the theater of Pompey, and the Odeum, and the Stadium, and, intermingled with these, the other ornaments of the everlasting city.

But when he came to the forum of Trajan, a structure unique under all heaven, which, to my thinking, even the gods would agree to call wonderful, he was rooted to the spot with amazement as he contemplated those gigantic edifices, which are neither to be described by words or again to be attempted by mortal men. And so, compelled to lay aside all hope of undertaking anything of that kind, he said that Trajan's horse alone, which was located in the middle of the court and bore the emperor himself, he would imitate, for he could do that.

The prince Ormizda, to whose departure from Persia we have referred above, happened to be standing at his side, and answered, with well-bred wit, 'Sire, you will first have to order the construction of a stable like this, if you can, so that the horse you have in mind to make may succeed to as ample a realm as that of the horse we are now looking at.'

He himself, being asked what he thought of Rome, replied that the one thing that delighted him was to learn that there, too, men died.

And so, after he had seen a multitude of things to his amazement and stupefaction, the emperor complained of Fame as either powerless or spiteful, because, though she always exaggerated, she had failed of showing forth what was at Rome; and, deliberating a long time as to what course he should pursue, he determined to add to the ornament of the city by erecting in the Circus Maximus an obelisk, of whose origin and form I shall speak in the fitting place.

THE GRAIN-FLEET THREATENED

(A.D. 359)

While these events and troubles were proceeding rapidly in the remote districts of the East, the Eternal City was fearing distress from an impending scarcity of corn; and the violence of the common people, infuriated by the expectation of that worst of all evils, was vented upon Tertullus, who at that time was prefect of the city. This was unreasonable, since it did not depend upon him that the provisions were embarked in a stormy season in ships which, through the unusually tempestuous state of the sea and the violence of contrary winds, were driven into any ports they could make, and were unable to reach the port of Augustus, from the greatness of the dangers which threatened them.

Nevertheless, Tertullus was continually troubled by the seditious movements of the people, who worked themselves up to great rage, being excited by the imminent danger of a famine; till, having no hope of preserving his own safety, he wisely brought his little boys out to the people, who, though in a state of tumultuous disorder, were often influenced by sudden accidents, and with tears addressed them thus:

'Behold your fellow citizens, who (may the gods avert the omen), unless fortune should take a more favorable turn, will be exposed to the same sufferings as yourself. If then you think that by destroying them you will be saved from all suffering, they are in your power.' The people, of their own nature inclined to mercy, were propitiated by this sad address, and made no answer, but awaited their fate with resignation.

And soon, by the favor of the deity who has watched over the growth of Rome from its first origin, and who promised that it should last forever, while Tertullus was at Ostia sacrificing in the temple of Castor and Pollux, the sea became calm, the wind changed to a gentle southeast breeze, and the ships in full sail entered the port laden with corn to fill the granaries.

THE COMMON PEOPLE

(A.D. 359)

And let us come to the idle and lazy common people, among whom some, who have not even got shoes, boast of high-sounding names; calling themselves Cimes-sores, Statarii, Semicupæ, Serapina, or Cicimbricus, or Gluturiorus, Trulla, Lucanicus, Pordaca, or Salsula, with numbers of other similar appellations. These men spend their whole lives in drinking, and gambling, and brothels, and pleasures, and public spectacles; and to them the Circus Maximus is their temple, their home, their public assembly; in fact, their whole hope and desire.

And you may see in the Forum, and roads, and streets, and places of meeting, knots of people collected, quarreling violently with one another, and objecting to one another, and splitting themselves into violent parties.

Among whom those who have lived long, having influence by reason of their age, their gray hairs and wrinkles, are continually crying out that the republic cannot stand, if in the contest which is about to take place, the skilful charioteer, whom some individual backs, is not foremost in the race, and does not dexterously shave the turning-post with the trace-horses.

And when there is so much ruinous carelessness, when the wished-for day of the equestrian games dawns, before the sun has visibly risen, they all rush out with headlong haste, as if with their speed they would outstrip the very chariots which are going to race; while as to the event of the contest they are all torn asunder by opposite wishes, and the greater part of them, through their anxiety, pass sleepless nights.

From hence, if you go to some cheap theater, the actors on the stage are driven off by hisses, if they have not taken the precaution to conciliate the lowest of the people by gifts of money.

JULIAN AND THE CHRISTIANS

(A.D. 361)

And although from his earliest childhood he was inclined to the worship of the gods, and gradually, as he grew up, became more attached to it, yet he was influenced by many apprehensions which made him act in things relating to that subject as secretly as he could.

But when his fears were terminated, and he found himself at liberty to do what he pleased, he then showed his secret inclinations, and by plain and positive decrees ordered the temples to be opened, and victims to be brought to the altars for the worship of the gods.

And in order to give more effect to his intentions, he ordered the priests of the different Christian sects, with the adherents of each sect, to be admitted into the palace, and in a constitutional spirit expressed his wish that their dissensions being appeased, each without any hindrance might fearlessly follow the religion he preferred.

He did this the more resolutely because, as long license increased their dissensions, he thought he should never have to fear the unanimity of the common people, having found by experience that no wild beasts are so hostile to men as Christian sects in general are to one another. And he often used to say, 'Listen to me, to whom the Alemanni and Franks have listened'; imitating in this an expression of the ancient emperor Marcus Aurelius. But he omitted to notice that there was a great difference between himself and his predecessor.

For when Marcus was passing through Palestine, on his road to Egypt, he is said, when wearied by the dirt and rebellious spirit of the Jews, to have often exclaimed with sorrow, 'O Marcomanni, O Quadi, O Sarmatians, I have at last found others worse than you!'

THE CHURCH AT ROME

(A.D. 367)

His administration was tranquil and undisturbed, and the people enjoyed plenty under it. Yet he also was alarmed by fierce seditions raised by the discontented populace, which arose from the following occurrence.

Damasus and Ursinus, being both immoderately eager to obtain the bishopric, formed parties and carried on the conflict with great asperity, the partisans of each carrying their violence to actual battle, in which men were wounded and killed. And as Juventius was unable to put an end to, or even to soften, these disorders, he was at last by their violence compelled to withdraw to the suburbs.

Ultimately Damasus got the best of the strife by the strenuous efforts of his partisans. It is certain that on one day one hundred and thirty-seven dead bodies were found in the basilica of Sicininus, which is a Christian church. And the populace who had been thus roused to a state of ferocity were with great difficulty restored to order.

I do not deny, when I consider the ostentation that reigns at Rome, that those who desire such rank and power may be justified in laboring with all possible exertion and vehemence to obtain their wishes; since after they have succeeded, they will be secure for the future, being enriched by offerings from matrons, riding in carriages, dressing splendidly, and feasting luxuriously, so that their entertainments surpass even royal banquets.

And they might be really happy if, despising the vastness of the city, which they excite against themselves by their vices, they were to live in imitation of some of the priests in the provinces, whom the most rigid abstinence in eating and drinking, and plainness of apparel, and eyes always cast on the ground, recommend to the everlasting Deity and his true worshippers as pure and sober-minded men.

—C. D. YONGE.

QUINTUS AURELIUS SYMMACHUS (About A.D. 340-403)

Symmachus, a wealthy and cultured member of the nobility who served the imperial government and the city of Rome in all the important offices within their gift, is important in the history of pagan Rome as a figure representative of the best society and the best administrative talent nearly a hundred years after the edict of Constantine and only a few years before the advent of Alaric and the Goths, at a time when the Church was already not only militant against paganism but a prey to internal dissensions, when the pagan religion was on the defensive and beginning to crumble, and when the bonds of the empire were loosening. With his contemporary, Nicomachus Flavianus, who figured in the last revival of paganism in 394, during the short tenure of the rebel emperor Eugenius, he assisted at what may be called the last public appearance of the old religion in Rome. Previously, he had been a delegate of the pagan party in the attempt to persuade the emperors to restore to its old place in the senate house the famous altar of Victory, which had been removed at the insistence of the Christians, and which had come to be the visible center of controversy between the old and new religions. Symmachus was an orator of distinction and a good letter-writer, but not a genius. It was on his recommendation to Ambrose, bishop of Milan, that Augustine was appointed in 385 to the professorship of rhetoric in that city, where he was converted by the bishop and baptized in 387.

A PLEA FOR PAGANISM

To our Lords Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, always Augusti, Symmachus the Senator, Prefect of the City.

Let us at least give to the name the honor which has been denied the deity. Your Eternities owe much to Victory and will owe still more. Let those turn away from this source of power who have had from it no advantage; you cannot afford to give up the protection of a deity friendly to triumphs. Hers is a power for whose favor everyone prays. No one would deny that a deity whose aid he professes is to be desired should be the object of religious attention. But if the avoidance of this omen were not a just thing to ask, at any rate it would have been but decency to keep hands off the ornaments of the senate house.

Enable us, we supplicate you, to leave as old men to our children what as children we received from our fathers. Deep is the affection men feel for that to which they are accustomed. The act of Deified Constantine did not long hold, and deservedly. All precedents should be shunned by you which are found soon to have lost their force. We are concerned for the lasting renown of your names; we desire that time to come shall find nothing there to correct.

Where are we to swear allegiance to your laws and your words? With what shall the minds of the false be made to fear so that they will not lie in the giving of testimony? It is true, of course, that all creation is full of deity, and that no place is safe for the perjurer, but the fear of playing false is greatly magnified if he is constrained also by deity actually at hand. That altar stands for the concord of all our body, that altar is the pledge of good faith for individuals; there is nothing makes for authority in our decrees so much as the fact that our body votes them all as it were under oath to the gods. Shall perjury therefore have an unconsecrated place at which to take oath, and will my illustrious Princes, who owe protection to the public oath, find this a thing they can approve?

But Deified Constantine will be said to have done this. Let us rather emulate other acts of that emperor, who would have entered upon no such policy as this had any other made the mistake before him; for the lapse of the predecessor serves as correction for the follower, and it is from the disregard of precedent that improvement springs. It may have been right for him, the example of Your Clemencies, in a matter still untried not to make sure he did nothing invidious; but can that same defense apply in our case if we imitate an act we have seen proved wrong? Let Your Eternities listen to other acts of this same emperor which you will find more worthy of appropriation. He took from the Sacred Virgins not a single one of their privileges, he decreed priesthoods to nobles, he did not deny moneys to meet the expense of the ceremonies in Rome, he accompanied the happy senate through all the streets of the Eternal City, looking with placid eye on our altars and shrines and on the names of the gods carved on the façades, inquiring into the origins of the temples, and marveling at their founders; and, although he professed another religion, gave ours his guarantee. For every man has his own ways, and every man has his own manner of worship; divine purpose has assigned various cults as protectors to cities. Just as souls are partitioned among human beings at birth, so to peoples are allotted the divine spirits that rule their fates.

There is the matter of benefits, too, which most of all justifies the gods to men. For when we bring every argument into the open, on what basis can we better judge of the gods than from the record and proof of prospering circumstances? Farther, if long existence confers authority upon religions, the faith of so many generations is worthy of preservation, and we ought to follow our fathers as they with such good results followed theirs.

Let us imagine Rome now present and pleading with you after this fashion: 'Best of princes, fathers of your country, have respect for my years—years to which my devotion to religion has brought me. Let me continue in the rites of my forefathers; for I have no reason for regret. Let me live, since I am free, in my own ways. The religion I profess brought the whole world under my sway, the cult I practise repulsed Hannibal from my walls and the Senones from the Capitol. Have I then been preserved for this, to be denied in my old age? What new ways are to be entered upon, should be mine to judge. Change in old age is tardy and disgraceful.'

And so we ask for peace to the gods of our fathers, and to the gods of our native soil. It is but fair that what all men worship should be regarded as one and the same. We gaze upon the same stars, the heavens are common to us, the same universe wraps us round. Why should it be a concern as to what manner of search for the truth another employs? It is not by one path alone that we can penetrate to so great a mystery.

CLAUDIUS CLAUDIANUS (About A.D. 400)

Claudian, a Greek born in Alexandria and using Latin as a foreign tongue but with perfection, appears in Rome in 395. The friend of the Emperor Honorius and his Vandal general Stilicho, he writes panegyrics on them and their friends and invectives against their enemies, besides various other poems, the longest of which is The Rape of Proserpina, by 402 has been honored with a bronze statue, and in 404 disappears from history. In 408 his patron Stilicho, who in 396 and 402 had checked the barbarians under Alaric, fell, and in August, 410, Rome was at last entered and spoiled by the Goths after fifteen years during which the threat of Alaric was never wholly absent. Poetically, Claudian's excellences are in language and meter which approach though they fall far short of Virgil, in descriptive passages, and in a certain inspiration when his theme is Rome and the Roman virtues. His defects are the artificialities inhering in imitative and laudatory court poetry. Historically, he is of exceeding interest as the main source for the times, and as reflecting the condition of a Rome which had existed for a thousand years, for five centuries had ruled the world, and now, still splendid in outward appearances but inwardly decadent and weak, was unconsciously and complacently advancing in the path soon to lead into the Dark Ages. He practically, and probably with intention, ignored Christianity. Aside from the idyllic gem, The Old Man of Verona, Claudian has inspired little verse translation.

THE OLD MAN OF VERONA

Happy the man, who his whole time doth bound

Within th' inclosure of his little ground.
Happy the man whom the same humble place,
The hereditary cottage of his race,
From his first rising infancy has known, 5
And by degrees sees gently bending down,
With natural propension, to that earth
Which both preserved his life, and gave him birth.

Him no false lights, by fortune set,
Could ever into foolish wanderings get. 10
He never dangers either saw or feared:
The dreadful storms at sea he never heard.
He never heard the shrill alarms of war,
Or the worse noises of the lawyers' bar.
No change of consuls marks to him the year;
The change of seasons is his calendar. 16
The cold and heat, winter and summer shows;
Autumn by fruits, and spring by flowers, he knows.

He measures time by landmarks, and has found

For the whole day the dial of his ground. 20
A neighboring wood, born with himself, he sees,

And loves his old contemporary trees.
He has only heard of near Verona's name,
And knows it, like the Indies, but by fame.

Does with a like concernment notice take 25
Of the Red sea, and of Benacus' lake.

Thus health and strength he to a third age enjoys,

And sees a long posterity of boys.

About the spacious world let others roam,
The voyage, life, is longest made at home. 30

ETERNAL ROME

Naught grander on earth does the sky embrace. The eye cannot comprehend her extent, the heart her beauty, nor the voice her praise. With the luster of her gold she rivals the stars she touches. Her seven hills recall the zones of Olympus. Mother of arms and laws, she spreads her rule over all mankind, the first to give them law.
She it is who from narrow bounds spread to either pole, and starting from a little home reached forth her hands with the sun. Battling with destiny, while she waged countless wars at once, laid hold on the towns of Spain, besieged the towns of Sicily, brought low the Gaul on land, the Carthaginian on the sea, she never bowed to blow; no whit was she affrighted by wounds, but her voice rose stronger after Cannæ and the Trebia, and when the flames girt her round about and the foe was at the wall, she sent her armies to the distant Iberians, nor was she stayed by Ocean, but embarked upon the deep and sought the Britons in a world remote for a fresh triumph. This is she who alone took the conquered to her bosom and cherished all mankind alike, as mother not as queen, and called them her sons whom she had conquered, and bound them to her afar by bonds of love. To her rule of peace we owe it that the stranger is at home in every land, that men may dwell in every clime, that it is but sport to visit Thule and the furthest shores; that we may range from Rhone to Orontes; that we are all one people. Nor shall there ever be an end to Rome's sway.

THE GLORIES OF ROME

Behold, new honor dignifies the Palatine as with joy and gladness it receives the divine tenant (Honorius) . . . Surely no other seat were fit abode for those who rule the world; on no hill is Sovereignty more conscious of its worth, or feels more deeply the pride of supreme power. Rearing aloft its crown, with the Rostra far below, the Palace looks forth upon countless sanctuaries and countless sentinel gods encircling it. How fair a sight, to behold the Giants hanging from the Tarpeian rock below the temple of the Thunderer, and the graven doors, and statues soaring amid the clouds, and the high air dense with thronging temples, and everywhere the terrain a forest of columns adorned with beaks from many a conquered ship, and palaces reposing on foundations mountain-high which the hands of men have up-reared, adding still to Nature, and arches unnumbered, rich with glittering spoils of war! The eye is bewildered and blinded by flashing metal and the gleam of gold on every hand.

DECIMUS MAGNUS AUSONIUS (A.D. 310-395)

At first an advocate in his native city Bordeaux, then professor of rhetoric in its university, Ausonius at fifty-four was appointed tutor to Gratian, the son of the Emperor Valentinian, and held imperial offices besides. His immediate relations with Gratian having ended with the latter's accession and the influence of Ambrose as his counsellor, Ausonius retired to Bordeaux. His poems form a great variety, including epigrams, acrostics, occasional verse, a few not very enthusiastic Christian poems, and The Moselle, whose five hundred lines contain a number of exquisite nature passages, the spirit of which is so modern and northern as almost to remove them from ancient Roman times. The touching epigram to his wife was written thirty-six years after her death at the age of twenty-seven.

TO HIS WIFE

Be life what it has been, and let us hold,
Dear wife, the names we each gave each of old;

And let not time work change upon us two,
I still your boy, and still my sweetheart you.
What though I outlive Nestor? and what though

You in your turn a Sibyl's years should know?

Ne'er let us know old age or late or soon;
Count not the years, but take of each its boon.

—TERROT REAVELEY GLOVER.

UNHAPPY DIDO

Poor Dido found but little rest,
By neither of her spouses blest;
She flies, because the first was dead,
And dies, because the second fled.

—CHARLES T. BROOKS.

THE MOSELLE

In nebulous light I crossed swift Nava's
stream,

Saw the new walls of ancient Bingen gleam,
Where Gallia once matched Latian Cannæ's
day,

And piles of dead unwept, unburied lay.
Thence through lone forest depths my journey ran,

That showed no trace of civilizing man;
O'er dry Dummissus; then where with sweet sound

Perennial fountains murmur all around Roman Tabernæ; and through fields where now

The Sauromatian colonist drives his plough.
At length I see upon the Belgian line ¹¹

The castle famed of glorious Constantine,
Nivomagus, and here a purer air Breathes o'er the fields; and now, serene and fair,

The face of Phœbus to the wondering sight ¹⁵
Renews Olympus clothed in purple light.

No longer vainly the bewildered eye
Through the green gloom of branches seeks the sky;

No more the ruddy ray and liquid light
Of the free heavens are hid by envious night. ²⁰

The lovely light that smiles o'er hill and
stream

Brings back the scenes that live in childhood's dream;

My own Burdigala's dear features lie
Imaged in all I see to memory's eye;
The villa roofs that crown the craggy steeps,
And overhang the valley's winding sweeps; ²⁶ Hills green with vines, and at their feet the swell

And low-voiced murmur of thy waves, Moselle. . . .

Hail, O illustrious river, renowned for thy fields and thy farmers,

River that washest the walls of the Belgæ's imperial city, ³⁰

River whose ridges are crowned with the vine's odoriferous clusters,

River whose meadows are clothed by the grass with an emerald verdure! . . .

Down through the crystalline depths of the waters we see to the bottom.
They have no mysteries to hide; and, as in the clear upper heavens Ranges the eye far round through all the circling horizon, 35
What time no breath of wind shakes a leaflet or ripples the water,
So in the blue heaven below the eye freely ranges or lingers,
And in the azure-light chambers sees manifold shapes of rare beauty;
Plants that gracefully wave in the silent sway
of the waters,
And through green groves of moss glittering jewels of sand. . . . 40

But let first the task I have now undertaken be ended;
Let me sing to the close the praise of the glorious river,
Follow the sweep of its tide rejoicing along
the green meadows,
Till in the waves of the Rhine it shall come to receive consecration.
Open, O Rhine, thy blue bosom, spread wide thy green fluttering garments 45
To the new stream that with thine would mingle its sisterly waters! . . .

Thus I sang, who, sprung from the race of the ancient Vivisci,
Lately in friendly alliance a guest at the Belgian hearthstone, Roman Ausonius am named, and claim as the home of my fathers 50
Gallia's utmost limits, and where the high Pyrenean
Mountains o'erhang Aquitania, serene land of free-hearted people.

Such the strains I boldly, though modestly swept from my harp-strings.
Poor though the tribute, 'twas fitting, O
Muse, that these hands should this offer
Out of my poverty, gratitude's gift to the beautiful river. 55
Nor for fame I hanker! I only beg for forgiveness;
So many hast thou, O glorious stream, whose footsteps have wandered Round the waters divine that are blessed by Æonian maidens,
And on whose foreheads hath sprinkled her cool drops the fair Aganippe;
But for me—if so much shall yet linger of fire poetic— 60
When to my native Bordeaux, youth's home
and of age the still refuge, Pater Augustus and also his son, whom of all I hold dearest,
Grant me once more to return, content with Ausonian fasces Graced, and with curule honors,—and when at length the old master
Now is dismissed and rewarded with thanks for long years of true service,— 65
Then to the stream of the North will I pour out a worthier tribute:
Sing of the cities whose walls are washed by thy calm-gliding waters;
Sing of the castles that frown above thee
with time-wasted turrets;
Sing of the fortresses built of old for a refuge from danger;
Used by the prosperous Belgians now, not for forts, but for garners.
Then, to the farthest lands and in tongues and in songs of strange peoples,
Wide shall be wafted thy name and thy glory,
O hornèd Mosella!

—CHARLES T. BROOKS.

RUTILIUS CLAUDIUS NAMATIUS (About A.D. 415)

When Rutilius, after three years as prefect of the city, left Rome in 417 to visit his native Gaul, seven years had passed since Alaric humiliated the ancient capital, the Christian religion, recognized a century before by Constantine, had become dominant, and the empire was falling apart and approaching its end; but little evidence that this condition is a reality to him appears in the extant 644 and 68 lines respectively of the two books of elegiacs On His Return. As he floats away from the city and down the Tiber to the sea, his ears are filled with the echoing cheers of the multitude for the winning charioteer, his memory with images of proud monuments, and his heart with pride in the benefactions of Mother Rome to the human race.

With Rutilius the line of pagan poets comes to an end, and the story of pagan Roman literature is told.

ON HIS RETURN TO GAUL

Thou wilt somewhat marvel at my speedy return, O reader, and that I could so soon give up the Romulean blessings. But what is long to those who venerate Rome through all the years? Naught can e'er be long for which our love is ne'er ended.

Ah, how blessed, how many times blessed, can I count them whose lot has been to be born on this happy soil—the nobly sprung of Roman lineage to whose family honors are added still the glories of the City! Virtue's seeds transmitted as boon from Heaven could have being in no place so worthy. Blessed also they who, favored by fortune with the second lot, come to have abodes on Latin soil. A just and conscientious senate lies open to the stranger who merits praise, nor does it regard as strangers those worthy of being its own. The authority of the rank and of their colleagues is theirs to enjoy, and they have part in the character they venerate; as we are told it is in the council of greatest Jove in the ethereal reaches of the rolling universe.

But my fate tears me away from the beloved shores; the fields of Gaul are calling their native son—unsightly, indeed, from too long wars, yet rousing the more compassion as they are the less beautiful. Were my fellow-citizens secure and safe, to neglect them would be a lighter fault; the sufferings of a people demand the loyalty of the individual. I owe my tears in person to the abodes of my ancestors; true helpfulness comes from effort oft prompted by grief. It is not right for me longer not to look on the wide ruin which the delays of unfulfilled aid have multiplied; it is time now, after the raging fires, even to build the homes of the herdsmen on the dismantled estates. Nay, even the springs, could they utter words, and the very trees, could they speak, would urge the tardy one with just complaints, and add sails to my longing.

And now at last I am vanquished; I have loosed the embraces of the beloved city, and can scarce endure the tardiness of going. My way shall be on the sea, for the roads on the levels of earth are saturate with streams, the high places are rough with rocks. Since the Tuscan land and since the defences of Aurelian have felt the hand of the Goth with sword and fire, and forests are no longer safe with the dwellings of men, or streams with bridges, it is better to trust sails to the uncertain sea.

Many are the kisses we imprint on the gates we now must leave behind; our feet unwillingly cross the sacred threshold. We implore pardon for our tears and render thee offering of our praise, so far as tears permit the utterance of words:

Hearken, most beautiful queen of thy world, Rome received among the starry reaches of heaven! Hearken, O mother of men and mother of gods! Not far from the skies are we when in thy sacred abodes. Thee do we sing, and ever shall while the fates permit. No one can be secure, neglectful of thee. Sooner shall wretched oblivion blot out the sun than thine honor fail from our heart. For thou dost extend thy boon wheresoever shine the sun's rays, wheresoever billows the girdling Ocean. . . . Thou hast made of diverse nations a single fatherland; the reluctant, with thee to rule, have found it gain to be vanquished. In bestowing upon the subdued an equal right in thy law, thou hast made a city what was before a world.

—GRANT SHOWERMAN.

VIII. THE RISE OF CHRISTIANITY (A.D. 58-420)

At least as early as 58, when Paul addressed the Romans, there existed a Christian community in the city. In 64, as we have read in Tacitus, its members were made the scape-goat by the Emperor Nero on the occasion of the great fire. From this time until about 400, when Christianity had definitely become the religion of administration and administrators, its progress was marked, first, for two hundred and fifty years by frequent persecutions, some general and some local, until in 313 Constantine's edict of Milan made it legitimate, and second, by a hundred years during which it gradually and in more peaceful manner supplanted the old religion, taking to itself in the process not only the membership, but not a little, both bad and good, of the character, of paganism.

PLINY TO TRAJAN ON THE CHRISTIANS

It is my wont, Sire, to refer to you all matters concerning which I am in doubt; for who better than you can guide me in my hesitations, or, if you please, instruct me in my ignorance? The trials of the Christians—I have never had to do with them, and so have no idea as to how far the sect should be held subject either to punishment or to examination. And I have felt no slight hesitation as to whether time of life should be taken into account, or no distinction should be made between those of very tender age and those of more years and strength; and as to whether the repentant should receive pardon, or renunciation should count for nothing if one at any time has been a Christian; and as to whether the mere name unattended by criminal conduct should constitute cause for punishment, or whether it is the crime inhering in the name that is to be punished.

In the meantime, in the cases brought before me with the charge of being Christians, I have followed this method of procedure. I have asked them whether they were Christians. On their confession of the fact, I have asked them a second and a third time, with threats of punishment. If they have persisted, I have ordered their execution; for I have had no doubt that, whatever they confessed, their pertinacity and their inflexible obstinacy at least ought to bring punishment upon them. There have been some afflicted with the same madness whom, because of their being citizens, I have taken steps to have sent to Rome for trial. Before long, by the very fact of measures being taken against it, as is usually the result, accusations began to be heard in various quarters, and a greater number of cases were brought before me. Anonymous information, with the names of many persons, has been lodged with me.

When those who have denied that they either were or had been Christians have called upon the gods in my presence, and have gone through the forms of worship, with incense and wine, before your likeness, which, with the images of the gods, I have ordered brought in for the purpose, and in addition to this have cursed Christ,—none of which acts those who are in real truth Christians can be brought to perform,—I have thought them deserving of discharge. Some have said that they were Christians, and then presently denied it, saying that they had been but had ceased to be, some many years before, a few even twenty years. These also, all of them, have both worshipped your likeness and the images of the gods and cursed Christ. They have affirmed, moreover, that the worst crime, or rather mistake, of which they had been guilty, had consisted in their custom of coming together before dawn on stated days to sing together a hymn to Christ, as if to God, and to bind themselves by an oath not to commit theft, robbery, or adultery, and not to deny a deposit when called upon. After this, according to their statement, they had been wont to separate. They had been accustomed to come together again to partake of a meal, common to all, and without blame; but they had discontinued even this after the edict in which, in obedience to your instructions, I had forbidden the existence of secret societies. For this reason I thought it all the more necessary to try to get at the truth by the examination of two female slaves said to be deaconesses, and I even had them put to the torture. I have been able to discover nothing except 10 a distorted and exaggerated outside cult, and so have postponed the hearings and resorted to you for counsel. The matter seemed to me to demand consultation, especially on account of the number of those 15 who are in danger. For many, of every age, of every rank, and of both sexes, are being called into jeopardy, and will continue to be in the future. Not merely cities, but villages, too, and the country dis- 20 tricts, have been thoroughly infected with the contagion of these wretched non-conformists—who I nevertheless think may be stayed and corrected. At least it is certain that the temples, already almost 25 deserted, have begun to be much frequented again, and that the usual sacrifices, long neglected, are again being performed, and the fodder for the victims is on sale—there were very few buyers of it heretofore.

From this it is easy to form an opinion 5 of the throngs who can be set right if only allowed the opportunity for recantation.

TRAJAN TO PLINY

In dealing with the cases of the Christians brought before you, my dear Secundus, you have followed the proper mode of procedure.

No definite rule, to apply in all cases, can be laid down. The Christians are not to be sought out. If brought before you and found guilty, they are to be punished; but on this condition, that whosoever denies that he is a Christian, and makes good his assertion by performing acts of worship to our gods, is to have full pardon, however greatly suspected in the past. Anonymous charges are in no case to be admitted as evidence; this would be a very bad precedent, and besides not in the spirit 10 of our times.

MARCUS MINUCIUS FELIX (About A.D. 175)

The Octavius of Minucius Felix, a cultivated Roman lawyer, is the earliest extant Latin essay on Christianity. Its author is a convert rich in pagan literary and philosophical lore, and writes an essay almost Ciceronian in style and presentation. In an utterly charming introduction, the narrator and his friends, the pagan Cæcilius and the Christian Octavius, after an early morning walk by the sea at Ostia, sit down to discuss the merits of new and old. The body of the essay consists of the two discourses of pagan and Christian, and the conclusion records the victory of the Christian and the deep satisfaction of the Christian narrator. The argument of Octavius is remarkable for the absence of peculiar Christian doctrines such as those of baptism, atonement, the Trinity, the divinity of Christ, and the resurrection, but striking in the familiar and modern nature of its reasoning.

OCTAVIUS: OR, PAGAN AND CHRISTIAN

THE FRIENDS AT OSTIA

Whenever my thoughts dwell on my good old friend Octavius, his charming and lovable personality becomes so real to me that I seem in a manner to return to the past, with something more than a mere recollection of its closed pages. My eyes can no longer see him, but his portrait is for that very reason all the more deeply engraved on my heart and inmost feelings. He was a remarkable and saintly man, and his departure from this world left me with an indefinite sense of loss. In truth, he was so much attached to me that our thoughts and wishes, whether grave or gay, always coincided; it was as though we had only one mind between us. The result of this unanimity was that, while he was the only partner of my pleasures, he shared my errors also. So, again, when I escaped from the dark slough of ignorance into the light of wisdom and truth, he did not cast off his companion, but, much more nobly, ran on to show him the way. Consequently, when my thoughts range over the whole period of our intimacy, my most vivid recollection is of a discourse of his in which by sheer force of argument he converted Quintus Cæcilius from his belated superstition to the true faith.

Octavius had come to Rome partly on business, and partly in order to see me; and he had left his wife and children at home, the little ones just at the age of innocence, and at that most lovable time when they try to say short words with delightfully quaint attempts at pronunciation. I cannot say how pleased I was to see my greatest friend, especially as his arrival was quite unexpected. After a day or two of renewed intimacy, when we had to some extent satisfied our hunger for each other's company, and had thoroughly compared notes together, we determined to go to Ostia, an exceedingly nice place, where I had been advised to try the bracing effects of sea-bathing. The vintage holidays had released me from the law-courts, and after the heat of summer there was a touch of autumn in the air.

Well, early one morning we were walking down to the sea, to enjoy the cool breeze and a stroll over the sands, when Cæcilius, who was with us, noticed an image of Serapis, and in the usual superstitious way kissed his hand to it.

Then Octavius said to me: 'Marcus, my brother, here is a man who is closely connected with you, both in private and in business. You are not doing your duty by him if you leave him in ignorant blindness, and let him stumble in broad daylight over blocks of stone, even though they are carved and anointed and crowned. You must be aware that his error is as discreditable to yourself as it is to him.'

This remark brought us past the town to the open shore, where the gentle waves had made us a promenade of level sand. The sea, which is never absolutely still, even when there is no wind, came in, not white and foaming, but in curling, twisting waves which it was a pleasure to look at, and, when we walked quite at the edge of the water, played round our footsteps and then receded from them. So we walked on, slowly and quietly, along the slight curve of the shore, amusing ourselves with conversation and with Octavius's accounts of his experiences on board ship. When we had gone far enough, walking and talking, we turned to come back the same way, and, as we came to a place where some boats were laid up high and dry upon baulks of timber, we saw a number of boys playing at ducks and drakes with bits of tile. The game, of course, is to choose a flat piece, with rounded edges, and then, holding it low, to throw it so that it may skim the surface of the water and make as many hops and jumps as possible; and the boy whose shot goes farthest and jumps oftenest is the winner.

The sight distinctly amused Octavius and me, but Cæcilius took no notice of it and did not so much as smile, but showed by his preoccupied expression that he was trying to keep to himself something or other that had annoyed him.

'Now, Cæcilius,' said I, 'what is the matter with you? What has become of all your gaiety? You generally look more cheerful than that even on serious occasions.'

'It is that nasty remark of our friend Octavius,' he said, 'that has been irritating me all this time. It was addressed ostensibly to you, because he blamed your negligence; but that was only his indirect way of charging me with ignorance, which is worse. As he has practically raised the whole question, the matter cannot rest where it is, so I shall have to have it out with him. All I know is that, if he wants me to argue on behalf of the school I belong to, he will soon find it easier to wrangle among his friends than to conduct a philosophical discussion. However, suppose we sit down on this stone breakwater by the baths, and rest, and thresh it out.'

So we sat down as he suggested, with myself in the middle; not that etiquette demanded that I should have the place of honor, because friendship always assumes or makes equality, but in order that I might act as judge, and hear both sides equally, and part the combatants.

THE ABSURDITIES OF CHRISTIAN BELIEF AND PRACTICE

'I pass over many facts, and advisedly; for even those I have mentioned are all too many, and the truth of all of them, or of most of them, is proven by the very mystery in which the shameful superstition is enveloped. For why should they take so much trouble to hide away in the dark and to keep from view the object of their worship, whatever it is? What is honorable ever rejoices in being known to all; it is crime that loves secrecy. Why is it that they have no altars, no temples, and no statues that are known? Why do they never dare to speak openly, never venture to congregate freely?—unless it is that what they worship and keep suppressed is something for which they ought to be punished or of which they ought to be ashamed. . . .

'Then too, whence, or if you please who, or where is that god of theirs, alone of his kind, solitary, forsaken, whom no free people, no governments, whom not even Roman superstition knows? To be sure, the lonely and pitiable nation of the Jews also worships a single god, but they do it openly, in temples, before altars, with victims and according to definite rites, though his strength and effectiveness are so slight that he, together with his own race, is a captive among the Romans, who are only mortals! But more, what absurdities, what monstrosities, do the Christians frame in their imagination! That god of theirs, whom they can neither point out to others nor themselves see, is engaged, according to their belief, in carefully inquiring into the morals, into the deeds, and, finally, into the words and secret thoughts of all men—running hither and thither, of course, and everywhere present. They will make him out petty, restless, even impudently curious; for he is at hand to see every act, he is abroad in every place, though he can do no good to individuals because of being bound to attend to the whole world, and cannot suffice for the whole world because he is engaged with individuals.

'But what shall I say of their prophecies threatening the whole earth, yes, the universe itself, stars and all, with destruction by fire? as if the everlasting fabric of nature, based upon divine laws, could be disturbed, or as if, even supposing the bond of all elemental things ruptured, or the framework of the heavens sundered, the great edifice by which all creation is contained and girdled could be crumbled into ruin. And yet, not content with a madman's belief like this, they add to it by trumping up old women's tales. They say they are to be born again after death, even from ash and cinders, and, prompted by an assurance which to me is a mystery, actually believe in their own lies. You would think they had already lived again. Double perversity and double nonsense, to threaten with destruction the heavens and the stars, which we leave at death as we find them at birth, and at the same time to promise to themselves, beings who, in like manner as they have entered upon existence, must also leave it, eternal life after annihilation in death! That, of course, is why they abhor the funeral pyre, and condemn cremation; as if any bodily frame, even if kept from the flames, would not be resolved into earth just the same after the passing of years and generations, and as if it made the least difference whether wild beasts tore it asunder, or the sea engulfed it, or the earth covered it, or fire consumed it. Any manner of disposition of the dead would be pain to the body if it retained the senses; and if not, its consumption by fire would be salutary because of its very quickness. Deceived by this mistake, they promise themselves after death, as a reward for their own goodness, a life of bliss through never-ending time, but to all others as a penalty for their wickedness, eternal torment. I could say much in regard to this, were I not in haste to finish. I have shown now that they themselves are unrighteous, and I care to go no farther. And yet, even if I should allow that they were righteous, it is a fact that both guilt and innocence, in the opinion of most men, are attributable to fate. You yourselves hold that view; for, just as others find in fate the reason for everything we do, you find it in your god. Thus those who belong to your sect do so not because of their own will, but because they are elect of God; and so you fashion a god who is unjust, inasmuch as he punishes men, not for what they will to do, but for what fate compels them to do.

'And yet I should like to ask whether they are to rise again without bodies, or with them—and with what bodies, the same, or new ones? Without? That, so far as I can see, would be neither mind nor soul nor life at all. With the same body? But that has already been dissolved, long ago. With another? In that case it is a new creature that is born, and the former being is not reconstructed. And besides, think of the length of time that has elapsed, and of the innumerable generations that have arrived and passed in the stream of existence: and has there been a single one who has returned from the shades, even on leave for so much as a few hours, like Protesilaus, to give us a precedent on which to ground a belief? All those figments of an unhealthy imagination, all those silly consolations invented by lying poets to lend charm to their song, you credulous fools that you are, have clumsily refashioned and ascribed to your god.

'You do not even allow the present to teach you how vain is the promise and how fruitless the vows in which you are deceived. Miserable that you are, while you are still in this life consider what awaits you after death. Part of you, the greater part, and, according to your claim, the better, are suffering from poverty and cold, are wretched from hard labor and hunger, and your god allows it, pretends not to see, and is either unwilling or unable to come to the aid of his own; so weak or so unjust is he. And you, who dream of immortality after death,—when you are shaken by danger, when you are burning with fever, when you are torn by grief, do you still not realize your condition? do you still not recognize your fragility? In spite of yourself, wretched that you are, you are convicted of infirmity, and yet will not confess it.

'But I pass over the merely ordinary. Look, set before you are threats, punishments, torments, and crosses not indeed to be worshipped but to be endured, and even the flames which you both predict and fear—and where is that god of yours who can aid those who are entering upon life a second time, but not those who are in this life? Do not the Romans command, do they not rule, without your god? Do they not enjoy as their own the whole world, and are they not masters over you? But you, in the meantime, in suspense and anxiety, abstain from honorable pleasures, refuse to go to the games, take no part in the processions, will have nothing to do with feasts in common apart from your own, or with contests in honor of the gods, or with the meats which remain from the sacrifices, or the wine left after libation at the altars. Thus it is that you stand in fear of the gods whom you deny. You set on your heads no garlands of flowers, you never grace your bodies with perfumes. You reserve your unguents for funerals, you deny the floral wreath even to the tomb. Pale and trembling with fear, you are worthy of compassion—but on the part of our gods; for the fact is, poor souls that you are, you neither live a second time nor do you enjoy the present life.

‘So henceforth, if you have any remnant of wisdom or modesty, cease to scrutinize the regions of the sky and to pry into the destinies and secrets of the universe. It is enough for men to contemplate what is under their feet, especially when, like you, they are untaught, uncultured, rude, and rustic, and not only have no idea of human affairs, but are much less qualified to discuss the divine.’

—GRANT SHOWERMAN.

THE CHRISTIAN REPLIES

‘Do you really imagine that we conceal the object of our worship because we have no shrines and altars? What image can I possibly make of God when man himself, rightly regarded, is God’s image? And what temple shall I build for him when the whole world, his handiwork, cannot contain him? Shall I, who have a more spacious dwelling myself, though I am only a man, try to enclose him within the four walls of one small building? Is he not better hallowed in the soul, and consecrated in the inmost heart? Shall I offer as victims and sacrifices to God the things which he has given me for my use, and so fling back his gift? That would be ungrateful. The fit sacrifice is a good spirit, a pure mind, and a clear conscience. He, then, who follows after innocence prays to God; he who pursues righteousness sacrifices to God; he who abstains from deceit propitiates God; he who saves a fellow-man from peril offers the chiefest victim. These are our sacrifices, these are the sacred rites of our God. With us, the most upright man is the most religious. But, as you say, we neither show to others, nor ourselves see, the God whom we worship. In truth, it is a reason for believing him to be God, that we can perceive, but cannot see him. In his works, and in all the forces of nature, in thunder, in lightning, and in the unclouded blue, we see his ever-present power. You need not wonder that you cannot see God himself. Winds and storms blow and shake everything, but the winds are not actually visible to the eyes. It is the sun that enables us to see everything; but you cannot look into the sun, for his rays dull your sight, and, if you persevere in the attempt, you see nothing at all. Do you think that you could bear to gaze at the maker of the sun, the very source of light, when you have to turn away from the lightning and hide from the thunderbolts? Do you expect to see God with your physical eyes, while your soul, which gives you life and speech, is invisible and intangible? You have urged that God does not heed the actions of men, and that from his place in heaven he cannot at once pervade the whole and regard individuals. Man, you are mistaken and deceived. From what place can God be far distant when all the regions of heaven and earth, and all beyond our earthly sphere, are filled with him who made them? In every place he is not only very near to us, but is mingled with us. To take another illustration from the sun, it is set high in the heavens, but it throws its light over all lands, and diffuses its beams everywhere with unfailing glory. Much more is God, the author of all things, the observer of all men, and from whom no secrets are hid, present in darkness, and in that other darkness of our thoughts. Not only do we live under his eye, but I may almost say we live with him. . . .

‘Now, with regard to the burning of the world, it is a vulgar error to hold that there cannot be an unexpected conflagration or a failure of moisture. No philosopher doubts that everything that has a beginning has also an end, and that all created things perish. The Stoics uniformly think that the heavens with all that they contain will be overcome by fire whenever the springs of water fail them, and that the world itself will take fire when all the moisture has been used up. The Epicureans agree with them as to the conflagration of the elements and the wreck of the universe. . . . And so with the renewal of life, the best philosophers, from Pythagoras downwards, and especially Plato, have held it with a sort of imperfect and partial belief. They say that after the dissolution of the body the soul alone remains eternally, and finds new habitations, and they so far pervert the truth as to suggest that the souls of men migrate into birds and beasts. That idea is more suitable for pantomime than for philosophy. However, it is enough for my purpose that on the general question your philosophers do to some extent agree with us. And surely, no one would be so dull or so stupid as to deny that God, who made man originally, can make him again and afresh? If he was born from nothing, so he can be renewed from nothing, for renewal must needs be less difficult than creation. Do you believe that that which is withdrawn from our dull eyes is necessarily dead in God's sight also? Every human body, whether it becomes dry dust, or moisture, or a handful of ashes, is removed from us, but is reserved for the purposes of God, who guards the elements. Nor, as you suppose, do we fear that our dead will be prejudiced if they are not buried; it is only that we prefer burial to cremation as being the older and better custom. But see how all nature offers us consolatory suggestions of a future resurrection. The sun sets and rises again, the stars sink and return, flowers wither and grow again, shrubs grow green after their old age, seeds cannot spring up except they perish. So the body in its sepulchre is like trees in winter, which show no sign of sap and seem quite dry. You are not so impatient as to expect a tree to grow green in midwinter; and we in like manner wait for the spring-time of the body. . . .

Our Christian morality, lax as our system is in some respects, will be found on comparison much better than your own. For instance, your people forbid adultery, but practice it, while we are true husbands all our lives; you punish crimes when they have been committed, with us the mere contemplation of them is sinful; you fear your accomplices, we fear conscience alone, of which we cannot divest ourselves. Besides, the jails are full of your people, but no Christian who is not an apostate is to be found there, except on account of his religion. . . .

How noble a spectacle it must be in God's sight when a Christian does battle with pain, and is matched like a gladiator against threats and torments and tortures; when he laughs at the terrors and din of the fatal theater and offers himself to the executioner; when he asserts his liberty against kings and princes, and yields only to God, whose he is; and when, with the triumphant air of a conqueror, he beards the very man who pronounced sentence upon him! He is indeed a conqueror, for he has won that for which he fought. What soldier does not adventure himself more bravely under the eye of his general? But the reward comes only after the deed of valor, and if the soldier is killed, the earthly general cannot give what he has not got;—he cannot prolong the man's life, but can only honor his good service. But the soldier of God is not deserted in trouble, nor put an end to by death. The Christian may seem unhappy, but cannot be so in reality. You yourselves laud to the skies the behavior of unfortunate people like Mucius Scaevola, who, when he made a mistake and failed to kill the king, would have lost his life if he had not voluntarily sacrificed his right hand. But how many of our folk have borne in silence the burning, not of the right hand, but of the whole body, and that, too, when it was in their power to procure their release? Need I compare our grown men to Mucius and Aquilius and Regulus? Why, our boys and girls are so inspired to bear pain that they make light of crucifixion, wild beasts, and all the tortures and penalties of the law. You wretched people, you do not understand that no one submits to pain voluntarily without good reason, or can endure torture without God's help. . . .

We, then, who value virtue and modesty necessarily have no part or lot in your evil pleasures and pomps and shows. We know how they originated from your ritual, and we condemn their dangerous attractions. And who can help condemning the disreputable excitements of the circus, and the organized teaching of murder in your gladiatorial shows? In your stage-plays also there is just as much wild passion, but more long-drawn-out infamy. The obscenities of the actor dishonor your own gods, and his sham tears evoke your sympathy, so that, while you insist on real murder in the arena, you deplore the imitation of it on the stage. . . .

We despise the pride of the philosophers, whom we know to be misleaders and flatterers of the great, notwithstanding their eloquent censure of their own faults. For ourselves, we wear our wisdom not in our dress, but in our minds; we do not say great things, but do them; and we glory in having attained that which the philosophers, with all their diligent search, could not find. How can we be thankless and discontented if the truth of God has borne fruit in our own time? Let us enjoy our good fortune, and direct our minds aright so that superstition may be restrained, impiety banished, and the true faith upheld.'

THE VERDICT

When Octavius had done speaking, we sat still for a minute or two, too much surprised to say anything. For myself, I was reduced to silence by my extreme admiration for the arguments, the instances, and the wide reading with which he had illustrated what it is much easier to feel than to express. I admired also the way in which he had turned against his opponents their own philosophical weapons, and had shown that truth was such as it was easy to understand and to welcome.

Cæcilius was the first to speak, and interrupted my reflections by saying: 'I congratulate my friend Octavius most heartily, and myself too and I need not wait for the verdict. We have won, as things are, and I say 'we' because I am unprincipled enough to claim a share in the victory; for if Octavius has overcome me, I have got the better of my errors. As for the main question, I admit what he has said of providence and the unity of God, and I agree with him as to the merits of what is now the sect of both of us. But as it is past midday, let us reserve for tomorrow certain matters, not serious objections, on which I should like fuller information. The inquiry will be all the easier for our being agreed in principle.'

'For the sake of all three of us,' I said, 'I am delighted with the happy result; with my friend Octavius's victory, and with my own escape from the invidious duty of delivering judgment. I will not attempt to reward him with mere words of praise; and, besides, the testimony of man—especially of one man—would be inconclusive. But he has a noble reward from God, to whose inspiration and help he owes his eloquence and his success.'

After this we parted in good spirits and good humor; Cæcilius rejoicing that he had become a believer, and Octavius because he had made him one; and I for both reasons.

QUINTUS SEPTIMIUS FLORENS TERTULLIANUS (About A.D. 155-220)

Tertullian, a converted pagan of Carthage, was one of the most earnest and earliest of the distinguished defenders of Christianity. Ably educated in rhetoric and law, he was prominent after conversion as presbyter and author, but in later life became one of the schismatics called Montanists. He wrote abundantly in both periods, and always with more or less combative fervor. Among his works are On the Witness of the Soul, On the Shows, On Women's Dress, The Apologeticus or Defence for Christians, On Idolatry, On Prayer, Against the Jews. The intransigent nature of his teaching is exemplified by the passage in the treatise On Idolatry where he condemns not only all attendance at pagan worship, but every activity in any way connected with it, even to the carpenter's work that builds or repairs the temple, the sculptor's that fashions pagan images for temple or theater, the merchant's selling of incense, or the teacher's instruction in pagan letters. He preaches the utmost separateness from the world.

THE APOLOGY

THE NUMBERS OF THE CHRISTIANS

We are of yesterday, and we already fill all that is yours—your cities, your tenements, your fortress-towns, your municipalities, your meeting-places, your councils, your very camps, your tribes, your public service, the imperial palace, the senate, the forum. We have left you nothing but your temples. For what war might we not have been fit and ready, even if unequal in forces—we, who are so willing to be slain, if according to our ways it were not the better thing to be slain rather than to slay? Without recourse to arms, and without rebellion, but by merely disagreeing with you, we could have fought you by the ill will engendered through keeping separate from you; for if such a multitude of men had broken away from you and removed to some distant corner of the world, your rule would surely have been put to shame by the loss of so many citizens, whatever their character, and would have suffered from bare desertion. Beyond doubt, you would have been terrified at your solitude, at the silence in everything, and at the stupor of a world as if dead. You would have had to look for subjects to rule over; more enemies would have remained than citizens.

—GRANT SHOWERMAN.

CHRISTIAN PRACTICE

We are made a body by common religious feeling, unity of discipline, and the bond of hope. We come together in a meeting and assembly, that we may as it were form a troop, and so in prayer to God beset Him with our supplications. This violence is well-pleasing to God. We pray also for emperors, for their ministers, and for them that are in power, for the welfare of the world, for peace therein, for the delay of the end. We meet together for the reading of the divine writings, if the character of the times compels us in any way to forewarning or reminder. However that may be, with the holy words we nourish our faith, lift up our hope, confirm our confidence and no less make strong our discipline by impressing the precepts. At these meetings we have also exhortations, rebukes, and a Divine censorship. For judgment also is executed with much gravity, as before men who are sure that they are in the sight of God; and it is a notable foretaste of judgment to come if a man has so sinned as to be banished from the communion of our prayer and meeting and all holy intercourse. Our presidents are the approved elders, obtaining that honor not for a price but by attested character; for indeed the things of God are not sold for a price. Even if there is a sort of common fund, it is not made up of money paid in fees, as for a worship by contract. Each of us puts in a trifle on the monthly day, or when he pleases; but only if he pleases, and only if he is able, for no man is obliged, but contributes of his own free will. These are as it were deposits of piety; for it is not paid out thence for feasts and drinkings and thankless eating-houses, but for feeding and burying the needy, for boys and girls deprived of means and parents, for old folk now confined to the house: also for them that are shipwrecked, for any who are in the mines, and for any who in the islands or in the prisons, if only it be for the cause of God's people, become the nurslings of their own confession.

—HENRY MELVILL GWATKIN.

CÆCILIOUS CYPRIANUS (About A.D. 200-258)

Cyprian, like Tertullian, was a convert from paganism whom ability and earnestness elevated to Christian leadership in Carthage. Made bishop about 249, on the outbreak of Decius' persecution in 250 and 251 he fled, directing the affairs of the Church from his place of concealment. Less seriously affected by the persecution of Gallus, emperor in 251-3, and attacked again in the persecution of Valerian in 257, on September 14 of the following year he suffered martyrdom. He wrote tractates and letters, of which we have thirteen of the former and about eighty of the latter. Some of the living subjects of his discussion were the treatment of those who under persecution had fallen away from the faith, the charge that Christianity was responsible for the calamities of the time, the superior blessings of the Christian religion as compared with the old faith, the proper dress and bearing of Christian virgins, the sins of heresy and the unity of the Church, the virtue of patience, and the rightness of his hiding in the persecution of Decius in order not to leave the Christians without a head.

THE EDICT OF VALERIAN

Cyprian to his brother Successus, greeting . . . But the truth concerning them is as follows, that Valerian had sent a rescript to the senate, to the effect that bishops and presbyters and deacons should immediately be punished; but that senators, and men of importance, and Roman knights, should lose their dignity, and more-¹⁰ over be deprived of their property; and if, when their means were taken away, they should persist in being Christians, then they should also lose their heads; that matrons should be deprived of their prop-¹⁵ erty, and sent into banishment; but that people of Cæsar's household, whoever of them had either confessed before, or should now confess, should have their property confiscated, and should be sent in chains by²⁰ assignment to Cæsar's estates.

THE UNITY OF THE CHURCH

And this unity we ought firmly to hold²⁵ and assert, especially those of us that are bishops who preside in the Church, that we may also prove the episcopate itself to be one and undivided. Let no one deceive the brotherhood by a falsehood: let no one³⁰ corrupt the faithfulness of the truth by perfidious prevarication. The episcopate is one, each part of which is held by each one for the whole. The Church also is one, which is spread abroad far and wide³⁵ into a multitude by an increase of fruitfulness. As there are many rays of the sun, but one light; and many branches of a tree, but one strength based in its tenacious root; and since from one spring flow⁵ many streams, although the multiplicity seems diffused in the liberality of an overflowing abundance, yet the unity is still preserved in the source. . . . He who has left the Church of Christ is an alien, a profane person, an enemy. He cannot have God for his Father who has not the Church for his mother. If he could escape who was outside the ark of Noah, then he too will escape who was outside the¹⁰ Church.

HERETICAL BAPTISM INVALID

For I know not by what argument some of our colleagues are led to think that when those come to us who have been dipped by heretics, they ought not to be baptized, on the ground as they say that there is one baptism; which one of course is in the¹⁵ Catholic Church, for the Church is one, and baptism there is none outside the Church. For since there cannot be two baptisms, then if heretics in truth baptize, it is they who have the baptism. . . . We,²⁰ however, say that those who have come thence are not rebaptized with us but baptized, for indeed they receive not anything there where nothing is, but come to us that they may here receive where there is²⁵ all grace and truth, since there is but one grace and truth.

LUCIUS CÆCILIUS FIRMIANUS LACTANTIUS (About A.D. 260-340)

Lactantius, pupil of Arnobius and Ciceronian enthusiast, called as professor of rhetoric to Nicomedia by Diocletian, became a convert in middle age, and was in late life the tutor of Constantine's son Crispus in Gaul. His works, facile and gracious rather than profound, were principally the seven books of Instruction in Religion, designed to induct the reader into Christianity, On the Wrath of God, and various lost works. On the Deaths of the Persecutors, written after the last persecution by Diocletian, demonstrating the evil end of the great enemies of Christianity, is not surely by Lactantius.

THE EDICT OF MILAN

When we, Constantine Augustus and Licinius Augustus, had happily met together at Milan, and were holding consideration of all things which concern the advantage and security of the state, we thought that amongst other things which seemed likely to profit men generally we ought in the very first place to set in order the conditions of the reverence paid to the Divinity, by giving to the Christians and all others full authority to follow whatever worship any man has chosen; whereby whatsoever Divinity dwells in heaven may be benevolent and propitious to us and to all who are placed under our authority. Therefore we thought it good with sound counsel and very right reason to lay down this law, that no man whatever should be refused any legal facility, who has given up his mind either to the observance of Christianity, or to the worship which he personally feels best suited to himself; to the end that the supreme Divinity whose worship we freely follow may continue in all things to grant us his wonted favor and goodwill. Wherefore Your Devotion should know that it is our pleasure to abolish all conditions whatever which appeared in former charters directed to your office about the Christians, that every one of those who have a common wish to observe the Christian worship may now freely and unconditionally endeavor to observe the same without any annoyance or disquiet. These things we thought good to signify in the fullest manner to Your Carefulness, that you might know that we have given freely and unreservedly to the said Christians authority to practise their worship. And when you perceive that we have made this grant to the said Christians, Your Devotion understands that to others also freedom for their own worship and observance is likewise left open and freely granted, as befits the quiet of our times, that every man may have freedom in the practice of whatever worship he has chosen, for it is not our will that ought be diminished from the honor of any worship. Moreover, in regard to the Christians we have thought fit to ordain this also, that if any appear to have bought, whether from our exchequer or from any others, the places at which they were used formerly to assemble, concerning which definite orders have been given before now, and that by letters issued to your office—that the same be restored to the Christians, setting aside all delay and doubtfulness, without any payment or demand of price. Those also who have obtained them by gift shall restore them in like manner without delay to the said Christians; and those moreover who have bought them, as well as those who have obtained them by gift, if they request anything of our benevolence, they shall apply to the Vicarius, that order may be taken for them too by Our Clemency. All these things must be delivered over at once and without delay by your intervention to the corporation of the Christians. And since the said Christians are known to have possessed, not those places only whereto they were used to assemble, but others also belonging to their corporation, namely the churches, and not to individuals, we comprise them all under the above law, so that you will order them to be restored without any doubtfulness or dispute to the said Christians, that is, to their corporation and assemblies; provided always as aforesaid, that those who restore them without price, as we said, shall expect a compensation from our benevolence. In all these things you must give the aforesaid Christians your most effective intervention, that our command may be fulfilled as soon as may be, and that in this matter as well as others order may be taken by Our Clemency for the public quiet. So far we will ensure that, as is already said, the Divine favor which we have already experienced in so many affairs shall continue for all time to give us prosperity and successes, together with happiness for the state. But that it may be possible for this command of our benevolence to come to the knowledge of all men, it will be your duty by a proclamation of your own to publish everywhere and bring to the notice of all men this present document when it reaches you, that the command of this our benevolence may not be hidden.

ON DIOCLETIAN

When Diocletian, that inventor of crimes and deviser of evils, was ruining all things, he could not refrain his hands even from God. He was the man who overturned the whole world, partly by avarice and partly by cowardice. He made three partners in the government, dividing the empire into four parts, so that armies were multiplied, because each of the four endeavored to have a much greater number of soldiers than former emperors had when they ruled the state alone. Thus the receivers of taxes began to be more in number than the payers, so that by reason of the consumption of husbandmen's goods by the excess of land-taxes the farms were left waste and tilled lands turned into forest. In order too that all places might be filled with terror the provinces also were cut up into fragments, and many presidents and sundry companies of officials lay heavy on every territory, and indeed almost on every city; and there were many receivers besides and secretaries and deputies of the prefects. All these very seldom had civil cases before them, only condemnations and continual confiscations and requisitions—I will not say frequent, but unceasing—of every kind of property, and in the levying intolerable wrongs. Even these might be borne if they were intended to provide pay for the soldiers; but Diocletian in his insatiable avarice would never let his treasures be diminished, but was always heaping up extraordinary aids and benevolences, in order to keep his hoards untouched and inviolate. Again, when by various evil deeds he caused a prodigious scarcity, he essayed by law to fix the prices of goods in the market. Then much blood was shed for trifling and paltry wares, and through fear nothing appeared in the market, so that the scarcity was made much worse, till after the law had ruined multitudes it was of sheer necessity abolished. In addition to this he had an unlimited taste for building, and levied of the provincials as unlimited exactions for the wages of workmen and artificers, and the supplying of wagons and everything else that was wanted for the works in hand. . . . Thus he always played the madman in his endeavor to equal Nicomedia with imperial Rome.

—GWATKIN'S SELECTIONS.

EUSEBIUS HIERONYMUS (About A.D. 348-420)

Jerome, born in Dalmatia, was in Rome at the age of five. Among the teachers of his youth was Ælius Donatus, the famous grammarian and commentator. After a sojourn in Gaul and the decision to devote himself to religion, followed by a sojourn at Aquileia in northeastern Italy, in 373 he set out for Jerusalem, which he did not reach, however, until twelve years later. Of the intervening time he spent two years in study at Antioch, three years as hermit in the desert in obedience to the strong ascetic impulse that characterized him, four years again in Antioch and in Constantinople as priest and student, and three years in Rome, where he was the intimate of Pope Damasus, for whom he undertook the famous revision and translation of the Bible called the Vulgate. In 385, the year after the death of Damasus, he yielded again to the ascetic impulse and left Rome for the East, the more readily because of enemies who found in his relations with Marcella, Paula, and Eustochium, Roman ladies of like ascetic inclination, convenient ground for criticism. Having met at Antioch, all visited Jerusalem in 386, returned to Alexandria and Egypt to learn at first hand the ways of the hermit life, and finally in 389 founded in Bethlehem a monastery, a convent, and a hospice for pilgrims. Here, after long years of study, teaching, and writing, not without the controversial unpleasantness into which his nature seemed to draw him, he died on September 30, 420, ten years after the taking of Rome by Alaric, the news of which had so affected him. He was a highly gifted man of strong emotions.

THE EPISTLES

THE CHARM OF CICERO

When years ago I had torn myself from home and parents, sister and friends, for the kingdom of heaven's sake, and had taken my journey for Jerusalem, I could not part with the books which I had collected at Rome with very great care and labor. And so, unhappy man that I was, I followed up my fasting by reading Cicero; after a night of watching, after shedding tears, which the remembrance of my past sins drew from my inmost soul, I took up Plautus. If sometimes, coming to myself, I began to read the prophets, their in-artistic style repelled me. When my blinded eyes could not see the light, I thought the fault was in the sun, not in my eyes. While the old serpent thus deceived me, about the middle of Lent a fever seized me, and so reduced my strength that my life scarce cleaved to my bones. They began to prepare for my funeral. My whole body was growing cold, only a little vital warmth remained in my breast; when suddenly I was caught up in spirit, and brought before the tribunal of the Judge. So great was the glory of his presence, and such the brilliancy of the purity of those who surrounded Him, that I cast myself to the earth, and did not dare to raise my eyes. Being asked who I was, I answered that I was a Christian. 'Thou liest,' said the Judge, 'thou art a Ciceronian, and not a Christian; for where thy treasure is, there is thy heart also.' Thereupon, I was silent. He ordered me to be beaten, but I was tormented more by remorse of conscience than by the blows; I said to myself, 'Who shall give thee thanks in hell?' Then I cried, 'Have mercy upon me, O Lord, have mercy upon me!' My cry was heard above the sound of the blows. Then they who stood by, gliding to the knees of the Judge, prayed Him to have mercy on my youth, and He gave me time for repentance, on pain of more severe punishment if I should read pagan books in the future. I, who in such a strait would have promised even greater things, made oath, and declared by His sacred Name, 'O Lord, if ever I henceforth possess profane books or read them, let me be treated as if I had denied thee.' After this oath, they let me go, and I returned to the world. To the wonder of all who stood by, I opened my eyes, shedding such a shower of tears that my grief would make even the incredulous believe in my vision. And this was not mere sleep, or a vain dream, such as often deludes us. The tribunal before which I lay is witness, so may I never come into a like judgment. I protest that my shoulders were livid, that I felt the blows after I awoke, and thenceforward I studied divine things with greater ardor than ever I had studied the things of the world.

A PROTEST AGAINST SLANDER

One finds fault with my walk and my smile, another slanders my countenance, another thinks my simplicity suspicious. I have lived among them nearly three years. A troop of virgins often surrounded me. I explained to them the divine books to the best of my ability. Study brought companionship, and companionship friendship, and friendship confidence. Let them say, if they have ever observed in me anything unbecoming a Christian man. Whose money have I accepted? Have I not refused all presents, great and small? Has anybody's gold tinkled in my hand? Have I spoken an ambiguous word, cast a light glance? They object nothing against me except that I am a man, and that objection was made only when Paula proposed to go to Jerusalem. Be it so. They believed my accuser when he lied, let them also believe him when he retracts. . . .

I have written these lines, dear lady Asella, on the eve of going on board, in haste, weeping, and mourning; and I thank my God that I am worthy of the hatred of the world. . . . They call me a malefactor; I, a servant of Christ, accept the title. . . . The infamy of a false accusation has been cast upon me; but I know it is through good report and through evil report one must come to the kingdom of heaven. Salute Paula and Eustochium, mine in Christ, whether the world will or no; salute Albina, my mother, Marcella my sister, Marcellina, the holy Felicitas, and say to them, we shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ; there it shall be seen in what spirit each has lived. Remember me, illustrious example of purity and virginity, and let thy prayers smooth for me the stormy sea.

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF PAULA

Besides a monastery of men, which she assigned to be governed by men, she gathered many virgins together out of divers provinces, some who were noble, some of middle rank, and some of the meanest condition; and these she divided into three bands and three monasteries; but so that, while separated in their work and in their food, yet in their Psalms and Prayers they were joined. As soon as the Alleluia was sung, which was the sign by which they were summoned to the assembly, it was lawful for none to forbear coming. Paula being either the first, or at least one of the first, would watch the arrival of the rest; provoking them to be diligent by her example, and by shame rather than by fear. In the morning early, at the third hour, at the sixth, at the ninth, at vespertine, and at midnight, they sang the Psalter in order. . . .

What shall I say about her piety and diligence, about sick persons whom she cherished with wonderful attention and care? But she, who liberally afforded all things to sick persons, and would also give them flesh to eat, whensoever she herself was sick allowed herself no such indulgences; and in that seemed unjust that, being so full of pity to others, she exercised so much severity upon herself. There was none of the young girls, healthy and strong, who gave herself to so much abstinence as Paula did, with that broken, aged, and weak body of hers. I confess that in this point she was somewhat too self-willed, for she would not spare herself nor hearken to my admonition. . . .

Why do I make any further delay, and increase my sorrow by prolonging it? This most wise of women felt that death was at hand. . . . And when I asked her why she was silent and would not answer us, and whether she was in any pain, she answered me in Greek, that 'she had no trouble, but that she saw all things before her in tranquillity and peace.' After this she was silent, and shutting her eyes, as one who now despised mortal things, she repeated these verses so that we could hardly hear what she said, even till she breathed out her soul, and applying her finger to her mouth, she made the sign of the cross upon her lips. Her spirit fainted, and panted apace toward death; and her soul even longing to break out, she converted the very rattling of her throat, wherewith mortal creatures use to end their life, into the praises of our Lord. There were present the bishops of Jerusalem and other cities, and an innumerable multitude of priests of inferior rank, and Levites. The whole monastery was filled with choirs of virgins and monks. . . .

From the moment of her death forward

there was no lamentation nor doleful cry, as is wont to be upon the death of this world, but there were whole troops of people who chanted out the Psalms in different tongues. Paula's body was carried to the tomb by the hands of bishops, who bent their necks under the bier, whilst other bishops carried lamps and tapers before the body; others led the choirs of singers; and she was laid in the middle of her Church of the Nativity of our blessed Savior. The whole crowd of the cities of Palestine came to her funeral.

THE RUIN OF THE ROMAN WORLD

It is not the calamities of wretched men that I am speaking of, but the fragile state of human conditions. My soul shrinks from reciting the ruins of our times. For twenty years and more, the blood of Rome has been poured out daily between the city of Constantine and the Julian Alps. In Scythia, Thrace, Macedonia, Thessaly, Dardania, Dacia, Epirus, Dalmatia, and all the Pannonias, the Goth, Sarmatian, Quade, Alan, Hun, Vandal, and Marcoman lay waste, pillage, and drag away. How many matrons, how many virgins of God, how many of the free-born and noble have been used for the mirth of these beasts! Bishops have been seized, elders and other officials slain, churches overthrown, horses stabled at the altars of Christ, the mortal relics of the martyrs dug up. Everywhere are lamentations, everywhere groanings, and on every hand the image of death. The Roman world is tumbling in ruins. And yet our head is erect and unbent. In what state of mind and soul now do you suppose are the people of Corinth, of Athens, of Lacedæmon, of Arcadia, and of entire Greece, all of them in the control of barbarians? and indeed I have named only a few cities that once had no slight power. The East seemed immune from these misfortunes, and thrown into consternation merely by rumors—when, look you, in the past year from the farthest cliffs of the Caucasus the wolves of the North came sweeping down on us, and in this short time have ranged over these big provinces. How many monasteries have been seized, how many rivers have had their waters changed to human blood! Antioch was besieged, and the rest of the cities by the Halys, the Cydnus, the Orontes, and the Euphrates. Troops of captives have been dragged away. Arabia, Phœnicia, Palestine, and Egypt are in bonds to fear.

ALARIC IN ROME

A terrifying rumor comes to me from the West that Rome has been besieged and her citizens' safety bought with gold; that, once despoiled, they were again beset, so that after losing their substance they might yield up life as well. My voice is stopped, and sobs cut off the words as I try to speak. Captive is the city which once took captive all the world; yea, it perished from famine ere touched by the sword, and few were found to be rendered captive. Maddening hunger drove to the use of meats unspeakable; they tore their own members, the one the other, mothers not sparing the sucking babe, and consuming again the fruits of their own bosoms. In the night was Moab taken, in the night its walls fell. O God, the heathen are come into thine inheritance; Thy holy temple have they defiled; they have laid Jerusalem on heaps. The dead bodies of thy servants have they given to be meat unto the fowls of the heaven, the flesh of thy saints unto the beasts of the earth. Their blood have they shed like water round about Jerusalem; and there was none to bury them. What voice could tell of that night's destruction and of its deadly woes, or what tears equal its sorrows? The city of old, the queen of the world for many years, is fallen to ruin, and the lifeless bodies of men lie thickly scattered in its streets and homes, and everywhere is the spectre of death.

THE PREFACE TO EZECHIEL III

AFTER ALARIC'S COMING

No doubt everything which is born is doomed to die, that which has matured must grow old, there is no work of man but decay attacks it or age ends by destroying it. But who would have believed that Rome, raised by so many victories above the universe, could one day crumble to pieces, and be at once the mother and the tomb of her people? that she who had reckoned the East, and Egypt, and Africa among her slaves, should herself become a slave in her turn? Who would have believed that obscure Bethlehem would see, begging at its gates, nobles lately loaded with wealth? The daughters of the queenly city now wander from shore to shore, to Africa, to Egypt, to the East; her ladies have become servants; the most illustrious personages ask bread at the gates of Bethlehem, and when we cannot give it to them all, we give them at least our tears. In vain I try to snatch myself from the sight of such sufferings by resuming my unfinished work; I am incapable of study. I feel that this is the time for translating the precepts of Scripture not into words but into deeds, and not for saying holy things but doing them.

A PROTEST TO AUGUSTINE

Most holy Lord and blessed Pope, a letter from your Blessedness reached me at the moment of the departure of our holy son, the sub-deacon Asterius, for the West. You affirm, in these lines which I read, that you have not sent a book written against me to Rome; it is not a book which is in question, but a certain letter which is attributed to you, and of which our brother, Sysinnius, brought me a copy. You there exhort me to sing my palinode on the dispute of the Apostles, Peter and Paul, and to do like Stesichore, who changed his satire on Helen into panegyric, in order to recover his sight, which he had lost through his misconduct. I sincerely admit that though I recognized in this writing your method of argumentation and your style, I did not think I ought rashly to accept its authenticity, and to reply to it, for fear I might lay myself open to a charge of injustice from your Blessedness, if I should attribute to you what was not really yours. To this reason for my silence there is another, the long illness of the holy and venerable Paula; occupied entirely in solicitude for her, I have almost forgotten your letter—or that which has been circulated under your name. Forgive me for recalling to you the proverb, 'Music in mourning is a tale out of season' (Eccles. xxii, 6). If the writing is indeed yours, tell me so plainly, and send me a copy of it, that we may discuss the Scriptures without bitterness, and learn either to correct one another's errors, or to show one another that they do not exist. . . . One thing remains for me to ask; it is that you will love one who loves you, and that you, a young man, will not provoke me, an old man, to the battle-ground of the Scriptures. We, too, have had our day, we have held the lists with such force as we had; now that it is your turn to hold them, and that you have obtained distinction, we claim repose at your hands. And that you may not be alone when you invoke against me the fables of the poets, recall to your mind Dares and Entellus. Think also of that proverb which says, 'When the ox is weary, he puts down his feet more heavily.' I dictate these lines with grief. Would to God I might have the happiness of embracing you, and that we could converse together, in order that we might understand one another, and teach one another whatever we are ignorant of.

Remember me, holy and venerable Pope, and see how I love you, I who, when provoked, have not been willing to reply to you, and shrank from attributing to you what I should have blamed in another.

—EDWARD L. CUTTS.

AURELIUS AUGUSTINUS (A.D. 354-430)

Augustine, of Thagaste in Africa, was educated in his home town, at Madaura, and at Carthage, taught rhetoric in Thagaste, Carthage, Rome, and Milan, fell under the influence of Ambrose, then bishop of Milan, who baptized him in 387, and soon returned to Africa, where he was bishop of Hippo. One of his two great works, The Confessions, a highly spiritual comment on significant relations in his life, including his education, his love of Cicero and Virgil, and his mother's character and death, is ranked as one of the world's richest autobiographies. The other, The City of God, was a refutation of the pagan charge that neglect of paganism had been responsible for Alaric's taking of Rome, and a demonstration of the purpose of God in history. Augustine is called the greatest shaping influence between Paul and Luther.

The translation is by E. B. Pusey.

THE CONFESSIONS

THE INSPIRATION OF CICERO

Among such as these, in that unsettled age of mine, learned I books of eloquence, wherein I desired to be eminent, out of a damnable and vain glorious end, a joy in human vanity. In the ordinary course of study, I fell upon a certain book of Cicero, whose speech almost all admire, not so his heart. This book of his contains an exhortation to philosophy, and is called 'Hor-tensius.' But this book altered my affections, and turned my prayers to Thyself, O Lord; and made me have other purposes and desires. Every vain hope at once became worthless to me; and I longed with an incredibly burning desire for an immortality of wisdom, and began now to arise, that I might return to Thee. For not to sharpen my tongue, (which thing I seemed to be purchasing with my mother's allowances, in that my nineteenth year, my father being dead two years before,) not to sharpen my tongue did I employ that book; nor did it infuse into me its style, but its matter.

How did I burn then, my God, how did I burn to re-mount from earthly things to Thee, nor knew I what Thou wouldest do with me? For with Thee is wisdom. But the love of wisdom is in Greek called 'philosophy,' with which that book inflamed me. Some there be that seduce through philosophy, under a great, and smooth, and honorable name coloring and disguising their own errors: and almost all who in that and former ages were such, are in that book censured and set forth: there also is made plain that wholesome advice of Thy Spirit, by Thy good and devout servant; Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ. For in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. And since at that time (Thou, O light of my heart, knowest) Apostolic Scripture was not known to me, I was delighted with that exhortation, so far only, that I was thereby strongly roused, and kindled, and inflamed to love, and seek, and obtain, and hold, and embrace not this or that sect, but wisdom itself whatever it were; and this alone checked me thus enkindled, that the name of Christ was not in it. For this name, according to Thy mercy, O Lord, this name of my Saviour Thy Son, had my tender heart, even with my mother's milk, devoutly drunk in, and deeply treasured; and whatsoever was without that name, though never so learned, polished, or true, took not entire hold of me.

I resolved then to bend my mind to the holy Scriptures, that I might see what they were.

CARTHAGE AND ROME

Thou didst deal with me, that I should be persuaded to go to Rome, and to teach there rather, what I was teaching at Carthage. And how I was persuaded to this, I will not neglect to confess to Thee: because herein also the deepest recesses of Thy wisdom, and Thy most present mercy to us, must be considered and confessed. I did not wish therefore to go to Rome, because higher gains and higher dignities were warranted me by my friends who persuaded me to this, (though even these things had at that time an influence over my mind,) but my chief and almost only reason was, that I heard that young men studied there more peacefully, and were kept quiet under a restraint of more regular discipline; so that they did not, at their pleasures, petulantly rush into the school of one, whose pupils they were not, nor were even admitted without his permission. Whereas at Carthage, there reigns among the scholars a most disgraceful and unruly licence. They burst in audaciously, and with gestures almost frantic, disturb all order which any one hath established for the good of his scholars. Divers outrages they commit, with a wonderful stolidity, punishable by law, did not custom uphold them; that custom evincing them to be the more miserable, in that they now do as lawful, what by Thy eternal law shall never be lawful; and they think they do it unpunished, whereas they are punished with the very blindness whereby they do it, and suffer incomparably worse than what they do. The manners then which, when a student, I would not make my own, I was fain, as a teacher, to endure in others: and so I was well pleased to go where, all that knew it, assured me that the like was not done. But Thou, my refuge and my portion in the land of the living, that I might change my earthly dwelling for the salvation of my soul, at Carthage didst goad me, that I might thereby be torn from it; and at Rome didst proffer me allurements, whereby I might be drawn thither, by men in love with a dying life, the one doing frantic, the other promising vain, things; and, to correct my steps, didst secretly use their and my own perverseness. For both they who disturbed my quiet were blinded with a disgraceful phrenzy, and they who invited me elsewhere, savored of earth. And I, who here detested real misery, was there seeking unreal happiness.

But why I went hence, and went thither, Thou knewest, O God, yet showedst it neither to me, nor to my mother, who grievously bewailed my journey, and followed me as far as the sea. But I deceived her, holding me by force, that either she might keep me back, or go with me, and I feigned that I had a friend whom I could not leave, till he had a fair wind to sail. And I lied to my mother, and such a mother, and escaped: for this also hast Thou mercifully forgiven me, preserving me, thus full of execrable defilements, from the waters of the sea, for the water of Thy Grace; whereby when I was cleansed, the streams of my mother's eyes should be dried, with which for me she daily watered the ground under her face. And yet refusing to return without me, I scarcely persuaded her to stay that night in a place hard by our ship, where was an Oratory in memory of the blessed Cyprian. That night I privily departed, but she was not behind in weeping and prayer. And what, O Lord, was she with so many tears asking of Thee, but that Thou wouldest not suffer me to sail? But Thou, in the depth of Thy counsels and hearing the main point of her desire, regardest not what she then asked, that Thou mightest make me what she ever asked. The wind blew and swelled our sails, and withdrew the shore from our sight; and she on the morrow was there, frantic with sorrow, and with complaints and groans filled Thine ears, who didst then disregard them; whilst through my desires, Thou wert hurrying me to end all desire, and the earthly part of her affection to me was chastened by the allotted scourge of sorrows. For she loved my being with her, as mothers do, but much more than many; and she knew not how great joy Thou wert about to work for her out of my absence. She knew not; therefore did she weep and wail, and by this agony there appeared in her the inheritance of Eve, with sorrow seeking, what in sorrow she had brought forth. And yet, after accusing my treachery and hardheartedness, she betook herself again to intercede to Thee for me, went to her wonted place, and I to Rome.

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF MONNICA

Finally, her own husband, towards the very end of his earthly life, did she gain unto Thee; nor had she to complain of that in him as a believer, which before he was a believer she had borne from him. She was also the servant of thy servants; whosoever of them knew her, did in her much praise and honor and love Thee; for that through the witness of the fruits of a holy conversation they perceived Thy presence in her heart. For she had been the wife of one man, had requited her parents, had governed her house piously, was well reported of for good works, had brought up children, so often travailing in birth of them, as she saw them swerving from Thee. Lastly, of all of us Thy servants, O Lord (whom on occasion of Thy own gift Thou sufferest to speak),¹⁰ us, who before her sleeping in Thee lived united together, having received the grace of Thy baptism, did she so take care of, as though she had been mother of us all; so served us, as though she had been child¹⁵ to us all.

The day now approaching whereon she was to depart this life (which day Thou well knewest, we knew not), it came to pass, Thyself, as I believe, by Thy secret ways so ordering it, that she and I stood alone, leaning in a certain window, which looked into the garden of the house where we now lay, at Ostia; where removed from the din of men, we were recruiting from the fatigues of a long journey, for the voyage. We were discoursing then together, alone, very sweetly; and forgetting those things which are behind, and *reaching forth unto those things which are be-*³⁰ fore, we were inquiring between ourselves in the presence of the Truth, which Thou art, of what sort the eternal life of the saints was to be, which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man. But yet we gasped with the mouth of our heart, after those heavenly streams of Thy fountain, the fountain of life, which is with Thee; that being be-⁴⁰ dewed thence according to our capacity, we might in some sort meditate upon so high a mystery. . . .

Such things was I speaking, and even if not in this very manner, and these same words, yet, Lord, Thou knowest, that in that day when we were speaking of these things, and this world with all its delights became, as we spake, contemptible to us, my mother said; 'Son, for mine own part I have no further delight in anything in⁵⁰ this life. What I do here any longer, and to what end I am here, I know not, now that my hopes in this world are accomplished. One thing there was, for which I desired to linger for a while in this life,⁵⁵ that I might see thee a Catholic Christian before I died. My God hath done this for me more abundantly, that I should now

What answer I made her unto these things, I remember not. For scarce five⁵ days after, or not much more, she fell sick of a fever; and in that sickness one day she fell into a swoon, and was for a while withdrawn from these visible things. We hastened round her; but she was soon brought back to her senses; and looking on me and my brother standing by her, said to us inquiringly, 'Where was I?' And then looking fixedly on us, with grief¹⁰ amazed; 'Here,' said she, 'shall you bury your mother.' I held my peace and refrained from weeping; but my brother spake something, wishing for her, as the happier lot, that she might die, not in a strange place, but in her own land.²⁰ Whereat, she with anxious look, checking him with her eyes, for that he still savored such things, and then looking upon me; 'Behold,' saith she, 'what he saith:' and soon after to us both, 'Lay,' she saith,²⁵ this body anywhere; let not the care for that any way disquiet you: this only I request, that you would remember me at the Lord's altar, wherever you be.' And having delivered this sentiment in what words she could, she held her peace, being exercised by her growing sickness.

But I, considering Thy gifts, Thou unseen God, which Thou instillest into the hearts of Thy faithful ones, whence wondrous fruits do spring, did rejoice and give thanks to Thee, recalling what I before knew, how careful and anxious she had ever been, as to her place of burial, which she had provided and prepared for herself by the body of her husband. For because they had lived in great harmony together, she also wished (so little can the human mind embrace things divine) to have this addition to that happiness, and to have it remembered among men, that after her pilgrimage beyond the seas, what was earthly of this united pair had been permitted to be united beneath the same earth. But when this emptiness had through the fulness of Thy goodness begun to cease in her heart, I knew not, and rejoiced admiring what she had so disclosed to me; though indeed in that our discourse also in the window, when she said, 'What do I here any longer?' there appeared no desire of dying in her own country. I heard afterwards also, that when we were now at Ostia, she with a mother's confidence, when I was absent, one day discoursed with certain of my friends about the contempt of this life, and the blessing of death: and when they were amazed at such courage which Thou hadst given to a woman, and asked 'Whether she were not afraid to leave her body so far from her own city?' she replied, 'Nothing is far to God; nor was it to be feared lest at the end of the world, He should not recognize whence He were to raise me up.' On the ninth day then of her sickness, and the fifty-sixth year of her age, and the three and thirtieth of mine, was that religious and holy soul freed from the body.

I closed her eyes; and there flowed withal a mighty sorrow into my heart, which was overflowing into tears; mine eyes at the same time, by the violent command of my mind, drank up their fountain wholly dry; and woe was me in such a strife! But when she breathed her last, the boy Adeodatus burst out into a loud lament; then, checked by us all, held his peace. In like manner also a childish feeling in me, which was, through my heart's youthful voice, finding its vent in weeping, was checked and silenced. For we thought it not fitting to solemnize that funeral with tearful lament, and groanings: for thereby do they for the most part express grief for the departed, as though unhappy, or altogether dead; whereas she was neither unhappy in her death, nor altogether dead. Of this, we were assured on good grounds, the testimony of her good conversation and her faith unfeigned.

What then was it which did grievously pain me within, but a fresh wound wrought through the sudden wrench of that most sweet and dear custom of living together? I joyed indeed in her testimony, when, in that her last sickness, mingling her endearments with my acts of duty, she called me 'dutiful,' and mentioned, with great affection of love, that she never had heard any harsh or reproachful sound uttered by my mouth against her. But yet, O my God, Who madest us, what comparison is there betwixt that honor that I paid to her, and her slavery for me? Being then forsaken of so great a comfort in her, my soul was wounded, and that life rent asunder as it were, which, of hers and mine together, had been made but one.

The boy then being stilled from weeping, Euodius took up the Psalter, and began to sing, our whole house answering him, the Psalm, I will sing of mercy and judgment to Thee, O Lord. But hearing what we were doing, many brethren and religious women came together; and whilst they (whose office it was) made ready for the burial, as the manner is, I (in a part of the house, where I might properly), together with those who thought not fit to leave me, discoursed upon something fitting the time; and by this balm of truth, assuaged that torment, known to Thee, they unknowing and listening intently, and conceiving me to be without all sense of sorrow. But in Thy ears, where none of them heard, I blamed the weakness of my feelings, and refrained my flood of grief, which gave way a little unto me; but again came, as with a tide, yet not so as to burst out into tears, nor to a change of countenance; still I knew what I was keeping down in my heart. And being very much displeased, that these human things had such power over me, which in the due order and appointment of our natural condition, must needs come to pass, with a new grief I grieved for my grief, and was thus worn by a double sorrow.

And behold, the corpse was carried to the burial; we went and returned without tears. For neither in those prayers which we poured forth unto Thee, when the sacrifice of our ransom was offered for her, when now the corpse was by the grave's side, as the manner there is, previous to its being laid therein, did I weep even during those prayers; yet was I the whole day in secret heavily sad, and with troubled mind prayed Thee, as I could, to heal my sorrow, yet Thou didst not; impressing, I believe, upon my memory by this one instance, how strong is the bond of all habit, even upon a soul, which now feeds upon no receiving Word. It seemed also good to me to go and bathe, having heard that the bath had its name (balneum) from the Greek βαλανεῖον for that it drives sadness from the mind. And this also I confess unto Thy mercy. Father of the fatherless, that I bathed, and was the same as before I bathed. For the bitterness of sorrow could not exude out of my heart. Then I slept, and woke up again, and found my grief not a little softened; and as I was alone in my bed, I remembered those true verses of Thy Ambrose. For Thou art the

Maker of all, the Lord,
 And Ruler of the height,
 Who, robing day in light, hast poured
 Soft slumbers o'er the night,
 That to our limbs the power
 Of toil may be renewed,
 And hearts be rais'd that sink and cower,
 And sorrows be subdued;

And then by little and little I recovered my former thoughts of Thy handmaid, her holy conversation towards Thee, her holy 10 tenderness and observance towards us, whereof I was suddenly deprived: and I was minded to weep in Thy sight, for her and for myself, in her behalf and in my own. And I gave way to the tears which 15 I before restrained, to overflow as much as they desired; reposing my heart upon them; and it found rest in them, for it was in Thy ears, not in those of man, who would have scornfully interpreted my 20 weeping. And now, Lord, in writing I confess it unto Thee. Read it, who will, and interpret it, how he will: and if he finds sin therein, that I wept my mother for a small portion of an hour (the mother 25 who for the time was dead to mine eyes, who had for many years wept for me, that I might live in Thine eyes), let him not deride me; but rather, if he be one of large charity, let him weep himself for 30 my sins unto Thee, the Father of all the brethren of Thy Christ. . . .

I therefore, O my Praise and my Life, God of my heart, laying aside for a while her good deeds, for which I give thanks to 35 Thee with joy, do now beseech Thee for the sins of my mother. Harken unto me, I entreat Thee, by the Medicine of our wounds, Who hung upon the tree, and now 40 sitting at Thy right hand maketh intercession to Thee for us. I know that she dealt mercifully, and from her heart forgave her debtors their debts; do Thou also forgive her debts, whatever she may 5 have contracted in so many years, since the water of salvation. Forgive her, Lord, forgive, I beseech Thee; enter not into judgment with her. Let Thy mercy be exalted above Thy justice, since Thy words 10 are true, and Thou hast promised mercy unto the merciful; which Thou gavest them to be, who wilt have mercy on whom Thou wilt have mercy; and wilt have compassion, on whom Thou hast had compassion.

May she rest then in peace with the husband, before and after whom she had never any; whom she obeyed, with patience bringing forth fruit unto Thee, that she might 20 win him also unto Thee. And inspire, O Lord my God, inspire Thy servants my brethren, Thy sons my masters, whom with voice, and heart, and pen I serve, that so many as shall read these Confessions, may 25 at Thy Altar remember Monnica Thy handmaid, with Patricius, her sometimes husband, by whose bodies Thou broughtest me into this life, how, I know not. May they with devout affection remember my 30 parents in this transitory light, my brethren under Thee our Father in our Catholic Mother, and my fellow citizens in that eternal Jerusalem, which Thy pilgrim people sightheth after from their Exodus, even unto their return thither. That so, my mother's last request of me, may 35 through my confessions, more than through my prayers, be, through the prayers of many, more abundantly fulfilled to her. 40

APOLLINARIS SIDONIUS (About A.D. 431-489)

Sidonius was born in Lyons twenty-one years after Alaric entered Rome and twenty years before the defeat of the Huns at Chalons in one of the world's decisive battles, remarkable besides for the fact that Romans and Teutons for the first time stood together against a common enemy. After winning the favor first of the Emperor Avitus and next of Majorian, whose deaths were temporary checks to his career, he was sent by his province in 467 as delegate to Rome and the Emperor Anthemius, and was favored by appointment to the prefecture of Rome, an office from which he withdrew probably in 469, to become in about three years bishop of Clermont in Auvergne, seat of the ancient Arverni. In the raids and invasions of the Visigoths, and their sieges of Clermont, Sidonius was an active defender of the province, and when in 475 the Roman empire relinquished it to the chieftain Euric and Sidonius ceased to be a Roman citizen, he was filled with sorrow and indignation. After a period in prison, he was allowed to return to Clermont, where he devoted his remaining years to pastoral, scholastic, and literary tasks.

A LETTER FROM ROME

Your letter finds me at Rome. You are solicitous to know whether the affairs which have brought me so far go forward as we hoped, what route I took, and how I fared on it, what rivers celebrated in song I saw, what towns famed for their fair sites, what mountains reputed as the haunt of gods, what glorious battlefields. . . . As bearer of the imperial letter, I was able to avail myself of the public post on leaving our beloved Lyons. . . . On the Ticino I boarded the packet known as the Cursoria, which soon bore me to the Po; be sure I laughed over those convivial songs of ours about Phaethon's sisters and their unnatural tears of amber gum. I passed the mouth of many a tributary from Ligurian or Euganean heights, sedgy Lambro, blue Adda, swift Adige, slow Mincio, borne upon their very eddies as I looked; their margins and high banks were clothed with groves of oak and maple. Everywhere sweetly resounded the harmony of birds, whose loose-piled nests swayed on the hollow canes, or amid the pointed rushes and smooth reed-grass luxuriantly flourishing in the moisture of this wet riverain soil. The way led past Cremona, over whose proximity the Mantuan Tityrus so deeply sighed. We just touched at Brescello to take on Æmilian boatmen in place of our Venetian rowers, and, bearing to the right, soon reached Ravenna. . . . But the drawback is that, with water all about us, we could not quench our thirst; there was neither pure-flowing aqueduct nor filterable cistern, nor trickling source, nor unclouded well. On the one side, the salt tides assail the gates; on the other, the movement of vessels stirs the filthy sediment in the canals, or the sluggish flow is fouled by the bargemen's poles, piercing the bottom slime. From Ravenna we came to the Rubicon, which borrows its name from the red color of its gravels, and formed the frontier between the old Italians and the Cisalpine Gauls when the two peoples divided the Adriatic towns. Thence I journeyed to Rimini and Fano, the first famed for its association with Cæsar's rebellion, the second tainted by the fate of Hasdrubal; for hard by flows Metaurus, more durably renowned through the fortune of a single day than if it had never ceased to run red to this hour and roll down the dead on blood-stained waters to the Dalmatian sea. After this I just traversed the other towns of the Flaminian Way—in at one gate, out at the other—leaving the Picenians on the left and the Umbrians on the right; and here my exhausted system succumbed either to Calabrian Atabulus or to air of the insalubrious Tuscan region, charged with poisonous exhalations, and blowing now hot, now cold. Fever and thirst ravaged the very marrow of my being; in vain I promised to their avidity draughts from the pleasant fountain or hidden well, yes, and from every stream present or to come, water of Velino clear as glass, of Clitunno ice-cold, cerulean of Teverone, sulphureous of Nera, pellucid of Farfa, muddy of Tiber; I was mad to drink, but prudence stayed the craving.

Meanwhile, Rome herself spread wide before my view, but I felt like draining down her aqueducts, or even the water of her naval spectacles. Before I reached the city limits, I fell prostrate at the triumphal threshold of the Apostles, and in a flash I felt the languor vanish from my enfeebled limbs. After which proof of celestial protection, I alighted at the inn of which I have engaged a part, and there I am trying to get a little rest, writing as I lie upon my couch. As yet I have not presented myself at the bustling gates of Emperor or court official. For my arrival coincided with the marriage of the patrician Ricimer, to whom the hand of the Emperor's daughter was being accorded in the hope of securer times for the state.

Not individuals alone, but whole classes and parties are given up to rejoicing; you have the best of it on your side of the Alps. While I was writing these lines, scarce a theater, provision-market, prætorium, forum, temple, or gymnasium but echoed to the passage of the cry Thalassio! and even at this hour the schools are closed, no business is doing, the courts are voiceless, missions are postponed; there is a truce to intrigue, and all the serious business of life seems merged in the buffooneries of the stage. Though the bride has been given away, though the bridegroom has put off his wreath, the consular his palm-embroidered robe, the brideswoman her wedding gown, the distinguished senator his toga, and the plain man his cloak, yet the noise of the great gathering has not died away in the palace chambers, because the bride still delays to start for her husband's house. When this merrymaking has run out its course, you shall hear what remains to tell of my proceedings, if indeed these crowded hours of idleness to which the whole state seems now surrendered are ever to end, even when the festivities are over. Farewell.

—O. M. DALTON.

IX. THE THRESHOLD OF THE MIDDLE AGES

ANICIUS MANLIUS SEVERINUS BOETHIUS (About A.D. 480-524)

Boethius, a Roman born of ancient noble family, son of a consul, consul himself in 510, father of the two consuls of 522, was charged by Theodoric the Ostrogoth, who ruled from 489 to 526, with conspiracy to free Rome from his authority, and after imprisonment at Pavia, near Milan, was put to death. He was devoted to Plato and Aristotle, immensely learned and industrious, sensitive to literary art, and a Christian, and has been called 'the last of the Roman philosophers, and the first of the scholastic theologians.' The Consolation of Philosophy, written in prison before his execution, is praised by Gibbon as 'a golden volume, not unworthy of the leisure of Plato or of Tully.' The fact that, unlike the Tractates, the Consolation contains no direct reference to peculiarly Christian doctrine is explained on the ground of its being philosophy and not theology.

The translation here presented is that of the unknown I. T. (1609), revised by H. F. Stewart in the Loeb Library series.

THE CONSOLATION OF PHILOSOPHY

PHILOSOPHY APPEARETH

I that with youthful heat did verses write,
Must now my woes in doleful tunes indite.
My work is framed by Muses torn and rude,
And my sad cheeks are with true tears bedewed:
For these alone no terror could affray
From being partners of my weary way.
The art that was my young life's joy and glory
Becomes my solace now I'm old and sorry; Sorrow has filched my youth from me, the thief!
My days are numbered not by time but Grief.
Untimely hoary hairs cover my head,
And my loose skin quakes on my flesh half dead.
O happy death, that spareth sweetest years,
And comes in sorrow often called with tears.
Alas, how deaf is he to wretch's cries;
And loath he is to close up weeping eyes;
While trustless chance me with vain favors crowned,
That saddest hour my life had almost drowned:
Now she hath clouded her deceitful face,
My spiteful days prolong their weary race.

My friends, why did you count me fortunate?

He that is fallen, ne'er stood in settled state.

While I ruminated these things with myself, and determined to set forth my woeful complaint in writing, methought I saw a woman stand above my head, having a grave countenance, glistening clear eye, and of quicker sight than commonly Nature doth afford; her color fresh and bespeaking unabated vigor and yet discovering so many years, that she could not at all be thought to belong to our times; her stature uncertain and doubtful, for sometime she exceeded not the common height of men, and sometime she seemed to touch the heavens, with her head, and if she lifted it up to the highest, she pierced the very heavens, so that she could not be seen by the beholders; her garments were made of most fine threads, with cunning workmanship into an ever-during stuff, which (as I knew afterward by her own report) she had woven with her own hands.

SHE BEGINNETH HER CONSOLATION

30 Then fled the night and darkness did me leave,
Mine eyes their wonted strength receive,
As when swift Corus spreads the stars with clouds

And the clear sky a veil of tempest shrouds,
The sun doth lurk, the earth receiveth
night,
Lacking the boon of starry light;
But if fierce Boreas, sent from Thrace, make way
For the restoring of the day,
Phœbus with fresh and sudden beams doth rise,
Striking with light our wondering eyes.

In like manner, the mists of sadness dissolved, I came to myself and recovered my judgment, so that I knew my Physician's face; wherefore casting my eyes upon her somewhat steadfastly, I beheld my nurse Philosophy, in whose house I had remained from my youth, and I said: 'O Mistress of all virtues, for what cause art thou come from heaven into this our solitary banishment? Art thou come to bear me company in being falsely accused?'

'Should I,' saith she, 'forsake thee, my disciple, and not divide the burden, which thou bearest through hatred of my name, by partaking of thy labor? But Philosophy never thought it lawful to forsake the innocent in his trouble. Should I fear any accusations, as though this were any new matter? For dost thou think that this is the first time that Wisdom hath been exposed to danger by wicked men? Have we not in ancient times before our Plato's age had oftentimes great conflicts with the rashness of folly? And while he lived, had not his master Socrates the victory of an unjust death in my presence, whose inheritance, when afterward the mob of Epicures, Stoics, and others (everyone for his own sect) endeavored to usurp, and as it were in part of their prey, sought to draw me to them, exclaiming and striving against them; they tore the garment which I had woven with my own hands, and having gotten some little pieces of it, thinking me to be wholly in their possession, departed. Some of whom, because certain signs of my apparel appeared upon them, were rashly supposed to be my familiar friends, and condemned accordingly through the error of the profane multitude.'

GOD GOVERNETH WITH GOODNESS

'He that would seek the truth with thoughts profound

And would not stray in ways that are not right,
He to himself must turn his inward sight,
And guide his motions in a circled round,
Teaching his mind that ever she design
Herself in her own treasures to possess:
So that which late lay hidden in cloudiness
More bright and clear than Phœbus' beams shall shine.
Flesh hath not quenched all the spirit's
light,
Though this oblivion's lamp holds her oppressed.

Some seed of truth remaineth in our breast,
Which skilful learning easily doth excite.
For being asked how can we answer true
Unless that grace within our hearts did dwell?
If Plato's heavenly Muse the truth us tell,
We learning things remember them anew.'

Then I said that I did very well like of Plato's doctrine, for she had brought these things to my remembrance now the second time, first, because I lost their memory by the contagion of my body, and after when I was oppressed with the burden of grief. 'If,' quoth she, 'thou reflectest upon that which heretofore hath been granted, thou wilt not be far from remembering that which in the beginning thou confessedst thyself to be ignorant of.' 'What?' quoth I. 'By what government,' quoth she, 'the world is ruled.' 'I remember,' quoth I, 'that I did confess my ignorance, but though I foresee what thou wilt say, yet I desire to hear it more plainly from thyself.' 'Thou thoughtest a little before that it was not to be doubted that this world is governed by God.' 'Neither do I think now,' quoth I, 'neither will I ever think, that it is to be doubted of, and I will briefly explicate the reasons which move me to think so. This world could never have been compacted of so many divers and contrary parts, unless there were One that doth unite these so different things; and this disagreeing diversity of natures being united would separate and divide this concord, unless there were One that holdeth together that which He united. Neither would the course of nature continue so certain, nor would the different parts hold so well-ordered motions in due places, times, causality, spaces, and qualities, unless there were One who, Himself remaining quiet, disposeth and ordereth this variety of motions. This, whatsoever it be, by which things created continue and are moved, I call God, a name which all men use.'

'Since,' quoth she, 'thou art of this mind, I think with little labor thou mayest be capable of felicity, and return to thy country in safety. But let us consider what we proposed. Have we not placed sufficiency in happiness, and granted that God is Blessedness itself?' 'Yes truly.' 'Wherefore,' quoth she, 'He will need no outward help to govern the world, otherwise, if He needed anything, He had not full sufficiency.' 'That,' quoth I, 'must necessarily be so.' 'Wherefore He disposeth all things by Himself.' 'No doubt He doth,' quoth I. 'But it hath been proved that God is goodness itself.' 'I remember it very well,' quoth I. 'Then He disposeth all things by goodness: since He governeth all things by Himself, whom we have granted to be goodness. And this is as it were the helm and rudder by which the frame of the world is kept steadfast and uncorrupted.' 'I most willingly agree,' quoth I, 'and I foresaw a little before, though only with a slender guess, that thou wouldst conclude this.' 'I believe thee,' quoth she, 'for now I suppose thou lookest more watchfully about thee to discern the truth. But that which I shall say is no less manifest.' 'What?' quoth I. 'Since that God is deservedly thought to govern all things with the helm of goodness, and all these things likewise, as I have showed, hasten to goodness with their natural contention, can there be any doubt made but that they are governed willingly, and that they frame themselves of their own accord to their disposer's beck, as agreeable and conformable to their ruler?' 'It must needs be so,' quoth I, 'neither would it seem an happy government, if it were an imposed yoke, not a desired health.' 'There is nothing then which, following nature, endeavoreth to resist God.' 'Nothing,' quoth I. 'What if anything doth endeavor,' quoth she, 'can anything prevail against Him, whom we have granted to be most powerful by reason of His blessedness?' 'No doubt,' quoth I, 'nothing could prevail.' 'Wherefore there is nothing which either will or can resist this sovereign goodness.' 'I think not,' quoth I. 'It is then the sovereign goodness which governeth all things strongly, and disposeth them sweetly.' 'How much,' quoth I, 'doth not only the reason which thou allegest, but much more the very words which thou usest, delight me, that folly which so much vexed me may at length be ashamed of herself.'

'Thou hast heard in the poets' fables,' quoth she, 'how the giants provoked heaven, but this benign fortitude put them down also, as they deserved. But wilt thou have our arguments contend together? Perhaps by this clash there will fly out some beautiful spark of truth.' 'As it pleaseth thee,' quoth I. 'No man can doubt,' quoth she, 'but that God is almighty.' 'No man,' quoth I, 'that is well in his wits.' 'But,' quoth she, 'there is nothing that He who is almighty cannot do.' 'Nothing,' quoth I. 'Can God do evil?' 'No,' quoth I. 'Wherefore,' quoth she, 'evil is nothing, since He cannot do it who can do anything.' 'Dost thou mock me,' quoth I, 'making with thy reasons an inextricable labyrinth, because thou dost now go in where thou meanest to go out again, and after go out, where thou camest in, or dost thou frame a wonderful circle of the simplicity of God? For a little before taking thy beginning from blessedness, thou affirmedst that to be the chiefest good which thou saidst was placed in God, and likewise thou provedst that God Himself is the chiefest good and full happiness, out of which thou madest me a present of that inference, that no man shall be happy unless he be also a God. Again thou toldest me that the form of goodness is the substance of God and of blessedness, and that unity is the same with goodness, because it is desired by the nature of all things; thou didst also dispute that God governeth the whole world with the helm of goodness, and that all things obey willingly, and that there is no nature of evil, and thou didst explicate all these things with no foreign or far-fetched proofs, but with those which were proper and drawn from inward principles, the one confirming the other.'

'We neither play nor mock,' quoth she, 'and we have finished the greatest matter that can be by the assistance of God, whose aid we implored in the beginning. For such is the form of the Divine substance that it is neither divided into outward things, nor receiveth any such into itself, but as Parmenides saith of it:

"In body like a sphere well-rounded on all sides,"

it doth roll about the moving orb of things, while it keepeth itself unmovable. And if we have used no far-fetched reasons, but such as were placed within the compass of the matter we handled, thou hast no cause to marvel, since thou hast learned in Plato's school that our speeches must be like and as it were akin to the things we speak of.'

OF PROVIDENCE, FOREKNOWLEDGE, WILL AND FATE

But yet thou wilt inquire whether God's knowledge shall be changed by thy disposition, so that when thou wilt now one thing, and now another, it should also seem to have divers knowledges. No. For God's sight preventeth all that is to come and recallesh and draweth it to the presence of His own knowledge; neither doth He vary, as thou imaginest, now knowing one thing and now another, but in one instant without moving preventeth and comprehendeth thy mutations. Which presence of comprehending and seeing all things, God hath not by the event of future things but by His own simplicity. By which that doubt is also resolved which thou didst put a little before, that it is an unworthy thing that our future actions should be said to cause the knowledge of God. For this force of the divine knowledge comprehending all things with a present notion appointeth to everything its measure and receiveth nothing from ensuing accidents. All which being so, the free-will of mortal men remaineth unviolated, neither are the laws unjust which propose punishments and rewards to our wills, which are free from all necessity. There remaineth also a beholder of all things which is God, who foreseeth all things, and the eternity of His vision, which is always present, concurreth with the future quality of our actions, distributing rewards to the good and punishments to the evil. Neither do we in vain put our hope in God or pray to Him; for if we do this well and as we ought, we shall not lose our labor or be without effect. Wherefore fly vices, embrace virtues, possess your minds with worthy hopes, offer up humble prayers to your highest Prince. There is, if you will not dissemble, a great necessity of doing well imposed upon you, since you live in the sight of your Judge, who beholdeth all things.'

TYPOGRAPHY

The selections in CENTURY READINGS IN ANCIENT CLASSICAL LITERATURE represent many translators, many periods of time, and widely separated places. To have printed them in their original form would have resulted in an irritating variety. To reduce them to absolute conformity would be in many instances to interfere with the tastes and the rights of the translator. The very few inconsistencies in spelling, punctuation, and capitalization will be understood as due to a measure of respect for individual, temporal, and national variations.

NOTES

THE ILIAD

4. 7. Atrides, son of Atreus, meaning Agamemnon; the word is a patronymic, as Pelides, son of Peleus, for Achilles.

53. Smintheus, a name given Apollo, from a town sacred to him in the Troad. The town of Cilla and the island of Tenedos were near.

5. 73. Vulcan; the translator uses in general the Latin rather than the Greek names of the gods and heroes.

88. white-armed. It is Homer's way to give the impression of beauty by the use of epithet expressive of a single suggestive detail.

17. nervous, sinewy or muscular.

20. ff. A series of grand similes, characteristic of Homer.

6. vi. The parting of Hector and Andromache is one of the Iliad's most beautiful passages.

33. Thebè, a town on the borders of the Troad.

9. 47. One of the most beautiful similes.

2. The Myrmidons were Achilles' special soldiers.

11. 53. Homer's gods frequently take part in battle, and may even be wounded.

13. xviii. The beautiful shield passage is an important aid to our imagination of Homeric life.

15. 153. Gnosssus was excavated by Sir Arthur Evans from 1900 on; Troy, by Schliemann and Dörpfeld from 1871 on.

18. 178. dome, house, from Latin domus, much used by the translators of Pope's time.

THE ODYSSEY

20. i. Ulysses was much admired for resourcefulness. The Greek name is Odysseus. The use of Latin names for Greek is excusable only as a literary convention.

22. 36. The simile is much less frequent in the Odyssey.

23. 119. Leucothea, a sea nymph; she had given Ulysses the magic veil, with the command to cast it back into the sea after reaching safety.

24. 144. horrors. The word is used in the sense of Latin horreare, to be rough or shaggy, to quiver, to shudder.

vi. The sixth book is favorite because of its charming presentation of the girl princess.

9. Phaeacia, localized in the island of Corfu, not far from Ithaca.

25. 62. Taygetus, the lofty and extended mountain overlooking Sparta; Erymanthus, a mountain in the Peloponnese.

26. ix. The passages by Pope are noticeably of greater facility and vigor, and reproduce more nearly "the surge and thunder of the Odyssey" (Andrew Lang).

27. 81. The land of the Cyclops is localized on the rocky coast near Ætna.

29. xi. The descent to the lower world is the theme of Virgil's Æneid, book VI, and is the whole substance of Dante's Inferno.

41. Tiresias, the famous blind prophet of Thebes. 30. 117. The Greek after-life at its best was not a happy existence.

31. 90. The rock is to be seen near modern Corfu.

32. xvii. The story of Argus is one of the most human things in Homer.

34. xxiii. Penelope's recognition of Ulysses is delayed by the changes time has wrought in his appearance, and by the caution bred in her by experience during his absence. His description of the bed, which is known to nobody outside of the family, will convince her.

THEOGONY

37. The Theogony is comparable to the Hebrew account of creation.

30. Delphi, also called Pytho, was high in a deep mountain valley near Parnassus.

46. Japhet, Iapetus, one of the twelve Titans, father of Prometheus, who stole fire from Heaven.

38. 67. One of Æschylus' surviving tragedies is Prometheus Bound.

WORKS AND DAYS

38. i. Pierian, from a region near Mount Olympus.

39. 26. The Five Ages are a frequent subject in ancient literature: Horace, Virgil, Ovid, Seneca depict or refer to them. The Greek Age of Gold is the parallel of the Hebrew Paradise, and it too was ended by the Fall of Man.

41. ii. This passage affords glimpses of the basic life of Greek lands in all times.

A HYMN TO HERMES

42. 2. Arcadia and Mount Cyllene are in the northern part of the Peloponnese.

18. ways, object of assays and antecedent of which understood.

20. Such was the Greek admiration for inventiveness and resourcefulness that the dubious morality of both Hermes and Odysseus seems not to have lessened their attractiveness.

43. 133. The Hymn to Hermes is humorous after the fashion of many stories of the Christian Saints.

THE LYRIC

46. The Abandoned Shield. Horace makes a like humorous reference, to the lost battle of Philippi, in Odes I, 7.

47. The Storm. Cf. Horace, Odes I, 9, the Soracte poem.

Thou Too Sail On. The ship of state was a much used figure: cf. Plato's Republic VI, 487-9, Horace, Odes I, 14, and Longfellow.

48. II. Imitated by Catullus, poem LI.

49. VII. Supposed to be in answer to a poem of Alcaeus.

XVII. Teian, Anacreon of Teos.

50. The Constitution of Athens. After setting in order the affairs of the city, the law-giver is said to have withdrawn from it in order not to prejudice the working of his laws.

51. 52. Compare the Hebrew complaint: Righteous art thou, O Lord, when I plead with thee: yet let me talk with thee of thy judgments: Wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper—Jeremiah xii, 1, 2.

The Bard of Love. Cadmus, the Phœnician founder of Thebes.

52. 15. Alcides, Hercules.

All Nature Drinks. Cf. Cowley's translation:

'Fill up the bowl then, fill it high,
Fill all the glasses there; for why
Should every creature drink but I;
Why, man of morals, tell me why?'

The Cicada. This insect is a prominent detail in Mediterranean midsummer days.

Thermopylae. One of the world's most famous epigrams. Christopher North made 46 English versions of it 'one sleepless night in bed.'

53. At The Eurymedon. A naval battle won by Cimon on the coast of Asia Minor in 466 B. C., defeating the last great Persian attempt against Greece.

PINDAR

54. Olympian I was probably sung in Hiero's palace at Syracuse. Because it is a glorification of Olympian games above all others, its body is the story of Pelops, son of Tantalus, who won Hippodamia by winning in a race with her father Enomaus.

54. Strophe I, 1. Water, an allusion to the philosophic conception, attributed to Thales, that water was the basic principle of all creation.

Antistrophe I. Pisa and Alpheus, a city and a river near Olympia.

Dorian, a minor mode in music, like the Æolian.

Pherenicus, the winning horse.

Strophe II. Pindar thinks unworthy the ordinary story that Tantalus placed his son before the gods as a feast, that Demeter ate one shoulder before noticing, and that the victim was given an ivory shoulder. He accounts for the ivory shoulder as the white birthmark belonging to the Pelopids, and for the story as a popular invention to account for the disappearance of Pelops.

55. Epode II. Pindar's enlightened views of religion are indicated here.

Antistrophe III. Cyprian Queen, Aphrodite.

56. Epode IV. Cronium, a hill overlooking Olympia.

Pythian I is a glorification of poetry and the gentle qualities of Hiero, as well as of his prowess in battle and in the race. This ode is the inspiration of Gray's Progress of Poesy, which should be read in connection with it. It was probably sung in Syracuse in 474, and also in the town of Ætna.

Antistrophe I. Latoides, patronymic of Apollo, god of poetry and music.

57. Epode I. The region from Cumæ to Ætna has always been actively volcanic. Virgil in the third book of the Æneid makes the writhing Titan Encecladus its cause, and in the sixth places the entrance to the lower world at Lake Avernus, near Cumæ. The description of the eruption of 478 in strophe II would serve perfectly for any modern outburst.

58. Epode III. Dinomenes, son of Hiero.

Strophe IV. The city of Ætna was founded by Hiero in 476 on the model of the Dorian institutions of Sparta, itself a Dorian foundation by Hyllus, who descended with his men from the Balkan Mount Pindus. Pamphyllus, son of Ægimius, was another Dorian leader. Amyclæ was the first capital of Laconia, before the rise of Sparta.

Antistrophe IV. The Amena flowed through the town of Ætna.

Epode IV. Hiero defeated the Etruscans at Cumæ in 474, and the Carthaginians at Himera in Sicily in 480 on the day of Salamis.

59. V. Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum, 570-554, burned men to death in a brazen bull which echoed their cries like bellowings.

HERODOTUS

60. Herodotus will be much more keenly enjoyed by those who read first Andrew Lang, To Herodotus, in his Letters to Dead Authors.

61. The Story of Cræsus: Book I, 30-33, 85-91.

63. b. 50. the sin of his ancestor. Like the Hebrews, the Greeks believed that the curse of guilt descended from generation to generation.

64. 10. Good instances of the ambiguities by which the famous oracle insured itself against reproach.

41. Babylon: Book I, 178-181.

50. Ninus, Nineveh.

b. 13. hot bitumen, suggesting the oil fields of today in the same region.

32. Excavation has revealed parts of ancient Babylon.

57. Belus, Baal. The tower here described was a ziggurat. The biblical tower of Babel was of this character.

65. 21. The Nile: Book II, 19-25.

30. The Nile rises in June, swollen by rains at its source, and subsides from September on. Its waters are now controlled and conserved by dams, the chief of which is at Assuan, ancient Syene.

b. 10. the Ocean, the Homeric idea of it.

66. 16. Cats, Crocodiles: Book II, 66-74. Great deposits of cat mummies have been discovered.

67. 21. The phoenix is described by Tacitus, Lactantius, and Claudian, and became a symbol of immortality.

51. Death and Burial: Book II, 84-88. The number of the embalmed dead in Egypt has been estimated at 731,000,000.

68. 23. The Pyramids: Book II, 124-125. The pyramids of Cheops, Chephren, and Mycerinus, near Cairo, were visited by Herodotus as they are visited today.

55. The Great Pyramid measures 482 feet in height and 762 along the base (Hamlin).

b. 41. Marathon: Book VI, 105-117.

43. Pheidippides; Browning's Pheidippides should be read.

69. 32. polemarch, one of the nine archons, chosen by lot as commander.

42. Harmodius and Aristogiton, slayers of the tyrant Hipparchus a generation before Marathon. Hippias, the tyrant's brother, driven from Athens in 511, still threatened the city's liberty.

b. 33. festivals, the Panathenæa.

70. 25. Euphorion, brother of Æschylus, who also fought at Marathon.

32. Sunium, a promontory 45 miles southeast of Athens.

47. Phalerum, four miles from Athens, near the port Piræus.

48. back to Asia. Marathon is the first of Creasy's Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World (1851), and Waterloo the last.

b. 14. Xerxes Crosses: Book VII, 34-37; 55-57.

15. Abydos. Sestos was on the opposite shore. The Hellespont here is the scene of the Hero and Leander story; see Ovid, Leander to Hero, page 443 below.

71. 18. cubit, about 18 inches, talent, 57.75 pounds.

b. 14. The crossing took place probably in April, 480.

72. 1. Thermopylæ: Book VII, 222-228.

73. 19. Amphictyons, a league of deputies from twelve Greek states.

26. Salamis: Book VIII, 54-57; 83-86; 96-99.

29. Susa, seat of Xerxes' capital and palace.

56. Salamis, about ten miles from Athens.

b. 37. Ægina, an island about 20 miles south.

74. b. 22. The Persians of Æschylus, who fought at Salamis, was first performed in 472, eight years after the battle, is interesting as one of the few ancient tragedies based on historic incident. Byron's beautiful lyric, The Isles of Greece, in Don Juan, Canto III, should also be read, for its associations with Marathon and Salamis.

THUCYDIDES

75. b. The Cause of the War: Book I, 22, 23.

76. 26. Barbarians. The term denotes peoples not Hellenic.

b. 10. Athenians and Spartans: Book I, 67-71; 80, 81; 83-87. These speeches are famous for the light they throw on Greek character.

77. 4. Corcyra, modern Corfu.

6. Potidæa, a Thracian city not far from modern Saloniki.

80. 53. The Unburied Soldier: Book II, 34.

b. 43. The Funeral Oration: Book II, 35-46.

84. b. 32. The Great Plague: Book II, 47, 48; 51-54. Lucretius concludes his poem De Rerum Natura with a description of this plague.

86. b. The Fleet Departs: Book VI, 30-32.

12. Iapygia, the southeastern promontory of Italy.

87. b. 21. The Defeat: Book VII, 70-72. A great description.

89. 49. The End of the Expedition: Book VII, 85-87.

b. 47. Sphacteria. In 425, the Athenians had killed and captured a Spartan force on this island, near Pylos.

90. b. 18. This conclusion is a fine example of classical reserve. Browning's Balaustion's Adventure has a Syracusan setting.

XENOPHON

91. Preparations: Anabasis, Book I, 1.

91. b. 17. In the Desert: Book I, 5.

21. parasangs. A parasang was about 18,000 feet, over three miles.

93. 55. Cold, Snow, and Hunger: Book IV, 5.

94. 45. The Sea: Book VII, 7. The expedition had marched 1800 miles east from Ephesus, lost Cyrus in battle at Cunaxa, not far from Babylon, and now were at the end of their 700 miles north to the Black Sea through enemy country.

ÆSCHYLUS

106. Æschylus is noted for bold imagery and for speeches in the grand style.

3. Atreida, Agamemnon and Menelaus, sons of Atreus.

36. The feeling of suspense, created by the dark utterances of the watchman, is deepened steadily by chorus and action until the climax is reached at line 995 in the death of the king.

42. Menelaos. The translator here and elsewhere uses the Greek -os.

58. clients, protégés, about the temple, and important as the givers of signs.

60. Erinnyis, the Fate that pursues the guilty.

61. Alexandros, Paris.

84. three feet, one being the staff.

100. unguent, oil for ceremonial purposes.

111-122. Uranus and Cronus, predecessors of Zeus, are referred to.

125-132. pain is gain, wisdom comes with suffering, a favorite theme repeated at line 212.

133. chief, Agamemnon at Aulis.

149. Artemis had been offended by Agamemnon's killing one of her stags in the chase, and must be propitiated by the sacrifice of the king's daughter Iphigenia before the winds would become favorable.

178. frailty, Helen's.

180-210. Lucretius, I, 84-101, page 375 below, makes use of the sacrifice of Iphigenia in his attack on religion, concluding with the famous line,

'Such are the crimes to which religion leads.'

The scene is represented also in a Pompeian painting in the Naples Museum; see Mau-Kelsey, Pompeii, page 313.

243. A celebrated speech. The map should be used here. The torch race, by relay, was a well known Greek sport.

269. beard, one of Æschylus' impressive figures.

314-377. There is deep human feeling in this chorus and in the herald's speech from 442.

536. A striking image.

575-606. Æschylus believes that the love of righteousness will remove the curse from any house, and that wrong-doing, not prosperity, brings the curse.

624. Another fine speech.

665-670. A remarkable succession of similes.

690. Another reference to the belief that prosperity endangered men by arousing the envy of the gods.

730. purple juice. Purple dye came from a shell-fish.

776. Heracles.

810. Cassandra is possessed by the prophetic frenzy.

905. children, of Thyestes, served to him by his brother Atreus.

917. lewd. Cassandra sees that Clytemnestra has been unfaithful during the king's absence.

923. Amphisbæna, a serpent that could go forward or backward.

950. Clytemnestra, Ægisthus, and Agamemnon.

969. Syrian, luxurious.

995. The climax of the play. The practice of the Greek dramatist was to have deeds of violence done behind the scenes.

999. Clytemnestra now drops all pretence. Her terrible remorselessness, as well as her vigor and decisiveness, prompts the comparison with Lady Macbeth.

1020. A striking figure.

1028. Referring to the sacrifice of Iphigenia.

1045. penalty, death at the hands of Orestes, her son; the theme of Æschylus' Libation-pourers and the Electra of Sophocles and Euripides.

1056. Chryseïds, plural of Chryseis, daughter of Chryses the priest, who in Iliad I compels Agamemnon to give her up.

1065. The queen does not conceal her relations with Ægisthus. Unfaithfulness and revengefulness are seen to be the motives for her murder of the king.

SOPHOCLES

121. 2. Cadmos, Phœnician founder of Thebes. The translator uses here and elsewhere the Greek -os.

41. songstress, the Sphinx, whose riddle, in verse, was first guessed by Œdipus.

76. Pythian home, Delphi, nearly a hundred miles northwest of Athens, and reached by sea or land.

157. word of Zeus, the oracle; see 197.

160. fear. The chorus, as in the Agamemnon, contribute to the feeling of suspense.

184. darkling West, death, the shore of Pluto.

222. I banish. Œdipus thus banishes himself, unwittingly. This is the celebrated dramatic irony of the Greeks. The play abounds in it.

247. The genealogy of Laius and Œdipus.

262. Teiresias, the blind prophet of Thebes, is consulted by Odysseus on his descent to the lower world in Odyssey XI.

295. Teiresias knows the guilt of Œdipus.

418. Here begins the series of inquiries and revelations leading to the king's discovery of his guilt. The steady progression from now on to the climax at line 1098 is wonderful art. Œdipus the King is an explicative play, as opposed to a synthetic.

499-538. Every Greek drama contains passages wholly or largely made up of one-line speeches. This is called stichomythy.

660. These three roads are still travelled.

858. Now, oracles of Gods. See 876; both Jocasta and Œdipus are guilty of disrespect to the oracle. Sophocles does not represent a faultless or a wholly guilty Œdipus, but one of great good qualities vitiated by arrogance and passion. To have represented the king as merely caught in the toils of Fate and without blame would have outraged our sense of justice and robbed the play of tragic quality.

931. Œdipus is relieved from one fear to be subjected to another.

935. At about this point, Jocasta has the full truth come to her.

1016. He who rules, Hermes, born on Mount Cyllene.

1019. nymphs, the Muses.

1094. The climax, or scène à faire.

1122. The messenger's speech is a regular feature of Greek tragedy.

1199-1355. The Greek play descended from the climax to the end less abruptly than the modern play.

EURIPIDES

140. 1-81. The Euripidean prologue still consists of action, but resembles the modern prologue in serving as introduction to the plot.

32. Orcus, death.

128. The Sage's Æsculapius, son of Apollo.

348. The extravagant idea of Admetus recalls the story of Pygmalion, at whose entreaties life was divinely breathed into the statue which he had chiselled and with which he had fallen in love. See page note, 442, line I.

455. Hercules is on the way to one of the Twelve Labors, weary, but hearty and human.

460. Tirynthian king, Eurystheus, who imposed the Labors.

523. Not so. The obligations of hospitality have always been very strict in Greece.

603. Does Euripides mean to present Admetus on the whole as an attractive character?

713. Hercules is presented as a robust and expansive hero, and is almost a comic figure.

964. Hercules leads Alcestis, veiled.

1115. son of Sthenelus, Eurystheus.

ARISTOPHANES

156. 5. stadia, plural of stadium, about 600 feet.

6. Raven. The sober raven and the chattering jackdaw are characteristic of their masters, the pre-tentious Peisthetairus, Talkover, and the simple Euelpides, Hopeful.

159. Melanthius, a tragic poet who was leprous.

213. Odds, nets and snares. The Hoopoe swears appropriately, like Bob Acres.

362. Nicias, in command of the Athenian expedition against Syracuse; compare line 659.

568. Alcmenas and Semeles, the mothers by Jove of Hercules and Bacchus.

649. Ammon's, Jupiter-Ammon's, in Egypt.

704-793. The Parabasis; a part of the play in which the author has the chorus go outside the action to indulge in satire or fantasy. The object of satire here is the Athenian craze for novel philosophical and scientific accounts of creation.

775. Bird. The birds served as omens, and the word was the same for both.

802. our own, referring to the eagle pierced by an arrow feathered from his own wing.

865. Through the Poet, Aristophanes probably parodies well known lines.

949. This form of city has many modern advocates, who regard it as more convenient than the rectangular form.

1009. Owl, stamped on the Athenian coin.

1034-1110. Vividly suggestive of Athenian industrial and military life.

1136. Salaminian galley. This and the Paralian were for sacred and other important errands.

1187. Quoted from Euripides' Alcestis, a speech of Pheres to Admetus. The preceding speech of Iris is a parody of the tragic style.

1305. dithyrambic. The dithyramb was a special form of poem in honor of Dionysus.

1369. Excecidestes, notorious for having no citizen's rights.

1397. Timon, the celebrated misanthrope; see Shakespeare's play.

1429. Hercules and his appetite always made good matter for comedy.

1581. Sycophantic, referring to the despised informers.

1583. Clepsydra, the water-clock by which speeches in the Assembly were limited.

1591. Gorgias, one of the chief Sophists, who had a reputation for wordiness and sharp practice.

MENANDER

181. 9. obol, nearly two cents.

14. talent, about a thousand dollars.

16. drachma, nearly twenty cents.

140. The speech of Syrisus is suggestive of the usual content of comic drama in the fourth century. Tragedy also was not without the same material; Euripides' Ion is an example.

275. chiton, tunic.

PARMENIDES AND EMPEDOCLES

187. 2. Acragas. Empedocles lived in Acragas, Roman Agrigentum, modern Girgenti. Love, Hate, and Metempsychosis were important in his philosophy. For transmigration, compare Plato, A Sojourn (see page 216), and John Masefield, A Creed.

PLATO

188. b. 18. bankers' tables. Money-changers, etc., were more frequently in the open air than even now.

189. 21. Pythia, the priestess of Apollo who was the mouthpiece of the oracle, which was often capable of many different interpretations, and therefore safe for its authors.

b. 19. Dog, a frequent oath of Socrates, perhaps to avoid a more blasphemous expression.

190. b. 54. monitor, the famous daimon, a sort of guardian spirit always with Socrates.

191. 54 ff. Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Æacus, judges in the lower world; Triptolemus, founder of the worship of Demeter and Persephone at Eleusis, and giver of grains and agriculture; Orpheus and Musæus, famous bards; Palamedes and Ajax, heroes of the Trojan war; Sisyphus, for an offense to Jove condemned to roll up hill a stone which always rolled back before reaching the summit.

192. The Crito is noted for its ideas regarding the wrongfulness of retaliation, and the obligation of the social contract.

193. b. dervishes of Cybele. The priests of the Great Mother danced themselves into a frenzy as a means of communion with deity.

27. Immortality. Wordsworth's Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood is an echo of Plato.

199. The Setting: Book I, 327-330.

56. Peiræus, the port of Athens, five miles from the city.

200. 47. threshold of age. Cicero in De Senectute very charmingly adapts from the opening part of The Republic.

201. 45. State: II, 368-372. Aristotle's definition of the state was Platonic: 'an association of similar persons for the attainment of the best life possible.' Ten citizens he regarded as too few, a hundred thousand as too many. Athens had perhaps a hundred thousand inhabitants, of which about twenty-five thousand were citizens, the rest slaves and free outlanders. The ancient state was a city-state.

203. b. 36. Education: II, 376-383.

42. music, the equivalent of the modern liberal arts is meant: what is related to the Muses.

205. 6. Homer. The poet was a great vehicle of moral instruction, comparable to the Bible. Plato's argument is carried to surprising lengths.

208. Homer Disapproved: III, 387-388.

b. 55. Women and the State: V, 455-457.

210. b. 3. possibility. This sounds like sly humor.

6. The Ship of State: VI, 487-489.

211. The Cave: VII, 514-518.

213. 9. Achilles' word to Ulysses in the lower world; see note, page 30, line 117.

214. Democracy: VIII, 562-565.

6. tyranny, meaning the rule, good or bad, of one man. This selection is of the greatest interest to modern critics of democracy.

216. A Sojourn: X, 614-622.

218. b. 10. Thamyras, who challenged the Muses and was deprived of sight after defeat.

28. Epeus, builder of the wooden horse at Troy.

219. b. 21. a thousand years, the ancient Purgatory.

ARISTOTLE

220. Ethics: II, 6-7.

ROMANCE AND SAGA

ROMANCE AND SAGA

Internal decay and pressure from without resulted not only in the downfall of the Roman Empire as a governmental organization, but in the disappearance of the civilization resting upon it and protected by it. The legionaries who kept the barbarians at bay in the outlying portions of the Empire were gradually withdrawn to protect the center, and the barbarians ultimately overran Rome itself. Latin continued to be the tongue of many of the races freed from the imperial power of Rome, and it was preserved, among those converted to Christianity, as the language of the Church, but it was retained as a medium of instruction and edification, no longer as a means of literary expression used by cultivated people. Greek dropped out of the knowledge, even of the learned, of western Europe, and the heritage of Latin literature, instead of being increased, was gradually curtailed as author after author passed into oblivion. All the great Latin prose writers were lost except Livy, the elder Pliny, and a few philosophical treatises of Cicero and Seneca. The very knowledge of drama as a form of art disappeared, so that tragedy came to mean simply a sad story and comedy any narrative with a happy ending.

Of the poets, Lucretius, Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius and Martial were known no more. The works of Virgil and Ovid survived, but on the one hand were regarded as mines for the excavation of mythological information, and on the other were subjected to a process of allegorical interpretation which completely obscured the authors' intention. Of Greek poets in translation, a short paraphrase of the Iliad survived for a time, but Homer soon became nothing but a name. The philosophers fared better; two of three dialogues of Plato were saved in translation, in whole or in part, and Aristotle was preserved, not only in Latin translations, but in the "great commentary" of the Arabian scholar Averrhoës, to be reconciled and combined with Christian theology by Albertus Magnus and St. Thomas Aquinas.

The light of the great masters of classical antiquity was, fortunately, only eclipsed, not finally extinguished; it was buried in monastic and other libraries to break out into new life centuries later. Preceding this re-birth of classical literature, which we are to consider later, there were new beginnings of popular literature—folk tales and folk songs, which were passed from generation to generation by word of mouth before they were committed to writing. How and when these stories originated and grew, we do not precisely know; and the earliest written records of them have perished. The manuscripts which have survived show traces of considerable working over and development, the combination of different versions of the same story and the confusion of elements from different periods, pagan deities appearing alongside of Christian beliefs, and the manner of life, customs, and weapons of one century jostling those of other centuries in the same tale or song as it has come down to us. The disentanglement and interpretation of these diverse elements are matters of research and controversy for the experts in the several fields of scholarship; what the ordinary student needs to realize is that the conditions of literary production and development were entirely different from those of modern times. 'The masses could not read. Whatsoever information they had came to them by word of mouth or from their own observation. They were closer observers than we are, and their memories were more retentive than ours; but they lacked the superficial breadth of mind that comes from casual inspection of many kinds of things. Book-learning was mostly confined, in the earlier medieval centuries, to clerics; and many of them had little enough of it. As time went on, it spread somewhat among the secular well-to-do; but the hand-laborers remained mostly unschooled. There were no journals, no printed books, no telegraphs or telephones, no railways, no facilities whatever for the rapid diffusion of information. Every bit of lore had to be patiently dug out of an expensive manuscript, which, at the best, was less easy to decipher, even for the expert, than any decent product of the modern press.' (Professor C. H. Grandgent).

EARLY IRISH ROMANCE

The existing manuscripts containing the Cycles of Irish Romance do not go back further than the eleventh century, but some of them appear to be copies of earlier writings going back to the seventh or eighth, and the oral traditions on which they rest go back earlier still. The cycles have been divided into three main groups according to the material with which they deal: (1) The mythological, recounting the exploits of the pre-historic pagan gods; (2) the heroic cycle, of which the leading figure is the hero Cuchulain (pronounced Cuholin), supposed to have reigned in Ulster about the beginning of the Christian Era; (3) the Ossianic cycle, centering about Ossian and his father Finn, whose date may be placed two or three centuries later, though all these are characters of legend rather than of history.

The Etain (pronounced Etoyn) story as presented in the following pages is taken from a semi-independent small cycle, which at a very early date was attached to the great Cuchulain cycle; the events it relates are imagined as taking place as about 100 B.C., but the dates suggested by tradition are inconsistent with each other and of no historical importance. Of the two principal manuscripts used in our text, as translated by Mr. A. H. Leahy, with the assistance of Professor Strachan of the University of Manchester, Egerton 1782 is a fifteenth century MS., and The Book of the Dun Cow is of the eleventh century; but these dates give no clue to the time when the romances took the shape in which they are found in the manuscripts, and the legends or traditions underlying the romances probably go back to pre-Christian times in Ireland. Two passages marked by square brackets indicate gaps in the MS. which have been filled by the translator, Mr. Leahy, either from other parts of the same manuscript or from other early manuscripts dealing with the same story. For this translation, we are indebted to Heroic Romances of Ireland, Vol. II of the Irish Saga Library, published by David Nutt, London, Eng.

THE COURTSHIP OF ETAIN

From MS. Egerton 1782

Less than a year had passed since Eochaid first assumed the sovereignty over Erin, when the news was proclaimed at once throughout all the land that the Festival of Tara should be held, that all the men of Ireland should come into the presence of their king, and that he desired full knowledge of the tributes due from, and the customs proper to each. And the one answer that all the men of Ireland made to his call was: 'That they would not attend the Festival of Tara during such time, whether it be long or short, that the king of Ireland remained without a wife that was worthy of him;' for there is no noble who is a wifeless man among the men of Ireland; nor can there be any king without a queen; not does any man go to the Festival of Tara without his wife; nor does any wife go thither without her husband.

Thereupon Eochaid sent out from him his horsemen, and his wizards, and his officers who had the care of the roads, and his couriers of the boundaries throughout all Ireland; and they searched all Ireland as they sought for a wife that should be worthy of the king, in her form, and her grace, and her countenance, and her birth. And in addition to all this there yet remained one condition: that the king would take as his wife none who had been before as a wife to any other man before him.

And after that they had received these commands, his horsemen, and his wizards, and his officers who had the care of the roads, and the couriers of the boundaries went out; and they searched all Ireland south and north; and near to the Bay of Cichmany they found a wife worthy of the king; and her name was Etain the daughter of Etar, who was the king of Echrad. And his messengers returned to Eochaid, and they told him of the maiden, of her form, and her grace, and her countenance. And Eochaid came to that place to take the maiden thence, and this was the way that he took; for as he crossed over the ground where men hold the assembly of Bri Leith, he saw the maiden at the brink of the spring. A clear comb of silver was held in her hand, the comb was adorned with gold; and near her, as for washing, was a bason of silver whereon four birds had been chased, and there were little bright gems of carbuncle on the rims of the bason. A bright purple mantle waved round her, and beneath it was another mantle, ornamented with silver fringes; the outer mantle was clasped over her bosom with a golden brooch. A tunic she wore, with a long hood that might cover her head attached to it; it was stiff and glossy with green silk beneath red embroidery of gold, and was clasped over her breasts with marvelously wrought clasps of silver and gold; so that men saw the bright gold and the green silk flashing against the sun. On her head were two tresses of golden hair, and each tress had been plaited into four strands; at the end of each strand was a little ball of gold. And there was that maiden, undoing her hair that she might wash it, her two arms out through the armholes of her smock. Each of her two arms was as white as the snow of a single night, and each of her cheeks was as rosy as the foxglove. Even and small were the teeth in her head, and they shone like pearls. Her eyes were as blue as a hyacinth, her lips delicate and crimson; very high, soft, and white were her shoulders. Tender, polished, and white were her wrists; her fingers long, and of great whiteness; her nails were beautiful and pink. White as the snow, or as the foam of the wave, was her side; long was it, slender, and as soft as silk. Smooth and white were her thighs; her knees were round and firm and white; her ankles were as straight as the rule of a carpenter. Her feet were slim, and as white as the ocean's foam; evenly set were her eyes; her eyebrows were of a bluish black, such as ye see upon the shell of a beetle. Never a maid fairer than she, or more worthy of love, was till then seen by the eyes of men; and it seemed to them that she must be one of those who have come from the fairy mounds. It is of this maiden that men have spoken when it hath been said: 'All that's graceful must be tested by Etain; all that's lovely by the standard of Etain.'

Grace with Etain's grace compare!
Etain's face shall test what's fair!

And desire of her seized upon the king; and he sent a man of his people in front of him to go to her kindred, in order that she might abide to await his coming. And afterwards the king came to the maiden, and he sought speech from her: 'Whence art thou sprung, O maiden?' says Eochaid, 'and whence is it that thou hast come?' 'It is easy to answer thee,' said the maiden: 'Etain is my name, the daughter of the king of Echrad; "out of the fairy mound" am I.' 'Shall an hour of dalliance with thee be granted to me?' said Eochaid. 'Tis for that I have come hither under thy safeguard,' said she. 'And indeed twenty years have I lived in this place, ever since I was born in the mound where the fairies dwell; and the men who dwell in the elf-mounds, their kings and their nobles, have been a-wooing me; yet to never a one of them was granted sleep with me, for I have loved thee, and have set my love and affection upon thee; and that ever since I was a little child, and had first the gift of speech. It was for the high tales of thee and of thy splendor that I have loved thee thus; and though I have never seen thee before, I knew thee at once by reason of the report of thee that I had heard; it is thou, I know, to whom we have attained.' 'It is no evil-minded lover who now inviteth thee,' says Eochaid. 'Thou shalt be welcomed by me, and I will leave all women for thy sake, and thine alone will I be so long as it is pleasing to thee.' 'Let the bride-price that befits me be paid,' said the maiden, 'and after that let my desire be fulfilled.' 'It shall be as thou hast said,' the king answered her; and he gave the value of seven cumals to be her bride-price; and after that he brought her to Tara, whereon a fair and hearty welcome was made to her.

Now there were three brothers of the one blood, all sons of Finn, namely, Eochaid Airem, and Eochaid, and Ailill Anglonnach, or Ailill of the Single Stain, because the only stain that was upon him was the love that he had for his brother's wife. And at that time came all the men of Ireland to hold the festival of Tara; they were there for fourteen days before Samhain, the day when the summer endeth, and for fourteen days after that day. It was at the feast of Tara that love for Etain the daughter of Etar came upon Ailill Anglonnach; and ever, so long as they were at the Tara Feast, so long he gazed upon the maid. And it was there that the wife of Ailill spoke to him; she who was the daughter of Luchta of the Red Hand, who came from the province of Leinster: 'Ailill,' said she, 'why dost thou gaze at her from afar? for long gazing is a token of love.' And Ailill gave blame to himself for this thing, and after that he looked not upon the maid.

Now it followed that after the Feast of Tara had been consumed, the men of Ireland parted from one another, and then it was that Ailill became filled with the pangs of envy and of desire; and he brought upon himself the choking misery of a sore sickness, and was borne to the stronghold of Frémain in Tethba after that he had fallen into that woe. There also, until a whole year had ended, sickness long brooded over Ailill, and for long was he in distress, yet he allowed none to know of his sickness. 10 And there Eochaid came to learn of his brother's state, and he came near to his brother, and laid his hand upon his chest; and Ailill heaved a sigh. 'Why,' said Eochaid, 'surely this sickness of thine is 15 not such as to cause thee to lament; how fares it with thee?' 'By my word,' said Ailill, 'tis no easier that I grow; but it is worse each day and each night.' 'Why, what ails thee?' said Eochaid. 'By my 20 word of truth,' said Ailill, 'I know not.' 'Bring one of my folk hither,' said Eochaid, 'one who can find out the cause of this illness.'

Then Fachtna, the chief physician of 25 Eochaid, was summoned to give aid to Ailill, and he laid his hand upon his chest, and Ailill heaved a sigh. 'Ah,' said Fachtna, 'there is no need for lament in this matter, for I know the cause of thy 30 sickness; one or other of these two evils oppresses thee, the pangs of envy, or the pangs of love: nor hast thou been aided to escape from them until now.' And Ailill was full of shame, and he refused to 35 confess to Fachtna the cause of his illness, and the physician left him.

Now, after all this, King Eochaid went in person to make a royal progress throughout the realm of Ireland, and he 40 left Etain behind him in his fortress; and 'Lady,' said he, 'deal thou gently with Ailill so long as he is yet alive; and, should he die,' said he, 'do thou see that his burial mound be heaped for him; and that a 45 standing-stone be set up in memory of him; and let his name be written upon it in letters of Ogham.' Then the king went away for the space of a year, to make his royal progress throughout the realm of Ireland, 50 and Ailill was left behind, in the stronghold of Frémain of Tethba; there to pass away and to die.

Now upon a certain day that followed, the lady Etain came to the house where 55 Ailill lay in his sickness, and thus she spoke to him: 'What is it,' she said, 'that ails thee? thy sickness is great, and if we but knew anything that would content thee, thou shouldest have it.' It was thus that at that time she spoke, and she sang a verse of a song, and Ailill in song made 5 answer to her. . . .

Now each day the lady came to Ailill to tend him, and to divide for him the portion of food that was allotted to him; and she wrought a great healing upon him: for it grieved her that he should perish for her sake. And one day the lady spoke to Ailill: 'Come thou to-morrow,' said she, 'to tryst with me at the break of day, in the house which lieth outside, and is beyond the fort, and there shalt thou have granted thy request and thy desire.' On that night Ailill lay without sleep until the coming of the morning; and when the time had come that was appointed for his tryst, his sleep lay heavily upon him; so that till the hour of his rising he lay deep in his sleep. And Etain went to the tryst, nor had she long to wait ere she saw a man coming towards her in the likeness of Ailill, weary and feeble; but she knew that he was not Ailill, and continued there waiting for Ailill. And the lady came back from her tryst, and Ailill awoke, and thought that he would rather die than live; and he went in great sadness and grief. And the lady came to speak with him, and when he told her what had befallen him: 'Thou shalt come,' said she, 'to the same place to meet with me upon the morrow.' And upon the morrow it was the same as upon the first day; each day came that man to her tryst. And she came again upon the last day that was appointed for the tryst, and the same man 40 met her. 'Tis not with thee that I trysted,' said she, 'why dost thou come to meet me? and for him whom I would have met here; neither from desire of his love nor for fear of danger from him had I appointed to meet him, but only to heal him, and to cure him from the sickness which had come upon him for his love of me.' 'It were more fitting for thee to come to tryst with me,' says the man, 'for when thou wast Etain of the Horses, and when thou wast the daughter of Ailill, I myself was thy husband.' 'Why,' said she, 'what name hast thou in the land? that is what I would demand of thee.' 'It is not hard to answer thee,' he said, 'Mider of Bri Leith is my name.' 'And what made thee to part from me, if we were as thou sayest?' said Etain. 'Easy again is the answer,' said Mider; 'it was the sorcery of Fuamnach and the spells of Bressal Etarlam that put us apart.' And Mider said to Etain: 'Wilt thou come with me?'

'Nay,' answered Etain, 'I will not exchange the king of all Ireland for thee; for a man whose kindred and whose lineage is unknown.' 'It was I myself indeed,' said Mider, 'who filled all the mind of Ailill with love for thee; it was I also who prevented his coming to the tryst with thee, and allowed him not thine honor to spoil it.'

After all this the lady went back to her house, and she came to speech with Ailill, and she greeted him. 'It hath happened well for us both,' said Ailill, 'that the man met thee there: for I am cured forever from my illness, thou also art unhurt in thine honor, and may a blessing rest upon thee!' 'Thanks be to our gods,' said Etain, 'that both of us do indeed deem that all this hath chanced so well.' And after that, Eochaid came back from his royal progress, and he asked at once for his brother; and the tale was told to him from the beginning to the end, and the king was grateful to Etain, in that she had been gracious to Ailill; and 'What hath been related in this tale,' said Eochaid, 'is well-pleasing to ourselves.'

FROM 'THE BOOK OF THE DUN COW'

Now upon another time it chanced that Eochaid Airemm, the king of Tara, arose upon a certain fair day in the time of summer and he ascended the high ground of Tara to behold the plain of Breg; beautiful was the color of that plain, and there was upon it excellent blossom, glowing with all hues that are known. And, as the aforesaid Eochaid looked about and around him, he saw a young strange warrior upon the high ground at his side. The tunic that the warrior wore was purple in color, his hair was of golden yellow, and of such length that it reached to the edge of his shoulders. The eyes of the young warrior were lustrous and grey; in the one hand he held a five-pointed spear, in the other a shield with a white central boss, and with gems of gold upon it. And Eochaid held his peace, for he knew that none such had been in Tara on the night before, and the gate that led into the Liss had not at that hour been thrown open.

The warrior came, and placed himself under the protection of Eochaid; and 'Welcome do I give,' said Eochaid, 'to the hero who is yet unknown.'

'Thy reception is such as I expected when I came,' said the warrior.

'We know thee not,' answered Eochaid. 'Yet thee in truth I know well!' he replied.

'What is the name by which thou art called?' said Eochaid.

'My name is not known to renown,' said the warrior; 'I am Mider of Bri Leith.'

'And for what purpose art thou come?' said Eochaid.

'I have come that I may play a game at the chess with thee,' answered Mider. 'Truly,' said Eochaid, 'I myself am skilful at the chess-play.'

'Let us test that skill!' said Mider.

'Nay,' said Eochaid, 'the queen is even now in her sleep; and hers is the palace in which the chessboard lies.'

'I have here with me,' said Mider, 'a chessboard which is not inferior to thine.' It was even as he said, for that chessboard was silver, and the men to play with were gold; and upon that board were costly stones, casting their light on every side, and the bag that held the men was of woven chains of brass.

Mider then set out the chessboard, and he called upon Eochaid to play. 'I will not play,' said Eochaid, 'unless we play for a stake.'

'What stake shall we have upon the game then?' said Mider.

'It is indifferent to me,' said Eochaid.

'Then,' said Mider, 'if thou dost obtain the forfeit of my stake, I will bestow on thee fifty steeds of a dark grey, their heads of a blood-red color, but dappled; their ears pricked high, and their chests broad; their nostrils wide, and their hoofs slender; great is their strength, and they are keen like a whetted edge; eager are they, high-standing and spirited, yet easily stopped in their course.'

[Many games were played between Eochaid and Mider; and since Mider did not put forth his whole strength, the victory on all occasions rested with Eochaid. But instead of the gifts which Mider had offered, Eochaid demanded that Mider and his folk should perform for him services which should be of benefit to his realm;

that he should clear away the rocks and stones from the plains of Meath, should remove the rushes which made the land barren around his favorite fort of Tethba, should cut down the forest of Breg, and finally should build a causeway across the moor or bog of Lamrach that men might pass freely across it. All these things Mider agreed to do, and Eochaid sent his steward to see how that work was done. 10 And when it came to the time after sunset, the steward looked, and he saw that Mider and his fairy host, together with fairy oxen, were laboring at the causeway over the bog;] and thereupon much of earth and of gravel and of stones was poured into it. Now it had, before that time, always been the custom of the men of Ireland to harness their oxen with a strap over their foreheads, so that the pull might be against the foreheads of the oxen; and this custom lasted up to that very night, when it was seen that the fairy-folk had placed the yoke upon the shoulders of the oxen, so that the pull might be there; and in this way were the yokes of the oxen afterwards placed by Eochaid, and thence cometh the name by which he is known; even Eochaid Airemm, or Eochaid the Ploughman, for he was the first of all the men of Ireland to put the yokes on the necks of the oxen, and thus it became the custom for all the land of Ireland. And this is the song that the host of the fairies sang, as they labored at the making of the road:

Thrust it in hand! force it in hand!
Nobles this night, as an ox-troop, stand:
Hard is the task that is asked, and who
From the bridging of Lamrach shall gain, or rue?

Not in all the world could a road have been found that should be better than the road that they made, had it not been that the fairy folk were observed as they worked upon it; but for that cause a breach hath been made in that causeway. And the steward of Eochaid thereafter came to him; and he described to him that great laboring band that had come before his eyes, and he said that there was not over 50 the chariot-pole of life, a power that could withstand its might. And, as they spake thus with each other, they saw Mider standing before them; high was he girt, and ill-favored was the face that he showed; and Eochaid arose, and he gave welcome to him. 'Thy welcome is such as I expected when I came,' said Mider.

'Cruel and senseless hast thou been in thy treatment of me, and much of hardship and suffering hast thou given me. All things that seemed good in thy sight have I got 5 for thee, but now anger against thee hath filled my mind!' 'I return not anger for anger,' answered Eochaid; 'what thou wishest shall be done.' 'Let it be as thou wishest,' said Mider; 'shall we play at the chess?' said he. 'What stake shall we set upon the game?' said Eochaid. 'Even such stake as the winner of it shall demand,' said Mider. And in that very place Eochaid was defeated, and he forfeited his 15 stake.

'My stake is forfeit to thee,' said Eochaid.

'Had I wished it, it had been forfeit long ago,' said Mider.

'What is it that thou desirest me to grant?' said Eochaid.

'That I may hold Etain in my arms and obtain a kiss from her!' answered Mider.

Eochaid was silent for a while, and then he said: 'One month from this day thou shalt come, and that very thing that thou hast asked for shall be given to thee.' Now for a year before that Mider first came to Eochaid for the chess-play, had he been at the wooing of Etain, and he obtained her not; and the name which he gave to Etain was Béfind, or Fair-haired Woman, so it was that he said:

35 Wilt thou come to my home, fair-haired lady?

as has before been recited. And it was at that time that Etain said: 'If thou obtainest 40 me from him who is the master of my house, I will go; but if thou art not able to obtain me from him, then I will not go.' And thereon Mider came to Eochaid, and allowed him at the first to win the victory 45 over him, in order that Eochaid should stand in his debt; and therefore it was that he paid the great stakes to which he had agreed, and therefore also was it that he had demanded of him that he should play that game in ignorance of what was staked. And when Mider and his folk were paying those agreed-on stakes, which were paid upon that night; to wit, the making of the road, and the clearing of the stones from Meath, the rushes from around Tethba, and of the forest that is over Breg, it thus that he spoke, as it is written in the Book of Drom Snechta:

Pile on the soil; thrust on the soil;
 Red are the oxen around who toil;
 Heavy the troops that my words obey.
 Heavy they seem, and yet men are they.
 Strongly, as piles, are the tree-trunks placed:
 Red are the wattles above them laced:
 Tired are your hands, and your glances slant;
 One woman's winning this toil may grant!

Oxen ye are, but revenge shall see;
 Men who are white shall your servants be:
 Rushes from Teffa are cleared away:
 Grief is the price that the man shall pay:
 Stones have been cleared from the rough Meath
 ground;
 Whose shall the gain or the harm be found?

Now Mider appointed a day at the end of the month when he was to meet Eochaid, and Eochaid called the armies of the heroes of Ireland together, so that they came to Tara; and all the best of the champions of Ireland, ring within ring, were about Tara, and they were in the midst of Tara itself, and they guarded it, both without and within; and the king and the queen were in the midst of the palace, and the outer court thereof was shut and locked, for they knew that the great might of men would come upon them. And upon the appointed night Etain was dispensing the banquet to the kings, for it was her duty to pour out the wine, when in the midst of their talk they saw Mider standing before them in the center of the palace. He was always fair, yet fairer than he ever was seemed Mider to be upon that night. And he brought to amazement all the hosts on which he gazed, and all thereon were silent, and the king gave a welcome to him.

'Thy reception is such as I expected when I came,' said Mider; 'let that now be given to me that hath been promised. 'Tis a debt that is due when a promise hath been made; and I for my part have given to thee all that was promised by me.'

'I have not yet considered the matter,' said Eochaid.

'Thou hast promised Etain's very self to me,' said Mider; 'that is what hath come from thee.' Etain blushed for shame when she heard that word.

'Blush not,' said Mider to Etain, 'for in no wise hath thy wedding-feast been disgraced. I have been seeking thee for a year with the fairest jewels and treasures that can be found in Ireland, and I have not taken thee until the time came when Eochaid might permit it. 'Tis not through any will of thine that I have won thee.'

 'I myself told thee,' said Etain, 'that until Eochaid should resign me to thee I would grant thee nothing. Take me then for my part, if Eochaid is willing to resign me to thee.'

'But I will not resign thee!' said
 Eochaid; 'nevertheless he shall take thee in his arms upon the floor of this house as thou art.'

'It shall be done!' said Mider.

He took his weapons into his left hand and the woman beneath his right shoulder;
 and he carried her off through the skylight of the house. And the hosts rose up around the king, for they felt that they had been disgraced, and they saw two swans circling round Tara, and the way that they took was the way to the elfmound Femun. And Eochaid with an army of the men of Ireland went to the elfmound of Femun, which men call the mound of the Fair-haired-Woman. And he followed the counsel of the men of Ireland, and he dug up each of the elf-mounds that he might take his wife from thence. [And Mider and his host opposed them and the war between them was long:
 again and again the trenches made by Eochaid were destroyed, for nine years, as some say, lasted the strife of the men of Ireland to enter into the fairy palace. And when at last the armies of Eochaid came by digging to the borders of the fairy mansion, Mider sent to the side of the palace sixty women all in the shape of Etain, and so like to her that none could tell which was the Queen, and Eochaid himself was deceived, and he chose instead of Etain her daughter Messbuachalla (or as some say Esa). But when he found that he had been deceived, he returned again to sack Bri Leith, and this time Etain made herself known to Eochaid, by proofs that he could not mistake, and he bore her away in triumph to Tara, and there she abode with the king.]

THE EDDAS

The Norsemen had their greatest period of activity between 850 and 1100. For a time they controlled the British Isles and that part of France which is still called Normandy. But they penetrated also into the Mediterranean, and left their mark on Sicily and Russia. This was also the period of the composition and oral transmission of songs and stories; from 1100 to 1250 these lays and sagas were written down, collected, merged together, extended and developed, especially in Iceland. There in 1222-3 Snorri Sturluson, himself a poet and writer of sagas, wrote out a full account of the older mythology of his race, of the exploits of the heroes and of the more recent doings of the Icelanders, with many quotations from the poems on which his prose narrative was often founded; in one of the early manuscripts, dating apparently about the end of the thirteenth century, it is written: 'This book is called Edda, which Snorri Sturluson composed.' Edda has lately been identified with Oddi, a place in Iceland where Snorri Sturluson lived, so that it really means 'The Book of Oddi,' but for centuries it was taken to mean 'Poetics,' and when in 1643 a Bishop of Iceland discovered an older manuscript collection of poems which Snorri Sturluson had evidently used, it was natural to call these poems The Elder Edda and Snorri's prose The Younger Edda. The poems have been divided into two groups—'Lays of the Gods,' dealing with the old Norse mythology, and 'Lays of the Heroes,' most of which have to do with the story, of Germanic origin, of Sigurd or Siegfried and Brynhild, familiar to most of us through the Nibelung cycle of Wagnerian opera. The Norsemen, in borrowing this legend from the Franks of the Rhine Valley, set the story in their own mythology by making Sigurd a descendant from Odin and converting Brynhild into a Valkyrie.

Our selection from The Poetic Edda is The Lay of Thrym, a spirited mythological ballad, supposed to have taken its present form about 900 A.D. The Nibelung Gold is from Snorri Sturluson's prose. Both versions are from the admirable translations of The Poetic Edda by Harry Adams Bellows, of the prose by Arthur Gilchrist Brodeur, published by the American-Scandinavian Foundation, to whom we are indebted for permission to reprint.

In the meter of the original poems, each line is divided into half-lines by a cæsural pause, each half containing two accented syllables and three or four unaccented ones. The accented syllables are alliterative, beginning with the same consonant, or with a vowel. The translator of The Lay of Thrym has preserved the effect of the original meter by maintaining the form and beat of each stanza as far as possible and alliterating two accented syllables in each line.

THE LAY OF THRYM

Wild was Vingthor when he awoke,
And when his mighty hammer he missed;
He shook his beard, his hair was bristling,
As the son of Jorth about him sought.

Hear now the speech that first he spake:
'Harken, Loki, and heed my words,
Nowhere on earth is it known to man,
Nor in heaven above: our hammer is stolen.'

To the dwelling fair of Freyja went they,
 Hear now the speech that first he spake:
 'Wilt thou, Freyja, thy feather-dress lend me,
 That so my hammer I may seek?' 10

Freyja spake:

'Thine should it be though of silver bright,
 And I would give it though 'twere of gold.'
 Then Loki flew, and the feather-dress whirred,
 Till he left behind him the home of the gods,
 And reached at last the realm of the giants. 15

Thrym sat on a mound, the giants' master,
 Leashes of gold he laid for his dogs,
 And stroked and smoothed the manes of his steeds. 20

Thrym spake:

'How fare the gods, how fare the elves?
 Why comest thou alone to the giants' land?'

Loki spake:

'Ill fare the gods, ill fare the elves!
 Hast thou hidden Hlorrithi's hammer?'

Thrym spake:

'I have hidden Hlorrithi's hammer,
 Eight miles down deep in the earth;
 And back again shall no man bring it
 If Freyja I win not to be my wife.' 25

Then Loki flew, and the feather-dress whirred,
 Till he left behind him the home of the giants,
 And reached at last the realm of the gods. 30
 There in the courtyard Thor he met:
 Hear now the speech that first he spake:

'Hast thou found tidings as well as trouble?
 Thy news in the air shalt thou utter now;
 Oft doth the sifter his story forget,
 And lies he speaks who lays himself down.' 35

Loki spake:

'Trouble I have, and tidings as well:
 Thrym, king of the giants, keeps thy hammer,
 And back again shall no man bring it
 If Freyja he wins not to be his wife.' 40

Freyja the fair then went they to find;
 Hear now the speech that first he spake:
 'Bind on, Freyja, the bridal veil,
 For we two must haste to the giants' home.' 45

Wrathful was Freyja, and fiercely she snorted,
 And the dwelling great of the gods was shaken,
 And burst was the mighty Brisings' necklace:
 'Most lustful indeed should I look to all
 If I journey with thee to the giants' home.' 50

Then were the gods together met,
And the goddesses came and council held,
And the far-famed ones a plan would find,
How they might Hlorrithi's hammer win.

Then Heimdall spake, whitest of the gods,
Like the Waness he knew the future well:
'Bind we on Thor the bridal veil,
Let him bear the mighty Brisings' necklace;

55

'Keys around him let there rattle,
And down to his knees hang woman's dress;
With gems full broad upon his breast,
And a pretty cap to crown his head.'

60

Then Thor the mighty his answer made:
'Me would the gods unmanly call
If I let bind the bridal veil.'

65

Then Loki spake, the son of Laufey:
'Be silent, Thor, and speak not thus;
Else will the giants in Asgarth dwell
If thy hammer is brought not home to thee.'

Then bound they on Thor the bridal veil,
And next the mighty Brisings' necklace.

70

Keys around him let they rattle,
And down to his knees hung woman's dress;
With gems full broad upon his breast,
And a pretty cap to crown his head.

75

Then Loki spake, the son of Laufey:
'As thy maid-servant thither I go with thee;
We two shall haste to the giants' home.'

Then home the goats to the hall were driven,
They wrenched at the halters, swift were they to run;
The mountains burst, earth burned with fire,
And Odin's son sought Jotunheim.

Then loud spake Thrym, the giants' leader:
'Bestir ye, giants, put straw on the benches;
Now Freyja they bring to be my bride,
The daughter of Njorth out of Noatun.

85

'Gold-horned cattle go to my stables,
Jet-black oxen, the giant's joy;
Many my gems, and many my jewels,
Freyja alone did I lack, methinks.'

90

Early it was to evening come,
And forth was borne the beer for the giants;
Thor alone ate an ox, and eight salmon,
All the dainties as well that were set for the women;
And drank Sif's mate three tuns of mead.

Then loud spake Thrym, the giants' leader:
 'Who ever saw bride more keenly bite?
 I ne'er saw bride with a broader bite,
 Nor a maiden who drank more mead than this!'

Hard by there sat the serving-maid wise, 100
 So well she answered the giant's words:
 'From food has Freyja eight nights fasted,
 So hot was her longing for Jotunheim.'

Thrym looked 'neath the veil, for he longed to kiss, 105
 But back he leaped the length of the hall:
 'Why are so fearful the eyes of Freyja?
 Fire, methinks, from her eyes burns forth.'

Hard by there sat the serving-maid wise, 110
 So well she answered the giant's words:
 'No sleep has Freyja for eight nights found
 So hot was her longing for Jotunheim.'

Soon came the giant's luckless sister, 115
 Who feared not to ask the bridal fee:
 'From thy hands the rings of red gold take,
 If thou wouldst win my willing love,
 (My willing love and welcome glad.)'

Then loud spake Thrym, the giants' leader: 120
 'Bring in the hammer to hallow the bride;
 On the maiden's knees let Mjollnir lie,
 That us both the hand of Vor may bless.'

The heart in the breast of Hlorrithi laughed
 When the hard-souled one his hammer beheld;
 First Thrym, the king of the giants, he killed,
 Then all the folk of the giants he felled.

The giant's sister old he slew, 125
 She who had begged the bridal fee;
 A stroke she got in the shilling's stead,
 And for many rings the might of the hammer.

And so his hammer got Odin's son.

THE NIBELUNG GOLD

It is related that when certain of the Æsir, Odin and Loki and Hœnir, went forth to explore the earth, they came to a certain river, and proceeded along the river to a water-fall. And beside the fall was an otter, which had taken a salmon from the fall and was eating, blinking his eyes the while. Then Loki took up a stone and cast it at the otter, and struck its head. And Loki boasted in his catch, that he had got otter and salmon with one blow. Then they took up the salmon and the otter and bore them along with them, and coming to the buildings of a certain farm, they went in. Now the husbandman who dwelt there was named Hreidmar: he was a man of much substance, and very skilled in black magic. The Æsir asked him for a night's lodging, saying that they had sufficient food with them, and showed him their catch. But when Hreidmar saw the otter, straightway he called to him his sons, Fáfnir and Regin, and told them that the otter their brother was slain, and who had done that deed.

Now father and sons went up to the Æsir, seized them, bound them, and told them about the otter, how he was Hreidmar's son. The Æsir offered a ransom for their lives, as much wealth as Hreidmar himself desired to appoint; and a covenant was made between them on those terms, and confirmed with oaths. Then the otter was flayed, and Hreidmar, taking the otter-skin, bade them fill the skin with red gold and also cover it altogether; and that should be the condition of the covenant between them. Thereupon Odin sent Loki into the Land of the Black Elves, and he came to the dwarf who is called Andvari, who was as a fish in the water. Loki caught him in his hands and required of him in ransom of his life all the gold that he had in his rock; and when they came within the rock, the dwarf brought forth all the gold he had, and it was very much wealth. Then the dwarf quickly swept under his hand one little gold ring, but Loki saw it and commanded him to give over the ring. The dwarf prayed him not to take the ring from him, saying that from this ring he could multiply wealth for himself if he might keep it. Loki answered that he should not have one penny left, and took the ring from him and went out; but the dwarf declared that that ring should be the ruin of every one who should come into possession of it. Loki replied that this seemed well enough to him, and that this condition should hold good provided that he himself brought it to the ears of them that should receive the ring and the curse. He went his way and came to Hreidmar's dwelling, and showed the gold to Odin; but when Odin saw the ring, it seemed fair to him, and he took it away from the treasure, and paid the gold to Hreidmar. Then Hreidmar filled the otter-skin as much as he could, and set it up when it was full. Next Odin went up, having the skin to cover with gold, and he bade Hreidmar look whether the skin were yet altogether hidden. But Hreidmar looked at it searchingly, and saw one of the hairs of the snout, and commanded that this be covered, else their covenant should be at an end. Then Odin drew out the ring, and covered the hair, saying that they were now delivered from their debt for the slaying of the otter. But when Odin had taken his spear, and Loki his shoes, and they had no longer any need to be afraid, then Loki declared that the curse which Andvari had uttered should be fulfilled: that this ring and this gold should be the destruction of him who received it; and that was fulfilled afterward. Now it has been told wherefore gold is called Otter's Wergild, or Forced Payment of the Æsir, or Metal of Strife. What more is to be said of the gold? Hreidmar took the gold for his son's wergild, but Fáfnir and Regin claimed some part of their brother's blood-money for themselves. Hreidmar would not grant them one penny of the gold. This was the wicked purpose of those brethren; they slew their father for the gold. Then Regin demanded that Fáfnir share the gold with him, half for half. Fáfnir answered that there was little chance of his sharing it with his brother, seeing that he had slain his father for its sake; and he bade Regin go hence, else he should fare even as Hreidmar. Fáfnir had taken the helmet which Hreidmar had possessed, and set it upon his head (this helmet was called the Helm of Terror, of which all living creatures that see it are afraid), and the sword called Hrotti. Regin had that sword which was named Refil. So he fled away, and Fáfnir went up to Gnita Heath, and made himself a lair, and turned himself into a serpent, and laid him down upon the gold.

Then Regin went to King Hjálprek at Thjóð, and there he became his smith; and he took into his fostering Sigurd, son of Sigmund, Völsung's son, and of Hjördis, daughter of Eylimi. Sigurd was most illustrious of all Host-Kings in race, in prowess, and in mind. Regin declared to him where Fáfnir lay on the gold, and incited him to seek the gold. Then Regin fashioned the sword Gram, which was so sharp that Sigurd, bringing it down into running water, cut asunder a flock of wool which drifted down-stream onto the sword's edge. Next Sigurd clove Regin's anvil down to the stock with the sword. After that they went, Sigurd and Regin, to Gnita Heath, and there Sigurd dug a pit, in Fáfnir's way, and laid himself in ambush therein. And Fáfnir glided toward the water and came above the pit, Sigurd straightway thrust his sword through him, and that was his end.

Then Regin came forward, saying that Sigurd had slain his brother, and demanded as a condition of reconciliation that he take Fáfnir's heart and roast it with fire; and Regin laid him down and drank the blood of Fáfnir, and settled himself to sleep. But when Sigurd was roasting the heart, and thought that it must be quite roasted, he touched it with his finger to see how hard it was; and then the juice ran out from the heart on to his finger, so that he was burned and put his finger to his mouth. As soon as the heart's blood came upon his tongue, straightway he knew the speech of birds, and he understood what the nuthatches were saying which were sitting in the trees. Then one spake:

There sits Sigurd
Blood-besprinkled,
Fáfnir's heart
With flame he roasteth:
Wise seemed to me
The Spoiler of Rings

If the gleaming
Life-fiber he ate.

There lies Regin—sang another—
Rede he ponders,
Would betray the youth
Who trusteth in him:
In his wrath he plots
Wrong accusation;
The smith of bale
Would avenge his brother.

Then Sigurd went over to Regin and slew him, and thence to his horse, which was named Grani, and rode till he came to Fáfnir's lair. He took up the gold, trussed it up in his saddle-bags, laid it upon Grani's back, mounted up himself, and then rode his ways. Now the tale is told why gold is called Lair or Abode of Fáfnir, or Metal of Gnita Heath, or Grani's Burden.

Then Sigurd rode on till he found a house on the mountain, wherein a woman in helm and birnie lay sleeping. He drew his sword and cut the birnie from her: she awoke then, and gave her name as Hild; she is called Brynhild, and was a Valkyr. Sigurd rode away and came to the king who was named Gjúki, whose wife was Grimhild; their children were Gunnar, Högni, Gudrún, Gudný; Gott-horm was Gjúki's stepson. Sigurd tarried there a long time, and then he obtained the hand of Gudrún, daughter of Gjúki, and Gunnar and Högni swore oaths of blood-brotherhood with Sigurd. Thereafter Sigurd and the sons of Gjúki went unto Atli, Budli's son, to sue for the hand of Brynhild his sister in marriage to Gunnar. Brynhild abode on Hinda-Fell, and about her hall there was a flaring fire; and she had made a solemn vow to take none but that man who should dare to ride through the flaring fire.

Then Sigurd and the sons of Gjúki (who were also called Niflungs) rode up on to the mountain, and Gunnar should have ridden through the flaring fire; but he had the horse named Goti, and that horse dared not leap into the fire. So they exchanged shapes, Sigurd and Gunnar, and names likewise; for Grani would go under no man but Sigurd. Then Sigurd leapt on to Grani and rode through the flaring fire. That eve he was wedded with Brynhild. But when they came to bed, he drew the Sword Gram from its sheath and laid it between them. In the morning when he arose and clothed himself, he gave Bryn-hild as linen-fee the same gold ring which Loki had taken from Andvari and took another ring from her hand for remembrance. Then Sigurd mounted his horse and rode to his fellows, and he and Gunnar changed shapes again and went home to Gjúki with Brynhild. Sigurd and Gudrún had two children, Sigmund and Swanhild.

It befell on a time that Brynhild and Gudrún went to the water to wash their hair. And when they came to the river, Brynhild waded out from the bank well into the river, saying that she would not touch to her head the water which ran out of the hair of Gudrún since she herself had the more valorous husband. Then Gudrún went into the river after her and said that it was her right to wash her hair higher upstream, for the reason that she had to husband such a man as neither Gunnar nor any other in the world matched in valor, seeing that he had slain Fáfnir and Regin and succeeded to the heritage of both. And Brynhild made answer: 'It was a matter of greater worth that Gunnar rode through the flaring fire and Sigurd durst not.' Then Gudrún laughed, and said: 'Dost thou think that Gunnar rode through the flaring fire? Now I think that he who went into the bride-bed with thee was the same that gave me this gold ring; and the gold ring which thou bearest on thine hand and didst receive for linen-fee is called Andvari's Yield, and I believe that it was not Gunnar who got that ring on Gnita Heath.' Then Brynhild was silent, and went home.

After that she egged on Gunnar and Högni to slay Sigurd; but because they were Sigurd's sworn blood-brothers, they stirred up Gotthorm their brother to slay him. He thrust his sword through Sigurd as he slept; but when Sigurd felt the wound, he hurled his sword Gram after Gotthorm, so that it cut the man asunder at the middle. There fell Sigurd and Sigmund, his son of three winters, whom they slew. Then Brynhild stabbed herself with a sword, and she was burned with Sigurd; but Gunnar and Högni took Fáfnir's heritage and Andvari's Yield, and ruled the lands thereafter.

King Atli, Budli's son, the brother of Brynhild, then wedded Gudrún, whom Sigurd had had to wife; and they had children. King Atli invited to him Gunnar and Högni, and they came at his invitation. Yet before they departed from their land, they hid the gold, Fáfnir's heritage, in the Rhine, and that gold has never since been found. Now King Atli had a host in readiness, and fought with Gunnar and Högni, and they were made captive. King Atli bade the heart be cut out of Högni alive, and that was his end. Gunnar he caused to be cast into a den of serpents. But a harp was brought secretly to Gunnar, and he struck it with his toes, his hands being bound; he played the harp so that all the serpents fell asleep, saving only one adder, which glided over to him and gnawed into the cartilage of his breast-bone so far that her head sank within the wound, and she clove to his liver till he died. Gunnar and Högni were called Niflungs and Gjúkungs, for which reason gold is called Treasure, or Heritage, of the Niflungs.

THE NIBELUNGENLIED

The story of Sigurd, as above related, probably originated in a nature-myth, recounting the victory of the dawn over the mist-dragon of the mountains and the awakening of the sun-maiden, with the ultimate triumph of night over day, or it may be the dispersal of the clouds by the spring sun and the freeing of the earth from the bonds of winter. By the Franks of the Rhine Valley, this myth, after being converted into the story of a hero, was later combined with the destruction of their neighbors, the Burgundians, by the Huns, a historical event which took place in 437 A.D. The Norsemen, as we have seen, developed the early part of the story and added to it romantic elements taken from their own mythology; in the later developments among the Christianised Germanic tribes the story takes a very different shape, preserved for us in a long narrative poem of over two thousand four-line stanzas—the Nibelungenlied, attributed to about 1200 A.D. Instead of pagan myths we have Christian customs and ceremonies, although these do not go far to mitigate the essential savagery of the traditional legend. The early miraculous element disappears or is softened; the slaying of the dragon is pushed into the background, only one stanza being devoted to it in the course of an incidental reference to the exploits of Sigurd (now called Siegfried) before the story opens. Brynhild is no longer fire-encircled, but merely a very valiant princess who demands extraordinary feats of strength as the price of her hand. She is won for Gunther (Gunnar of the Prose Edda) by Siegfried with the aid of his tarn-kappe, a cloak which makes the wearer invisible. Siegfried has also become a knight—Sir Siegfried—and there are long accounts of jousting, hunting, feasting, and other knightly amusements with very elaborate—for the modern reader much too elaborate—descriptions of the clothes, jewels, and armor worn. Carlyle, in a well-known essay on the Nibelungenlied, gave this German version of the story very high praise, but later English critics, who have had fuller access to the earlier Scandinavian versions of the story, have given the latter preference on account of their more spirited and poetic treatment of the subject.

The Sixteenth Adventure as here printed from the translation of Professor George Henry Needler (for which we have to thank the publishers, Henry Holt & Co.), follows the original meter, consisting of stanzas of four long rhymed lines, each of which is divided in half by an emphatic cæsura. The half lines have three accented syllables with the exception of the eighth and last, which has four. It is the longer closing line which gives this four line stanza its peculiarly deliberate movement.

HOW SIEGFRIED WAS SLAIN

Gunther and Hagen, the knights full keen,
Proposed with evil forethought a hunting in the green:
The boar within the forest they'd chase with pointed spear,
And shaggy bear and bison.—What sport to valiant men more dear?

With them rode also Siegfried happy and light of heart:
Their load of rich refreshments was made in goodly part.
Where a spring ran cooling they took from him his life,
Whereto in chief had urged them Brunhild, royal Gunther's wife.

Then went the valiant Siegfried where he Kriemhild found;
Rich hunting-dress was laden and now stood ready bound
For him and his companions across the Rhine to go.
Than this a sadder hour nevermore could Kriemhild know.

The spouse he loved so dearly upon the mouth he kissed.
 'God grant that well I find thee again, if so He list,
 And thine own eyes to see me. 'Mid kin that hold thee dear
 May now the time go gently, the while I am no longer near.'

15

Then thought she of the story—but silence must she keep—
 Whereof once Hagen asked her: then began to weep
 The princess high and noble that ever she was born,
 And wept with tears unceasing the valiant Siegfried's wife forlorn.

She spake unto her husband: 'Let now this hunting be.
 I dreamt this night of evil, how wild boars hunted thee,
 Two wild boars o'er the meadow, wherefrom the flowers grew red.
 That I do weep so sorely have I poor woman direst need.

Yea, do I fear, Sir Siegfried, something treacherous,
 If perchance have any of those been wronged by us
 Who might yet be able to vent their enmity.
 Tarry thou here, Sir Siegfried: Let that my faithful counsel be.'

Quoth he: 'I come, dear lady, when some short days are flown.
 Of foes who bear us hatred here know I never one.
 All of thine own kindred are gracious unto me,
 Nor know I aught of reason why they should other-minded be.'

30

'But nay, belovèd Siegfried, thy death I fear 'twill prove.
 This night I dreamt misfortune, how o'er thee from above Down there fell two mountains: I never saw thee more.
 And wilt thou now go from me, that must grieve my heart full sore.'

35

The lady rich in virtue within his arms he pressed,
 And with loving kisses her fair form caressed.
 From her thence he parted ere long time was o'er:
 Alas for her, she saw him alive thereafter nevermore.

40

Then rode from thence the hunters deep within a wold
 In search of pleasant pastime. Full many a rider bold Followed after Gunther in his stately train.
 Gernot and Giselher,—at home the knights did both remain.

Went many a horse well laden before them o'er the Rhine,
 That for the huntsmen carried store of bread and wine,
 Meat along with fishes and other victualling,
 The which upon his table were fitting for so high a king.

45

Then bade they make encampment before the forest green
 Where game was like to issue, those hunters proud and keen,
 Who there would join in hunting, on a meadow wide that spread.
 Thither also was come Siegfried: the same unto the king was said.

By the merry huntsmen soon were watched complete
 At every point the runways. The company then did greet Siegfried the keen and doughty: 'Who now within the green
 Unto the game shall guide us, ye warriors so bold and keen?'

55

'Now part we from each other,' answered Hagen then,
 'Ere that the hunting we do here begin!
 Thereby may be apparent to my masters and to me
 Who on this forest journey of the hunters best may be.

60

Let then hounds and huntsmen be ta'en in equal share,
That wheresoever any would go, there let him fare.
Who then is first in hunting shall have our thanks this day.'
Not longer there together did the merry hunters stay.

Thereto quoth Sir Siegfried: 'Of dogs have I no need,
More than one hound only of trusty hunting breed
For scenting well the runway of wild beast through the brake.
And now the chase begin we!' So the spouse of Kriemhild spake. 65

Then took a practised hunter a good tracking-hound,
That did bring them where they game in plenty found, 70
Nor kept them long awaiting. Whate'er did spring from lair Pursued the merry huntsmen, as still good hunters everywhere.

As many as the hound started slew with might hand
Siegfried the full doughty hero of Netherland.
So swiftly went his charger that none could him outrun; 75
And praise before all others soon he in the hunting won.

He was in every feature a valiant knight and true.
The first within the forest that with his hand he slew
Was a half-grown wild-boar that he smote to ground;
Thereafter he full quickly a wild and mighty lion found. 80

When it the hound had started, with bow he shot it dead,
Wherewith a pointed arrow he had so swiftly sped
That the lion after could forward spring but thrice.
All they that hunted with him cried Siegfried's praise with merry voice.

Soon fell a prey unto him an elk and bison more, 85
A giant stag he slew him and huge ure-oxen four.
His steed bore him so swiftly that none could him outrun;
Of stag or hind encountered scarce could there escape him one.

A boar full huge and bristling soon was likewise found,
And when the same bethought him to flee before the hound, 90
Came quick again the master and stood athwart his path.
The boar upon the hero full charged straightway in mickle wrath.

Then the spouse of Kriemhild, with sword the boar he slew,
A thing that scarce another hunter had dared to do.
When he thus had felled him they leashed again the hound, 95
And soon his hunting prowess was known to all the people round.

Then spake to him his huntsmen: 'If that the thing may be,
So let some part, Sir Siegfried, of the forest game go free;
Today thou makest empty hillside and forest wild.'
Thereat in merry humor the thane so keen and valiant smiled. 100

Then they heard on all sides the din, from many a hound
And huntsmen eke the clamor so great was heard around
That back did come the answer from hill and forest tree—
Of hounds had four-and-twenty packs been set by hunter free.

Full many a forest denizen from life was doomed to part. 105
Each of all the hunters thereon had set his heart,
To win the prize in hunting. But such could never be,
When they the doughty Siegfried at the camping-place did see.

Now the chase was ended,—and yet complete 'twas not.
 All they to camp who wended with them thither brought Skin of full many an animal and of game good store.
 Heigho! unto the table how much the king's attendants bore! 110

Then bade the king the noble hunters all to warn
 That he would take refreshment, and loud a hunting-horn
 In one long blast was winded: to all was known thereby
 That the noble monarch at camp did wait their company 115

Spake one of Siegfried's huntsmen: 'Master, I do know
 By blast of horn resounding that we now shall go Unto the place of meeting: thereto I'll make reply.'
 Then for the merry hunters blew the horn right lustily. 120

Then spake Sir Siegfried: 'Now leave we eke the green.'
 His charger bore him smoothly, and followed huntsmen keen.
 With their rout they started a beast of savage kind,
 That was a bear untamed. Then spake the knight to those behind:

'For our merry party some sport will I devise.
 Let slip the hound then straightway, a bear now meets my eyes,
 And with us shall he thither unto the camp-fire fare.
 Full rapid must his flight be shall he our company forbear.' 125

From leash the hound was loosened, the bear sprang through the brake,
 When that the spouse of Kriemhild did wish him to o'ertake.
 He sought a pathless thicket, but yet it could not be,
 As bruin fondly hoped it, that from the hunter he was free. 130

Then from his horse alighted the knight of spirit high,
 And gan a running after. Bruin all unguardedly
 Was ta'en and could escape not. Him caught straightway the knight,
 And soon all unwounded had him bound in fetters tight. 135

Nor claws nor teeth availed him for aught of injury,
 But bound he was to saddle. Then mounted speedily
 The knight and to the camp-fire in right merry way
 For pastime led he bruin, the hero valiant and gay. 140

In what manner stately unto the camp he rode!
 He bore a spear full mickle, great of strength and broad.
 A sword all ornamented hung down unto his spur,
 And wrought of gold all ruddy at side a glittering horn he wore.

Of richer hunting-garments heard I ne'er tell before.
 Black was the silken tunic that the rider wore,
 And cap of costly sable did crown the gallant knight.
 Heigho, and how his quiver with well-wrought hands was rich bedight! 145

A skin of gleaming panther covered the quiver o'er,
 Prized for its pleasant odor. Eke a bow he bore,
 The which to draw if ever had wished another man,
 A lever he had needed: such power had Siegfried alone. 150

Of fur of costly otter his mantle was complete,
 With other skins embroidered from head unto the feet.
 And 'mid the fur all shining, full many a golden seam
 On both sides of the valiant huntsman saw ye brightly gleam. 155

Balmung, a goodly weapon broad, he also wore,
 That was so sharp at edges that it ne'er forbore
 To cleave when swung on helmet: blade it was full good.
 Stately was the huntsman as there with merry heart he rode. 160

If that complete the story to you I shall unfold,
 Full many a goodly arrow did his rich quiver hold
 Whereof were gold the sockets, and heads a hand-breadth each.
 In sooth was doomed to perish whate'er in flight the same did reach

Pricking like goodly huntsman the noble knight did ride 165
 When him the men of Gunther coming thither spied.
 They hasted out to meet him and took from him his steed,
 As bruin great and mighty by the saddle he did lead.

When he from horse alighted he loosed him every band
 From foot and eke from muzzle. Straight on every hand 170
 Began the dogs a howling when they beheld the bear.
 Bruin would to the forest: among the men was mickle stir.

Amid the clamor bruin through the camp-fires sped:
 Heigho, how the servants away before him fled!
 O'erturned was many a kettle and flaming brands did fly: 175
 Heigho, what goodly victuals did scattered in the ashes lie!

Then sprang from out the saddle knights and serving-men.
 The bear was wild careering: the king bade loosen then
 All the dogs that fastened within their leashes lay.
 If this thing well had ended, then had there passed a merry day. 180

Not longer then they waited but with bow and eke with spear
 Hasted the nimble hunters to pursue the bear,
 Yet none might shoot upon him for all the dogs around.
 Such clamor was of voices that all the mountain did resound.

When by the dogs pursued the bear away did run, 185
 None there that could o'ertake him but Siegfried alone.
 With his sword he came upon him and killed him at a blow,
 And back unto the camp-fire bearing bruin they did go.

Then spake who there had seen it, he was a man of might.
 Soon to the table bade they come each noble knight, 190
 And on a smiling meadow the noble company sat.
 Heigho, with what rare victuals did they upon the huntsmen wait!

Ne'er appeared a butler wine for them to pour.
 Than they good knights were never better served before,
 And had there not in secret been lurking treachery, 195
 Then were the entertainers from every cause of cavil free.

Then spake Sir Siegfried: 'A wonder 'tis to me,
 Since that from the kitchen so full supplied are we,
 Why to us the butlers of wine bring not like store:
 If such the huntsman's service a huntsman reckon me no more. 200

Meseems I yet did merit some share of courtesy.'
 The king who sat at table spake then in treachery:
 'Gladly shall be amended wherein we're guilty so.
 The fault it is of Hagen, he'd willing see us thirsting go.'

Then spake of Tronje Hagen: 'Good master, hear me say,
I weened for this our hunting we did go today
Unto the spessart forest: the wine I thither sent.
Go we today a-thirsting, I'll later be more provident.' 205

Thereto replied Sir Siegfried: 'Small merit here is thine.
Good seven horses laden with mead and sparkling wine
Should hither have been conducted. If aught the same denied,
Then should our place of meeting have nearer been the Rhine beside.' 210

Then spake of Tronje Hagen: 'Ye noble knights and bold,
I know here nigh unto us a spring that's flowing cold.
Be then your wrath appeased, and let us thither go.'
Through that same wicked counsel came many a thane to grievous woe. 215

Sore was the noble Siegfried with the pangs of thirst:
To bid them rise from table was he thus the first.
He would along the hillside unto the fountain go:
In sooth they showed them traitors, those knights who there did counsel so. 220

On wagons hence to carry the game they gave command
Which had that day been slaughtered by Siegfried's doughty hand.
He'd carried off the honors, all who had seen did say.
Hagen his faith with Siegfried soon did break in grievous way.

When now they would go thither to where the linden spread,
Spake of Tronje Hagen: 'To me hath oft been said,
That none could follow after Kriemhild's nimble knight
Or vie with him in running: would that he'd prove it to our sight!' 225

Then spake of Netherland bold Siegfried speedily:
'That may ye well have proof of, will ye but run with me
In contest to the fountain. When that the same be done,
To him be given honor who the race hath fairly won.' 230

'Now surely make we trial,' quoth Hagen the thane.
Thereto the doughty Siegfried: 'I too will give you gain,
Afore your feet at starting to lay me in the grass.'
When that he had heard it, thereat how joyous Gunther was! 235

And spake again the warrior: 'And ye shall further hear:
All my clothing likewise will I upon me wear,
The spear and shield full heavy and hunting-dress I'll don.'
His sword as well as quiver had he full quickly girded on. 240

Doffed they their apparel and aside they laid it then:
Clothed in white shirts only saw you there the twain.
Like unto two wild panthers they coursed across the green:
Yet first beside the fountain was the valiant Siegfried seen.

No man in feats of valor who with him had vied.
The sword he soon ungirded and quiver laid aside,
The mighty spear he leaned against the linden-tree:
Beside the running fountain stood the knight stately to see. 245

To Siegfried naught was lacking that doth good knight adorn.
Down the shield then laid he where did flow the burn,
Yet howsoe'er he thirsted no whit the hero drank
Before had drunk the monarch: therefore he earned but evil thank. 250

There where ran clear the water and cool from out the spring,
 Down to it did bend him Gunther the king.
 And when his thirst was quenched rose he from thence again: 255
 Eke the valiant Siegfried, how glad had he done likewise then.

For his courtesy he suffered. Where bow and sword there lay,
 Both did carry Hagen from him thence away,
 And again sprang quickly thither where the spear did stand:
 And for a cross the tunic of the valiant knight he scanned. 260

As there the noble Siegfried to drink o'er fountain bent,
 Through the cross he pierced him, that from the wound was sent
 The blood nigh to bespatter the tunic Hagen wore.
 By hand of knight such evil deed shall wrought be nevermore.

The spear he left projecting where it had pierced the heart. 265
 In terror as that moment did Hagen never start
 In flight from any warrior he ever yet had found.
 Soon as the noble Siegfried within him felt the mighty wound,

Raging the knight full doughty up from the fountain sprang,
 The while from 'twixt his shoulders stood out a spearshaft long. 270
 The prince weened to find there his bow or his sword:
 Then in sooth had Hagen found the traitor's meet reward.

When from the sorely wounded knight his sword was gone,
 Then had he naught to 'venge him but his shield alone.
 This snatched he from the fountain and Hagen rushed upon, 275
 And not at all escape him could the royal Gunther's man.

Though he nigh to death was wounded he yet such might did wield
 That out in all directions flew from off the shield
 Precious stones a many: the shield he clave in twain.
 Thus vengeance fain had taken upon his foe the stately thane. 280

Beneath his hand must Hagen stagger and fall to ground.
 So swift the blow he dealt him, the meadow did resound.
 Had sword in hand been swinging, Hagen had had his meed,
 So sorely raged he stricken: to rage in sooth was mickle need.

Faded from cheek was color, no longer could he stand, 285
 And all his might of body soon complete had waned,
 As did a deathly pallor over his visage creep.
 Full many a fairest lady for the knight anon must weep.

So sank amid the flowers Kriemhild's noble knight,
 While from his wound flowed thickly the blood before the sight. 290
 Then gan he reviling—for dire was his need—
 Who had thus encompassed his death by this same faithless deed.

Then spake the sorely wounded: 'O ye base cowards twain,
 Doth then my service merit that me ye thus have slain?
 To you I e'er was faithful and so am I repaid. 295
 Alas, upon your kindred now have ye shame eternal laid.

By this deed dishonored hereafter evermore
 Are their generations. Your anger all too sore
 Have ye now thus vented and vengeance ta'en on me,
 With shame henceforth be parted from good knights' company.' 300

All the hunters hastened where he stricken lay,
 It was in sooth for many of them a joyless day.
 Had any aught of honor, he mourned that day, I ween,
 And well the same did merit the knight high-spirited and keen.

As there the king of Burgundy mourned that he should die,
 Spake the knight sore wounded: 'To weep o'er injury,
 Who hath wrought the evil hath smallest need, I trow.
 Reviling doth he merit, and weeping may he well forego.'

305

Thereto quoth grim Hagen: 'Ye mourn, I know not why:
 This same day hath ended all our anxiety.
 Few shall we find henceforward for fear will give us need,
 And well is me that from his mastery we thus are freed.'

310

'Light thing is now thy vaunting,' did Siegfried then reply.
 'Had I e'er bethought me of this thy infamy
 Well had I preservèd 'gainst all thy hate my life.
 Me rueth naught so sorely as Lady Kriemhild my wife.'

315

Now may God have mercy that to me a son was born,
 That him alack! the people in times to come shall spurn,
 That those he nameth kinsmen have done the murderer's deed.
 An had I breath,' spake Siegfried, 'to mourn o'er this I well had need.'

320

Then spake, in anguish praying, the hero doomed to die:
 'And wilt thou, king, to any yet not good faith deny,
 In all the world to any, to thee commended be
 And to thy loving mercy the spouse erstwhile was wed to me.

Let it be her good fortune that she thy sister is:
 By all the princely virtues, I beg thee pledge me this.
 For me long time my father and men henceforth must wait:
 Upon a spouse was never wrought, as mine, a wrong so great.'

325

All around the flowers were wetted with the blood
 As there with death he struggled. Yet not for long he could,
 Because the deadly weapon had cut him all too sore:
 And soon the keen and noble knight was doomed to speak no more.

330

When the lords perceived how that the knight was dead,
 Upon a shield they laid him that was of gold full red,
 And counsel took together how of the thing should naught
 Be known, but held in secret that Hagen the deed had wrought.

335

Then spake of them a many: 'This is an evil day.
 Now shall ye all conceal it and all alike shall say,
 When as Kriemhild's husband the dark forest through Rode alone a-hunting, him the hand of robber slew.'

340

Then spake of Tronje Hagen: 'Myself will bring him home.
 In sooth I reck but little if to her ears it come,
 Who my Lady Brunhild herself hath grieved so sore.
 It maketh me small worry, an if she weep for evermore.'

THE SONG OF ROLAND

The French epic has characteristics which distinguish it very clearly from the romances and sagas hitherto considered. The frequent confusion of pagan and Christian elements in the latter has no place in the early literature of Christian France. 'Most of the heroic poems that have come down to us were written in the twelfth century and the thirteenth, and are apparently the work of clerics or of minstrels in close touch with the Church. While they deal primarily with feats of arms, they are apt to savor strongly of religion. Monasteries and shrines seem to have been their especial breeding-places; and they are locally associated with the highways which swarms of pilgrims followed, year after year.' (Grandgent). The Chanson de Roland, which is alike the best and the best known of the chansons de geste, lays stress on the conflict between the Christians of France and the Moors of Spain, though these pagans were by no means so black as they are painted in the poem; the feeling underlying the conflict is that which provoked and was developed by the Crusades for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre. By the side of this spirit of religious antagonism we see very clearly the permeating influence of the spirit of feudalism. Often these two motives are intermingled. Archbishop Turpin is accounted worthy at the critical moment in the conflict to ride side by side with Roland as a 'good vassal,' great alike in battles and in 'very rare sermons.' So Roland, in his last hour, holds out his glove to his Over-Lord, God, who sends down the Angel Gabriel to take it from his hand. Evidently we have here an epic of Christian chivalry, with its characteristic modes of thought and expression.

The historical incident which the poem celebrates, obviously with considerable romantic exaggeration, was a rear-guard action fought between the Emperor Charlemagne's forces under his nephew Roland and the Saracens at Roncesvaux on August 15, 778 A.D. It is known that a Latin poem on the subject existed in the tenth century, and the Norman minstrel Taillefer sang some version of the story before the invading hosts at the battle of Hastings in 1066—probably not the Song of Roland as we have it, though it may have taken its present shape about this time or not much later. The Bodleian MS. ends with the words Tuoldus declinet, but whether Tuoldus was the name of the author of the poem, or of the Jongleur who sang it, or of the copyist who wrote out the manuscript, scholars have not been able to agree.

The poem consists of about 4,000 lines and has come down to us in several manuscripts, of which the one just referred to, now preserved in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, is perhaps the best. The meter is decasyllabic, but is neither blank verse nor rhyme, though it has a strong rhythmical effect, produced by the assonance (repetition of vowel sound) of the strongly accented final syllable or syllables of each line in the same strophe or laisse: these might be called stanzas but that the number of lines in each is absolutely independent of all the rest. This meter is peculiarly difficult to get into English and the task was not attempted until very recently by Captain Charles Scott Moncrieff, who solaced the hardships of the Great War by a close study of the poem, and soon after succeeded in bringing his translation to a successful termination (published by Chapman & Hall, Ltd. 1919). In achieving this feat he has had to take certain liberties unusual in English verse—the use of certain names (Charles, for instance), and past participles sometimes as one syllable, sometimes as two; the elision of 'to,' 'the' and similar words before following vowels; and so on. The beat of the verse is not so hard to catch by the modern reader if he remembers that the Chansons were songs chanted by professional performers (Jongleurs) to a monotonous tune played on a primitive kind of large violin called a vielle. Presbyterian readers (Captain Moncrieff suggests) may sing the poem to the favorite tune of their metrical Psalm: 'Now Israel may say, and that truly.'

THE DEATH OF ROLAND

When Rollant sees those misbegotten men,
 Who are more black than ink is on the pen
 With no part white, only their teeth except,
 Then says that Count: 'I know now very well
 That here to die we're bound, as I can tell.
 Strike on, the Franks! For so I recommend.'
 Says Oliver: 'Who holds back, is condemned!
 Upon those words, the Franks to strike again.

Franks are but few; which, when the pagans know,
 Among themselves comfort and pride they show;
 Says each to each: 'Wrong was that Emperor.'
 Their alcaliph upon a sorrel rode,
 And pricked it well with both his spurs of gold;
 Struck Oliver, behind, on the back-bone,
 His hauberk white into his body broke,
 Clean through his breast the thrusting spear he drove;
 After he said: 'You've borne a mighty blow.
 Charlès the Great should not have left you so;
 He's done us wrong, small thanks to him we owe;
 I've well avenged all ours on you alone.'

Oliver feels that he to die is bound,
 Holds Halteclere, whose steel is rough and brown,
 Strikes the alcaliph on his helm's golden mount;
 Flowers and stones fall clattering to the ground,
 Slices his head, to th' small teeth in his mouth;
 So brandishes his blade and flings him down;
 After he says: 'Pagan, accurst be thou!
 Thou'lt never say that Charles forsakes me now;
 Nor to thy wife, nor any dame thou'st found,
 Thou'lt never boast, in lands where thou wast crowned,
 One pennyworth from me thou'st taken out,
 Nor damage wrought on me nor any around.'
 After, for aid, 'Rollant!' he cries aloud.

AOI.

Oliver feels that death is drawing nigh;
 To avenge himself he hath no longer time;
 Through the great press most gallantly he strikes,
 He breaks their spears, their buckled shields doth slice,
 Their feet, their fists, their shoulders and their sides,
 Dismembers them: whoso had seen that sight,
 Dead in the field one on another piled,
 Remember well a vassal brave he might.
 Charlès' ensign he'll not forget it quite;
 Aloud and clear 'Monjoie' again he cries.
 To call Rollanz, his friend and peer, he tries:
 'My companion, come hither to my side.
 With bitter grief we must us now divide.'

AOI.

Then Rollant looked upon Oliver's face;
 Which was all wan and colorless and pale,
 While the clear blood, out of his body sprayed,

Upon the ground gushed forth and ran away. 50
 'God!' said that count, 'What shall I do or say?
 My companion, gallant for such ill fate!
 Ne'er shall man be, against thee could prevail.
 Ah! France the Douce, henceforth art thou made waste
 Of vassals brave, confounded and disgraced! 55
 Our Emperor shall suffer damage great.'
 And with these words upon his horse he faints.

AOL.

You'd seen Rollant aswoon there in his seat,
 And Oliver, who unto death doth bleed,
 So much he's bled, his eyes are dim and weak; 60
 Nor clear enough his vision, far or near,
 To recognize whatever man he sees;
 His companion, when each the other meets,
 Above the helm jeweled with gold he beats,
 Slicing it down from there to the nose-piece, 65
 But not his head; he's touched not brow nor cheek.
 At such a blow Rollant regards him keen,
 And asks of him, in gentle tones and sweet:
 'To do this thing, my comrade, did you mean?
 This is Rollanz, who ever held you dear; 70
 And no mistrust was ever us between.'
 Says Oliver: 'Now can I hear you speak;
 I see you not: may the Lord God you keep!
 I struck you now: and for your pardon plead.'
 Answers Rollanz: 'I am not hurt, indeed; 75
 I pardon you, before God's Throne and here.'
 Upon these words, each to the other leans;
 And in such love you had their parting seen.

Oliver feels death's anguish on him now;
 And in his head his two eyes swimming round; 80
 Nothing he sees; he hears not any sound;
 Dismounting then, he kneels upon the ground,
 Proclaims his sins both firmly and aloud,
 Clasps his two hands, heavenwards holds them out,
 Prays God himself in Paradise to allow; 85
 Blessings on Charles, and on Douce France he vows,
 And his comrade, Rollanz, to whom he's bound.
 Then his heart fails; his helmet nods and bows;
 Upon the earth he lays his whole length out:
 And he is dead, may stay no more, that Count. 90
 Rollanz the brave mourns him with grief profound;
 Nowhere on earth so sad a man you'd found.

So Rollant's friend is dead; whom when he sees
 Face to the ground, and biting it with's teeth,
 Begins to mourn in language very sweet: 95
 'Unlucky, friend, your courage was indeed!
 Together we have spent such days and years;
 No harmful thing 'twixt thee and me has been.
 Now thou art dead, and all my life a grief.'
 And with these words again he swoons, that chief, 100
 Upon his horse, which he calls Veillantif;
 Stirrups of gold support him underneath;
 He cannot fall, whichever way he lean.

Soon as Rollant his senses won and knew,
 Recovering and turning from that swoon, 105
 Bitter great loss appeared there in his view:
 Dead are the Franks; he'd all of them to lose,
 Save the Archbishop, and save Gualter del Hum;
 He is come down out of the Mountains, who
 'Gainst Spanish men made there a great ado; 110
 Dead are his men, for those the pagans slew;
 Will he or nill, along the vales he flew,
 And called Rollant, to bring him succour soon:
 'Ah! Gentle Count, brave soldier, where are you?
 For by thy side no fear I ever knew. 115
 Gualter it is, who conquered Maëlgut,
 And nephew was to hoary old Droün;
 My vassalage thou ever thoughtest good.
 Broken my spear, and split my shield in two;
 Gone is the mail that on my hauberk grew; 120
 This body of mine eight lances have gone through;
 I'm dying. Yet full price for life I took.
 Rollant has heard these words and understood,
 Has spurred his horse, and on towards him drew.

AOI.

Grief gives Rollanz intolerance and pride; 125
 Through the great press he goes again to strike;
 To slay a score of Spaniards he contrives,
 Gualter has six, the Archbishop other five.
 The pagans say: 'Men, these, of felon kind!
 Lordings, take care they go not hence alive! 130
 Felon he's named that does not break their line,
 Recreant, who lets them any safety find!
 And so once more begin the hue and cry,
 From every part they come to break the line.

AOI.

Count Rollant is a noble and brave soldier, 135
 Gualter del Hum's a right good chevalier,
 That Archbishop hath shewn good prowess there;
 None of them falls behind the other pair;
 Through the great press, pagans they strike again.
 Come on afoot a thousand Sarrazens, 140
 And on horseback some forty thousand men.
 But well I know, to approach they never dare;
 Lances and spears they poise to hurl at them,
 Arrows, barbs, darts and javelins in the air.
 With the first flight they've slain our Gualtier; 145
 Turpin of Reims has all his shield broken,
 And cracked his helm; he's wounded in the head,
 From his hauberk the woven mail they tear,
 In his body four spear-wounds doth he bear;
 Beneath him too his charger's fallen dead. 150
 Great grief it was, when that Archbishop fell.

AOI.

Turpin of Reims hath felt himself undone,
 Since that four spears have through his body come;
 Nimble and bold upon his feet he jumps;
 Looks for Rollant, and then towards him runs, 155

Saying this word: 'I am not overcome,
 While life remains, no good vassal gives up,'
 He's drawn Almace, whose steel was brown and rough;
 Through the great press a thousand blows he's struck:
 As Charlès said, quarter he gave to none;
 He found him there, four hundred else among,
 Wounded the most, speared through the middle some,
 Also there were from whom the heads he'd cut:
 So tells the tale, he that was there says thus,
 The brave Saint Giles, whom God made marvelous;
 Who charters wrote for th' Minster at Loim;
 Nothing he's heard that does not know this much.

The Count Rollanz has nobly fought and well,
 But he is hot; and all his body sweats;
 Great pain he has, and trouble in his head,
 His temples burst when he the horn sounded;
 But he would know if Charles will come to them,
 Takes the olifant, and feebly sounds again.
 That Emperor stood still and listened then:
 'My lords,' said he, 'right evilly we fare!
 This day Rollanz, my nephew, shall be dead:
 I hear his horn, with scarcely any breath.
 Nimble canter, whoever would be there!
 Your trumpets sound, as many as ye bear!
 Sixty thousand so loud together blare;
 The mountains ring, the valleys answer them.
 The pagans hear, they think it not a jest;
 Says each to each; 'Carlum doth us bestead.'

AOI.

The pagans say: 'That Emperor's at hand,
 We hear their sound, the trumpets of the Franks;
 If Charlès come, great loss we then shall stand,
 And wars renewed, unless we slay Rollant;
 All Spain we'll lose, our own clear fatherland.'
 Four hundred men of them in helmets stand;
 The best of them that might be in their ranks
 Make on Rollanz a grim and fierce attack;
 'Gainst these the Count had well enough in hand.

AOI.

The Count Rollanz, when their approach he sees
 Is grown so bold and manifest and fierce
 So long as he's alive he will not yield.
 He sits his horse, which men call Veillantif,
 Pricking him well with golden spurs beneath,
 Through the great press he goes, their line to meet,
 And by his side is the Archbishop Turpin.
 'Now, friend, begone!' say pagans, each to each;
 'These Frankish men, their horns we plainly hear;
 Charle is at hand, that King in Majesty.'

The Count Rollanz has never loved cowards,
 Nor arrogant, nor men of evil heart,
 Nor chevalier that was not good vassal.
 That Archbishop, Turpins, he calls apart:
 'Sir, you're afoot, and I my charger have;

For love of you, here will I take my stand,
 Together we'll endure things good and bad;
 I'll leave you not, for no incarnate man:
 We'll give again these pagans their attack;
 The better blows are those from Durendal.
 Says the Archbishop: 'Shame on him that holds back!
 Charle is at hand, full vengeance he'll exact.'

210

The pagans say: 'Unlucky were we born!
 An evil day for us did this day dawn!
 For we have lost our peers and all our lords.
 Charles his great host once more upon us draws,
 Of Frankish men we plainly hear the horns,
 'Monjoie' they cry, and great is their uproar.
 The Count Rollant is of such pride and force
 He'll never yield to man of woman born;
 Let's aim at him, then leave him on the spot!
 And aim they did: with arrows long and short,
 Lances and spears and feathered javelots;
 Count Rollant's shield they've broken through and bored,
 The woven mail have from his hauberk torn,
 But not himself, they've never touched his corse;
 Veillantif is in thirty places gored,
 Beneath the Count he's fallen dead, that horse.
 Pagans are fled, and leave him on the spot;
 The Count Rollant stands on his feet once more.

AOI.

Pagans are fled, enangered and enraged,
 Home into Spain with speed they make their way;
 The Count Rollanz, he has not given chase,
 For Veillantif, his charger, they have slain;
 Will he or nill, on foot he must remain.
 To the Archbishop, Turpins, he goes with aid;
 He's from his head the golden helm unlaced,
 Taken from him his white hauberk away,
 And cut the gown in strips, was round his waist;
 On his great wounds the pieces of it placed,
 Then to his heart has caught him and embraced;
 On the green grass he has him softly laid,
 Most sweetly then to him has Rollant prayed:
 'Ah! Gentle sir, give me your leave, I say;
 Our companions, whom we so dear appraised,
 Are now all dead; we cannot let them stay;
 I will go seek and bring them to this place,
 Arrange them here in ranks, before your face.'
 Said the Archbishop: 'Go, and return again.
 This field is yours and mine now; God be praised!'

240

245

250

So Rollanz turns; through the field, all alone,
 Searching the vales and mountains, he is gone;
 He finds Gerin, Gerers his companion,
 Also he finds Berenger and Otton,
 There too he finds Anséis and Sanson,
 And finds Gerard the old, of Rossillon;
 By one and one he's taken those barons,
 To the Archbishop with each of them he comes,
 Before his knees arranges every one.

260

That Archbishop, he cannot help but sob,
 He lifts his hand, gives benediction;
 After he's said: 'Unlucky, Lords, your lot!
 But all your souls He'll lay, our Glorious God, 265
 In Paradise, His holy flowers upon!
 For my own death such anguish now I've got;
 I shall not see him, our rich Emperor.'

So Rollant turns, goes through the field in quest;
 His companion Oliver finds at length; 270
 He has embraced him close against his breast,
 To the Archbishop returns as he can best;
 Upon a shield he's laid him, by the rest;
 And the Archbishop has them absolved and blest;
 Whereon his grief and pity grow afresh. 275
 Then says Rollanz: 'Fair comrade Olivier,
 You were the son of the good count Reinier,
 Who held the march by th' Vale of Runier;
 To shatter spears, through buckled shields to bear,
 And from hauberks the mail to break and tear, 280
 Proof men to lead, and prudent counsel share,
 Gluttons in field to frighten and conquer,
 No land has known a better chevalier.'

The Count Rollanz, when dead he saw his peers,
 And Oliver, he held so very dear, 285
 Grew tender, and began to shed a tear;
 Out of his face the color disappeared;
 No longer could he stand, for so much grief,
 Will he or nill, he swooned upon the field.
 Said the Archbishop: 'Unlucky lord, indeed!' 290

When the Archbishop beheld him swoon, Rollant, Never before such bitter grief he'd had;
 Stretching his hand, he took that olifant.
 Through Rencesvals a little river ran;
 He would go there, fetch water for Rollant. 295
 Went step by step, to stumble soon began,
 So feeble he is, no further fare he can,
 For too much blood he's lost, and no strength has;
 Ere he has crossed an acre of the land,
 His heart grows faint, he falls down forwards and 300
 Death comes to him with very cruel pangs.

The Count Rollanz wakes from his swoon once more,
 Climbs to his feet; his pains are very sore;
 Looks down the vale, looks to the hills above;
 On the green grass, beyond his companions, 305
 He sees him lie, that noble old baron;
 'Tis the Archbishop, whom in His name wrought God;
 There he proclaims his sins, and looks above;
 Joins his two hands, to Heaven holds them forth,
 And Paradise prays God to him to accord. 310
 Dead is Turpin, the warrior of Charlon.
 In battles great and very rare sermons
 Against pagans ever a champion.
 God grant him now His Benediction!

The Count Rollant sees the Archbishop lie dead, 315
 Sees the bowels of his body shed,
 And sees the brains that surge from his forehead;
 Between his two arm-pits, upon his breast,
 Crossways he folds those hands so white and fair.
 Then mourns aloud, as was the custom there: 320
 'Thee, gentle sir, chevalier nobly bred,
 To the Glorious Celestial I commend;
 Ne'er shall man be, that will Him serve so well;
 Since the Apostles was never such prophet,
 To hold the laws and draw the hearts of men. 325
 Now may your soul no pain nor sorrow ken,
 Finding the gates of Paradise open!'

Then Rollanz feels that death to him draws near,
 For all his brain is issued from his ears;
 He prays to God that he will call the peers, 330
 Bids Gabriel, the angel, t'himself appear.
 Takes the olifant, that no reproach shall hear,
 And Durendal in the other hand he wields;
 Further than might a cross-bow's arrow speed
 Goes towards Spain into a fallow-field; 335
 Climbs on a cliff, where, under two fair trees,
 Four terraces, of marble wrought, he sees.
 There he falls down, and lies upon the green;
 He swoons again, for death is very near.

High are the peaks, the trees are very high. 340
 Four terraces of polished marble shine;
 On the green grass Count Rollant swoons thereby.
 A Sarrazin him all the time espies,
 Who feigning death among the others hides;
 Blood hath his face and all his body dyed; 345
 He gets afoot, running towards him hies;
 Fair was he, strong and of a courage high;
 A mortal hate he's kindled in his pride.
 He's seized Rollant, and the arms, were at his side,
 'Charlè's nephew,' he's said, 'here conquered lies. 350
 To Araby I'll bear this sword as prize.'
 As he drew it, something the count descried.

So Rollant felt his sword was taken forth,
 Opened his eyes, and this word to him spoke:
 'Thou'rt never one of ours, full well I know.' 355
 Took the olifant, that he would not let go,
 Struck him on th' helm, that jeweled was with gold,
 And broke its steel, his skull and all his bones,
 Out of his head both the two eyes he drove;
 Dead at his feet he has the pagan thrown: 360
 After he's said: 'Culvert, thou wert too bold,
 Or right or wrong, of my sword seizing hold!
 They'll dub thee fool, to whom the tale is told.
 But my great one, my olifant I broke;
 Fallen from it the crystal and the gold.' 365

Then Rollanz feels that he has lost his sight,
 Climbs to his feet, uses what strength he might;
 In all his face the color is grown white.

In front of him a great brown boulder lies;
 Whereon ten blows with grief and rage he strikes;
 The steel cries out, but does not break outright;
 And the count says: 'Saint Mary, be my guide!
 Good Durendal, unlucky is your plight!
 I've need of you no more; spent is my pride!
 We in the field have won so many fights,
 Combating through so many regions wide,
 That Charlès holds, whose beard is hoary white!
 Be you not his that turns from any in flight!
 A good vassal has held you this long time;
 Never shall France the Free behold his like.'

Rollant hath struck the sardonx terrace;
 The steel cries out, but broken is no ways.
 So when he sees he never can it break,
 Within himself begins he to complain:
 'Ah! Durendal, white art thou, clear of stain!
 Beneath the sun reflecting back his rays!
 In Moriane was Charlès, in the vale,
 When from heaven God by His angel bade
 Him give thee to a count and captain;
 Girt thee on me that noble King and great.
 I won for him with thee Anjou, Bretagne,
 And won for him with thee Peitou, the Maine,
 And Normandy the free for him I gained,
 Also with thee Provence and Equitaine,
 And Lombardie and all the whole Romaine,
 I won Baivere, all Flanders in the plain,
 Also Burguigne and all the whole Puillane,
 Costentinnople, that homage to him pays;
 In Saisonie all is as he ordains;
 With thee I won him Scotland, Ireland, Wales,
 England also, where he his chamber makes;
 Won I with thee so many countries strange
 That Charlès holds, whose beard is white with age!
 For this sword's sake sorrow upon me weighs,
 Rather I'd die, than it mid pagans stay.
 Lord God Father, never let France be shamed!

Rollant his stroke on a dark stone repeats,
 And more of it breaks off than I can speak.
 The sword cries out, yet breaks not in the least,
 Back from the blow into the air it leaps.
 Destroy it can he not; which when he sees,
 Within himself he makes a plaint most sweet:
 'Ah! Durendal, most holy, fair indeed!
 Relics enough thy golden hilt conceals:
 Saint Peter's Tooth, the Blood of Saint Basile,
 Some of the Hairs of my Lord, Saint Denise,
 Some of the Robe, was worn by Saint Mary.
 It is not right that pagans should thee seize,
 For Christian men your use shall ever be.
 Nor any man's that worketh cowardice!
 Many broad lands with you have I retrieved
 Which Charlès holds, who hath the great white beard;
 Wherefore that King so proud and rich is he?

But Rollant felt that death had made a way
 Down from his head till on his heart it lay; 425
 Beneath a pine running in haste he came,
 On the green grass he lay there on his face;
 His olifant and sword beneath him placed,
 Turning his head towards the pagan race,
 Now this he did, in truth, that Charles might say 430
 (As he desired) and all the Franks his race;—
 'Ah, gentle Count; conquering he was slain!'—
 He owned his faults often and every way,
 And for his sins his glove to God upraised.

AOI.

But Rollant feels he's no more time to seek; 435
 Looking to Spain, he lies on a sharp peak,
 And with one hand upon his breast he beats:
 'Mea Culpa! God, by Thy Virtues clean
 Me from my sins, the mortal and the mean,
 Which from the hour that I was born have been 440
 Until this day, when life is ended here!'
 Holds out his glove towards God, as he speaks;
 Angels descend from heaven on that scene.

AOI.

The Count Rollanz, beneath a pine he sits,
 Turning his eyes towards Spain, he begins 445
 Remembering so many divers things:
 So many lands where he went conquering,
 And France the Douce, the heroes of his kin,
 And Charlemagne, his lord who nourished him.
 Nor can he help but weep and sigh at this. 450
 But his own self, he's not forgotten him,
 He owns his faults, and God's forgiveness bids:
 'Very Father, in Whom no falsehood is,
 Saint Lazaron from death Thou didst remit,
 And Daniel save from the lions' pit; 455
 My soul in me preserve from all perils
 And from the sins I did in life commit!'
 His right-hand glove, to God he offers it,
 Saint Gabriel from 's hand hath taken it.
 Over his arm his head bows down and slips, 460
 He joins his hands: and so is life finished.
 God sent him down His angel cherubin,
 And Saint Michael, we worship in peril;
 And by their side Saint Gabriel alit;
 So the Count's soul they bare to Paradis. 465

Rollant is dead; his soul to heaven God bare.
 That Emperor to Rencesvals doth fare.
 There was no path nor passage anywhere
 Nor of waste ground no ell nor foot to spare
 Without a Frank or pagan lying there. 470
 Charles cries aloud: 'Where are you, nephew fair?
 Where's the Archbishop and that count Oliviers?
 Where is Gerins and his comrade Gerers?
 Otés the Duke, and the count Berengiers
 And Ivorie, and Ive, so dear they were? 475
 What is become of Gascon Engelier,

Sansun the Duke and Anséis the fierce?
 Where's old Gerard of Russillun; oh, where
 The dozen peers I left behind me here?
 But what avail, since none can answer bear? 480
 'God!' says the King, 'now well may I despair,
 I was not here the first assault to share!
 Seeming enraged, his beard the King doth tear.
 Weep from their eyes barons and chevaliers,
 A thousand score, they swoon upon the earth; 485
 Duke Neimes for them was moved with pity rare.

No chevalier nor baron is there, who
 Pitifully weeps not for grief and dule;
 They mourn their sons, their brothers, their nephews,
 And their liege lords, and trusty friends and true; 490
 Upon the ground a many of them swoon.
 Thereon Duke Neimes doth act with wisdom proof,
 First before all he's said to the Emperor:
 'See beforehand, a league from us or two,
 From the highways dust rising in our view; 495
 Pagans are there, and many of them, too.
 Canter therefore! Vengeance upon them do!
 'Ah, God!' says Charles, 'so far are they removed!
 Do right by me, my honor still renew!
 They've torn from me the flower of France the Douce.' 500
 The King commands Gebuin and Otun,
 Tedbalt of Reims, also the Count Milun:
 'Guard me this field, these hills and valleys too,
 Let the dead lie, all as they are, unmoved,
 Let not approach lion, nor any brute, 505
 Let not approach esquire, nor any groom;
 For I forbid that any come thereto,
 Until God will that we return anew.'
 These answer him sweetly, their love to prove:
 'Right Emperor, dear Sire, so will we do.' 510
 A thousand knights they keep in retinue.

AOL.

That Emperor bids trumpets sound again,
 Then canters forth with his great host so brave.
 Of Spanish men, whose backs are turned their way,
 Franks one and all continue in their chase. 515
 When the King sees the light at even fade,
 On the green grass dismounting as he may,
 He kneels aground, to God the Lord doth pray
 That the sun's course He will for him delay,
 Put off the night, and still prolong the day. 520
 An angel then, with him should reason make,
 Nimble enough appeared to him and spake:
 'Charles, canter on! Light needst not thou await.
 The flower of France, as God knows well, is slain;
 Thou canst be avenged upon that crimeful race.' 525
 Upon that word mounts the Emperor again.

AOL.

For Charlemagne a great marvel God planned:
 Making the sun still in his course to stand.

So pagans fled, and chased them well the Franks
 Through the Valley of Shadows, close in hand;
 Towards Sarrauce by force they chased them back,
 And as they went with killing blows attacked:
 Barred their highways and every path they had.
 The River Sebre before them reared its bank,
 'Twas very deep, marvelous current ran;
 No barge thereon nor dromond nor caland.
 A god of theirs invoked they, Tervagant.
 And then leaped in, but there no warrant had.
 The armed men more weighty were for that,
 Many of them down to the bottom sank,
 Downstream the rest floated as they might hap;
 So much water the luckiest of them drank,
 That all were drowned, with marvelous keen pangs.
 'An evil day,' cry Franks, 'ye saw Rollant!'

When Charlès sees that pagans all are dead,
 Some of them slain, the greater part drownèd;
 (Whereby great spoils his chevaliers collect)
 That gentle King upon his feet descends,
 Kneels on the ground, his thanks to God presents.
 When he once more rises, the sun is set.
 Says the Emperor: 'Time is to pitch our tents;
 To Rencesvals too late to go again.
 Our horses are worn out and foundered:
 Unsaddle them, take bridles from their heads,
 And through these meads let them refreshment get.'
 Answer the Franks: 'Sire, you have spoken well.'

AOL.

That Emperor hath chosen his bivouac;
 The Franks dismount in those deserted tracts,
 Their saddles take from off their horses' backs,
 Bridles of gold from off their heads unstrap,
 Let them go free; there is enough fresh grass—
 No service can they render them, save that.
 Who is most tired sleeps on the ground stretched flat.
 Upon this night no sentinels keep watch.

THE CID

'The Cid Campeador' ('Lord Champion') was a popular title given to a historical Castilian outlaw, Ruy Diaz, who was born at Bivar about 1040, married Jimena, King Alfonso's cousin, in 1074, was banished in 1081, and died in 1099; his embalmed body, after many adventures, found repose at last at Burgos, where it remains 'a show for tourists in a huge tea-caddy.' On his banishment he took refuge among the Moors of Spain and carved out for himself a small principality with the sword. His exploits were magnified in ballad and story, the earliest being 'The Poem of My Cid,' probably composed in 1207 and here quoted from the translation of John Ormsby; though somewhat lacking in polish, the original poem is considered one of the most spirited of the early romantic epics. The subject was given dramatic treatment by Guillem de Castro (1569-1631) and taken over from Spanish into French drama by Corneille. In the eighteenth century Herder introduced the story to German romance, and Southey made the Chronicle of the Cid familiar to nineteenth century England. Not much more in fact than a bold and successful freebooter, like the more familiar Robin Hood or Rob Roy, the Cid owes his fame principally to popular and imaginative literature. The incident recounted below belongs to an early stage of his career as an outlaw.

THE CID'S GENEROSITY TO A BEATEN FOE

The Count of Barcelona, when the tidings met his ear
How that my Cid Ruy Diaz made forays far and near,
And laid the country waste, with wrath his inmost soul was stirred,
And in his anger hastily he spake a braggart word—
'He cometh to insult me, doth my Cid, he of Bivar. 5
Up to my very court, methinks, he means to carry war.
My nephew he hath wronged; the wrong remaineth unrepaired:
And now the lands that I protect to harry hath he dared.
No challenge have I sent to him, nor sought him for my foe;
But now I call him to account, since he will have it so.' 10
Great mustering there is of Moors and Christians through the land,
A mighty host of men-at-arms he hath at his command.
Two days, three nights, they march to seek the Good One of Bivar,
To snare him where he harbors in the Pine-wood of Tebar;
And such the speed of their advance, that, cumbered with his spoils, 15
And unaware, my Cid well nigh was taken in the toils.
The tidings reached my Cid as down the sierra side he went,
Then straightway to Count Raymond he a friendly message sent:
'Say to the Count that he, meseems, to me no grudge doth owe:
Of him I take no spoil, with him in peace I fain would go.' 20
'Nay,' said the Count, 'for all his deeds he hath to make amends:
This outlaw must be made to know whose honor he offends.'
With utmost speed the messenger Count Raymond's answer brought;
Then of a surety knew my Cid a battle must be fought.
'Now, cavaliers,' quoth he, 'make safe the booty we have won. 25
Look to your weapons, gentlemen; with speed your armor don.
On battle bent Count Raymond comes; a mighty host hath he
Of Moors and Christians; fight we must if hence we would go free.
Here let us fight the battle out, since fight we must perforce.
On with your harness, cavaliers, quick! saddle, and to horse! 30

Yonder they come, the linen breeks, all down the mountain side,
 For saddles they have Moorish pads, with slackened girths they ride:
 Our saddles are Galician make, our leggings tough and stout:
 A hundred of us gentlemen should scatter such a rout.
 Before they gain the level plain, home with the lance charge we, 35
 And then, for every blow we strike, we empty saddles three.
 Count Raymond Berenger shall know with whom he has to do;
 And dearly in Tebar today his raid on me shall rue.
 In serried squadron while he speaks they form around my Cid.
 Each grasps his lance, and firm and square each sits upon his steed. 40
 Over against them down the hill they watch the Franks descend,
 On to the level ground below, where plain and mountain blend.
 Then gives my Cid the word to charge—with a good will they go:
 Fast ply the lances; some they pierce, and some they overthrow.
 And he that in good hour was born soon hath he won the field;
 And the Count Raymond Berenger he hath compelled to yield; 45
 And reaping honor for his beard a noble prize hath made,
 A thousand marks of silver worth, the great Colada blade.
 Unto his quarters under guard the captive Count he sent,
 While his men haste to gather in their spoils in high content. 50
 Then for my Cid Don Roderick a banquet they prepare;
 But little doth Count Raymond now for feast or banquet care.
 They bring him meat and drink, but he repels them with disdain.
 'No morsel will I touch,' said he, 'for all the wealth of Spain.
 Let soul and body perish now; life why should I prolong, 55
 Conquered and captive at the hands of such an ill-breeched throng?'
 'Nay,' said my Cid, 'take bread and wine; eat, and thou goest free;
 If not, thy realms in Christendom thou never more shalt see.'
 'Go thou, Don Roderick,' said the Count, 'eat if thou wilt, but I Have no more lust for meat or drink: I only crave to die.' 60
 Three days, while they the booty share, for all that they entreat,
 The Count his purpose holds unchanged, refusing still to eat.
 Then said my Cid, 'I pray thee, Count, take food and trust to me;
 Thyself and two knights of thy train I promise to set free.'
 Glad was Count Raymond in his heart when he the promise heard— 65
 'A marvel that will be, my Cid, if thou dost keep thy word.'
 'Then, Count, take food, and when I see thy hunger satisfied,
 My word is pledged to let thee go, thyself and two beside.
 But understand, one farthing's worth I render not again
 Of what has been in battle lost and won on yonder plain. 70
 I give not back the lawful spoils I fairly win in fight;
 But for mine own and vassals' wants I hold them as my right.
 My followers are needy men; I cannot if I would;
 For spoil from thee and others won is all our livelihood.
 And such, while God's good will it is, must be our daily life, 75
 As outcasts forced to wander, with an angry king at strife.'
 With lighter heart Count Raymond called for water for his hands,
 And then with his two gentlemen, sent by the Cid's commands,
 He blithely sat him down to meat: God! with what gust ate he!
 And glad was the Campeador such heartiness to see. 80
 Quoth he, 'Until thou eat thy fill we part not, Count, today.'
 'Nor loth am I,' Count Raymond said, 'such bidding to obey.'
 So he and his two cavaliers a hearty meal they made:
 It pleased my Cid to watch his hands, how lustily they played.
 'Now, if thou wilt,' Count Raymond said, 'that we are satisfied, 85 Bid them to lead the horses forth, that we may mount and ride.
 Never since I have been a Count have I yet broken fast
 With such a relish; long shall I remember this repast.'

Three palfreys with caparisons of costly sort they bring,
And on the saddles robes of fur and mantles rich they fling. 90
Thus, with a knight on either hand, away Count Raymond rides;
While to the outposts of the camp his guests the Champion guides,
'Now speed thee, Count; ride on,' quoth he, 'a free Frank as thou art.
For the brave spoil thou leavest me I thank thee from my heart;
And if to win it back again perchance thou hast a mind, 95
Come thou and seek me when thou wilt; I am not far to find.
But if it be not to thy taste to try another day,
Still somewhat, be it mine or thine, thou carriest away.'
'Nay! go in peace for me, my Cid: no more I seek of thee;
And thou, I think, for one year's space hast won enough of me.' 100
He spurred his steed, but, as he rode, a backward glance he bent,
Still fearing to the last my Cid his promise would repent:
A thing, the world itself to win, my Cid would not have done:
No perfidy was ever found in him, the Perfect One.

AUCASSIN AND NICOLETTE

The Chansons de geste (songs of doughty deeds) dealt mainly with war and feats of arms and were sung to audiences largely composed of men, by whom they were taken, if not literally, at any rate seriously. For my lady, who demanded more fanciful stories, of love rather than of war, there were romans, long tales written in rhymed couplets, to be read, not sung. The 'matter' of these tales was taken from very various sources, and assumed different shapes in different hands, spreading from France to England on the one hand, and to Germany and Italy on the other. From them we get such famous romantic lovers as Troilus and Cressida, Lancelot and Guinevere, Tristram and Iseult, whose originals come, the first two from Latin translations of Greek romances, the last four probably from Celtic sources. An Oriental tale seems to have furnished the plot of the charming Aucassin et Nicolette, a French romance partly in prose, partly in verse, of which a few pages are given below, from the translation of Andrew Lang. The author who invented this mixed form, called cante-fable, lived, so Gaston Paris thought, in the first half of the twelfth century. Nicolette, the heroine of the story, is a slave girl bought from the Saracens, and it is only at the end that the author lets us know that she is the daughter of the King of Carthage, stolen away from him in early childhood. Aucassin is the son and heir of Count Garin de Biaucaire, who, in ignorance of her high lineage, puts every possible obstacle in the way of the young people's happiness.

HOW AUCASSIN ESCAPED FROM PRISON

Aucassin was cast into prison as ye have heard tell, and Nicolette, of her part, was in the chamber. Now it was summer time, the month of May, when days are warm and long and clear, and the night still and serene. Nicolette lay one night on her bed, and saw the moon shine clear through a window, yea, and heard the nightingale sing in the garden, so she minded her of Aucassin her lover whom she loved so well. Then fell she to thoughts of Count Garin de Biaucaire, that hated her to the death; therefore deemed she that there she would no longer abide, for that, if she were told of, and the Count knew whereas she lay, an ill death would he make her die. Now she knew that the old woman slept who held her company. Then she arose, and clad her in a mantle of silk she had by her, very goodly, and took napkins, and sheets of the bed, and knotted one to the other, and made therewith a cord as long as she might, so knitted it to a pillar in the window, and let herself slip down into the garden, then caught up her raiment in both hands, behind and before, and kilted up her kirtle, because of the dew that she saw lying deep on the grass, and so went her way down through the garden.

Her locks were yellow and curled, her eyes blue and smiling, her face featly fashioned, the nose high and fairly set, the lips more red than cherry or rose in time of summer, her teeth white and small; her breasts so firm that they bore up the folds of bodice as they had been two apples; so slim she was in the waist that your two hands might have clipped her, and the daisy flowers that brake beneath her as she went tip-toe, and that bent above her instep, seemed black against her feet, so white was the maiden. She came to the postern gate, and unbarred it, and went out through the streets of Biaucaire, keeping always on the shadowy side, for the moon was shining right clear, and so wandered she till she came to the tower where her lover lay. The tower was flanked with buttresses, and she cowered under one of them, wrapped in her mantle. Then thrust she her head through a crevice of the tower that was old and worn, and so heard she Aucassin wailing within, and making dole and lament for the sweet lady he loved so well. And when she had listened to him she began to say:

Here one singeth:

Nicolette, the bright of brow,
 On a pillar leanest thou,
 All Aucassin's wail dost hear
 For his love that is so dear.
 Then thou spakest, shrill and clear,
 'Gentle knight withouten fear
 Little good befalleth thee,
 Little help of sigh or tear,
 Ne'er shalt thou have joy of me
 Never shalt thou win me; still Am I held in evil will
 Of thy father and thy kin,
 Therefore must I cross the sea,
 And another land must win.'
 Then she cut her curls of gold,
 Cast them in the dungeon hold,
 Aucassin doth clasp them there,
 Kissed the curls that were so fair,
 Them doth in his bosom bear,
 Then he wept, even as of old,
 All for his love!

Then say they, speak they, tell they the Tale:

When Aucassin heard Nicolette say that she would pass into a far country, he was all in wrath.

'Fair sweet friend,' quoth he, 'thou shalt not go, for then wouldst thou be my death. 25 And the first man that saw thee and had the might withal, would take thee straightway into his bed to be his leman. And once thou camest into a man's bed, and that bed not mine, wit ye well that I would not tarry till I had found a knife to pierce my breast and slay myself. Nay, verily, wait so long I would not: but would hurl myself on it so soon as I could find a wall, or a black stone, thereon would I dash my head so mightily, that the eyes would start, and my brain burst. Rather would I die even such a death than know thou hadst lain in a man's bed, and that bed not mine.'

'Aucassin,' she said, 'I trow thou lovest 40 me not as much as thou sayest, but I love thee more than thou lovest me.'

'Ah, fair sweet friend,' said Aucassin, 'it may not be that thou shouldst love me even as I love thee. Woman may not love 45 man as man loves woman, for a woman's love lies in the glance of her eye, and the bud of her breast, and her foot's tip-toe, but the love of man is in his heart planted, whence it can never issue forth and pass 50 away.'

Now while Aucassin and Nicolette held this parley together, the town's guards came down a street, with swords drawn beneath their cloaks, for the Count Garin 55 had charged them that if they could take her they should slay her. But the sentinel that was on the tower saw them coming, and heard them speaking of Nicolette as they went, and threatening to slay her.

'God!' quoth he, 'this were great pity to slay so fair a maid! Right great charity 5 it were if I could say aught to her, and they perceive it not, and she should be on her guard against them, for if they slay her, then were Aucassin, my damoiseau, dead, and that were great pity.'

10 Here one singeth:

Valiant was the sentinel,
 Courteous, kind, and practised well,
 So a song did sing and tell
 Of the peril that befell.

15 'Maiden fair that lingerest here,
 Gentle maid of merry cheer,
 Hair of gold, and eyes as clear
 As the water in a mere,
 Thou, meseems, hast spoken word
 To thy lover and thy lord,
 20 That would die for thee, his dear;
 Now beware the ill accord,
 Of the cloaked men of the sword,
 These have sworn and keep their word,
 They will put thee to the sword
 Save thou take heed!'

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

'Ha!' quoth Nicolette, 'be the soul of thy father and the soul of thy mother in the rest of Paradise, so fairly and so courteously hast thou spoken me! Please God, I will be right ware of them, God keep me out of their hands.'

So she shrank under her mantle into the shadow of the pillar till they had passed by, and then took she farewell of Aucassin, and so fared till she came unto the castle wall. Now that wall was wasted and broken, and some deal mended, so she clomb thereon till she came down between wall and fosse, and so looked down, and saw that the fosse was deep and steep, whereat she was sore adread.

'Ah, God,' saith she, 'sweet Savior! If 45 I let myself fall hence, I shall break my neck, and if here I abide, tomorrow they will take me, and burn me in a fire. Yet liefer would I perish here than that tomorrow the folk should stare on me for a gazing-stock.'

Then she crossed herself, and so let herself slip into the fosse, and when she had come to the bottom, her fair feet and fair hands that had not custom thereof 55 were bruised and frayed, and the blood springing from a dozen places, yet felt she no pain nor hurt, by reason of the great dread wherein she went. But if she were in cumber to win there, in worse was she to win out. But she deemed that there to abide was of none avail, and she found a pike sharpened, that they of the city had thrown out to keep the hold. Therewith made she one stepping place after another, till, with much travail, she climbed the wall. Now the forest lay within two cross-bow shots, and the forest was of thirty leagues this way and that. Therein also 10 were wild beasts, and beasts serpentine, and she feared that if she entered there they would slay her. But anon she deemed that if men found her there they would hale her back into the town to burn her. 15

Here one singeth:

Nicolette, the fair of face,
Climbed upon the coping stone,
There made she lament and moan
Calling on our Lord alone
For his mercy and his grace.

'Father, king of Majesty,
Listen for I nothing know
Where to flee or whither go.
If within the wood I fare,
Lo, the wolves will slay me there,
Boars and lions terrible,
Many in the wild wood dwell;
But if I abide the day,
Surely worse will come of it,
Surely will the fire be lit
That shall burn my body away.
Jesus, lord of Majesty,
Better seemeth it to me,
That within the wood I fare,
Though the wolves devour me there
Than within the town to go,
Ne'er be it so!'

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

Nicolette made great moan, as ye have heard; then commended she herself to God, and anon fared till she came unto the forest. But to go deep in it she dared not, by reason of the wild beasts and beasts serpentine. Anon crept she into a little thicket, where sleep came upon her, and she 45 slept till prime next day, when the shepherds issued forth from the town and drove their bestial between wood and water. Anon came they all into one place by a fair fountain which was on the fringe of the forest, thereby spread they a mantle, and thereon set bread. So while they were eating, Nicolette wakened, with the sound of the singing birds, and the shepherds, and she went unto them, saying, 'Fair boys, 50 our Lord keep you!'

'God bless thee,' quoth he that had more words to his tongue than the rest,

'Fair boys,' quoth she, 'know ye Aucassin, the son of Count Garin de Biaucaire?'

'Yea, well we know him.'

'So may God help you, fair boys,' quoth 5 she, 'tell him there is a beast in this forest, and bid him come chase it, and if he can take it, he would not give one limb thereof for a hundred marks of gold, nay, nor five hundred, nor for any ransom.'

Then looked they on her, and saw her so fair that they were all astonished.

'Will I tell him thereof?' quoth he that had more words to his tongue than the rest; 'foul fall him who speaks of the thing or 15 tells him the tidings. These are but visions ye tell of, for there is no beast so great in this forest, stag, nor lion, nor boar, that one of his limbs is worth more than two deniers, or three at the most, and ye speak 20 of such great ransom. Foul fall him that believes your word, and him that telleth Aucassin. Ye be a Fairy, and we have none liking for your company; nay, hold on your road.'

'Nay, fair boys,' quoth she, 'nay, ye will do my bidding. For this beast is so mighty of medicine that thereby will Aucassin be healed of his torment. And lo! I have five sols in my purse, take them, and 30 tell him; for within three days must he come hunting it hither, and if within three days he find it not, never will he be healed of his torment.'

'My faith,' quoth he, 'the money will we 35 take, and if he come hither we will tell him, but seek him we will not.'

'In God's name,' quoth she; and so took farewell of the shepherds, and went her way.

Here singeth one:

Nicolette, the bright of brow,
From the shepherds doth she pass
All below the blossomed bough
Where an ancient way there was,
Overgrown and choked with grass,
Till she found the cross-roads where
Seven paths do all way fare,
Then she deemeth she will try,
Should her lover pass thereby,
If he love her loyally.
So she gathered white lilies,
Oak-leaf, that in green wood is,
Leaves of many a branch I wis,
Therewith built a lodge of green,
Goodlier was never seen,
Swore by God who may not lie,
'If my love the lodge should spy,
He will rest awhile thereby
If he love me loyally.'
Thus his faith she deemed to try,
'Or I love him not, not I,
Nor he loves me.'

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

Nicolette built her lodge of boughs, as ye have heard, right fair and feteously, and wove it well, within and without, of flowers and leaves. So lay she hard by the lodge in a deep coppice to know what Aucassin will do. And the cry and the bruit went abroad through the country and all the land, that Nicolette was lost. Some told that she had fled, and some that the Count Garin had let slay her. Whosoever had joy thereof, no joy had Aucassin. And the Count Garin, his father, had taken him out of prison, and had sent for the knights of that land, and the ladies, and let make a right great feast, for the comforting of Aucassin his son. Now at the high time of the feast, was Aucassin leaning from a gallery all woeful and discomforted. Whatsoever men might devise of mirth, Aucassin had no joy thereof, nor no desire, for he saw not her that he loved. Then a knight looked on him, and came to him, and said:

'Aucassin, of that sickness of thine have I been sick, and good counsel will I give thee, if thou wilt hearken to me—'

'Sir,' said Aucassin, 'gramercy, good counsel would I fain hear.'

'Mount thy horse,' quoth he, 'and go take thy pastime in yonder forest, there wilt thou see the good flowers and grass, and hear the sweet birds sing. Perchance thou shalt hear some word, whereby thou shalt be the better.'

'Sir,' quoth Aucassin, 'gramercy, that will I do.'

He passed out of the hall, and went down the stairs, and came to the stable where his horse was. He let saddle and bridle him, and mounted, and rode forth from the castle, and wandered till he came to the forest, so rode till he came to the fountain and found the shepherds at point of noon. And they had a mantle stretched on the grass, and were eating bread, and making great joy.

Here one singeth:

There were gathered shepherds all,
Martin, Esmeric, and Hal,
Aubrey, Robin, great and small.
Saith the one, 'Good fellows all,
God keep Aucassin the fair,
And the maid with yellow hair,
Bright of brow and eyes of vair
She that gave us gold to ware,
Cakes therewith to buy ye know,
Goodly knives and sheaths also.

Flutes to play, and pipes to blow,
May God him heal!'

When Aucassin heard the shepherds, anon he bethought him of Nicolette, his sweet lady he loved so well, and he deemed that she had passed thereby; then set he spurs to his horse, and so came to the shepherds.

'Fair boys, God be with you.'

'God bless you,' quoth he that had more words to his tongue than the rest.

'Fair boys,' quoth Aucassin, 'say the song again that anon ye sang.'

'Say it we will not,' quoth he that had more words to his tongue than the rest; 'foul fall him who will sing it again for you, fair sir!'

'Fair boys,' quoth Aucassin, 'know ye me not?'

'Yea, we know well that you are Aucassin, our damoiseau, natheless we be not your men, but the Count's.'

'Fair boys, yet sing it again, I pray you.'

'Hearken! by the Holy Heart,' quoth he, 'wherefore should I sing for you, if it likes me not? Lo, there is no such rich man in this country, saving the body of Garin the Count, that dare drive forth my oxen, or my cows, or my sheep, if he finds them in his fields, or his corn, lest he lose his eyes for it, and wherefore should I sing to you, if it likes me not?'

'God be your aid, fair boys, sing it ye will, and take ye these ten sols I have here in a purse.'

'Sir, the money will we take, but never a note will I sing, for I have given my oath, but I will tell thee a plain tale, if thou wilt.'

'By God,' saith Aucassin, 'I love a plain tale better than naught.'

'Sir, we were in this place, a little time ago, between prime and tierce, and were eating our bread by this fountain, even as now we do, and a maid came past, the fairest thing in the world, whereby we deemed that she should be a fay, and all the wood shone round about her. Anon she gave us of that she had, whereby we made covenant with her, that if ye came hither we would bid you hunt in this forest, wherein is such a beast that, an ye might take him, ye would not give one limb of him for five hundred marks of silver, nor for no ransom; for this beast is so mighty of medicine, that, an ye could take him, ye should be healed of your torment, and within three days must ye take him, and if ye take him not then, never will ye look on him. So chase ye the beast, an ye will, or an ye will let be, for my promise have I kept with her.'

'Fair boys,' quoth Aucassin, 'ye have said enough. God grant me to find this quarry.'

Here one singeth:

Aucassin, when he had heard,
Sore within his heart was stirred,
Left the shepherds on that word,
Far into the forest spurred;
Rode into the wood; and fleet
Fled his horse through paths of it,
Three words spake he of his sweet,
'Nicolette the fair, the dear,
'Tis for thee I follow here
Track of boar, nor slot of deer,
But thy sweet body and eyes so clear,
All thy mirth and merry cheer,
That my very heart have slain,
So please God to me maintain
I shall see my love again,
Sweet sister, friend.'

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

Aucassin fared through the forest from path to path after Nicolette, and his horse bare him furiously. Think ye not that the thorns him spared, nor the briars, nay, not so, but tare his raiment, that scarce a knot might be tied with the soundest part thereof, and the blood sprang from his arms, and flanks, and legs, in forty places, or thirty, so that behind the Childe men might follow on the track of his blood in the grass. But so much he went in thoughts of Nicolette, his lady sweet, that he felt no pain nor torment, and all the day hurled through the forest in this fashion nor heard no word of her. And when he saw Vespers draw nigh, he began to weep for that he found her not. All down an old road, the grassgrown, he fared, when anon, looking along the way before him, he saw such an one as I shall tell you. Tall was he and great of growth, laidly and marvelous to look upon: his head huge, and black as charcoal, and more than the breadth of a hand between his two eyes, and great cheeks, and a big nose and broad, big nostrils and ugly, and thick lips redder than a collop, and great teeth yellow and ugly, and he was shod with hosen and shoon of bull's hide, bound with cords of bark over the knee, and all about him a great cloak twy-fold, and he leaned on a grievous cudgel, and Aucassin came unto him, and was afraid when he beheld him.

'Fair brother, God aid thee.'

'God bless you,' quoth he.

'As God he helpeth thee, what makest thou here?'

5 'What is that to thee?'

'Nay, naught, naught,' said Aucassin;

'I ask but out of courtesy.'

'But for whom weepest thou,' quoth he, 'and makest such heavy lament? Certes, were I as rich a man as thou, the whole world should not make me weep.'

'Ha, know ye me?' saith Aucassin.

'Yea, I know well that ye be Aucassin, the son of the Count, and if ye tell me for 15 why ye weep, then will I tell you what I make here.'

'Certes,' quoth Aucassin, 'I will tell you right gladly. Hither came I this morning to hunt in this forest; and with me a white 20 hound, the fairest in the world; him have I lost, and for him I weep.'

'By the Heart our Lord bare in his breast,' quoth he, 'are ye weeping for a stinking hound? Foul fall him that holds thee 25 high henceforth! for there is no such rich man in the land, but if thy father asked it of him, he would give thee ten, or fifteen, or twenty, and be the gladder for it. But I have cause to weep and make dole.'

'Wherefore so, brother?'

'Sir, I will tell thee. I was hireling to a rich villain, and drove his plow; four oxen had he. But three days since came on me great misadventure, whereby I lost the best of mine oxen, Roger, the best of my team. Him go I seeking, and have neither eaten nor drunken these three days, nor may I go to the town, lest they cast me into prison, seeing that I have not 40 wherewithal to pay. Out of all the wealth of the world have I no more than ye see on my body. A poor mother bare me, that had no more but one wretched bed; this have they taken from under her, and she lies in the very straw. This ails me more than mine own case, for wealth comes and goes; if now I have lost, another tide will I gain, and will pay for mine ox whenas I may; never for that will I weep. But you weep for a stinking hound. Foul fall whoso thinks well of thee!'

'Certes thou art a good comforter, 55 brother, blessed be thou! And of what price was thine ox?'

'Sir, they ask me twenty sols for him, whereof I cannot abate one doit.'

'Nay, then,' quoth Aucassin, 'take these twenty sols I have in my purse, and pay for thine ox.'

'Sir,' saith he, 'gramercy. And God give thee to find that thou seekest.'

So they parted each from other, and Aucassin rode on; the night was fair and still, and so long he went that he came to the lodge of boughs, that Nicolette had builded and woven within and without, 10 over and under, with flowers, and it was the fairest lodge that might be seen. When Aucassin was ware of it, he stopped suddenly and the light of the moon fell therein. 15

'God,' quoth Aucassin, 'here was Nicolette, my sweet lady, and this lodge builded she with her fair hands. For the sweetness of it, and for love of her, will I alight, and rest here this night long.'

He drew forth his foot from the stirrup to alight, and the steed was great and tall. He dreamed so much on Nicolette his right sweet lady, that he slipped on a stone, and drave his shoulder out of its place. 25 Then knew he that he was hurt sore, natheless he bore him with what force he might, and fastened with the other hand the mare's son to a thorn. Then turned he on his side, and crept backwise into the 30 lodge of boughs. And he looked through a gap in the lodge and saw the stars in heaven, and one that was brighter than the rest; so began he to say:

Here one singeth:

'Star, that I from far behold,
Star, the Moon calls to her fold,
Nicolette with thee doth dwell,
My sweet love with locks of gold,
God would have her dwell afar,
Dwell with him for evening star,
Would to God, whate'er befell,
Would that with her I might dwell,
I would clip her close and strait,
Nay, were I of much estate,
Some king's son desirable,
Worthy she to be my mate,
Me to kiss and clip me well,
Sister, sweet friend.'

So speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

When Nicolette heard Aucassin, right so came she unto him, for she was not far away. She passed within the lodge, and threw her arms about his neck, and clipped and kissed him.

'Fair sweet friend, welcome be thou.'

'And thou, fair sweet love, be thou welcome.'

So either kissed and clipped the other, and fair joy was them between.

'Ha! sweet love,' quoth Aucassin, 'but now was I sore hurt, and my shoulder 5 wried, but I take no force of it, nor have no hurt therefrom since I have thee.'

Right so felt she his shoulder and found it was wried from its place. And she so handled it with her white hands, and so wrought in her surgery, that by God's will who loveth lovers, it went back into its place. Then took she flowers, and fresh grass, and leaves green, and bound these herbs on the hurt with a strip of her 15 smock, and he was all healed.

'Aucassin,' saith she, 'fair sweet love, take counsel what thou wilt do. If thy father let search this forest tomorrow, and men find me here, they will slay me, come 20 to thee what will.'

'Certes, fair sweet love, therefore should I sorrow heavily, but, an if I may, never shall they take thee.'

Anon gat he on his horse, and his lady before him, kissing and clipping her, and so rode they at adventure.

Here one singeth:

Aucassin, the frank, the fair,
Aucassin of the yellow hair,
Gentle knight, and true lover,
From the forest doth he fare,
Holds his love before him there,
Kissing cheek, and chin, and eyes,
But she spake in sober wise,
'Aucassin, true love and fair,
To what land do we repair?' 40
'Sweet my love, I take no care,
Thou art with me everywhere!
So they pass the woods and downs,
Pass the villages and towns,
Hills and dales and open land,
Came at dawn to the sea sand,
Lighted down upon the strand,
Beside the sea.

Then say they, speak they, tell they the Tale:

Aucassin lighted down and his love, as 45 ye have heard sing. He held his horse by the bridle, and his lady by the hands; so went they along the sea-shore, and on the sea they saw a ship, and he called unto the 50 sailors, and they came to him. Then held he such speech with them, that he and his lady were brought aboard that ship, and when they were on the high sea, behold a mighty wind and tyrannous arose, marvelous and great, and drave them from 55 land to land, till they came unto a strange country, and won the haven of the castle of Torelore.

FURTHER ADVENTURES OF NICOLETTE

Aucassin dwelt in the castle of Torelore, 5 in great ease and great delight, for that he had with him Nicolette his sweet love, whom he loved so well. Now while he was in such pleasure and such delight, came a troop of Saracens by sea, and laid siege to 10
the castle and took it by main strength.
Anon took they the substance that was therein and carried off the men and maidens captives. They seized Nicolette and Aucas-sin, and bound Aucassin hand and foot, and 15 cast him into one ship, and Nicolette into another. Then rose there a mighty wind over sea, and scattered the ships. Now that ship wherein was Aucassin went wandering on the sea, till it came to the castle of Biaucaire, and the folk of the country ran together to wreck her, and there found they Aucassin, and they knew him again.

So when they of Biaucaire saw their 25
damoiseau, they made great joy of him, for Aucassin had dwelt full three years in the castle of Torelore, and his father and mother were dead. So the people took him to the castle of Biaucaire, and there 30 were they all his men. And he held the land in peace.

Now leave we Aucassin, and speak we of Nicolette. The ship wherein she was cast pertained to the King of Carthage, 35 and he was her father, and she had twelve brothers, all princes or kings. When they beheld Nicolette, how fair she was, they did her great worship, and made much joy of her, and many times asked her who she 40 was, for surely seemed she a lady of noble line and high parentry. But she might not tell them of her lineage, for she was but a child when men stole her away. So sailed they till they won the City of 45 Carthage, and when Nicolette saw the walls of the castle, and the country-side, she knew that there had she been nourished and thence stolen away, being but a child.
Yet was she not so young a child but that 50 well she knew she had been daughter of the King of Carthage; and of her nurture in that city.

Here singeth one:

Nicolette, the good and true,
To the land hath come anew,
Sees the palaces and walls,
And the houses and the halls!
Then she spake and said, 'Alas!
That of birth so great I was,
Cousin of the Amiral
And the very child of him
Carthage counts King of Paynim,
Wild folk hold me here withal;
Nay, Aucassin, love of thee
Gentle knight, and true, and free,
Burns and wastes the heart of me.
Ah God grant it of his grace,
That thou hold me, and embrace,
That thou kiss me on the face,
Love and lord!'

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

When the King of Carthage heard Nicolette speak in this wise, he cast his arms about her neck.

20 'Fair sweet love,' saith he, 'tell me who thou art, and be not adread of me.'

'Sir,' said she, 'I am the daughter to the King of Carthage, and was taken, being then a little child, it is now fifteen years gone.'

When all they of the court heard her speak thus, they knew well that she spake sooth: so made they great joy of her, and led her to the castle in great honor, as the King's daughter. And they would have given her to her lord a king of Paynim, but she had no mind to marry. There dwelt she three days or four. And she considered by what means she might seek for Aucassin. Then she got her a viol, 35 and learned to play on it, till they would have married her on a day to a great king of Paynim, and she stole forth by night, and came to the seaport, and dwelt with a poor woman thereby. Then took she a 40 certain herb, and therewith smeared her head and her face, till she was all brown and stained. And she let make coat, and mantle, and smock, and hose, and attired herself as if she had been a harper. So took she the viol and went to a mariner, and so wrought on him that he took her aboard his vessel. Then hoisted they sail, and fared on the high seas even till they came to the land of Provence. And Nicolette went forth and took the viol, and went playing through all that country, even till she came to the castle of Biaucaire, where Aucassin lay.

THE REVIVAL OF LEARNING

THE REVIVAL OF LEARNING

The change from what it was once the fashion to call the 'dark' ages to the era of progress was a very gradual one, beginning and developing at different rates in different places at different times. The earlier age was not altogether dark, but it was static, endeavoring not so much to add to the achievements of the past as to maintain, as far as possible, what had been already gained. Even this humbler endeavor, as we have seen, was not entirely successful, owing to the disorder of the time and its consequent poverty and misery. A beginning of the organization of order in the West was made by the crowning of Charlemagne as Emperor in 800 A.D., and the growing power of the Papacy also helped to extend the exercise of authority over the wide field in which the Church claimed jurisdiction. But the two powers soon clashed, and in the Italian cities, in which the strife became most intense, the partisans of the Pope came to be known as Guelfs, those of the Emperor as Ghibellines. These factions were often bitter and destructive, but they were part of a vigorous city life, in which the static element gave place to the modern desire for progress.

It was natural that the first effort should be directed to the recovery and restoration of the art and literature of the past which had been in some measure lost, but once the mind of man begins to move, it does not content itself merely with recovering lost treasures; it goes on to create treasures of its own. It was inevitable that the process of recovery should begin in Italy, where these treasures of the past were most easily attainable, and that here too should arise the impulse to new achievements. As the growth of wealth made the cities more powerful and independent, their pride and ambition found expression in the erection of great municipal buildings, cathedrals and churches, and the adornment of these with pictures and statuary.

The development of a new and original literature came more slowly. It has been associated with the organization of the universities in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries at Bologna in Italy and at Paris in France, followed by that of Oxford in England. But these new opportunities for learning, at once the cause and consequence of a new zeal for knowledge, were merely elements in a new soaring of the human spirit, a new desire to express life in art and literature, life as it was being lived at the time, not merely to set forth how it had been lived in the past.

The dramatic instinct, which had already made a new beginning in connection with the sacred legends of the Church, took a more regular form, first through the representation of Latin tragedies and comedies in the original tongue, then by the translation and adaptation of these to contemporary life, finally by the composition of original dramas for stage production. The study of Latin historians prompted men to write histories of their own time after the classical model. Philosophy, hitherto regarded merely as the handmaid of theology, slowly established its right to an independent position. Science developed still more slowly; but it made a beginning, especially in the work of Roger Bacon at Oxford. It was in poetry and fiction that the greatest and most immediate advances were made; these, as we have seen, had never lost their hold on the popular mind, and the study of classical examples simply gave new stimulus and new forms to a mode of expression that was already familiar.

In poetry the Provençal troubadours, with their songs of love, took the lead before the end of the eleventh century, and one of them, Pierre Vidal of Toulouse, who accompanied Richard Cœur de Lion on the third Crusade in 1190, declared Provençal to be 'the only true language of poetry.' Frederic II, who resided in Sicily until he became Emperor in 1212, made Italian the language of his court, but Sordello, who was born near Mantua, was writing ballads up to the middle of the thirteenth century in Provençal. Brunetto Latini, the teacher of Dante, wrote the Tesoro about the same time in French, and Dante speaks of fourteen dialects of Italian in use in his time. It was indeed Dante himself who elevated Tuscan to the rank of a literary standard which has prevailed from that day to this to such a degree that his language is still easily understood by the common people and is not far removed from literary Italian of the present time—about as near to it, in fact, as the language of Shakespeare and the Bible is to modern English.

Dante is in the first place a poet for whom the modern reader is not called upon to make any allowance or excuse; successive translators—some of them excellent poets—have striven in vain to reproduce the charm, variety, and beauty of his verse when read in the original Italian. The interlaced rhymes of the Divine Comedy follow a simple pattern, but Dante was enough of a metrical artist to use this medium (terza rima, which he himself invented) for the fitting expression of every height and depth of emotion, from the gentlest sympathy and the keenest admiration to the sternest indignation and the bitterest satire. He can pass from a charming description of a scene of quiet natural beauty to the exposition of the highest themes in philosophy or theology.

In the second place Dante presents to us a personality whose private fortunes and opinions on public questions have made a distinct impression on following generations. His portrait in the Bargello is sought out by many visitors to Florence who are unaware of the difference between Guelfs and Ghibellines, Blacks and Whites, but who know that Dante died in exile and left behind him indelible pictures of the people of whom he disapproved. The turbulent factions of medieval Florence and the ardent, often bitter, spirit of its municipal life have through Dante's pen won for themselves a vague remembrance in the memory of mankind. His political career was, as a matter of fact, exceedingly short. Born in 1265, it was not till 1300 that he rose to the highest office in his native city, acting for two months as one of the six Priors who governed Florence. He held minor offices in 1301, but in that year the White party, with which he was identified, was overthrown, and in the January following he was driven into exile. Leaving his wife and family at Florence, he became a wanderer from one court to another willing to give him refuge, and died in 1321 at Ravenna, whose lord was a nephew of Francesca da Rimini, immortalised in the beautiful lines which are translated below.

Before he left Florence Dante had put forth the Vita Nuova, an account partly in verse, partly in prose, of his mystical love for a young girl named Beatrice, who in the Divine Comedy becomes a symbolic figure signifying the revelation of divine wisdom and love. Soon after his exile he wrote five books of a philosophical treatise—the Convivio or Banquet—explaining allegorically certain poems which to a superficial observer might seem merely love lyrics. He wrote also a Latin treatise on poetic composition in the vulgar tongue, De Volgari Eloquentia, and another Latin treatise, De Monarchia, in which he sets forth his ideas on government. But the world will always associate his name chiefly with the great work of his later life, the Commedia, which, as Carlyle says, all men have called Divine.

Another important aspect of this great poem is that it is an epitome of the knowledge of the time and presents in a form of chiseled beauty the medieval view of this world as a place of preparation for a better life to come. Dante's conception of the universe has given way to other views through the discoveries of modern science, but the ideas which underlie it have not yet lost their hold on the minds of men. His Christianity is characteristically medieval in its other-worldliness, but he was thoroughly human and a keen observer of the men and life of his time, as well as a diligent student of the past, so far as it was accessible to him.

Villani, the contemporary historian of Florence, while expressing the highest appreciation of Dante's learning and worth as a citizen, describes him as haughty in demeanor and contemptuous of ordinary people. Boccaccio, on the other hand, says that although reserved in manner and melancholy in expression, he was exceptionally courteous and civil. A somewhat later biographer speaks of him as in his youth a gallant soldier, proficient in all manly exercises, and in his maturity a man of great refinement, serious in aspect, and of slow, but subtle speech.

THE DIVINE COMEDY

OPENING OF THE INFERNO

When half the journey of our life was done
I found me in a darkling wood astray
Because aside from the straight pathway run.

Ah me, how hard a thing it is to say
What was this thorny wildwood intricate
Whose memory renews the first dismay!

Scarcely in death is bitterness more great:
But as concerns the good discovered there
The other things I saw will I relate.

How there I entered I am unaware, 10
So was I at that moment full of sleep
When I abandoned the true thoroughfare.

But when I reached the bottom of a steep
Ending the valley which had overcome
My courage, piercing me with fear so deep, 15

Lifting mine eyes up, I beheld its dome
Already covered with that planet's light
Which along all our pathways leads us
home.

Then was a little quieted the fright
That had been lurking in the heart of me 20
Throughout the passage of the piteous
night.

And as the panting castaway, if he
Escape the wave and on the shore arrive
Turns back and gazes on the perilous sea,

Even so my spirit, still a fugitive, 25
Turned back again to look upon the shore
That never left one person yet alive.

My weary frame somewhat refreshed, once more
Along the solitary slope I plied
So that the firm foot ever was the lower. 30

And lo! where but begins the mountainside,
A leopard light and very swift of pace
And covered with a gaily spotted hide.

Never withdrew she from before my face:
Nay, rather blocked she so my going on 35
That oft I turned my footing to retrace.

It was about the moment of the dawn:
Uprose the sun and paled the light benign
Of those fair stars which were beside him yon

When, took they motion first from Love
Divine: 40
So the sweet season and the time of day
Caused me to augur as a hopeful sign

That animal with skin bedappled gay:
Yet not so much but that I felt dismayed
To see a lion intercept my way. 45

It seemed to me that he toward me made
With head erected and with hunger raving
So that the very air appeared afraid:

And a she-wolf, made gaunt by every craving
Wherewith methought she heavy-laden went, 50
And much folk hitherto of joy bereaving;

She brought on me so much discouragement
By terror of her aspect that perforce
I forfeited all hope of the ascent.

And as one, interrupted in his course 55
Of winning, when his fortune is undone
Is full of perturbation and remorse,

That truceless beast made me such malison,
And coming on against me pace by pace
Baffled me back where silent is the sun. 60

While I was falling back to that low place
A certain person there appearance made,
Whose lengthened silence argued feebleness.

When him I saw in the deserted glade,
'Have pity upon me!' I imploring cried, 65
'Whate'er thou beest, whether man or shade.'

'Not man,—a man once was I,' he replied,
'My parents both were born at Mantua,
And were of Lombard blood on either side.

Sub Julio was I born, though late the day, 70
And under good Augustus lived at Rome
When false and lying deities bore sway.

I was a poet: that just hero whom Anchises sired, I sang, who came from Troy
After the burning of proud Ilium. 75

But why dost thou return to such annoy,
Wherefore ascend not the delightful
Mount,
Beginning and occasion of all joy?' 7

'Art thou indeed that Virgil, and that fount Whence pours of eloquence so broad a stream?' 80
I made reply to him with bashful front.

'O of the other poets light supreme,
May the long study well avail me now
And the great love that made thy book my theme.

Thou art my Master and my Author thou, 85
And thou alone art he from whom results
The goodly style whereto my honors owe.

Behold the beast that doth my steps repulse:
Come to my help against her, famous sage,
For palpitates my every vein and pulse.' 90

'Another journey must thy steps engage,'
When he beheld me weeping, did he say,
'Wouldst from his savage place make pilgrimage;

Because this beast wherewith thou criest, gives way
Never to any comer, but doth sore 95
Impede and harass him until she slay.

Malignant is she so that nevermore
The craving of her appetite is fed,
And after food is hungrier than before.

Many are the animals that with her wed, 100
And there shall yet be more, until the Hound
Shall come and in her misery strike her dead.

His food shall not be either pelf or ground
But what is loving, wise and valorous:
Feltro and Feltro shall his nation bound. 105

That humble Italy preserves he thus
For which the maid Camilla bit the dust
Turnus and Nisus and Euryalus.

And out of every city shall he thrust
That beast, until he drive her back to Hell 110
Whence she was first let loose by envious lust.

Wherefore for thee I think and judge it well
Thou follow me, and I will bring about Thy passage thither where the eternal dwell.

There shalt thou hearken the despairing
shout, 115
Shalt see the souls of yore, each woful guest
Who craving for the second death cry out.

Shalt see thereafter those who are at rest
Amid the flame because their wishes bend
To make them, whensoever, of the blest. 120

If then to these thou wishest to ascend,
For this a worthier soul than I shall wait,
And with her will I leave thee at the end:

Because that Emperor who there holds state,
Seeing I was a rebel to His law, 125
Wills that through me none pass His City-gate.

There rules His Love, as everywhere His Awe;
There in His Capital He sits on high:
Happy his chosen who may nigh him draw.'

'O Poet, I entreat of thee,' said I, 130
'By that Divinity thou didst not know,
So this and greater evil I may fly,

That where thou saidst I may a pilgrim go,
And led by thee Saint Peter's portal find,
And those thou makest out afflicted so,' 135
Then moved he on, I following behind.

VIRGIL TELLS OF BEATRICE

INFERNO, CANTO II

Day was departing and the dusky air Loosing the living things on earth that dwell
From their fatigues; and I alone was there

Preparing to sustain the war, as well
Of the long way as also of the woe, 5
Which now unerring memory will tell.

O Muses! O high Genius, aid me now!
O Memory who wrote down what I did see,
Herein all thy nobility will show.

Now I began: 'Poet, who guidest me, 10
Look to my worth if it be plenteous,
Ere to the hard pass thou confidest me.

Thou tellest that the Sire of Silvius
Went to the everlasting world, while still Corruptible, and in the body thus. 15

But that the Adversary of every ill
Should grace him so, viewing the issue high
And who he was and what he should fulfil,

Seems not unfit to the understanding eye;
For he was father of imperial Rome 20
Elected in the empyrean sky,

Founding that city and her masterdom
In sooth, for see and sanctuary blest
Of those who after greatest Peter come.

And by that going which thou honorest, 25
He heard of things whereon were consequent
His victory and then the Papal Vest.

There afterward the Chosen Vessel went Thence bringing comfort to that Faith supreme
Which of salvation is the rudiment. 30

But wherefore I? Who grants me such a dream?

Aeneas am I not, nor am I Paul,
Nor to myself or others worthy seem.

Whence, if I dare to yield me to thy call,
I tremble lest the going prove insane: 35
My words are to the wise,—thou knowest all.

And like to those who chop and change again
On second thoughts, unwilling former will,
And make their fair beginning wholly vain,

Such became I on that benighted hill: 40
Since, taking thought, I canceled the em-
prise
I was before so eager to fulfil.

'If I have comprehended thy replies,'
Returned that shadow of the lofty mind,
'Thy soul in caitiff apprehension lies, 45

Which oftentimes so baffles humankind,
They turn like animal false sight perceiv-
ing,
Leaving emprise of honor all behind.

To free thee from this timid misconceiving,
Let me now tell thee what my coming meant, 50
And what I heard of thee that set me grieving.

I was with those who are in Limbo pent
When a fair Lady from the blest abode Called me, and her command was my consent.

More brilliant than the star her glances glowed 55
And gently and serenely she began
With voice angelic, in her own sweet mode:

"O courteous shade, soul of the Mantuan
Whose fame endures today in human ear,
And will endure as long as motion can, 60

One dear to me and not to fortune dear,
Is on the desert hillside in his way
So hindered that he has turned back for fear,

And may, alas! be now so far astray
That I am risen for his relief too late, 65
From what I hear the Heavenly voices say.

Now go, and with thine eloquence ornate,
And what may serve for his escape from
woe,
Aid him, lest I should be disconsolate.

Myself am Beatrice who bid thee go; 70
Thence come I whither to return I sigh;
Love prompted me and makes me urge thee so.

When I shall be before my Lord on high
Often will I invoke for thee His grace."
Thereat she paused, and I began reply: 75

"O Lady, by virtue of whom the human race
Doth in nobility all things excel
Within the Heaven that rounds the smallest space,

To do thy bidding pleases me so well
The deed were laggard if already done; 80
There is no further need thy wish to tell.

But tell me rather why thou dost not shun
Descending to this center from the sphere
So wide, whereto thou burnest to be gone."

"Seeing it is thy will so far to peer, 85
I will proceed to tell thee," she replied,
"Why I am not afraid to enter here.

Of those things only fear is justified
Wherein is power of harming less or much:
At nothing else need one be terrified. 90

By Grace Divine have I been fashioned such
That pangs me not the misery of you,
Nor can the flame of all this burning touch.

In Heaven there is a gentle Lady who Berues this barrier whence I bid thee fare,
So that she bursts on high stern judgment
through. 96

She summoned Lucy to her in her prayer
And said: 'Thy faithful one now needs thee
so
That I commend him to thy tender care.'

Lucy, of every cruelty the foe, 100
Arose and came where I had not been long
With Rachel, who was set there long ago.

'Beatrice,' she said, 'God's very choral song,
Why help not him who had such love for
thee
That he forsook for thee the vulgar
through? 105

Dost thou not hear him weep in misery?
Dost thou not see how he is combated
By DEATH upon a flood wild as the sea?'

None ever in the world so swiftly sped
Avoiding hurt or questing benefit, 110
As came I, after suchlike words were said,

Speeding me down from where the blessed sit,
Trusting thy noble speech whose modest
lore
Honors thyself and others hearing it."

After she this had spoken, she forebore, 115
And, weeping, turned her shining eyes away,
Wherefore to come she made me hasten
more;

And, coming to thee even as she did pray,
I drew thee from the beast which up the fair 119
Mountain, bereft thee of the briefer way.

What ails thee then? ah, why, why tarry
there?
Why harbor in thy heart such cowardice?
Why not take liberty to do and dare,

When cherish for thee so much care as this
In Court of Heaven three Ladies benedict,
And mine own speaking pledges thee such
bliss? 126

Even as the flowerets by the chill of night
Bended and closed, when brightens them
the sun
Uplift both stem and petal to the light,

So with my drooping courage I had done 130
Already, and began like one set free,
So much good daring to my heart had run:

'O deep compassion of her who succored me!
And courteous thou, promptly obedient
To the true words that she addressed to thee! 135

Thy words have with such ardent longing bent
My heart to the adventure that, in troth,
I have returned now to my first intent.

Now go, for one will animates us both Thou leader and thou lord and master mild! 140
So said I; and he moving, nothing loth
I entered on the pathway deep and wild.

CHARON'S BOAT

INFERNO, CANTO III

'Through me the way is to the city of woe;
Through me the way unto eternal pain
Through me the way unto the lost below.

Justice commoved my high Creator, when
Made me Divine Omnipotence, combined 5
With Primal Love and Wisdom Sovereign.

Before me nothing was of any kind
Except eterne, and I eterne abide:
Leave, ye that enter in, all hope behind!"

On high above a gateway I descried, 10
Written in dusky color, this device:
Whence I: 'The sense is dire to me, O
Guide!'

Then answered he, as of expert advice:
'Here must thou every fear perforce neglect, 14
Here must perforce be killed all cowardice.

Now come we where I taught thee to expect
To look upon the woful populace
Who have forgone the good of intellect.'

Laying his hand on mine with cheerful face,
Whence I was comforted, he made me
keep 20
Right on and inward to the secret place.

Here lamentations, sighs, and wailings deep
Resounding, so the starless welkin fill That, at the first, I could not choose but weep.

Strange languages, discourings horrible, 25
Accents of anger, histories of woes, Smiting of hands, with voices hoarse and shrill,

Make a tumultuous roar that swirling goes
Forever in that air of endless night,
Like to the sandblast when the whirlwind blows, 30

And I, my temples girded with affright,
Said: 'Master, what is this, and who may be
The folk who seem in such a woful plight?'

'The melancholy souls,' then answered h
'Of those enduring this condition dire, 35
Lived void of honor and of infamy.

They are commingled with that caitiff quire
Of angels, who nowise rebellious were,
Nor leal to God, but all for self-desire.

The Heavens to keep their beauty from impair, 40
Banned them, nor harbors them the deep of Hell,
Because the damned some boast of them would bear.'

'Master,' said I, 'what grievance is so fell
To these, that their lament should be so great?'
He answered: 'I will very briefly tell. 45

These have no hope of death; and this their state
Of blind existence is degraded so,
They are envious of every other fate.

Report of them the world does not allow;
Mercy and Justice hold them in disdain: 50
Let us not speak of them, but look, and go.'

And I beheld, on looking there again,
A whirling banner running swiftly on,
As scorning all delay; and such a train

Of people in pursuit of it that run, 55
Nothing but seeing could belief persuade
That ever Death so many had fordone.

And recognizing some, I saw a shade
In whom detected I that one of these
Who cravenly the Great Refusal made. 60

This was the sect of caitiffs, who displease,
As now forthwith I understood and knew,
Not God alone but all His enemies.

Wretches who never were alive, and who
Were sorely stung upon their bodies nude
By hornets and by wasps that thither flew. 66

These caused their visages to stream with blood,
Which, mixed with tears, was gathered at their feet
By vermin, foul and loathsome multitude.

And now my glances, pushing further, meet 70
People upon the marge of a great stream;
Whence I: 'Now tell me, Master, I entreat,

What folk are these, and by what rule they seem
So eager on the passage to be gone,
As I distinguish by the feeble gleam.' 75

And he to me: 'These matters shall be known
Unto thee, when we stay from our advance
Upon the woful marge of Acheron.'

Thereon with downcast eyes and modest glance, 80
Fearing my words were irksome to him, I
Far as the stream refrained from utterance

And lo! upon a bark approaching nigh,
One white with ancient tresses, passing old;
'Woe to you wicked spirits!' was his cry. 85

'Hope nevermore the Heavens to behold;
I come to lead you to the other bank,
Into eternal darkness, heat, and cold.

And thou, O living spirit, from the rank Dispart thee, of these others who are dead.' 90
And when he saw me not as one who shrank:

'Another way, by other ports,' he said,
 'Not here, shalt come for ferriage to the shore:
 Upon a lighter keel must thou be sped.'

'Vex thee not, Charon,' said my Monitor: 95
 'Thus it is willed where will is one and same
 With potence to fulfil,—and ask no more.'

Then quieted the shaggy cheeks became,
 Of him, the boatman of the marish dark,
 Who round about his eyes had wheels of flame. 100

But all those spirits, so forworn and stark,
 Change color and their teeth are chattering,
 As soon as they the cruel accents mark.

God they blaspheme and their own sires, and fling
 Curses on race and place and time and law 105
 Both of their birth and their engendering.

Then flocking all together, they withdraw,
 Bitterly weeping, to the curséd shore
 Awaiting each who holds not God in awe.

Charon, the demon, with the eyes that glower, 110
 Beckoning to them, every one receives,
 And smites whoever lingers, with the oar.

As in the autumn season when the leaves,
 First one, and then another lightly fall,
 Till all upon the ground the bough perceives:

Likewise the evil seed of Adam all 115
 Fling them from off that margin one by one
 At signals, like the bird at his recall.

Thus over the dusk water they are gone,
 And ere they can alight on yonder strand
 Forgathers a fresh throng on this anon. 120

'Son,' said the courteous Master, 'understand
 That those who perish subject to God's ire
 Are all assembled here from every land,

And ready are to pass the river dire,
 Because Celestial Justice so doth goad 125
 That very fear converts into desire.

No righteous spirit ever takes this road:
 And hence, though Charon may of thee complain,
 Thou knowest now the meaning of his mode.'

When he had ended, all the dreary plain 130
 So trembled that, but calling it to mind
 The terror bathes me now with sweat again.

The land of tears gave forth a blast of wind
 With lightning flashes of vermilion deep,
 When consciousness I utterly resigned: 135
 Then sank I like one overcome with sleep.

THE PAGANS IN LIMBO

INFERNO, CANTO IV

A pealing burst of thunder loosed my sense
 From chains of heavy sleep, and made me bound
 Like one who is awaked by violence:

And, risen erect, on every side around
 I moved my rested eye, and fixed my sight 5
 To recognize the features of that ground.

True is it that I stood upon the height
 Above the valley of the Abyss of Woe,
 Which gathers roar of wailing infinite.

It was so dark, deep, cloudy, that although 10
 My gaze upon the bottom I confined,
 Not anything discerned I there below.

'Now go we down among the people blind,'
 Began the Poet, pallid as the dead:
 'I will go first, and follow thou behind.' 15

And I, observant of his pallor, said:
 'How shall I come if thou afraid appear,
 By whom I am wonted to be comforted?'

'The anguish of the people downward here,
 Portrays upon my face,' said he at this, 20
 'That pity which thou deemest to be fear.'

The long way urges: come, be not remiss.
 Thus he set forth, and made me enter thus,
 The foremost circle that begirds the abyss.

Here was no sound perceptible to us 25
 Of wailing, only sighs and sighs again,
 That made the eternal air all tremulous:

And this arose from woe unpanged with pain,
Felt by the great and thronging multitude
Of children and of women and of men. 30

'Askest thou not,' resumed the Master good,
'What spirits these may be thou dost behold?
Now ere thou go, I wish it understood

Though these sinned not, their merit manifold
Doth not, for want of Baptism, signify,—35
The portal of the faith which thou dost hold,—

They worship God but through idolatry,
Seeing they were to Christian ages prior:
And among such as these myself am I.

For such defects, and for no trespass dire, 40
Lost are we, suffering no more but so,
That without hope we languish in desire.'

On hearing this, laid hold on me great woe,
For very worthy people knew I well,
Suspended in that Limbo there below. 45

'O tell me, Lord, O Master, speak and tell,'
Began I, wishing full intelligence
About the faith that doth all error quell,

'Went ever any by self-merit hence,
Or by another's, to a blissful fate?' 50
And he, who understood my covert sense,

Made answer: 'I was new unto this state,
When I beheld One come omnipotent,
With sign of victory incoronate.

The shade of our first father penitent, 55
Abel his son and Noah, hence he drew;
Moses the lawgiver obedient;

Patriarch Abraham, King David too;
Israel with his sire, with every son,
With Rachel for whose sake such pains he knew, 60

And many more, and gave them benison:
And thou must know that earlier than these,
Never a human soul salvation won.'

Not for his speaking did our going cease,
But ever through the forest did we fare, 65
The forest, I mean, where spirits were the trees.

We had not traveled far as yet from where
My sleep befel, when I beheld a blaze
Which conquered from the dark a hemisphere.

We still were distant by a little space, 70
Yet not so far but I discerned in part
That honorable people held that place.

'O thou who honorest both science and art,
Who may these be that so great honor claim, 74
Thus set from fashion of the rest apart?'

And he to me: 'The honorable fame
Concerning them that in thy life doth ring,
Wins grace in Heaven that so advances them.'

Hereon I heard a voice thus heralding:
'Honor to him of poets loftiest! 80
His shade returneth home from wandering.'

After the voice had ceased and was at rest,
Four mighty shades advancing did I see,
In whom nor grief nor joy was manifest.

The Master good began to say to me: 85
'Mark him there, carrying that sword in
hand,
Who, as their lord, comes on before the three:

'Tis Homer, sovran bard of every land,
Horace next after him, satiric wit,
Third Ovid, Lucan last of all the band. 90

Since unto each doth, as to me, befit
The name the one voice sounded, in such wise
They do me honor, and do well in it.'

Thus gathered the fair school before mine
eyes,
Of him, the lord of song the loftiest, 95
Who o'er the others like an eagle flies.

When they had talked awhile with him, the rest
To me with signs of salutation bent;
Whereat my Master's smile his mind expressed.

They paid me honor far more eminent, 100
In that they made me of their brotherhood:
So I was sixth of them, the sapient.

Toward the light we thus our way pursued,
Discoursing things whereof fits reticence,
Even as there to speak of them was good.

We gained a castle's grand circumference, ¹⁰⁶
With seven lofty walls encircled round,
Bemoated with a brooklet for defense.

This passed we over as upon dry ground:
Through seven gates I with those sages went; ¹¹⁰
A meadow of fresh verdure there we found.

People were there of aspect eminent,
With eyes that moved majestical and slow:
Taciturn, but with voices sweetly blent.

A little to one side withdrew we so, ¹¹⁵
Into an open place, and high and sheen,
Where one and all we might behold and
know.

There opposite, upon the enameled green,
Were shown to me the mighty souls, whom I
Feel inwardly exalted to have seen. ¹²⁰

I saw Electra with much people by,
Hector among them, and Æneas descried,
And armored Cæsar with the falcon eye.

Camill', Penthesilæa, I espied;
Over against them King Latinus dwelled,
Lavinia, his daughter, by his side. ¹²⁶

I saw that Brutus Tarquin who expelled;
Lucrece, Cornelia, Julia, Marcia; then
Alone, apart, great Saladin beheld.

And when I lifted up my brows again, ¹³⁰
The Master I beheld of those who know,
Sitting amid the philosophic train.

All look to him, to him all honor show:
Here saw I Plato, Socrates advance,
Who nearer him before the others go; ¹³⁵

Democritus, who puts the world on chance,
Anaxagoras and Diogenes I saw;
Dioscorides, collector good of plants;

Thales, and Zeno of the Stoic law;
Orpheus, Heraclitus, Empedocles, ¹⁴⁰
Tully, and Linus, and moral Seneca;

Euclid, geometer; Hippocrates,
Ptolemy, Avicen, Galen; him who wrought
The Commentary great, Averroës.

In full concerning all report I not, ¹⁴⁵
For the long theme impels me forward:
thus
Many a time the word comes short of thought.

The band of six gives places to two of us:
My sage Guide leads me by another way
Forth from the still air to the tremulous;
And now I come where shines no light of day.

FRANCESCA DA RIMINI

INFERNO, CANTO V

From the first circle thus I made descent
Down to the second, whose contracted rim
Girdles so much more woe it goads lament.

There Minos stands and snarls with clamor grim,
Examines the transgressions at the gate, ⁵
Judges, and sends as he encircles him.

Yea, when the spirit born to evil fate
Before him comes confessing all, that fell
Distinguisher among the reprobate,

Seeing what place belongs to it in Hell, ¹⁰ Entwines him with his tail such times as show
How many circles down he bids it dwell.

Always before him many wait; they go
All turn by turn to sentence for their sin:
They tell and hear and then are whirled below. ¹⁵

'O thou that comest to the woful inn!
As soon as he beheld me, Minos cried,
Leaving the act of so great discipline,

'Beware to enter, beware in whom confide,
Be not deceived by wideness of the door.' ²⁰
'Why dost thou also clamor?' said my Guide.

'Bar not his going fated from before:
Thus it is willed up yonder where is might
To bring the will to pass, and ask no more.'

And now the notes of woe begin to smite ²⁵
The hollow of mine ear; now am I come
Where I am pierced by wailings infinite.

I came into a place of all light dumb,
Which bellows like a sea where thunders roll 29
And counter winds contend for masterdom.

The infernal hurricane beyond control
Sweeps on and on with ravishment malign
Whirling and buffeting each hapless soul.

When by the headlong tempest hurled supine,
Here are the shrieks, the moaning, the laments 35
Here they blaspheme the puissance divine.

I learned that to such sorry recompense
Are damned the sinners of the carnal sting
Who make the reason thrall to appetite.

And as great flocks of starlings on the wing 40
In winter-time together trooping go,
So did that blast the wicked spirits fling

Now here, now there, now up, and now
below:
Comfort of hope to them is never known
Either of rest or even less bitter woe. 45

And as the pilgrim cranes from zone to zone Draw out their aery file and chant the dirge,
So saw I, and I heard them making moan,

Shadows who on that storm-blast whirl and surge:
Whence I: 'Who, Master, are those tempest-flung, 50
Round whom the black air whistles like a scourge?'

'The first,' said he, 'that multitude among,
Of whom thou seekest knowledge more precise,
Was empress over many a tribe and tongue.

Abandoned so was she to wanton vice 55
That, her own stigma so to wipe away,
Lust was made licit by her law device.

That is Semiramis,—as annals say
Consort of Ninus and successor too;
Where governs now the Soldan, she held sway. 60

The next one, lo! herself for love she slew
And to Sichaeus' urn her faith dismissed;
Next wanton Cleopatra comes to view;

Now lookest thou on Helen, whose acquist Brought evil years; and great Achilles
see 65
Who found in Love his last antagonist.

Look, Paris, Tristan . . .' and he pointed me
A thousand shades, and named me every name,
Who in our life gave Love the victory.

When I had heard my Teacher many a dame 70
Of eld enumerate, and many a knight,
Pity assailed me and almost overcame.

'Poet,' began I, 'fain would I invite Speech with those twain who go a single way
And seem upon the wind to be so light.' 75

And he made answer: 'Thou shalt mark when they Draw near to us, and then adjure them by
The Love that leads them, and they will obey.'

Thereafter when a whirlwind swept them
nigh
I lifted up my voice: 'O souls forspent, 80
Come and have speech with us if none deny.'

As doves to the heart's call obedient
Are borne along to the beloved nest
On wide and steady pinions homeward bent,

So these came toward us through the air
unblessed, 85
Veering from Dido and her multitude,
So tender and so strong was my request.

'O living creature, full of grace and good
Who goest through the dusk air visiting Us who left earth encrimsoned with our
blood, 90

If friendly were the Universal King
We would be praying to Him for thy peace,
Seeing thou piest our suffering.

Whatever ye to speak and hear may please,
That will we speak and hear you close at hand, 95
If yet awhile the wind as now may cease.

The town where I was born sits on the strand
Beside the water where descends the Po
In quest of peace, with his companion band,

Love that in gentle heart is soon aglow 100
Laid hold on this one for the person fair
Bereft me, and the mode is still my woe.

Love that doth none beloved from loving spare,
To do him pleasure made my heart so fain
That, as thou seest not yet doth it forbear.

Love led us down to death together: Cain 106
Awaits the soul of him who laid us dead.
These words from them to us returned again.

Hearing those injured souls, I bowed my head
And held it for so long dejectedly 110
That, 'Whereon thinkest thou?' the Poet said.

When I could answer, I began: 'Ah me,
How many tender thoughts, what longing drew
These lovers to the pass of agony.'

Thereafter I turned to them, and spoke anew: 115
'Francesca, all thy torments dim mine eyes
With tears that flow for sympathy and rue.

But tell me, in the time of the sweet sighs
By what, and how did Love to you disclose
The vague desires, that ye should realize?'

And she to me: 'It is the woe of woes. — 121
Remembrance of the happy time to keep
In misery,—and that thy Teacher knows.

But if thy yearning be indeed so deep
To know the first root of a love so dear, 125
I will do even as they who speak and weep.

One day together read we for good cheer
Of Love, how he laid hold on Launcelot:
Alone we were and without any fear. 129

Many and many a time that reading brought
Our eyes to meet, and blanched our faces o'er,
But only one point we resisted not.

When reading of the smile long-awaited-for Being kissed by such a lover chivalrous,
He, never now from me divided more, 135

Kissed me upon the mouth, all tremulous.
Gallehaut was the book and writer too:
That day there was no reading more for us.'

And while one soul was saying this, for rue
So wept the other, that I fainted all 140
For pity, even as dying persons do,
And fell, as would a lifeless body fall.

ULYSSES

INFERNO, CANTO XXVI

Rejoice, O Florence, since thou art so great,
Thy wings are beating land and sea around,
And even in Hell thy name is celebrate.

Among the robbers five like these I found,
Thy citizens,—whereat comes shame to
me, 5
Nor do thy honors greatly thence abound.

But if near dawning dream be verity,
Within short while from now shalt thou perceive
What Prato, if no other, craves for thee.

If it must be, let come without reprieve; 10
Serene the mind when of the worst aware:
The older I become, the more 'twill grieve.

We parted thence, and up along the stair
The spur-stones made before for our descent,
My Guide remounted now, and drew me
there. 15

And as the solitary way we went
Amid the crags and splinters of the span,
The foot without the hand had been for-
spent.

Then sorrowed I, and sorrow now again,
When I direct my thought to what I viewed, 20
And curb my genius from the course it ran,

Lest it from Virtue turn to truanthood;
So that if favoring star or higher grace
Have given me aught, I forfeit not that good.

During that season when from us his face 25
He least conceals whose light the world
doth fill,
What time the fly unto the gnat gives place,

The peasant who is resting on the hill
Sees many a firefly down along the dale,
Perhaps where he doth gather grapes and till: 30

With flames so many the eighth pit of Hell
Was everywhere agleam, as I beheld
On coming where I saw the bottom well.

And even as he whom bears avenged of eld
Looked on Elijah's parting chariot 35
When straight the way to Heaven the horses held;

For with the eyesight could he follow not
So that aught other than the flame was seen
Flitting aloft, a fading cloudy spot:

Thus moved along the throat of the ravine 40
Each flame, for none of them the theft unlock,
Though every flame a sinner wraps within.

I stood to look upon the bridge of rock,
Erect, so that, did not a jut prevent,
To make me fall had been no need of shock. 45

And when my Leader saw me thus intent,
He said: 'The spirits in the fires abide,
Each swathed within the burning element.'

'Through hearing thee, my Master,' I replied,
'Am I more certain; but what thou dost say 50
I had surmised and would have asked, O
Guide,

Who is within that flame which comes this
way,
Whose cloven top seems rising from the pyre
Where once Eteocles with his brother lay?'

'Ulysses pines,' he said, 'within that fire, 55
And Diomed; thus neither goes alone
In punishment, as neither went in ire:

And in their flame together do they groan
The ambush of the horse, whence was to come
The noble seed by the old Romans sown; 60

There weep the guile whereby, though dead
and dumb,
Deidamia still Achilles wails;
And there they pay for the Palladium.'

'If they within those sparks can tell their tales,'
Said I, 'O Master, much I pray thee, pray
Until my prayer a thousandfold avails, 66

That thou refuse not unto me to stay
Until the hornéd flame comes hither nigh:
Thou seest with what desire I lean that way.'

'Thy prayer deserves all praise,' he made reply, 70
'And therefore I accept it; none the less Take heed thou to thy tongue all speech
deny:

Leave me to speak, for I already guess
What thou desirest. Seeing that these were Greek,
Perhaps they might be shy of thine address.' 75

After the flame with the divided peak
Had come where time and place to him seemed due,
I heard my Leader in this manner speak:

'O ye, within one fire remaining two,
If I deserved of you in life, if I 80
Or much or little merited of you

When in the world I wrote the verses high,
Do not move on, but one of you declare
Whither, being lost, he went away to die.'

One horn, the mightier of the ancient pair, 85
With murmuring began to quiver then,
Even as a flame made weary by the air.

Waving the summit back and forth again,
Thereafter, like a speaking tongue, the flame
Flung forth a voice and spoke as follows:
'When 90

Of Circé I had taken leave,—the same
Who held me near Gaeta a year and more,
Ere yet Æneas gave it such a name,—

Nor tender love of son, nor pity for
My aged father, nor affection due 95
That should have cheered Penelopé, o'er-bore

The ardor that was in me to pursue
Experience of the world, that I might be
In human vices versed and virtue too:

But I put forth on the deep open sea 100
With but one vessel, and that little train
Which hitherto had not deserted me.

Both of the shores I saw as far as Spain,
Morocco, and Sardinia's isle, and so
The other islands bathing in that main. 105

I and my company were old and slow
When in upon that narrow pass we bore,
Where Hercules set up his bounds to show

That man beyond might venture nevermore.
Here left I Seville back upon the right, 110
And had left Ceuta on the other shore.

"O brothers," said I, "who are come despite
Ten thousand perils to the West, let none,
While still our senses hold the vigil slight

Remaining to us ere our course is run, 115
Be willing to forgo experience
Of the unpeopled world beyond the sun.

Regard your origin,—from whom and whence!
Not to exist like brutes, but made were ye
To follow virtue and intelligence." 120

With this brief speech I made my company
So keen to go, that scarce to be denied
Would they have been thereafter, even by me.

And having turned the stern to morning-tide,
For the mad flight we plied the winged oar,
Steadily gaining on the larboard-side. 126

Night saw the constellations more and more
Of the other pole, and ours at such descent
That it rose not above the ocean-floor.

Five times rekindled and as many spent 130
The light beneath the moon did wane away,
Since to the passage of the deep we went

When there appeared to us a mountain, gray
With distance, and upreared a loftier brow
Than I had ever seen until that day. 135

We joyed, but joy soon turned to weeping
now,
For out of the new land a whirling blast
Arose and struck the vessel on the prow—

Thrice with the waters all, it whirled her fast:

The fourth upheaved the stern and sunk
amain 140

The prow, as pleased Another, till at last
The ocean had above us closed again.'

THE MEETING WITH SÖRDELLO

PURGATORIO, CANTOS VI AND VII

When breaks the game of hazard, he who lost
Remains behind in sorrow, and essays
The throws again, thus learning to his cost;

With the winner all the others go their ways:
One in advance, one plucks him from the rear, 5
And for reminder one beside him stays.

He hastens,—all soliciting his ear,—
His hand goes out to some, who leave him free,—
And from the pressure of the crowd gets clear.

So I, amid that thronging company, 10
Was turning to them here and there my face,
And making promise, extricated me.

The Aretine who in the grim embrace
Of Ghin di Tacco perished, with them
stood,
And the other who was drowned while giving chase. 15

There prayed, with hands in suppliant attitude,
Frederick Novello, and that Pisan son
Who proved the good Marzucco's fortitude.

I saw Count Orso, and the soul of one
Bereft of life by spite, as he averred, 20
And envy, not for any trespass done,—

Pier de la Brosse, I mean: and by this word
Be warned the Dame of Brabant to take heed
Lest she for this consort with baser herd.

As soon as I was from these shadows freed, Whose one prayer was that other prayer benign 26
Them on the way to holiness might speed,

Thus I began: 'It seems, O light of mine,
In one text thou expressly questionest
That orison may bend decree divine; 30

And yet these people only this request:
Can it be possible their hope is vain?
Or is to me thy word not manifest?'

And he responded: 'What I wrote is plain,
And not fallacious is the hope of these 35
If one consider it with reason sane,

For Top of Judgment stoops not when the pleas
Of burning love do in a moment what
These do who here await the slow decrees.

And in the instance where I tied that knot, 40
Prayer did not counterbalance the defect,
Since, from God disunited, prayer, was not.

Howbeit, waive decision in respect
To doubt so deep, till she interpret this,
Who shall be light 'twixt truth and intellect. 45

Be assured that here I speak of Beatrice:
Her shalt thou see above, upon the crown
Of this same Mountain, smiling and in
bliss.'

And I: 'Lord, let us hasten to be gone,
For I am not as hitherto forspent, 50
And look, the hill now casts a shadow down.'

'As much as possible of the ascent,
Will we perform today,' responded he,
'But other than thou thinkest is the event.

Ere thou canst climb up yonder, thou wilt
see 55
Return that light so hidden that its ray
Is interrupted now no more by thee.

But see! there is a spirit making stay
All, all alone, and looking toward this side;
It will point out to us the speediest way.' 60

We thither came. O Lombard soul, what pride
And lofty scorn thine attitude expressed,
And thy slow-moving eyes how dignified!

As we came on he proffered no request,
But let us go our way, calmly surveying 65
In manner of a lion when at rest.

Steadily drew up Virgil toward him, praying
Direction where ascent might best be made;
But he, no word by way of answer saying,

News of our life and of our country
prayed. 70
And when thereto the gentle Guide began,
'Mantua' upleaped that all-secluded shade

From where before he stood: 'O Mantuan,
I am Sordello of thy city!' said he,
And to embrace of each the other ran. 75

Hostel of woe, ah, servile Italy,
Vessel unpiloted in a great storm,
No Lady of provinces, but harlotry!

Eager that noble spirit was and warm
To welcome there his own compatriot, 80
So did the sweet name of his city charm!

While now in civil tumult are distraught
Thy living citizens,—at daggers drawn
Those whom one wall incloses, and one moat.

Make search around thy seaboard, wretched
one, 85
And after in thy bosom look again,
If anywhere within be unison!

What boots Justinian adjust the rein
If ever empty be the saddle? Without Such bridle not so black would be the stain. 90

Ah, gentry, ye that ought to be devout
And let but Cæsar in the saddle sit,
Nor leave unheeded what God pointed out,

Look well to this wild beast, consider it,
Ungoaded by the spur how fell it grows 95
Since ye laid hand upon the bridle-bit!

O German Albert, who to such as those Yieldest this wild unruly animal,
And oughtest to bestride her saddlebows,

May from the stars upon thy issue fall 100
Just judgment, and be it strange and manifest
Such that it may thy follower appal!

Thy father suffered and thou sufferest,
Held back up yonder by the greed of you,
The garden of the Empire go to waste. 105

Come look at Capulet and Montague,
Monaldi and Filippeschi, careless prince,
These dreading that which those already rue.

Come, cruel man, and see thy nobles wince
Under oppression, cure their hurts,—nay
come 110
See Santaflora how secure long since!

Come hear the outcries of thy weeping Rome
By day and night, a widow and alone:
'My Cæsar, why forsakest thou thy home?'

Come, see thy people, how their love is grown;
And if for us thou have no sympathy,
Come and take shame to thee for thy renown.

And if it be allowed me, Jove most High,
Thou who for us on earth wast crucified,
Is elsewhere averted thy just eye?

Or is it discipline thou dost provide
In thy deep counsel, for some useful plan
To our perception utterly denied?

Swarm in Italian towns the tyrant clan,
And a Marcellus comes incipient
In every churl who plays the partisan.

My Florence, thou indeed mayst be content
With this aside,—thy withers are unwrung,
Thanks to thy people all so provident.

The bow of justice is but slowly strung
By many, who let no random arrow fly:
Thy people have justice pat upon the tongue.

Many would put the public burden by,
But answers eagerly thy populace Unbidden: 'Shoulder to the wheel!' they cry.

Good reason hast thou to take heart of grace:
If sooth I say, the facts do not conceal, Thou wealthy and thou wise and thou at peace!

The Athenian and the Spartan commonweal,
Long famed for art and law, gave feeble proof
Of civil life to what thy deeds reveal,

Who with such foresight weave in that behoof,
That reach not to the middle of November
The filmy threadlets of October's woof.

How often hast thou changed (canst thou remember?)
Law, coinage, offices, time out of mind,
And usage, renovating every member.

And were thy memory not so short or blind,
Thou wouldst see thyself in that sick woman, fair

A little rest upon her couch to find,
Who would by tossing ward away her pain.

After the courtly and glad greetings now
Again a third time and a fourth began,
Sordello drew back saying: 'Who art thou?'

'Ere to this Mount turned any soul of man
Worthy to rise with God to be enskied,
My bones were buried by Octavian.

Virgil am I; and for no crime beside Not having faith, went I from Heaven astray.
So forthwith made reply to him my Guide.

Like one encountering upon his way
Some sudden wonder which he stands before,
Doubting, believing, saying yea and nay,

Sordello stood; then bowed his forehead lower,
Turning to greet my Leader with embrace
More humble, where lays hold the inferior.

'O glory,' exclaimed he, 'of the Latin race,
Through whom our language showed its worth so well,
O praise eternal of my native place,

What merit shows thee or what miracle?
If I be worthy held thy news to know,
Say from what cloister comst thou, if from Hell?'

'Through all the circles of the world of woe
Am I come hither,' so he made reply,
'Moved by a power of Heaven whereby I go.

Omitting, not committing, forfeit I Sight of the Dayspring where thy longings
rise,
And which was known by me too tardily.

There is a place below not otherwise Tormented save with gloom, where the laments
Are uttered not in wailing but in sighs;

There I abide with little innocents
Bitten by fangs of Death and all undone
Ere yet exempt from man's maleficence;

There I abide with those who put on none
Of the three holy virtues, yet who knew
The others, following guiltless every one.

But if thou know and can, afford some clue

To us, whereby we may arrive apace
Where Purgatory has beginning true.' 190

He answered: 'We are bound to no fixed
place;

I lawfully may wander up and round,
And join you as guide for my allotted space.

But look! the day declining to the bound,
And we are powerless to ascend by night;
Then let us think of pleasant resting-
ground. 196

Souls dwell secluded yonder to the right:
Unto them will I lead if thou consent,
Nor will acquaintance be without delight.'

'How so?' was asked, 'if any made ascent 200
By night, would he be then inhibited
By another, or would want of power prevent?'

'Look!'—and the good Sordello's finger
sped
Along the ground,—'the sun being parted
hence
Thou couldst not even cross this line,' he
said; 205

'Not that there else would be impediments
To going up save shades nocturnal,—they
Would trammel up the will with impotence.

One might indeed in darkness downward
stray,
And make the tour of the whole mountain-ring, 210
While the horizon prisons up the day.'

Then said my Master, as if wondering:
'Now lead us on whither, by thy report,
We may have some delight while tarry-
ing.'

Thence on the Mountain was the distance
short 215

When of a hollow I became aware,
Valleys down here are hollowed in such sort.

'Yonder,' proposed that shade, 'let us repair
Where inward-curving slopes a dell surround, 219
And dawning of new day await we there.'

END OF THE PARADISO

XXXIII. 55-145

After this point my vision far surpassed
Our human speech, from which such concepts flee,
And even recollection fails at last.

As dreaming men who something clearly see,
And afterwards their feeling can recall 5
But nothing else is left to memory,

E'en so am I: returneth scarce at all
The thing I saw, yet trickles through my mind
The dew of sweetness which therefrom did fall.

Thus runs the snow which sunshine doth unbind; 10
Thus, writ on fluttering leaves, the Sybil's
lore
Was swept away forever by the wind.

O Fire Supreme, which human minds ignore,
Inept to scale thy height, I pray thee, some Fragment of thy revealing now restore, 15

And lend such power unto mine organs dumb
That I one single spark of all thy light
May leave to generations yet to come.

For if it glimmer on mine aftersight
And faintly echo in the verse I pen, 20
Better conceived by man shall be thy might.

I think, so keenly did I suffer when I faced the living beam, my sight were spent,
Had I mine eyes from it averted then.

This thought new courage to my spirit lent, 25
As I remember, till my struggling gaze
On God's immeasurable self was bent.

O grace abounding! through the endless rays
Thou gavest me full confidence to look,
Till mortal sight was quenched within the blaze. 30

Whate'er is writ in Cosmos' every nook
Was in that depth collected, ream by ream,
Bound up by love into a single book.

Things transient and eternal blended seem,
And all their operations, so combined 35
That what I saw was one unchanging gleam.

The bond which all the universe confined
 I think I saw, because, this statement made,
 An ampler satisfaction floods my mind. 39

One moment makes my memory fainter fade
 Than five and twenty centuries that quest
 Which startled Neptune with the Argo's
 shade.

Now mine uplifted spirit, God-possessed,
 Was gazing, fixed and still, with all its might,
 To deeper look by constant yearning
 pressed. 45

The while he stands before that Presence bright,
 The spellbound gazer never can consent
 To turn away for any other sight;

Since goodness, object of the will's intent,
 All centers there; outside of It, the best 50
 A true perfection never can present.

Henceforth my telling must be more compressed—
 E'en what I can recall—than infant's lore Whose tongue is moistened still at mother's breast!

It was not that the living Brightness bore 55
 Aught but a single image to my view,
 For It is always what it was before;

My sight it was which, peering, stronger grew
 And altered, while the change occurred in me, 59
 One selfsame form to various figures new.

Within the deep, clear Light I seemed to see Three rings, which one dimension doth connect,
 Yet are those rings in color ever three.

The first appeared the second to reflect.
 As rainbows do; a flame appeared the third, 65
 Which each and other equally project.

O! What a feeble thing is speech, and blurred,
 Beside my thought! And this, beside my sight,
 Is such that 'little' is no fitting word.

O self-contained and everlasting Light, 70
 Which thine own self alone doth understand,
 With love and wisdom smiling infinite!

That circle which I deemed a radiant band
 By thee reflected and within thee shown,
 Examined by mine eyes on every hand, 75

Seemed painted, with a color all its own,
 In very likeness of our human kind;
 Wherefore my gaze was fixed on it alone.

As some geometer bends all his mind
 To square the circle, yet, by pondering, 80
 The principle he lacks can never find,

So bent was I upon this wondrous thing:
 I wondered how the image was applied,
 I burned to know how it could fit the ring.

Too high was that for mortal wings to glide 85
 Till, stricken by a sudden-flashing ray,
 My reason found its longing satisfied.

My soaring fancy here at last gave way;
 But, like a wheel whose motion nothing
 mars,
 Already wish and will in even sway, 90
 Were turned by Love, which moves the sun and stars.

PETRARCH (1304-1374)

It is as hard to fix a precise date for the end of the Middle Ages, as for the beginning, but scholars are generally agreed that while Dante is the crown and epitome of the medieval spirit, in Petrarch and Boccaccio a new point of view is already manifest. 'Petrarch, the First Modern Scholar and Man of Letters, a Selection from his Correspondence with Boccaccio and other Friends, designed to illustrate the Beginnings of the Renaissance' is the full title of a well-known book by Professors James Harvey Robinson and Henry Winchester Rolfe; and one of the best medievalists of the last generation, Professor W. P. Ker, in a volume of essays published in 1905, says: 'To many readers it has appeared as if the friendship of Petrarch and Boccaccio made the first comfortable resting place in the history of literature on this side of the Dark Ages. . . . Even to speak of Dante is not always safe with the less adventurous sort of pilgrims; it is like recommending a good mountain to a traveler who is anxious about his inn. Boccaccio and Petrarch come much nearer to their readers and take them into their confidence; . . . and Petrarch takes the first stages in a progress that is to lead from superstition (that is to say, the traditional and conventional moralities of the Dark Ages) to the free and unembarrassed study of human nature.'

Francesco Petrarca, son of a Florentine notary, was born in Arezzo, where his father had been driven into exile at the same time that Dante was expelled from Florence in 1302. In 1312 his father left Tuscany for the papal court at Avignon in the South of France, where, as later at Montpellier and Bologna, the youth studied Cicero and Virgil with much more enthusiasm than the legal lore which was supposed to be his business. Returning to Avignon on his father's death in 1326, he first met the Laura whom he was to make immortal in his verse on April 6, 1327. This date, together with that of the lady's death exactly twenty-one years later, stands recorded in Petrarch's own hand on the fly-leaf of his copy of Virgil, now in the Ambrosian Library at Milan. Chiefly on the basis of these dates she has been identified with Laura de Noves, who in 1325 married Hugo de Sade, and died, the mother of eleven children, in April, 1348.

Petrarch early won fame as a classical scholar and was much sought after by Popes, Emperors, and other potentates as an adornment of their courts. He enjoyed the most exalted patronage, and on Easter Day, 1341, was solemnly crowned laureate poet by the Roman Senate at the Capitol amid the acclamations of the multitude. He traveled far and wide in search of classical manuscripts and unearthened works of Cicero and other writers then unknown, rendering invaluable service to the cause of learning in this and other ways.

When sick of the corruption and vanity of court life, Petrarch sought quiet in what he called his 'most delightful transalpine solitude' at Vacluse, near Avignon, and after the death of Laura and his friend and patron, Cardinal Colonna, he left Avignon for good and retired to his country house in the Euganean Hills at Arquà near Padua. Here he was found dead, sitting at his study-table, his head bowed upon the Virgil he had been reading.

Petrarch's fame during his lifetime was mainly founded upon his classical erudition and his works in Latin, which include an epic Africa, of which the hero is Scipio Africanus, eclogues, epistles in verse, prose treatises and an extensive collection of letters on various subjects. His more modern fame depends upon his lyrics, consisting of sonnets and other poems, setting forth with every variety of emotion and psychological analysis his unrequited passion for Laura. The rhyme scheme of the Petrarchan sonnet became the standard for all subsequent writers of this form of poetry. Petrarch's Canzoniere includes 317 sonnets, 29 odes, 9 sestines, 7 ballads, and 4 madrigals—366 poems in all, beside the six Triumphs of Love, Chastity, Death, Fame, Time, and Eternity. All these poems have reference, more or less direct, to Petrarch's love of Laura, the earlier ones of Laura in life, the later ones of Laura in death. They afforded a rich mine of fancies for lovelorn poets of the succeeding ages, and were so frequently translated, adapted, and imitated in various languages and by different poets that Petrarch and his followers may be said to have exhausted every phase of this particular kind of poetic adoration.

The translation of the letters following is taken from 'Petrarch' by J. H. Robinson and H. W. Rolfe, by the courtesy of the publishers, G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York and London.

ON THE SCARCITY OF COPYISTS

A Letter to Lapo da Castiglionchio

Your Cicero has been in my possession four years and more. There is a good reason, though, for so long a delay; namely, the great scarcity of copyists who understand such work. It is a state of affairs that has resulted in an incredible loss to scholarship. Books that by their nature are a little hard to understand are no longer multiplied, and have ceased to be generally intelligible, and so have sunk into utter neglect, and in the end have perished. This age of ours consequently has let fall, bit by bit, some of the richest and sweetest fruits that the tree of knowledge has yielded; has thrown away the results of the vigils and labors of the most illustrious men of genius, things of more value, I am almost tempted to say, than anything else in the whole world. . . .

But I must return to your Cicero. I could not do without it, and the incompetence of the copyists would not let me possess it. What was left for me but to rely upon my own resources, and press these weary fingers and this worn and ragged pen into the service? The plan that I followed was this. I want you to know it, in case you should ever have to grapple with a similar task. Not a single word did I read except as I wrote. But how is that, I hear someone say; did you write without knowing what it was that you were writing? Ah! but from the very first it was enough for me to know that it was a work of Tullius, and an extremely rare one too. And then as soon as I was fairly started I found at every step so much sweetness and charm, and felt so strong a desire to advance, that the only difficulty which I experienced in reading and writing at the same time came from the fact that my pen could not cover the ground so rapidly as I wanted it to, whereas my expectation had been rather that it would outstrip my eyes, and that my ardor for writing would be chilled by the slowness of my reading. So the pen held back the eye, and the eye drove on the pen, and I covered page after page, delighting in my task, and committing many and many a passage to memory as I wrote. For just in proportion as the writing is slower than the reading does the passage make a deep impression and cling to the mind.

And yet I must confess that I did finally reach a point in my copying where I was overcome by weariness; not mental, for how unlikely that would be where Cicero was concerned, but the sort of fatigue that springs from excessive manual labor. I began to feel doubtful about this plan that I was following, and to regret having undertaken a task for which I had not been trained; when suddenly I came across a place where Cicero tells how he himself copied the orations of—someone or other; just who it was I do not know, but certainly no Tullius, for there is but one such man, one such voice, one such mind. These are his words: 'You say that you have been in the habit of reading the orations of Cassius in your idle moments. But I, he jestingly adds, with his customary disregard of his adversary's feelings, 'have made a practice of copying them, so that I might have no idle moments.' As I read this passage I grew hot with shame, like a modest young soldier who hears the voice of his beloved leader rebuking him. I said to myself, 'So Cicero copied orations that another wrote, and you are not ready to copy his? What ardor! What scholarly devotion! What reverence for a man of godlike genius!' These thoughts were a spur to me, and I pushed on, with all my doubts dispelled. If ever from my darkness there shall come a single ray that can enhance the splendor of the reputation which his heavenly eloquence has won for him, it will proceed in no slight measure from the fact that I was so captivated by his ineffable sweetness that I did a thing in itself most irksome with such delight and eagerness that I scarcely knew I was doing it at all.

So then at last your Cicero has the happiness of returning to you, bearing you my thanks. And yet he also stays, very willingly, with me; a dear friend, to whom I give the credit of being almost the only man of letters for whose sake I would go to the length of spending my time, when the difficulties of life are pressing on me so sharply and inexorably and the cares pertaining to my literary labors make the longest life seem far too short, in transcribing compositions not my own. I may have done such things in former days, when I thought myself rich in time, and had not learned how stealthily it slips away: but I now know that this is of all our riches the most uncertain and fleeting; the years are closing in upon me now, and there is no longer any room for deviation from the beaten path. I am forced to practise strict economy; I only hope that I have not begun too late. But Cicero! he assuredly is worthy of a part of even the little that I still have left. Farewell.

THE ASCENT OF MOUNT VENTOUX

A Letter to Dionisio da Borgo San Sepolcro

Today I made the ascent of the highest mountain in this region, which is not improperly called Ventosum. My only motive was the wish to see what so great an elevation had to offer. I have had the expedition in mind for many years; for, as you know, I have lived in this region from infancy, having been cast here by that fate which determines the affairs of men. Consequently the mountain, which is visible from a great distance, was ever before my eyes, and I conceived the plan of some time doing what I have at last accomplished today. The idea took hold upon me with especial force when, in re-reading Livy's History of Rome, yesterday, I happened upon the place where Philip of Macedon, the same who waged war against the Romans, ascended Mount Hæmus in Thessaly, from whose summit he was able, it is said, to see two seas, the Adriatic and the Euxine. Whether this be true or false I have not been able to determine, for the mountain is too far away, and writers disagree. Pomponius Mela, the cosmographer—not to mention others who have spoken of this occurrence—admits its truth without hesitation; Titus Livius, on the other hand, considers it false. I, assuredly, should not have left the question long in doubt, had that mountain been as easy to explore as this one. Let us leave this matter on one side, however, and return to my mountain here,—it seems to me that a young man in private life may well be excused for attempting what an aged king could undertake without arousing criticism.

When I came to look about for a companion I found, strangely enough, that hardly one among my friends seemed suitable, so rarely do we meet with just the right combination of personal tastes and characteristics, even among those who are dearest to us. This one was too apathetic, that one over-anxious; this one too slow, that one too hasty; one was too sad, another over-cheerful; one more simple, another more sagacious, than I desired. I feared this one's taciturnity and that one's loquacity. The heavy deliberation of some repelled me as much as the lean incapacity of others. I rejected those who were likely to irritate me by a cold want of interest, as well as those who might weary me by their excessive enthusiasm. Such defects, however grave, could be borne with at home, for charity suffereth all things, and friendship accepts any burden; but it is quite otherwise on a journey, where every weakness becomes much more serious. So, as I was bent upon pleasure and anxious that my enjoyment should be unalloyed, I looked about me with unusual care, balanced against one another the various characteristics of my friends, and without committing any breach of friendship I silently condemned every trait which might prove disagreeable on the way. And—would you believe it?—I finally turned homeward for aid, and proposed the ascent to my only brother, who is younger than I, and with whom you are well acquainted. He was delighted and gratified beyond measure by the thought of holding the place of a friend as well as of a brother.

At the time fixed we left the house, and by evening reached Malaucène, which lies at the foot of the mountain, to the north. Having rested there a day, we finally made the ascent this morning with no companions except two servants; and a most difficult task it was. The mountain is a very steep and almost inaccessible mass of stony soil. But, as the poet has well said, 'Remorseless toil conquers all.' It was a long day, the air fine. We enjoyed the advantages of vigor of mind and strength and agility of body, and everything else essential to those engaged in such an undertaking, and so had no other difficulties to face than those of the region itself. We found an old shepherd in one of the mountain dales, who tried, at great length, to dissuade us from the ascent, saying that some fifty years before he had, in the same ardor of youth, reached the summit, but had gotten for his pains nothing except 10 fatigue and regret, and clothes and body torn by the rocks and briars. No one, so far as he or his companions knew, had ever tried the ascent before or after him. But his counsels increased rather than 15 diminished our desire to proceed, since youth is suspicious of warnings. So the old man, finding that his efforts were in vain, went a little way with us, and pointed out a rough path among the rocks, uttering 20 many admonitions, which he continued to send after us even after we had left him behind. Surrendering to him all such garments or other possessions as might prove burdensome to us, we made ready for the 25 ascent, and started off at a good pace. But, as usually happens, fatigue quickly followed upon our excessive exertion, and we soon came to a halt at the top of a certain cliff. Upon starting on again we 30 went more slowly, and I especially advanced along the rocky way with a more deliberate step. While my brother chose a direct path straight up the ridge, I weakly took an easier one which really descended. 35 When I was called back, and the right road was shown me, I replied that I hoped to find a better way round on the other side, and that I did not mind going farther if the path were only less steep. This was 40 just an excuse for my laziness; and when the others had already reached a considerable height I was still wandering in the valleys. I had failed to find an easier path, and had only increased the distance and 45 difficulty of the ascent. At last I became disgusted with the intricate way I had chosen and resolved to ascend without more ado. When I reached my brother, who, while waiting for me, had had ample 50 opportunity for rest, I was tired and irritated. We walked along together for a time, but hardly had we passed the first spur when I forgot about the circuitous route which I had just tried, and took a 55 lower one again. Once more I followed an easy, roundabout path through winding valleys, only to find myself soon in my old difficulty. I was simply trying to avoid the exertion of the ascent; but no human ingenuity can alter the nature of things, or cause anything to reach a height by 5 going down. Suffice it to say that, much to my vexation and my brother's amusement, I made this same mistake three times or more during a few hours.

After being frequently misled in this way, I finally sat down in a valley and transferred my winged thoughts from things corporeal to the immaterial, addressing myself as follows:—'What thou 10 hast repeatedly experienced today in the ascent of this mountain, happens to thee, as to many, in the journey toward the blessed life. But this is not so readily perceived by men, since the motions of the body are obvious and external while those of the 15 soul are invisible and hidden. Yes, the life which we call blessed is to be sought for on a high eminence, and strait is the way that leads to it. Many, also, are the hills that lie between, and we must ascend, by a glorious stairway, from strength to 20 strength. At the top is at once the end of our struggles and the goal for which we are bound. All wish to reach this goal, but, as Ovid says, "To wish is little; we must long with the utmost eagerness to 25 gain our end." Thou certainly dost ardently desire, as well as simply wish, unless thou deceivest thyself in this matter, as in so many others. What, then, doth 30 hold thee back? Nothing, assuredly, except that thou wouldst take a path which seems, at first thought, more easy, leading through low and worldly pleasures. But nevertheless in the end, after long wanderings, thou must perforce either climb 35 the steeper path, under the burden of tasks foolishly deferred, to its blessed culmination, or lie down in the valley of thy sins, and (I shudder to think of it!) if the shadow of death overtake thee, spend an 40 eternal night amid constant torments.' These thoughts stimulated both body and mind in a wonderful degree for facing the difficulties which yet remained. Oh, that I might traverse in spirit that other road for which I long day and night, even as today I overcame material obstacles by my bodily exertions! And I know not why it should 45 not be far easier, since the swift immortal soul can reach its goal in the twinkling of an eye, without passing through space, while my progress today was necessarily slow, dependent as I was upon a failing body weighed down by heavy members.

One peak of the mountain, the highest of all, the country people call 'Sonny,' why, I do not know, unless by antiphrasis, as I have sometimes suspected in other instances; for the peak in question would seem to be the father of all the surrounding ones. On its top is a little level place, and here we could at last rest our tired bodies.

Now, my father, since you have followed the thoughts that spurred me on in my ascent, listen to the rest of the story, and devote one hour, I pray you, to reviewing the experiences of my entire day. At first, owing to the unaccustomed quality of the air and the effect of the great sweep of view spread out before me, I stood like one dazed. I beheld the clouds under our feet, and what I had read of Athos and Olympus seemed less incredible as I myself witnessed the same things from a mountain of less fame. I turned my eyes toward Italy, whither my heart most inclined. The Alps, rugged and snow-capped, seemed to rise close by, although they were really at a great distance, the very same Alps through which that fierce enemy of the Roman name once made his way, bursting the rocks, if we may believe the report, by the application of vinegar. I sighed, I must confess, for the skies of Italy, which I beheld rather with my mind than with my eyes. An inexpressible longing came over me to see once more my friend and my country. At the same time I reproached myself for this double weakness, springing, as it did, from a soul not yet steeled to manly resistance. And yet there were excuses for both of these cravings, and a number of distinguished writers might be summoned to support me.

Then a new idea took possession of me, and I shifted my thoughts to a consideration of time rather than place. 'Today it is ten years since, having completed thy youthful studies, thou didst leave Bologna. Eternal God! In the name of immutable wisdom think what alterations in thy character this intervening period has beheld! I pass over a thousand instances. I am not yet in a safe harbor where I can calmly recall past storms. The time may come when I can review in due order all the experiences of the past, saying with St. Augustine, "I desire to recall my foul actions and the carnal corruption of my soul, not because I love them, but that I may the more love thee, O my God." Much that is doubtful and evil still clings to me, but what I once loved, that I love no longer. And yet what am I saying? I still love it, but with shame, but with heaviness of heart. Now, at last, I have confessed the truth. So it is. I love, but love what I would not love, what I would that I might hate. Though loath to do so, though constrained, though sad and sorrowing, still I do love, and I feel in my miserable self the truth of the well-known words, "I will hate if I can; if not, I will love against my will." Three years have not yet passed since that perverse and wicked passion which had a firm grasp upon me and held undisputed sway in my heart began to discover a rebellious opponent, who was unwilling longer to yield obedience. These two adversaries have joined in close combat for the supremacy, and for a long time now a harassing and doubtful war has been waged in the field of my thoughts.'

Thus I turned over the last ten years in my mind, and then, fixing my anxious gaze on the future, I asked myself, 'If, perchance, thou shouldst prolong this uncertain life of thine for yet two lusters, and shouldst make an advance toward virtue proportionate to the distance to which thou hast departed from thine original infatuation during the past two years, since the new longing first encountered the old, couldst thou, on reaching thy fortieth year, face death, if not with complete assurance, at least with hopefulness, calmly dismissing from thy thoughts the residuum of life as it faded into old age?'

These and similar reflections occurred to me, my father. I rejoiced in my progress, mourned my weaknesses, and commiserated the universal instability of human conduct. I had well-nigh forgotten where I was and our object in coming; but at last I dismissed my anxieties, which were better suited to other surroundings, and resolved to look about me and see what we had come to see. The sinking sun and the lengthening shadows of the mountain were already warning us that the time was near at hand when we must go. As if suddenly awakened from sleep, I turned about and gazed toward the west. I was unable to discern the summits of the Pyrenees, which form the barrier between France and Spain; not because of any intervening obstacle that I know of but owing simply to the insufficiency of our mortal vision. But I could see with the utmost clearness, off to the right, the mountains of the region about Lyons, and to the left the bay of Marseilles and the waters that lash the shores of Aigues Mortes, although all these places were so distant that it would require a journey of several days to reach them. Under our very eyes flowed the Rhone.

While I was thus dividing my thoughts, now turning my attention to some terrestrial object that lay before me, now raising my soul, as I had done my body, to higher planes, it occurred to me to look into my copy of St. Augustine's Confessions, a gift that I owe to your love, and that I always have about me, in memory of both the author and the giver. I opened the compact little volume, small indeed in size, but of infinite charm, with the intention of reading whatever came to hand, for I could happen upon nothing that would be otherwise than edifying and devout. Now it chanced that the tenth book presented itself. My brother, waiting to hear something of St. Augustine's from my lips, stood attentively by. I call him, and God too, to witness that where I first fixed my eyes it was written: 'And men go about to wonder at the heights of the mountains, and the mighty waves of the sea, and the wide sweep of rivers, and the circuit of the ocean, and the revolution of the stars, but themselves they consider not.' I was abashed, and, asking my brother (who was anxious to hear more), not to annoy me, I closed the book, angry with myself that I should still be admiring earthly things who might long ago have learned from even the pagan philosophers that nothing is wonderful but the soul, which, when great itself, finds nothing great outside itself. Then, in truth, I was satisfied that I had seen enough of the mountain; I turned my inward eye upon myself, and from that time not a syllable fell from my lips until we reached the bottom again. Those words had given me occupation enough, for I could not believe that it was by a mere accident that I happened upon them. What I had there read I believed to be addressed to me and to no other, remembering that St. Augustine had once suspected the same thing in his own case, when on opening the book of the Apostle, as he himself tells us, the first words that he saw there were,

'Not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof.'

The same thing happened earlier to St. Anthony, when he was listening to the Gospel where it is written, 'If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me.' Believing this scripture to have been read for his especial benefit, as his biographer Athanasius says, he guided himself by its aid to the Kingdom of Heaven. And as Anthony on hearing these words waited for nothing more, and as Augustine upon reading the Apostle's admonition sought no farther, so I concluded my reading in the few words which I have given. I thought in silence of the lack of good counsel in us mortals, who neglect what is noblest in ourselves, scatter our energies in all directions, and waste ourselves in a vain show, because we look about us for what is to be found only within. I wondered at the natural nobility of our soul, save when it debases itself of its own free will, and deserts its original estate, turning what God has given it for its honor into dishonor. How many times, think you, did I turn back that day, to glance at the summit of the mountain, which seemed scarcely a cubit high compared with the range of human contemplation,—when it is not immersed in the foul mire of earth? With every downward step I asked myself this: If we are ready to endure so much sweat and labor in order that we may bring our bodies a little nearer heaven, how can a soul struggling toward God, up the steepes of human pride and human destiny, fear any cross or prison or sting of fortune? How few, I thought, but are diverted from their path by the fear of difficulties or the love of ease! How happy the lot of those few, if any such there be! It is of them, assuredly, that the poet was thinking, when he wrote:

Happy the man who is skilled to understand
Nature's hid causes; who beneath his feet
All terrors casts, and death's relentless doom,
And the loud roar of greedy Acheron.

How earnestly should we strive, not to stand on mountain-tops, but to trample beneath us those appetites which spring from earthly impulses.

Malaucène, April 26 (1336 or 1337).

BALLAD I

LAURA'S VEIL

Translated by Nott

Wherefore my unkind fair one, say,
 Whether the sun fierce darts his ray,
 Or whether gloom o'erspreads the sky,
 That envious veil is ne'er thrown by;
 Though well you read my heart, and knew
 How much I longed your charms to view?
 While I concealed each tender thought,
 That my fond mind's destruction wrought,
 Your face with pity sweetly shone;
 But, when love made my passion known,
 Your sunny locks were seen no more,
 Nor smiled your eyes as heretofore;
 Behind a jealous cloud retired
 Those beauties which I most admired.
 And shall a veil thus rule my fate?
 O cruel veil, that whether heat
 Or cold be felt, art doomed to prove Fatal to me, shadowing the lights I love!

SONNET XLVII

Translated by Lady Dacre

Blest be the year, the month, the hour, the day,
 The season and the time, and point of space,
 And blest the beauteous country and the place
 Where first of two bright eyes I felt the sway:
 Blest the sweet pain of which I was the prey,
 When newly doomed Love's sovereign law to embrace
 And blest the bow and shaft to which I trace
 The wound that to my inmost heart found way:
 Blest be the ceaseless accents of my tongue,
 Unwearied breathing my loved lady's name:
 Blest my fond wishes, sighs, and tears, and pains:
 Blest be the lays in which her praise I sung,
 That on all sides acquired to her fair fame,
 And blest my thoughts! for o'er them all she reigns.

SONNET XCV

Translated by Macgregor

My sixteenth year of sighs its course has run,
 I stand alone, already on the brow
 Where Age descends: and yet it seems as now
 My time of trial only were begun.
 'Tis sweet to love and good to be undone;
 Though life be hard, more days may Heaven allow Misfortune to outlive: else Death may bow

5

The bright head low my loving praise that won.
 Here am I now who fain would be elsewhere;
 More would I wish and yet no more I would;
 I could no more and yet did all I could:
 And new tears born of old desires declare
 That still I am as I was wont to be,
 And that a thousand changes change not me.

SONNET CXXXII

Translated by Macgregor

As o'er the fresh grass her fair form its sweet
 And graceful passage makes at evening hours,
 Seems as around the newly-waking flowers
 Found virtue issue from her delicate feet.
 Love, which in true hearts only has his seat,
 Nor elsewhere deigns to prove his certain powers,
 So warm a pleasure from her bright eyes showers,
 No other bliss I ask, no better meat.
 And with her soft look and light step agree
 Her mild and modest, never eager air,
 And sweetest words in constant union rare.
 From these four sparks—nor only these we see—
 Springs the great fire wherein I live and burn,
 Which makes me from the sun as night-birds turn.

CANZONE VI

A DREAM OF LAURA DEAD

Translated by Lady Dacre

When she, the faithful soother of my pain,
 This life's long weary pilgrimage to cheer,
 Vouchsafes beside my nightly couch to appear,
 With her sweet speech attempering reason's strain;
 O'ercome by tenderness, and terror vain,
 I cry, 'Whence comest thou, O spirit blest?'
 She from her beauteous breast
 A branch of laurel and of palm displays,
 And, answering, thus she says:
 'From th' empyrean seat of holy love
 Alone thy sorrows to console I move.'

5

In actions and in words, in humble guise
 I speak my thanks, and ask, 'How may it be
 That thou shouldst know my wretched state?' and she:
 'Thy floods of tears perpetual, and thy sighs
 Breathed forth unceasing, to high heaven arise,
 And there disturb my blissful state serene;
 So grievous hath it been,
 That freed from this poor being, I at last
 To a better life have passed,
 Which should have joyed thee hadst thou loved as well
 As thy sad brow, and sadder numbers tell.'

15

'Oh! not thy ills, I but deplore my own,
 In darkness, and in grief remaining here,
 Certain that thou hast reached the highest sphere, 25
 As of a thing that man hath seen and known.
 Would God and Nature to the world have shown
 Such virtue in a young and gentle breast,
 Were not eternal rest
 The appointed guerdon of a life so fair? 30
 Thou! of the spirits rare,
 Who, from a course unspotted, pure and high,
 Are suddenly translated to the sky.

'But I! how can I cease to weep? forlorn,
 Without thee nothing, wretched, desolate! 35
 Oh, in the cradle had I met my fate,
 Or at the breast! and not to love been born!
 And she: 'Why by consuming grief thus worn?
 Were it not better spread aloft thy wings,
 And now all mortal things, 40
 With these thy sweet and idle fantasies,
 At their just value prize,
 And follow me, if true thy tender vows,
 Gathering henceforth with me these honored boughs?'

Then answering her:—'Fain would I thou shouldst say 45
 What these two verdant branches signify.'
 'Methinks,' she says, 'thou mayest thyself reply,
 Whose pen has graced the one by many a lay.
 The palm shows victory; and in youth's bright day
 I overcame the world, and my weak heart: 50
 The triumph mine in part,
 Glory to Him who made my weakness strength!
 And thou, yet turn at length!
 'Gainst other powers His gracious aid implore,
 That we may be with Him thy trial o'er!' 55

'Are these the crispéd locks, and links of gold
 That bind me still? And these the radiant eyes,
 To me the Sun?' 'Err not with the unwise,
 Nor think,' she says, 'as they are wont. Behold
 In me a spirit among the blest enrolled; 60
 Thou seekest what hath long been earth again:
 Yet to relieve thy pain
 'Tis given me thus to appear, ere I resume
 That beauty from the tomb,
 More loved, that I, severe in pity, win 65
 Thy soul with mine to Heaven, from death and sin.'

I weep: and she my cheek,
 Soft sighing, with her own fair hand will dry;
 And, gently chiding, speak
 In tones of power to rive hard rocks in twain; 70
 Then vanishing, sleep follows in her train.

BOCCACCIO (1313-1375)

'Petrarch and Boccaccio,' says Professor Ker, 'determined the course of the principal streams of poetry in all the languages of Europe for more than two centuries after their lifetime, and, in some important respects, even to the present day. . . . Boccaccio is the first adventurer in that long line of poets, in all the nations, who have tried for the prize of the epic. . . . He is one of the first of modern writers to try for the form and the spirit of classical literature.' At the same time he has firm attachments to the Middle Ages: he wrote, quite in the medieval spirit, encyclopedias of classical mythology, of princes who came to misfortune, and of women of renown, whereby poets might adorn their verses with classical allusions. 'Boccaccio was a professor in his old age; when he came to Virgil in his Dante lectures he had nothing to tell his audience about Virgil's diction nor about the idea of a Heroic Poem; he told them that Virgil was an astrologer who lived at Naples, and who made a brazen fly and a bronze horse and the two heads, one weeping and the other laughing, set up at the two sides of the Porta Nolana.'

But Boccaccio was modern in his keen sense of literary form and structure. He had 'a natural gift for story-telling, and for coherence in story-telling. His talent for composition, design, arrangement, gives him his rank among literary reformers.' Beside the Decameron, which is a most important landmark in the history of European fiction, he wrote the first pastoral romance in intermingled prose and verse, the Ameto, which had many successors in that kind, now known only to students of literary history. His Filostrato and Teseide furnished much more than the outlines of some of the best work of Chaucer, who learnt from him important lessons of proportion and design. Quite apart from these literary influences and achievements, he remains one of the best of story-tellers, whom fiction-lovers of the present day, innocent of all antiquarian curiosity, will turn to for the sake of a well-told tale. In spite of the changes of literary taste and fashion, his appeal to the ordinary reader has stood firm throughout the ages.

Giovanni Boccaccio, the illegitimate son of a Certaldo merchant, was first set by his father to business, which he disliked, and then to the study of law, but he was determined to devote himself to literature. His father sent him, when he was still a boy, to Naples, where he fell in love with a local beauty, a lady of high rank, whom he celebrated as the heroine of his early prose romances, Filocolo and Fiammetta. It is noteworthy that while Dante's Beatrice is etherialized into a symbol, and Petrarch's Laura became not much more than a literary subject and inspiration, Boccaccio's Fiammetta is always to him a living woman. In his maturity he made her one of the story-tellers of the Decameron, which he wrote during the years 1348-53, a period remarkable also for the beginning of his friendship with Petrarch and of his active service to the city of Florence as ambassador to Rome, Ravenna, Avignon, and other European courts. He persuaded the Florentines to appoint a wandering Greek scholar as professor of Greek, and with his help made prose versions of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, which he sent on to Petrarch; he himself gave lectures on the works of Dante and wrote a commentary on the Divine Comedy. His last years were spent in retirement at Certaldo, a village in Florentine territory, where the house in which he worked and died is still preserved.

THE DECAMERON—FIRST DAY

From the translation by J. M. Rigg

[In 1348] in the illustrious city of Florence, the fairest of all the cities of Italy, there made its appearance that deadly pestilence, which, whether disseminated by the influence of the celestial bodies, or sent upon us mortals by God in His just wrath by way of retribution for our iniquities, had had its origin some years before in the East, whence, after destroying an innumerable multitude of living beings, it had propagated itself without respite from place to place, and so, calamitously, had spread into the West.

In Florence, despite all that human wisdom and forethought could devise to avert it, as the cleansing of the city from many impurities by officials appointed for the purpose, the refusal of entrance to all sick folk, and the adoption of many precautions for the preservation of health; despite also 10 humble supplications addressed to God, and often repeated both in public procession and otherwise, by the devout; towards the beginning of the spring of the said year the doleful effects of the pestilence began 15 to be horribly apparent by symptoms that showed as if miraculous.

Not such were they as in the East, where an issue of blood from the nose was a manifest sign of inevitable death; but 20 in men and women alike it first betrayed itself by the emergence of certain tumors in the groin or the armpits, some of which grew as large as a common apple, others as an egg, some more, some less, which the 25 common folk called gavoccioli. From the two said parts of the body this deadly gavocciolo soon began to propagate and spread itself in all directions indifferently; after which the form of the malady began 30 to change, black spots or livid making their appearance in many cases on the arm or the thigh or elsewhere, now few and large, now minute and numerous. And as the gavocciolo had been and still was an in- 35 fallible token of approaching death, such also were these spots on whomsoever they showed themselves. Which maladies seemed to set entirely at naught both the art of the physician and the virtues of 40 physic; indeed, whether it was that the disorder was of a nature to defy such treatment, or that the physicians were at fault—beside the qualified there was now a multitude both of men and of women who prac- 45 tised without having received the slightest tincture of medical science—and, being in ignorance of its source, failed to apply the proper remedies; in either case, not merely were those that recovered few, but almost 50 all within three days from the appearance of the said symptoms, sooner or later, died, and in most cases without any fever or other attendant malady.

Moreover, the virulence of the pest was 55 the greater by reason that intercourse was apt to convey it from the sick to the whole, just as fire devours things dry or greasy when they are brought close to it. Nay, the evil went yet further, for not merely by speech or association with the sick was the malady communicated to the healthy 5 with consequent peril of common death, but any that touched the clothes of the sick or aught else that had been touched or used by them seemed thereby to contract the disease.

So marvelous sounds that which I have now to relate, that, had not many, and I among them, observed it with their own eyes, I had hardly dared to credit it, much less to set it down in writing, though I 15 had had it from the lips of a credible witness.

I say, then, that such was the energy of the contagion of the said pestilence, that it was not merely propagated from man to man, but, what is much more startling, it was frequently observed, that things which had belonged to one sick or dead of the disease, if touched by some other living creature, not of the human species, were the occasion, not merely of sickening, but of an almost instantaneous death. Whereof my own eyes (as I said a little before) had cognizance, one day among others, by the following experience. The rags of a poor man who had died of the disease being strewn about the open street, two hogs came thither, and after, as is their wont, no little trifling with their snouts, took the rags between their teeth and 25 tossed them to and fro about their chaps; whereupon, almost immediately, they gave a few turns, and fell down dead, as if by poison, upon the rags which in an evil hour they had disturbed.

In which circumstances, not to speak of many others of a similar or even graver complexion, divers apprehensions and imaginations were engendered in the minds of such as were left alive, inclining almost all of them to the same harsh resolution, to wit, to shun and abhor all contact with the sick and all that belonged to them, thinking thereby to make each his own health secure. Among whom there were those who thought that to live temperately and avoid all excess would count for much as a preservative against seizures of this kind. Wherefore they banded together, and, dissociating themselves from all others, formed communities in houses where there were no sick, and lived a separate and secluded life, which they regulated with the utmost care, avoiding every kind of luxury, but eating and drinking very moderately of the most delicate viands and the finest wines, holding converse with none but one another, lest tidings of sickness or death should reach them, and diverting their minds with music and such other delights as they could devise. Others, the bias of whose minds was in the opposite direction, maintained that to drink freely, frequent places of public resort, and take their pleasure with song and revel, sparing to satisfy no appetite and to laugh and mock at no event, was the sovereign remedy for so great an evil; and that which they affirmed they also put in practice, so far as they were able, resorting day and night, now to this tavern, now to that, drinking with an entire disregard of rule or measure, and by preference making the houses of others, as it were, their inns, if they but saw in them aught that was particularly to their taste or liking, which they were readily able to do, because the owners, seeing death imminent, had become as reckless of their property as of their lives; so that most of the houses were open to all comers, and no distinction was observed between the stranger who presented himself and the rightful lord. Thus, adhering ever to their inhuman determination to shun the sick, as far as possible, they ordered their life. In this extremity of our city's suffering and tribulation the venerable authority of laws, human and divine, was abased and all but totally dissolved, for lack of those who should have administered and enforced them, most of whom, like the rest of the citizens, were either dead or sick, or so hard bested for servants that they were unable to execute any office; whereby every man was free to do what was right in his own eyes.

Not a few there were who belonged to neither of the two said parties, but kept a middle course between them, neither laying the same restraint upon their diet as the former, nor allowing themselves the same license in drinking and other dissipations as the latter, but living with a degree of freedom sufficient to satisfy their appetites, and not as recluses. They therefore walked abroad, carrying in their hands flowers or fragrant herbs or divers sorts of spices, which they frequently raised to their noses, deeming it an excellent thing thus to comfort the brain with such perfumes, because the air seemed to be everywhere laden and reeking with the stench emitted by the dead and the dying, and the odors of drugs.

Some again, the most sound, perhaps, in judgment, as they were also the most harsh in temper of all, affirmed that there was no medicine for the disease superior or equal in efficacy to flight; following which prescription a multitude of men and women, negligent of all but themselves, deserted their city, their houses, their estates, their kinsfolk, their goods, and went into voluntary exile, or migrated to the country parts, as if God in visiting men with this pestilence in requital of their iniquities would not pursue them with His wrath wherever they might be, but intended the destruction of such alone as remained within the circuit of the walls of the city; or deeming, perchance, that it was now time for all to flee from it, and that its last hour was come.

Of the adherents of these divers opinions not all died, neither did all escape; but rather there were, of each sort and in every place, many that sickened, and by those who retained their health were treated after the example which they themselves, while whole, had set, being everywhere left to languish in almost total neglect. Tedious were it to recount, how citizen avoided citizen, how among neighbors was scarce found any that showed fellow-feeling for another, how kinsfolk held aloof, and never met, or but rarely; enough that this sore affliction entered so deep into the minds of men and women, that in the horror thereof brother was forsaken by brother, nephew by uncle, brother by sister, and oftentimes husband by wife; nay, what is more and scarcely to be believed, fathers and mothers were found to abandon their own children, untended, unvisited, to their fate, as if they had been strangers. Wherefore the sick of both sexes, whose number could not be estimated, were left without resource but in the charity of friends (and few such there were), or the interest of servants, who were hardly to be had at high rates and on unseemly terms, and being, moreover, one and all, men and women of gross understanding, and for the most part unused to such offices, concerned themselves no further than to supply the immediate and expressed wants of the sick, and to watch them die; in which service they themselves not seldom perished with their gains. In consequence of which dearth of servants and direliction of the sick by neighbors, kinsfolk and friends, it came to pass—a thing, perhaps, never before heard of—that no woman, however dainty, fair or well-born she might be, shrank, when stricken with the disease, from the ministrations of a man, no matter whether he were young or no, or scrupled to expose to him every part of her body, with no more shame than if he had been a woman, submitting of necessity to that which her malady required; wherefrom, perchance, there resulted in after-time some loss of modesty in such as recovered. Beside which many succumbed, who, with proper attendance, would, perhaps have escaped death; so that, what with the virulence of the plague and the lack of due tendance of the sick, the multitude of the deaths, that daily and nightly took place in the city, was such that those who heard the tale—not to say witnessed the fact—were struck dumb with amazement. Whereby, practises contrary to the former habits of the citizens could hardly fail to grow up among the survivors.

It had been, as today it still is, the custom for the women that were neighbors and of kin to the deceased to gather in his house with the women that were most closely connected with him, to wail with them in common, while on the other hand his male kinsfolk and neighbors, with not a few of the other citizens, and a due proportion of the clergy according to his quality, assembled without, in front of the house, to receive the corpse; and so the dead man was borne on the shoulders of his peers, with funeral pomp of taper and dirge, to the church selected by him before his death. Which rites, as the pestilence waxed in fury, were either in whole or in great part disused, and gave way to others of a novel order. For not only did no crowd of women surround the bed of the dying, but many passed from this life unregarded, and few indeed were they to whom were accorded the lamentations and bitter tears of sorrowing relations; nay, for the most part, their place was taken by the laugh, the jest, the festal gathering; observances which the women, domestic piety in large measure set aside, had adopted with very great advantage to their health. Few also there were whose bodies were attended to the church by more than ten or twelve of their neighbors, and those not the most honorable and respected citizens, but a sort of corpse-carriers drawn from the baser ranks, who called themselves becchini and performed such offices for hire, would shoulder the bier, and with hurried steps carry it, not to the church of the dead man's choice, but to that which was nearest at hand, with four or six priests in front and a candle or two, or perhaps, none; nor did the priests distress themselves with too long and solemn an office, but with the aid of the becchini hastily consigned the corpse to the first tomb which they found untenanted. The condition of the lower, and, perhaps, in great measure, of the middle ranks of the people showed even worse and more deplorable; for, deluded by hope or constrained by poverty, they stayed in their quarters, in their houses, where they sickened by thousands a day, and, being without service or help of any kind, were, so to speak, irredeemably devoted to the death which overtook them. Many died daily or nightly in the public streets; of many others, who died at home, the departure was hardly observed by their neighbors, until the stench of their putrefying bodies carried the tidings; and what with their corpses and the corpses of others who died on every hand the whole place was a sepulcher.

It was the common practise of most of the neighbors, moved no less by fear of contamination by the putrefying bodies than by charity towards the deceased, to drag the corpses out of the houses with their own hands, aided, perhaps, by a porter, if a porter was to be had, and to lay them in front of the doors, where any one who made the round might have seen, especially in the morning, more of them than he could count; afterwards they would have biers brought up, or, in default, planks, whereon they laid them. Nor was it once or twice only that one and the same bier carried two or three corpses at once; but quite a considerable number of such cases occurred, one bier sufficing for husband and wife, two or three brothers, father and son, and so forth. And times without number it happened, that, as two priests, bearing the cross, were on their way to perform the last office for some one, three or four biers were brought up by the porters in rear of them, so that, whereas the priests supposed that they had but one corpse to bury, they discovered that there were six or eight, or sometimes more. Nor, for all their number, were their obsequies honored by either tears or lights or crowds of mourners; rather, it was come to this, that a dead man was then of no more account than a dead goat would be today. From all which it is abundantly manifest, that that lesson of patient resignation, which the sages were never able to learn from the slight and infrequent mishaps which occur in the natural course of events, was now brought home even to the minds of the simple by the magnitude of their disasters, so that they became indifferent to them.

As consecrated ground there was not in extent sufficient to provide tombs for the vast multitude of corpses which day and night and almost every hour were brought in eager haste to the churches for interment, least of all, if ancient custom were to be observed and a separate resting-place assigned to each, they dug, for each graveyard, as soon as it was full, a huge trench, in which they laid the corpses as they arrived by hundreds at a time, piling them up as merchandise is stowed in the hold of a ship, tier upon tier, each covered with a little earth, until the trench would hold no more.

But I spare to rehearse with minute particularity each of the woes that came upon our city, and say in brief, that, harsh as was the tenor of her fortunes, the surrounding country knew no mitigation; for there—not to speak of the castles, each, as it were, a little city in itself—in sequestered village, or on the open champaign, by the wayside, on the farm, in the homestead, the poor hapless husbandmen and their families, forlorn of physicians' care or servants' tendance, perished day and night alike, not as men, but rather as beasts. Wherefore, they too, like the citizens, abandoned all rule of life, all habit of industry, all counsel of prudence; nay, one and all, as if expecting each day to be their last, not merely ceased to aid Nature to yield her fruit in due season of their beasts and their lands and their past labors, but left no means unused, which ingenuity could devise, to waste their accumulated store; denying shelter to their oxen, asses, sheep, goats, pigs, fowls, nay, even to their dogs, man's most faithful companions, and driving them out into the fields to roam at large amid the unsheaved, nay, unreaped corn. Many of which, as if endowed with reason, took their fill during the day, and returned home at night without any guidance of herdsman.

But enough of the country! What need we add, but (reverting to the city) that such and so grievous was the harshness of heaven, and perhaps, in some degree of man, that, what with the fury of the pestilence, the panic of those whom it spared, and their consequent neglect or desertion of not a few of the stricken in their need, it is believed without any manner of doubt, that between March and the ensuing July upwards of a hundred thousand human beings lost their lives within the walls of the city of Florence, which before the deadly visitation would not have been supposed to contain so many people! How many grand palaces, how many stately homes, how many splendid residences, once full of retainers, of lords, of ladies, were now left desolate of all, even to the meanest servant! How many families of historic fame, of vast ancestral domains, and wealth proverbial, found now no scion to continue the succession! How many brave men, how many fair ladies, how many gallant youths whom any physician, were he Galen, Hippocrates, or Æsculapius himself, would have pronounced in the soundest of health, broke fast with their kinsfolk, comrades and friends in the morning, and when evening came, supped with their forefathers in the other world!

Irk some it is to myself to rehearse in detail so sorrowful a history. Wherefore, being minded to pass over so much thereof as I fairly can, I say, that our city being thus well-nigh depopulated, it so happened, as I afterwards learned from one worthy of credit, that on a Tuesday morning after Divine Service the venerable church of Santa Maria Novella was almost deserted save for the presence of seven young ladies habited sadly in keeping with the season. All were connected either by blood or at least as friends or neighbors; and fair and of good understanding were they all, as also of noble birth, gentle manners, and a modest sprightliness. In age none exceeded twenty-eight, or fell short of eighteen years. Their names I would set down in due form, had I not good reason to withhold them, being solicitous lest the matters which here ensue, as told and heard by them, should in after-time be occasion of reproach to any of them, in view of the ample indulgence which was then, for the reasons heretofore set forth, accorded to the lighter hours of persons of much riper years than they, but which the manners of today have somewhat restricted; nor would I furnish material to detractors, ever ready to bestow their bite where praise is due, to cast by invidious speech the least slur upon the honor of these noble ladies.

THE STORY OF GRISELDA

Translated by J. M. Rigg

There was in olden days a certain Marquis of Saluzzo, Gualtieri by name, a young man, but head of the house, who, having neither wife nor child, passed his time in nought else but in hawking and hunting, and of taking a wife and begetting children had no thought; wherein he should have been accounted very wise: but his vassals, brooking it ill, did oftentimes entreat him to take a wife, that he might not die without an heir, and they be left without a lord; offering to find him one of such a pattern, and of such parentage, that he might marry with good hope, and be well content with the sequel. To whom, 'My friends,' replied Gualtieri, 'you enforce me to that which I had resolved never to do, seeing how hard it is to find a wife, whose ways accord well with one's own, and how plentiful is the supply of such as run counter thereto, and how grievous a life he leads who chances upon a lady that matches ill with him. And to say that you think to know the daughters by the qualities of their fathers and mothers, and thereby—so you would argue—to provide me with a wife to my liking, is but folly; for I wot not how you may penetrate the secrets of their mothers so as to know their fathers; and granted that you do know them, daughters oftentimes resemble neither of their parents. However, as you are minded to rivet these fetters upon me, I am content that so it be; and that I may have no cause to reproach any but myself, should it turn out ill, I am resolved that my wife shall be of my own choosing; but of this rest assured, that, no matter whom I choose, if she receive not from you the honor due to a lady, you shall prove to your great cost how sorely I resent being thus constrained by your importunity to take a wife against my will.'

The worthy men replied that they were well content, so only he would marry without more ado. And Gualtieri, who had long noted with approval the mien of a poor girl that dwelt on a farm hard by his house, and found her fair enough, deemed that with her he might pass a tolerably happy life. Wherefore he sought no further, but forthwith resolved to marry her; and having sent for her father, who was a very poor man, he contracted with him to take her to wife. Which done, Gualtieri assembled all the friends he had in those parts, and, 'My friends,' quoth he, 'you were and are minded that I should take a wife, and rather to comply with your wishes, than for any desire that I had to marry, I have made up my mind to do so. You remember the promise you gave me, to wit, that, whomsoever I should take, you would pay her the honor due to a lady. Which promise I now require you to keep, the time being come when I am to keep mine. I have found hard by here a maiden after mine own heart, whom I purpose to take to wife, and to bring hither to my house in the course of a few days. Wherefore bethink you, how you may make the nuptial feast splendid, and welcome her with all honor, that I may confess myself satisfied with your observance of your promise, as you will be with my observance of mine.' The worthy men, one and all, answered with alacrity that they were well content, and that, whoever she might be, they would entreat her as a lady, and pay her all due honor as such. After which, they all addressed them to make goodly and grand and gladsome celebration of the event, as did also Gualtieri. He arranged for a wedding most stately and fair, and bade thereto a goodly number of his friends and kinsfolk, and great gentlemen, and others, of the neighborhood; and therewithal he caused many a fine and costly robe to be cut and fashioned to the figure of a girl who seemed to him of the like proportions as the girl that he proposed to wed; and laid in store, besides, of girdles and rings, with a costly and beautiful crown, and all the other paraphernalia of a bride.

The day that he appointed for the wedding being come, about half tierce he got him to horse with as many as had come to do him honor, and having made all needful dispositions, 'Gentlemen,' quoth he, 'tis time to go bring home the bride.' And so away he rode with his company to the village; where, being come to the house of the girl's father, they found her returning from the spring with a bucket of water, making all the haste she could, that she might afterwards go with the other women to see Gualtieri's bride come by. Whom Gualtieri no sooner saw, than he called her by her name, to wit, Griselda, and asked her where her father was. To whom she modestly made answer:—'My lord, he is in the house.' Whereupon Gualtieri dismounted, and having bidden the rest await him without, entered the cottage alone; and meeting her father, whose name was Giannucolo, 'I am come,' quoth he, 'to wed Griselda, but first of all there are some matters I would learn from her own lips in thy presence.' He then asked her, whether, if he took her to wife, she would study to comply with his wishes, and be not wroth, no matter what he might say or do, and be obedient, with not a few other questions of a like sort; to all which she answered, Aye. Whereupon Gualtieri took her by the hand, led her forth, and before the eyes of all his company, and as many other folk as were there, caused her to strip naked, and let bring the garments that he had had fashioned for her, and had her forthwith arrayed therein, and upon her unkempt head let set a crown; and then, while all wondered, 'Gentlemen,' quoth he, 'this is she whom I purpose to make my wife, so she be minded to have me for husband.' Then, she standing abashed and astonished, he turned to her, saying:—'Griselda, wilt thou have me for thy husband?' To whom, 'Aye, my lord,' answered she. 'And I will have thee to wife,' said he, and married her before them all. And having set her upon a palfrey, he brought her home with pomp.

The wedding was fair and stately, and had he married a daughter of the King of France, the feast could not have been more splendid. It seemed as if, with the change of her garb, the bride had acquired a new dignity of mind and mien. She was, as we have said, fair of form and feature; and therewithal she was now grown so engaging and gracious and debonair, that she showed no longer as the shepherdess and the daughter of Giannucolo, but as the daughter of some noble lord, insomuch that she caused as many as had known her before to marvel. Moreover, she was so obedient and devoted to her husband, that he deemed himself the happiest and luckiest man in the world. And likewise so gracious and kindly was she to her husband's vassals, that there was none of them but loved her more dearly than himself, and was zealous to do her honor and prayed for her welfare and prosperity and aggrandisement, and instead of, as erstwhile, saying that Gualtieri had done foolishly to take her to wife, now averred that he had not his like in the world for wisdom and discernment, for that, save to him, her noble qualities would ever have remained hidden under her sorry apparel and the garb of the peasant girl. And in short she so comported herself as in no long time to bring it to pass that, not only in the marquise, but far and wide besides, her virtues and her admirable conversation were matter of common talk, and, if aught had been said to the disadvantage of her husband, when he married her, the judgment was now altogether to the contrary effect.

She had not been long with Gualtieri before she conceived; and in due time she was delivered of a girl, whereat Gualtieri made great cheer. But, soon after, a strange humor took possession of him, to wit, to put her patience to the proof by prolonged and intolerable hard usage; wherefore he began by afflicting her with his gibes, putting on a vexed air, and telling her that his vassals were most sorely dissatisfied with her by reason of her base condition, and all the more so since they saw that she was a mother, and that they did naught but most ruefully murmur at the birth of a daughter. Whereunto Griselda, without the least change of countenance or sign of discomposure, made answer:—'My lord, do with me as thou mayest deem best for thine own honor and comfort, for well I wot that I am of less account than they, and unworthy of this honorable estate to which of thy courtesy thou hast advanced me.' By which answer Gualtieri was well pleased, witting that she was in no degree puffed up with pride by his or any other's honorable entreatment of her. A while afterwards, having in general terms given his wife to understand that the vassals could not endure her daughter, he sent her a message by a servant. So the servant came, and 'Madame,' quoth he with a dolorous mien, 'so I value my life, I must needs do my lord's bidding. He has bidden me take your daughter and . . .' He said no more, but the lady by what she heard, and read in his face, and remembered of her husband's words, understood that he was bidden to put the child to death. Whereupon she presently took the child from the cradle, and having kissed and blessed her, albeit she was very sore at heart, she changed not countenance, but placed it in the servant's arms, saying:—'See that thou leave nought undone that my lord and thine has charged thee to do, but leave her not so that the beasts and the birds devour her, unless he have so bidden thee.' So the servant took the child, and told Gualtieri what the lady had said; and Gualtieri, marveling at her constancy, sent him with the child to Bologna, to one of his kinswomen, whom he besought to rear and educate the child with all care, but never to let it be known whose child she was.

Soon after it befell that the lady again conceived, and in due time was delivered of a son, whereat Gualtieri was overjoyed. But, not content with what he had done, he now even more poignantly afflicted the lady; and one day with a ruffled mien, 'Wife,' quoth he, 'since thou gavest birth to this boy, I may on no wise live in peace with my vassals, so bitterly do they reproach me that a grandson of Giannucolo is to succeed me as their lord; and therefore I fear that, so I be not minded to be sent a packing hence, I must even do herein as I did before, and in the end put thee away, and take another wife.' The lady heard him patiently, and answered only:—'My lord, study how thou mayst content thee and best please thyself, and waste no thought upon me, for there is nought I desire save in so far as I know that 'tis thy pleasure.' Not many days after, Gualtieri, in like manner as he had sent for the daughter, sent for the son, and having made a show of putting him to death, provided for his, as for the girl's nurture, at Bologna. Whereat the lady showed no more discomposure of countenance or speech than at the loss of her daughter: which Gualtieri found passing strange, and inly affirmed that there was never another woman in the world that would have so done. And but that he had marked that she was most tenderly affectionate towards her children, while 'twas well pleasing to him, he had supposed that she was tired of them, whereas he knew that 'twas of her discretion that she so did. His vassals, who believed that he had put the children to death, held him mightily to blame for his cruelty, and felt the utmost compassion for the lady. She, however, said never aught to the ladies that condoled with her on the death of her children, but that the pleasure of him that had begotten them was her pleasure likewise.

Years not a few had passed since the girl's birth, when Gualtieri at length deemed the time come to put his wife's patience to the final proof. Accordingly, in the presence of a great company of his vassals he declared that on no wise might he longer brook to have Griselda to wife, that he confessed that in taking her he had done a sorry thing and the act of a stripling, and that he therefore meant to do what he could to procure the Pope's dispensation to put Griselda away, and take another wife; for which cause being much upbraided by many worthy men, he made no other answer but only that needs must it so be. Whereof the lady being apprised, and now deeming that she must look to go back to her father's house, and perchance tend the sheep, as she had afore-time, and see him, to whom she was utterly devoted, engrossed by another woman, did inly bewail herself right sorely; but still with the same composed mien with which she had borne Fortune's former buffets, she set herself to endure this last outrage. Nor was it long before Gualtieri by counterfeit letters, which he caused to be sent to him from Rome, made his vassals believe that the Pope had thereby given him a dispensation to put Griselda away, and take another wife. Wherefore, having caused her to be brought before him, he said to her in the presence of not a few, 'Wife, by license granted me by the Pope, I am now free to put thee away, and take another wife; and, for that my forbears have always been great gentlemen and lords of these parts, whereas thine have ever been husbandmen, I purpose that thou go back to Giannucolo's house with the dowry that thou broughtest me; whereupon I shall bring home a lady that I have found, and who is meet to be my wife.'

'Twas not without travail most grievous that the lady, as she heard this announcement, got the better of her woman's nature, and suppressing her tears, made answer:—'My lord, I ever knew that my low degree was on no wise congruous with your nobility, and acknowledged that the rank I had with you was of your and God's bestowal, nor did I ever make as if it were mine by gift, or so esteem it, but still accounted it as a loan. 'Tis your pleasure to recall it, and therefore it should be, and is, my pleasure to render it up to you. So, here is your ring, with which you espoused me; take it back. You bid me take with me the dowry that I brought you; which to do will require neither paymaster on your part nor purse nor pack-horse on mine; for I am not unmindful that naked was I when you first had me. And if you deem it seemly that that body in which I have borne children, by you begotten, be beheld of all, naked will I depart; but yet, I pray you, be pleased, in guerdon of the virginity that I brought you and take not away, to suffer me to bear hence upon my back a single shift—I crave no more—beside my dowry.' There was nought of which Gualtieri was so fain as to weep; but yet setting his face as a flint, he made answer:—'I allow thee a shift to thy back; so get thee hence.' All that stood by besought him to give her a robe, that she, who had been his wife for thirteen years and more, might not be seen to quit his house in so sorry and shameful a plight, having nought on her but a shift. But their entreaties went for nothing; the lady in her shift, and barefoot and bare-headed, having bade them adieu, departed the house, and went back to her father amid the tears and lamentations of all that saw her. Giannucolo, who had ever deemed it a thing incredible that Gualtieri should keep his daughter to wife, and had looked for this to happen every day, and had kept the clothes that she had put off on the morning that Gualtieri had wedded her, now brought them to her; and she, having resumed them, applied herself to the petty drudgery of her father's house, as she had been wont, enduring with fortitude this cruel visitation of adverse Fortune.

Now no sooner had Gualtieri dismissed Griselda, than he gave his vassals to understand that he had taken to wife a daughter of one of the Counts of Panago. He accordingly made great preparations as for the nuptials, during which he sent for Griselda. To whom, being come, quoth he, 'I am bringing hither my new bride, and in this her first home-coming I purpose to show her honor; and thou knowest that women I have none in the house that know how to set chambers in due order, or attend to the many other matters that so joyful an event requires; wherefore do thou, that understandest these things better than another, see to all that needs be done, and bid hither such ladies as thou mayst see fit, and receive them, as if thou wert the lady of the house, and then, when the nuptials are ended, thou mayst go back to thy cottage.' Albeit each of these words pierced Griselda's heart like a knife, for that, in resigning her good fortune, she had not been able to renounce the love she bore Gualtieri, nevertheless, 'My lord,' she made answer, 'I am ready and prompt to do your pleasure.' And so, clad in her sorry garments of coarse romagnole, she entered the house, which, but a little before, she had quitted in her shift, and addressed her to sweep the chambers, and arrange arras and cushions in the halls, and make ready the kitchen, and set her hand to everything, as if she had been a paltry serving-wench; nor did she rest until she had brought all into such meet and seemly trim as the occasion demanded. This done, she invited in Gualtieri's name all the ladies of those parts to be present at his nuptials, and awaited the event. The day being come, still wearing her sorry weeds, but in heart and soul and mien the lady, she received the ladies as they came, and gave each a gladsome greeting.

Now Gualtieri, as we said, had caused his children to be carefully nurtured and brought up by a kinswoman of his at Bologna, which kinswoman was married into the family of the Counts of Panago; and, the girl being now twelve years old, and the loveliest creature that ever was seen, and the boy being about six years old, he had sent word to his kinswoman's husband at Bologna, praying him to be pleased to come with this girl and boy of his to Saluzzo, and to see that he brought a goodly and honorable company with him, and to give all to understand that he brought the girl to him to wife, and on no wise to disclose to any who she really was. The gentleman did as the Marquis bade him, and within a few days of his setting forth arrived at Saluzzo about breakfast-time with the girl, and her brother, and a noble company, and found all the folk of those parts, and much people besides, gathered there in expectation of Gualtieri's new bride. Who, being received by the ladies, was no sooner come into the hall, where the tables were set, than Griselda advanced to meet her, saying with hearty cheer:—'Welcome, my lady.' So the ladies, who had with much instance but in vain, besought Gualtieri, either to let Griselda keep in another room, or at any rate to furnish her with one of the robes that had been hers, that she might not present herself in such a sorry guise before the strangers, sat down to table; and the service being begun, the eyes of all were set on the girl, and everyone said that Gualtieri had made a good exchange, and Griselda joined with the rest in greatly commending her, and also her little brother. And now Gualtieri, sated at last with all that he had seen of his wife's patience, marking that this new and strange turn made not the least alteration in her demeanor, and being well assured that 'twas not due to apathy, for he knew her to be of excellent understanding, deemed it time to relieve her of the suffering which he judged her to dissemble under a resolute front; and so, having called her to him in presence of them all, he said with a smile, 'And what thinkst thou of our bride?' 'My lord,' replied Griselda, 'I think mighty well of her; and if she be but as discreet as she is fair, and so I deem her—I make no doubt but you may reckon to lead with her a life of incomparable felicity; but with all earnestness I entreat you, that you spare her those tribulations which you did once inflict upon another that was yours, for I scarce think she would be able to bear them as well because she is younger, as for that she has been delicately nurtured, whereas that other had known no respite of hardship since she was but a little child.' Marking that she made no doubt but that the girl was to be his wife, and yet spoke never a whit the less sweetly, Gualtieri caused her to sit down beside him, and, 'Griselda,' said he, 'tis now time that thou see the reward of thy long patience and those, who have deemed me cruel and unjust and insensate, should know that what I did was done of purpose aforethought, for that I was minded to give both thee and them a lesson, that thou mightest learn to be a wife, and they in like manner might learn how to take and keep a wife, and that I might beget me perpetual peace with thee for the rest of my life; whereof being in great fear, when I came to take a wife, lest I should be disappointed, I, therefore, to put the matter to the proof, did, and how sorely thou knowest, harass and afflict thee. And since I never knew thee either by deed or by word to deviate from my will, I now, deeming myself to have of thee that assurance of happiness which I desired, am minded to restore to thee at once all that, step by step, I took from thee, and by extremity of joy to compensate the tribulations that I inflicted on thee. Receive, then, this girl, whom thou supposest to be my bride, and her brother, with glad heart, as thy children and mine. These are they, whom by thee and many another it has long been supposed that I did ruthlessly to death, and I am thy husband, that loves thee more dearly than aught else, deeming that other there is none that has the like good cause to be well content with his wife.'

Which said, he embraced and kissed her; and then, while she wept for joy, they rose and hied them there where sat the daughter all astonished to hear the news, whom, as also her brother, they tenderly embraced, and explained to them, and many others that stood by, the whole mystery. Whereat the ladies, transported with delight, rose from table and betook them with Griselda to a chamber, and, with better omen, divested her of her sorry garb, and arrayed her in one of her own robes of state; and so, in guise of a lady (howbeit in her rags she had showed as no less) they led her back into the hall. Wondrous was the cheer which there they made with the children; and all overjoyed at the event, they reveled and made merry amain, and prolonged the festivities for several days, and very discreet they pronounced Gualtieri, albeit they censured as intolerably harsh the probation to which he had subjected Griselda, and most discreet beyond all compare they accounted Griselda.

Some days after, the Count of Panago returned to Bologna, and Gualtieri took Giannucolo from his husbandry, and established him in honor as his father-in-law, wherein to his great solace he lived for the rest of his days. Gualtieri himself, having mated his daughter with a husband of high degree, lived long and happily thereafter with Griselda, to whom he ever paid all honor.

FROISSART (1337-1410)

Jean Froissart was born at Valenciennes and early established a reputation as a chivalric poet. At eighteen he went to England and won the favor of Philippa of Hainault, wife of Edward III, who made him her secretary. In 1368 he accompanied the Duke of Clarence to Milan on the occasion of the marriage of this English prince to a daughter of the Visconti—a ceremony at which Petrarch was an honored guest; it was thought at one time that Chaucer was also present, but the English poet's visit to Italy seems to have been of later date. On the death of Queen Philippa in 1369, Froissart entered the service of Wenceslaus, Duke of Brabant, and on his death, that of Guy, Count of Blois, who gave him the canonry of Chimay, and induced him to complete his history of France, England, and the neighboring countries during his own lifetime. For the purpose of assembling materials for his Chronicles, which cover the period 1326-1400, Froissart traveled widely, and visited England again after an absence of forty years. He seems then to have retired and spent the rest of his life in quiet study at Chimay, where he died. The outlines of two stories included in the passage from the Chronicles given below are included in every child's history of England, but the charm of the narrative is Froissart's own. The second incident, that of Queen Philippa's intercession for the citizens of Calais, is told by no other historian, but there is no reason to doubt its authenticity and it may well have been related to Froissart by the Queen herself.

Froissart's Chronicles were first published in Paris about the end of the fifteenth century and some twenty-five years later were translated into English by Bouchier, Lord Berners, whose version is still highly prized by lovers of Tudor literature, but for the purposes of modern readers the more exact translation of Thomas Johnes, made at the beginning of the nineteenth century, appears more serviceable and is here used.

EDWARD III'S INVASION OF FRANCE

The king of France ordered all the bridges and fords of the river Somme to be guarded, to prevent the king of England from crossing it with his army; for he was resolved to force them to fight when he should see the most favorable opportunity, or else to starve them.

The two marshals, having thus in vain followed the course of the Somme, returned to the king of England, and related to him that they were unable to find a passage anywhere. That same evening, the king of France took up his quarters in Amiens, with upwards of one hundred thousand men. The king of England was very pensive: he ordered mass before sunrise, and his trumpets to sound for decamping. All sorts of people followed the marshals' banners, according to the orders the king had issued the preceding day; and they marched through the country of Vimeu, drawing near to the good town of Abbeville. In their march, they came to a town where a great number of the country people had assembled, trusting to some small fortifications which were thrown up there; but the English conquered the town, as soon as they came to it, and all that were within. Many of the townsmen and those from the adjoining country were slain or taken prisoners. The king lodged, that night, in the great hospital.

The king of France set out from Amiens, and came to Airaines about noon; the English king had quitted it about ten o'clock. The French found there provisions of all sorts; meat on the spits, bread and pastry in the ovens, wine in barrels, and even some tables ready spread, for the English had left it in very great haste. The king of France fixed his quarters there, to wait for his nobles and their retinue. The king of England was in the town of Oisemont. When his two marshals returned in the evening, after having overrun the country as far as the gates of Abbeville, and to St. Valery, where they had had a smart skirmish, the king of England summoned a council, and ordered many prisoners, whom his people had made in the districts of Ponthieu and Vimeu, to be brought before him.

The king, most courteously asked, 'if any of them knew a ford below Abbeville, where he and his army could pass without danger;' and added, 'Whoever will show us such a ford shall have his liberty, and that of any twenty of his fellow-soldiers whom he may wish to select.' There was among them a common fellow whose name was Gobin Agace, who answered the king, and said, 'Sir, I promise you, under peril of my life, that I will conduct you to such a place, where you and your whole army may pass the river Somme without any risk. There are certain fordable places where you may pass twelve men abreast twice in the day, and not have water above your knees; but when the tide is in, the river is full and deep, and no one can cross it; when the tide is out, the river is so low that it may be passed, on horseback or on foot, without danger. The bottom of this ford is very hard, of gravel and white stones, over which all your carriages may safely pass, and from thence is called Blanchetaque. You must therefore set out early, so as to be at the ford before sunrise.' 'Friend,' replied the king, 'if I find what thou hast just said to be true, I will give thee and all thy companions their liberty, and I will besides make thee a present of a hundred nobles.' The king gave orders for everyone to be ready to march at the first sound of his trumpet, and to proceed forward.

THE FIGHT AT THE FORD

The king of England did not sleep much that night, but, rising at midnight, ordered his trumpet to sound. Very soon everything was ready; and, the baggage being loaded, they set out from the town of Oise-mont about daybreak, and rode on, under the guidance of Gobin Agace, until they came to the ford of Blanchetaque, about sunrise; but the tide was at that time so full, they could not cross. The king, however, determined to wait there for those of his army who were not yet come up; and he remained until after ten o'clock, when the tide was gone out. The king of France, who had his scouts all over the country, was informed of the situation of the king of England: he imagined he should be able to shut him up between Abbeville and the Somme, and thus take him prisoner, or force him to fight at a disadvantage. From the time of his arrival at Amiens, he had ordered a great baron of Normandy, called Sir Godémar du Fay, to guard this ford of Blanchetaque, which the English must cross, and nowhere else. Sir Godémar had set out, in obedience to this order, and had with him, in the whole, one thousand men-at-arms and six thousand foot, with the Genoese. He had passed St. Ricquier in Ponthieu, and from thence came to Crotoy, where this ford was; he had collected, in his march, great numbers of the country people. The townsmen of Abbeville had also accompanied him, excellently well appointed: they had arrived at the passage before the English. They were, in all, fully twelve thousand men; among them were two thousand who had jackets, resembling wagoners' frocks, called torviquiaux.

On the arrival of the English army, Sir Godémar du Fay drew up his men on the banks of the river, to defend and guard the ford. The king of England, however, did not for this give up his intention of crossing; but, as soon as the tide was sufficiently gone out, he ordered his marshals to dash into the water, in the names of God and St. George. The most doughty and the best mounted leaped in first; and, in the river, the engagement began: many on both sides were unhorsed into the water: there were some knights and squires, from Artois and Picardy, in the pay of Sir Godémar, who in hopes of preferment and to acquire honor had posted themselves at this ford, and they appeared to be equally fond of tilting in the water as upon dry land.

The French were drawn up in battle array, near the narrow pass leading to the ford; and the English were much annoyed by them as they came out of the water to gain the land; for there were among them Genoese cross bowmen who did them much mischief. On the other hand, the English archers shot so well together that they forced the men-at-arms to give way. At this ford of Blanchetaque many gallant feats of arms were performed on each side; but, in the end, the English crossed over, and, as they came on shore, hastened to the fields. After the king, the prince, and the other lords had crossed, the French did not long keep in the order they were in, but ran off for the fastest. When Sir Godémar du Fay found his army discomfited, he saved himself as quickly as he could, and many with him, some making for Abbeville, others for St. Ricquier. The infantry, however, could not escape; and there were numbers of those from Abbeville, Arras, Montreuil, and St. Ricquier, slain or taken prisoners: the pursuit lasted more than a league. The English had scarcely gained the opposite bank, when some of the light horse of the French army, particularly those belonging to the king of Bohemia and Sir John of Hainault, advanced upon the rear, and took from them some horses and accoutrements, and slew several on the bank who were late in crossing.

The king of France had set out from Airaines that morning, thinking to find the English on the banks of the Somme; when news was brought to him of the defeat of Sir Godemar and his army, he immediately halted, and demanded from his marshals what was to be done; they answered, 'You can only cross the river by the bridge of Abbeville, for the tide is now in at Blanchetaque.' The king of France therefore turned back and took up his quarters at Abbeville.

The king of England, when he crossed the Somme, gave thanks to God for it, and began his march in the same order as he had done before. He called to him Gobin Agace, gave him his freedom without ransom, as well as that of his companions, and ordered the hundred nobles of gold to be given to him, and also a good horse.

The king continued his march, thinking to take up his quarters at a good and large town called Noyelle, situated hard by; but when he was informed that it belonged to the Countess d'Aumarle, sister to the late Robert d'Artois, he sent to assure the inhabitants, as well as all the farmers belonging to her, that they should not be hurt. He marched further on; but his two marshals rode to Crotoy, near the sea; they took the town, and burnt it. In the harbor they found many ships, and other vessels, laden with wines, from Poitou, Saintonge, and la Rochelle: they ordered the best to be carried to the English army; then one of the marshals pushed forward, even as far as the gates of Abbeville, and returned to St. Ricquier, following the seashore to the town of St. Esprit de Rue.

THE ENGLISH ENCAMP

These two battalions of the marshals came, on a Friday in the afternoon, to where the king was; and they fixed their quarters, all three together, near Crecy in Ponthieu. The king of England, who had been informed that the king of France was following him, in order to give him battle, said to his people: 'Let us post ourselves here; for we will not go farther before we have seen our enemies. I have good reason to wait for them on this spot; as I am now upon the lawful inheritance of my lady-mother, which was given her as her marriage portion; and I am resolved to defend it against my adversary, Philippe de Valois.' On account of his not having more than an eighth part of the forces which the king of France had, his marshals fixed upon the most advantageous situation; and the army went and took possession of it. He then sent his scouts toward Abbeville, to learn if the king of France meant to take the field this Friday; but they returned, and said they saw no appearance of it; upon which he dismissed his men to their quarters, with orders to be in readiness by times in the morning, and to assemble in the same place.

The king of France remained all Friday in Abbeville, waiting for more troops. He sent his marshals, the lord of St. Venant and lord Charles of Montmorency, out of Abbeville, to examine the country, and get some certain intelligence of the English. They returned, about vespers, with information that the English were encamped on the plain. That night the king of France entertained at supper, in Abbeville, all the princes and chief lords. There was much conversation relative to war; and the king entreated them, after supper, that they would always remain in friendship with each other; that they would be friends without jealousy, and courteous without pride. The king was still expecting the Earl of Savoy, who ought to have been there with a thousand lances, as he had been well paid for them at Troyes in Champagne, three months in advance.

THE ENGLISH ORDER OF BATTLE

The king of England, as I have mentioned before, encamped this Friday in the plain, for he found the country abounding in provisions; but, if they should have failed, he had plenty in the carriages which attended on him. The army set about furbishing and repairing their armor; and the king gave a supper that evening to the earls and barons of his army, where they made good cheer. On their taking leave, the king remained alone, with the lords of his bed-chamber; he retired into his oratory, and, falling on his knees before the altar, prayed to God, that, if he should combat his enemies on the morrow, he might come off with honor. About midnight he went to his bed; and, rising early the next day, he and the Prince of Wales heard mass, and communicated. The greater part of his army did the same, confessed, and made proper preparations. After mass, the king ordered his men to arm themselves, and assemble on the ground he had before fixed on. He had enclosed a large park near a wood, on the rear of his army, in which he placed all his baggage-wagons and horses; and this park had but one entrance: his men-at-arms and archers remained on foot.

The king afterwards ordered, through his constable and his two marshals, that the army should be divided into three battalions. In the first, he placed the young Prince of Wales, and with him the Earls of Warwick and Oxford, Sir Godfrey de Harcourt, the Lord Reginald Cobham, Lord Thomas Holland, Lord Stafford, Lord Mauley, the Lord Delaware, Sir John Chandos, Lord Bartholomew Burgher, Lord Robert Neville, Lord Thomas Clifford, the Lord Bouchier, the Lord Latimer, and many other knights and squires whom I cannot name. There might be, in the first division, about eight hundred men-at-arms, two thousand archers, and a thousand Welshmen. They advanced in regular order to their ground, each lord under his banner and pennon, and in the center of his men. In the second battalion were the Earl of Northampton, the Earl of Arundel, the Lords Roos, Willoughby, Basset, St. Albans, Sir Lewis Tufton, Lord Multon, the Lord Lascels, and many others, amounting, in the whole, to about eight hundred men-at-arms and twelve hundred archers. The third battalion was commanded by the king, and was composed of about seven hundred men-at-arms and two thousand archers.

The king then mounted a small palfrey, having a white wand in his hand, and attended by his two marshals on each side of him: he rode a foot's pace through all the ranks, encouraging and entreating the army that they would guard his honor and defend his right. He spoke this so sweetly and with such a cheerful countenance, that all who had been dispirited were directly comforted by seeing and hearing him. When he had thus visited all the battalions, it was near ten o'clock; he retired to his own division, and ordered them all to eat heartily, and drink a glass after. They ate and drank at their ease; and, having packed up pots, barrels, etc., in the carts, they returned to their battalions, according to the marshal's orders, and seated themselves on the ground, placing their helmets and bows before them, that they might be the fresher when their enemies should arrive.

THE FRENCH ARMY

That same Saturday, the king of France rose betimes, and heard mass in the monastery of St. Peter's in Abbeville, where he had lodged; having ordered his army to do the same, he left that town after sunrise. When he had marched about two leagues from Abbeville, and was approaching the enemy, he was advised to form his army in order of battle, and to let those on foot march forward, that they might not be trampled on by the horses. The king, upon this, sent off four knights, the Lord Moyne of Bastleberg, the Lord of Noyers, the Lord of Beaujeu, and the Lord of Aubigny, who rode so near to the English that they could clearly distinguish their position. The English plainly perceived that they were come to reconnoitre them; however, they took no notice of it, but suffered them to return unmolested. When the king of France saw them coming back, he halted his army; and the knights, pushing through the crowds, came near the king, who said to them, 'My lords, what news?' They looked at each other without opening their mouths: for neither chose to speak first. At last, the king addressed himself to the Lord Moyne, who was attached to the king of Bohemia, and had performed very many gallant deeds, so that he was esteemed one of the most valiant knights in Christendom. The Lord Moyne said, 'Sir, I will speak, since it pleases you to order me, but under the correction of my companion. We have advanced far enough to reconnoitre your enemies. Know, then, that they are drawn up in three battalions, and are waiting for you. I would advise, for my part (submitting, however, to better counsel), that you halt your army here, and quarter them for the night; for before the rear shall come up, and the army be properly drawn out, it will be very late, your men will be tired and in disorder, whilst they will find your enemies fresh and properly arrayed. On the morrow you may draw up your army more at your ease, and may reconnoitre at leisure on what part it will be most advantageous to begin the attack; for, be assured they will wait for you.' The king commanded that it should so be done: and the two marshals rode, one toward the front, and the other to the rear, crying out, 'Halt banners, in the name of God and St. Denis.' Those that were in the front halted; but those behind said they would not halt until they were as forward as the front. When the front perceived the rear pressing on, they pushed forward; and neither the king nor the marshals could stop them, but they marched on without any order until they came in sight of their enemies. As soon as the foremost rank saw them, they fell back at once, in great disorder, which alarmed those in the rear, who thought they had been fighting. There was then space and room enough for them to have passed forward, had they been willing to do so: some did so, but others remained shy. All the roads between Abbeville and Crecy were covered with common people, who, when they were come within three leagues of their enemies, drew their swords, bawling out, 'Kill, kill;' and with them were many great lords that were eager to make show of their courage. There is no man, unless he had been present, that can imagine, or describe truly, the confusion of that day; especially the bad management and disorder of the French, whose troops were out of number. What I know, and shall relate in this book, I have learnt chiefly from the English, who had well observed the confusion they were in, and from those attached to Sir John of Hainault, who was always near the person of the king of France.

THE BATTLE OF CRECY

The English, who were drawn up in three divisions, and seated on the ground, on seeing their enemies advance, rose undauntedly up, and fell into their ranks. That of the prince was the first to do so, whose archers were formed in the manner of a portcullis, or harrow, and the men-at-arms in the rear. The Earls of Northampton and Arundel, who commanded the second division, had posted themselves in good order on his wing, to assist and succor the prince if necessary.

You must know that these kings, earls, barons, and lords of France did not advance in regular order, but one after the other, or any way most pleasing to themselves. As soon as the king of France came in sight of the English, his blood began to boil, and he cried out to his marshals, 'Order the Genoese forward, and begin the battle, in the name of God and St. Denis.' There were about fifteen thousand Genoese cross bowmen; but they were quite fatigued, having marched on foot that day six leagues, completely armed, and with their cross bows. They told the constable they were not in a fit condition to do any great things that day in battle. The Earl Alençon, hearing this, said, 'This is what one gets by employing such scoundrels, who fall off when there is any need for them.' During this time a heavy rain fell, accompanied by thunder and a very terrible eclipse of the sun; and before this rain a great flight of crows hovered in the air over all those battalions, making a loud noise. Shortly afterwards it cleared up, and the sun shone very bright; but the Frenchmen had it in their faces, and the English in their backs. When the Genoese were somewhat in order, and approached the English, they set up a loud shout, in order to frighten them; but they remained quite still, and did not seem to attend it. They then set up a second shout, and advanced a little forward; but the English never moved. They hooted a third time, advancing with their cross bows presented, and began to shoot. The English archers then advanced one step forward, and shot their arrows with such force and quickness that it seemed as if it snowed. When the Genoese felt these arrows, which pierced their arms, heads, and through their armor, some of them cut the strings of their cross bows, others flung them on the ground, and all turned about and retreated quite discomfited. The French had a large body of men-at-arms on horseback, richly dressed, to support the Genoese. The king of France, seeing them thus fall back, cried out, 'Kill me those scoundrels; for they stop up our road, without any reason.' You would then have seen the above-mentioned men-at-arms lay about them, killing all they could of these runaways.

The English continued shooting as vigorously and quickly as before; some of their arrows fell among the horsemen, who were sumptuously equipped, and, killing 10 and wounding many, made them caper and fall among the Genoese, so that they were in such confusion they could never rally again. In the English army there were some Cornish and Welshmen on foot, who 15 had armed themselves with large knives; these, advancing through the ranks of the men-at-arms and archers, who made way for them, came upon the French when they were in this danger, and, falling upon 20 earls, barons, knights, and squires, slew many, at which the king of England was afterwards much exasperated. The valiant king of Bohemia was slain there. He was called Charles of Luxembourg; for he was 25 the son of the gallant king and emperor, Henry of Luxembourg; having heard the order of the battle, he inquired where his son, the Lord Charles, was: his attendants answered, that they did not know, but believed he was fighting. The king said to 30 them: 'Gentlemen, you are all my people, my friends and brethren at arms this day; therefore, as I am blind, I request of you to lead me so far into the engagement that I may strike one stroke with my sword.' 35 The knights replied, they would directly lead him forward; and in order that they might not lose him in the crowd, they fastened all the reins of their horses together, 40 and put the king at their head, that he might gratify his wish, and advanced toward the enemy. The Lord Charles of Bohemia, who already signed his name as king of Germany, and bore the arms, had 45 come in good order to the engagement; but when he perceived that it was likely to turn out against the French, he departed, and I do not well know what road he took. The king, his father, had rode 50 in among the enemy, and made good use of his sword; for he and his companions had fought most gallantly. They had advanced so far that they were all slain; and on the morrow they were found on the 55 ground, with their horses all tied together.

The Earl of Alençon advanced in regular order upon the English, to fight with them; as did the Earl of Flanders, in another part. These two lords, with their detachments, coasting, as it were, the archers, came to the prince's battalion, where they 5 fought valiantly for a length of time. The king of France was eager to march to the place where he saw their banners displayed, but there was a hedge of archers before him. He had that day made a present of a handsome black horse to Sir 10 John of Hainault, who had mounted on it a knight of his, called Sir John de Fusseselles, that bore his banner: which horse ran off with him, and forced his way 15 through the English army, and, when about to return, stumbled and fell into a ditch and severely wounded him: he would have been dead, if his page had not followed him round the battalions, and found him 20 unable to rise: he had not, however, any other hindrance than from his horse; for the English did not quit the ranks that day to make prisoners. The page alighted, and raised him up; but he did not return the way he came, as he would have found it 25 difficult from the crowd.

This battle, which was fought on the Saturday between la Broyes and Crecy, was very murderous and cruel; and many 30 gallant deeds of arms were performed that were never known. Toward evening, many knights and squires of the French had lost their masters: they wandered up and down the plain, attacking the English in small parties: they were soon destroyed; 35 for the English had determined that day to give no quarter, or hear of ransom for any one.

THE PRINCE OF WALES

Early in the day, some French, Germans, and Savoyards had broken through the archers of the prince's battalion, and had engaged with the men-at-arms; upon which 40 the second battalion came to his aid, and it was time, for otherwise he would have been hard pressed. The first division, seeing the danger they were in, sent a knight in great haste to the king of England, who 45 was posted upon an eminence, near a windmill. On the knight's arrival, he said, 'Sir, the Earl of Warwick, the Lord Stafford, the Lord Reginald Cobham, and the others who are about your son, are vigorously 50 attacked by the French; and they entreat that you would come to their assistance with your battalion, for, if their numbers should increase, they fear he will have too much to do.' The king replied, 'Is my son dead, unhorsed, or so badly wounded that he cannot support himself?' 'Nothing of the sort, thank God,' rejoined the knight; 'but he is in so hot an engagement that he has great need of your help.' The king answered, 'Now, Sir Thomas, return back to those that sent you, and tell them from me, not to send again for me this day, or expect that I shall come, let what will happen, as long as my son has life; and say, that I command them to let the boy win his spurs; for I am determined, if it please God, that all the glory and honor of this day shall be given to him, and to those into whose care I have entrusted him.' The knight returned to his lords and related the king's answer, which mightily encouraged them and made them repent they had ever sent such a message.

AFTER THE BATTLE

It is a certain fact, that Sir Godfrey de Harcourt, who was in the prince's battalion, having been told by some of the English, that they had seen the banner of his brother engaged in the battle against him, was exceedingly anxious to save him; but he was too late, for he was left on the field, and so was the Earl of Aumarle, his nephew. On the other hand, the Earls of Alençon and of Flanders were fighting lustily under their banners, and with their own people; but they could not resist the force of the English, and were there slain, as well as many other knights and squires that were attending on or accompanying them. The Earl of Blois, nephew to the king of France, and the Duke of Lorraine, his brother-in-law, with their troops, made a gallant defense; but they were surrounded by a troop of English and Welsh, and slain in spite of their prowess. The Earl of St. Pol and the Earl of Auxerre were also killed, as well as many others. Late after vespers, the king of France had not more about him than sixty men, every one included. Sir John of Hainault, who was of the number, had once remounted the king; for his horse had been killed under him by an arrow: he said to the king, 'Sir, retreat whilst you have an opportunity, and do not expose yourself so simply; if you have lost this battle, another time you will be the conqueror.' After he had said this, he took the bridle of the king's horse, and led him off by force; for he had before entreated of him to retire. The king rode on until he came to the castle of la Broyes, where he found the gates shut, for it was very dark. The king ordered the governor of it to be summoned; he came upon the battlements, and asked who it was that called at such an hour? The king answered, 'Open, open, governor; it is the fortune of France.' The governor, hearing the king's voice, immediately descended, opened the gate, and let down the bridge. The king and his company entered the castle; but he had only with him five barons, Sir John of Hainault, the Lord Charles of Montmorency, the Lord of Beaujeu, the Lord of Aubigny, and the Lord of Montfort. The king would not bury himself in such a place as that, but, having taken some refreshments, set out again with his attendants about midnight, and rode on, under the direction of guides who were well acquainted with the country, until, about daybreak, he came to Amiens, where he halted. This Saturday the English never quitted their ranks in pursuit of any one, but remained on the field, guarding their position, and defending themselves against all who attacked them. The battle was ended at the hour of vespers.

When, on this Saturday night, the English heard no more hooting or shouting, nor any more crying out to particular lords or their banners, they looked upon the field as their own, and their enemies as beaten. They made great fires, and lighted torches because of the obscurity of the night. King Edward then came down from his post, who all that day had not put on his helmet, and, with his whole battalion, advanced to the Prince of Wales, whom he embraced in his arms and kissed, and said, 'Sweet son, God give you good perseverance: you are my son, for most loyally have you acquitted yourself this day: you are worthy to be a sovereign.' The prince bowed down very low and humbled himself, giving all honor to the king, his father. The English, during the night, made frequent thanksgivings to the Lord, for the happy issue of the day, and without rioting; for the king had forbidden all riot or noise.

On the Sunday morning, there was so great a fog that one could scarcely see the distance of half an acre. The king ordered a detachment from the army, under the command of the two marshals, consisting of about five hundred lances and two thousand archers, to make an excursion, and see if there were any bodies of French collected together. The quota of troops from Rouen and Beauvais had, this Sunday morning, left Abbeville and St. Ricquier in Ponthieu, to join the French army, and were ignorant of the defeat of the preceding evening: they met this detachment, and, thinking they must be French, hastened to join them. As soon as the English found who they were, they fell upon them, and there was a sharp engagement; but the French soon turned their backs, and fled in great disorder. There were slain in this fight in the open fields, under hedges and bushes, upwards of seven thousand; and had it been clear weather, not one soul would have escaped.

A little time afterwards, this same party fell in with the Archbishop of Rouen and the great Prior of France, who were also ignorant of the discomfiture of the French; for they had been informed that the king was not to fight before Sunday. Here began a fresh battle: for those two lords were well attended by good men-at-arms: however, they could not withstand the English, but were almost all slain, with the two chiefs who commanded them, very few escaping. In the course of the morning, the English found many Frenchmen who had lost their road on the Saturday, and had lain in the open fields, not knowing what was become of the king, or their own leaders. The English put to the sword all they met; and it has been assured to me for fact, that of foot soldiers, sent from the cities, towns and municipalities, there were slain, this Sunday morning, four times as many as in the battle of the Saturday.

NUMBERING THE DEAD

This detachment, which had been sent to look after the French, returned as the king was coming from mass, and related to him all they had seen and met with. After he had been assured by them that there was not any appearance of the French collecting another army, he sent to have the numbers and condition of the dead examined.

He ordered on this business Lord Reginald Cobham, Lord Stafford, and three heralds to examine their arms, and two secretaries to write down all the names. They took much pains to examine all the dead, and were the whole day in the field of battle, not returning but just as the king was sitting down to supper. They made to him a very circumstantial report of all they had observed, and said they had found eighty banners, the bodies of eleven princes, twelve hundred knights, and about thirty thousand common men.

The English halted there that day, and on the Monday morning prepared to march off. The king ordered the bodies of the principal knights to be taken from the ground, and carried to the monastery of Montenay, which was hard by, there to be interred in consecrated ground. He had it proclaimed in the neighborhood that he should grant a truce for three days in order that the dead might be buried. He then marched on, passing by Montreuil-sur-mer.

His marshals made an excursion as far as Hesdin, and burnt Vaubain and Serain; but they could make nothing of the castle, as it was too strong and well guarded. They lay that Monday night upon the banks of the Canche, near Blangy. The next day they rode toward Boulogne, and burnt the towns of St. Josse and Neufchatel: they did the same to Estaples, in the country of the Boulonois. The whole army passed through the forest of Harelou and the country of the Boulonois, and came to the large town of Wissant, where the king, prince, and all the English lodged; and, having refreshed themselves there one whole day, they came, on the Thursday, before the strong town of Calais.

THE SIEGE OF CALAIS

A Burgundy knight, named Sir John de Vienne, was governor of Calais; and with him were Sir Arnold d'Andreghe, Sir John of Surie, Sir Bardo de Bellebourne, Sir Geoffry de la Motte, Sir Pepin de Were and many other knights and squires. On the king's arrival before Calais, he laid siege to it, and built, between it and the river and bridge, houses of wood: they were laid out in streets, and thatched with straw or broom; and in this town of the king's, there was everything necessary for an army, beside a market place, where there were markets, every Wednesday and Saturday, for butcher's meat, and all other sorts of merchandise; cloth, bread, and everything else, which came from England, and Flanders, might be had there, as well as all comforts, for money. The English made frequent excursions to Guines and its neighborhood, and to the gates of St. Omer and Boulogne, from whence they brought great booties back to the army. The king made no attacks upon the town, as he knew it would be only lost labor; and he was sparing of his men and artillery; but said he would remain there so long 10 that he would starve the town into a surrender, unless the king of France should come there to raise the siege. When the governor of Calais saw the preparations of the king of England, he collected together all the poor inhabitants, who had not laid in any store of provisions, and, one Wednesday morning, sent upwards of seventeen hundred men, women and children out of the town. As they were passing through the English army, they asked them, why they had left the town? They replied, because they had nothing to eat. The king, upon this, allowed them to pass through in safety, ordered them a hearty 20 dinner, and gave to each two sterlings, as charity and alms, for which many of them prayed earnestly for the king.

ATTEMPT TO RAISE THE SIEGE

King Philip of France, who felt that his subjects in Calais must be severely oppressed, commanded all the knights and squires of his realm to rendezvous at Amiens, or near that town, on the Feast of Whitsuntide. No one dared to disobey this order, but all were punctual in being there at the appointed time. King Philip kept a solemn court at Amiens, at which were present the Duke of Normandy, his eldest son, the Duke of Orleans, his youngest son, Eudes Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Bourbon, the Earl of Foix, the Lord Lewis of Savoy, the Lord John of Hainault, the Earls of Armagnac, Valentinois, Forêts, and a great many other earls, barons and knights. When all these noblemen were assembled in Amiens, they held many councils. The king of France 50 was very anxious to have a free passage through Flanders, that he might send through it a part of his army by way of Gravelines, to reinforce the garrison of Calais, and to attack and fight with the English on that side of the town. He sent, therefore, a very magnificent embassy into Flanders, to treat with the Flemings on this subject; but the king of England had so many friends there that they would not grant him his request. The king upon this said he would then advance as far as 5 Boulogne.

The king of England, who found that he could not conquer Calais but by famine, ordered a large castle to be constructed of strong timbers, in order to shut up the communication with the sea; and he directed it to be built and embattled in such a manner that it could not be destroyed. He placed it between the town and the sea, and fortified it with all sorts of warlike instruments, and garrisoned it with forty 15 men-at-arms and two hundred archers, who guarded the harbor and port of Calais so closely, that nothing could come out or go into the town, without being sunk or taken. By this means he more sorely aggrieved the Calesians than by anything he had hitherto done, and sooner brought famine among them. About this time, the king of England was so active among the Flemings (with whom as you have just 25 heard the king of France wanted to make a treaty) that they, to the amount of a hundred thousand men, marched out of Flanders, and laid siege to the town of 30 Aire: they burnt all the country round it, as far as St. Venant, Mourville la Gorge, Estelly le Ventre, and a tract of country round Loo, and even as far as the gates of St. Omer and Terouenne.

The king of France took up his quarters 35 at Arras. He sent a large body of men to strengthen his garrisons in Artois, and in particular Sir Charles d'Espagne, his constable, to St. Omer; for the Earl of Eu and of Guines, who had been constable, 40 was a prisoner, as I have before related, in England. The Flemings kept advancing into the country, and gave the French employment enough before they retreated. 45 When the Flemings were returned, after having made themselves well acquainted with the parts about Loo, the king of France and his army left Arras, and came to Hesdin: the army and baggage occupied three leagues of country. When the king 50 had rested one day at Hesdin, he advanced the next day to Blangy, where he halted, in order to consider whither he should march next. He was advised to make for that part of the country called la Belune, and accordingly began his march thither, his army following, which amounted, including men of all descriptions, to two hundred thousand. The king and his army passed through the country of Faukenberg, and came straight to the hill of Sangate, between Calais and Wissant; they marched armed, with banners flying, by moonlight, so that it was a beautiful sight to see their gallant army. When those in Calais perceived them from the walls, pitching their tents, they thought it had been a new siege.

THE FRENCH ARMY RETIRES

I will now relate what the king of England had done and was doing when he saw with what a prodigious force the king of France was come to raise the siege of Calais, which had cost him so much money and labor. He knew that the town was so nearly famished that it could hold out but a very short time; therefore it would have sorely hurt him to have been forced at that time to raise it. He considered that the French could neither approach his army nor the town of Calais but by two roads: the one by the downs along the seashore, the other higher up the country, which, however, was full of ditches and bogs; and there was but one bridge, called the bridge of Nieullet, by which they could be crossed. He posted, therefore, his fleet along the shore, as near as he could to the downs, and provided it with plenty of every warlike engine, so that the French could not pass that way. He sent the Earl of Derby, with a sufficient force of men-at-arms and archers, to guard the bridge of Nieullet. The French, therefore, were prevented from advancing thither, unless they attempted crossing the marshes between Sangate and the sea, which were impassable. There was also, nearer to Calais, a high tower, which was guarded by thirty archers from England; and they had fortified it with double ditches, as a stronger defense of the passage over the downs. When the French had taken up their quarters on the hill of Sangate, those from Tournay, who might amount to about fifteen hundred men, advanced toward this tower; the garrison shot at them, and wounded some, but the men of Tournay crossed the ditches, and reached the foot of the tower with pickaxes and bars. The engagement was then very sharp, and many of the Tournaymen were killed and wounded; but, in the end, the tower was taken and thrown down, and all that were within it put to the sword.

The king of France sent his two marshals, the Lord of Beaujeu and the Lord of St. Venant, to examine the country, and see where the army could pass, in order to fight with the English; but, after they had well examined all the passes, they returned and told the king there was not any possibility of doing it, but with infinite loss of men. Things remained in this state that day and the following night; but on the morrow, after the king of France had heard mass, he sent to the king of England the Lord Geoffry de Charny, the Lord Eustace de Ribeaumont, Sir Guy de Nesle, and the Lord of Beaujeu, who, as they rode along, observed how strongly all the passes were guarded; they were allowed to proceed freely, for so the king of England had ordered, and praised very much the dispositions of the Earl of Derby, who was posted at the bridge of Nieullet, over which they passed. They rode on until they came where the king was, whom they found surrounded by his barons and knights; they all four dismounted, and advanced toward the king, with many reverences. Then the Lord Eustace de Ribeaumont said, 'Sir, the king of France informs you through us that he is come to the hill of Sangate in order to give you battle; but he cannot find any means of approaching you; he therefore wishes you would assemble your council, and he will send some of his, that they may confer together, and fix upon a spot where a general combat may take place.' The king of England was advised to make his answer as follows: 'Gentlemen, I perfectly understand the request you have made me from my adversary, who wrongfully keeps possession of my inheritance, which weighs much upon me. You will therefore tell him from me, if you please, that I have been on this spot near a twelvemonth; this he was well informed of, and, had he chosen it, might have come here sooner; but he has allowed me to remain so long that I have expended very large sums of money and have done so much that I must be master of Calais in a very short time. I am not therefore inclined, in the smallest degree, to comply with his request, or to gratify his convenience, or to abandon what I have gained, or what I have been so anxious to conquer. If, therefore, neither he nor his army can pass this way, he must seek out some other road.' The four noblemen then returned, and were escorted as far as the bridge of Nieullet, and related to the king of France the king of England's answer.

Whilst the king of France was devising means to fight with the English, two cardinals, from Pope Clement, arrived as ambassadors in the camp. Immediately on their arrival, they visited each army, and exerted themselves so much that they procured a sort of truce; during which time, four lords of each party were to meet, and endeavor to form a peace. On the part of the king of France were nominated the Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Bourbon, the Lord Lewis of Savoy, and Sir John of Hainault. The English commissioners were the Earl of Derby, the Earl of Northampton, Lord Reginald Cobham and Sir Walter Manny. The two cardinals were the most active persons in this business, going backwards and forwards from one army to the other. These commissioners were three days together; and various propositions for peace were brought forward, though none took effect. During which time the king of England was strengthening his army, and making wide and deep ditches on the downs, to prevent the French from surprising him. When these three days were passed without any treaty being effected, the two cardinals went to St. Omer. The king of France, perceiving he could not in any way succeed, decamped on the morrow, and took the road to Amiens, where he disbanded all his troops, the men-at-arms as well as those sent from the different towns. When the Calesians saw them depart, it gave them great grief. Some of the English fell on their rear, and captured horses and wagons laden with wine and other things, as well as some prisoners; all which they brought to their camp before Calais.

CALAIS SURRENDERS

After the departure of the king of France, with his army, from the hill of Sangate, the Calesians saw clearly that all hopes of succor were at an end; which occasioned them so much sorrow and distress, that the hardiest could scarcely support it. They entreated, therefore, most earnestly, the Lord John de Vienne, their governor, to mount upon the battlements, and make a sign that he wished to hold a parley. The king of England, upon hearing this, sent to him Sir Walter Manny and Lord Basset. When they were come near, the Lord de Vienne said to them, 'Dear gentlemen, you who are very valiant knights, know that the king of France, whose subjects we are, has sent us hither to defend this town and castle from all harm and damage; this we have done to the best of our abilities. All hopes of help have now left us, so that we are most exceedingly straitened; and if the gallant king, your lord, have not pity upon us, we must perish with hunger. I therefore entreat that you would beg of him to have compassion on us, and to have the goodness to allow us to depart in the state we are in, and that he will be satisfied in having possession of the town and castle, with all that is within them, as he will find therein riches enough to content him.' To this Sir Walter Manny replied: 'John, we are not ignorant of what the king our lord's intentions are; for he has told them to us: know then, that it is not his pleasure you should get off so; for he is resolved that you surrender yourselves solely to his will, to allow those whom he pleases their ransom, or to put them to death; for the Calesians have done him so much mischief, and have, by their obstinate defense, cost him so many lives and so much money, that he is mightily enraged.' The Lord de Vienne answered: 'These conditions are too hard for us. We are but a small number of knights and squires, who have loyally served our lord and master, as you would have done, and have suffered much ill and disquiet; but we will endure more than any men ever did in a similar situation, before we consent that the smallest boy in the town should fare worse than the best. I therefore once more entreat you out of compassion to return to the king of England, and beg of him to have pity on us: he will, I trust, grant you this favor; for I have such an opinion of his gallantry as to hope, that, through God's mercy, he will alter his mind.' The two lords returned to the king, and related what had passed. The king said he had no intentions of complying with the request, but should insist that they surrendered themselves unconditionally to his will. Sir Walter replied: 'My lord, you may be to blame in this, as you will set us a very bad example; for if you order us to go to any of your castles, we shall not obey you so cheerfully, if you put these people to death; for they will retaliate upon us, in a similar case.' Many barons who were then present supported this opinion. Upon which the king replied: 'Gentlemen, I am not so obstinate as to hold my opinion alone against you all: Sir Walter, you will inform the governor of Calais, that the only grace he must expect from me is that six of the principal citizens of Calais march out of the town, with bare heads and feet, with ropes round their necks, and the keys of the town and castle in their hands. These six persons shall be at my absolute disposal, and the remainder of the inhabitants pardoned.'

Sir Walter returned to the Lord de Vienne, who was waiting for him on the battlements, and told him all that he had been able to gain from the king. 'I beg of you,' replied the governor, 'that you would be so good as to remain here a little, while I go and relate all that has passed to the townsmen; for, as they have desired me to undertake this, it is but proper they should know the result of it.' He went to the market place, and caused the bell to be rung; upon which all the inhabitants, men and women, assembled in the town-hall. He then related to them what he had said and the answers he had received; and that he could not obtain any conditions more favorable, to which they must give a short and immediate answer. This information caused the greatest lamentations and despair, so that the hardest heart would have had compassion on them; even the Lord de Vienne wept bitterly.

After a short time, the most wealthy citizen of the town, by name Eustace de St. Pierre, rose up and said: 'Gentlemen, both high and low, it would be a very great pity to suffer so many people to die through famine, if any means could be found to prevent it; and it would be highly meritorious in the eyes of our Savior, if such misery could be averted. I have such faith and trust in finding grace before God, if I die to save my townsmen, that I name myself as first of the six.' When Eustace had done speaking, they all rose up and almost worshiped him: many cast themselves at his feet with tears and groans. Another citizen, very rich and respected, rose up and said he would be the second to his companion, Eustace; his name was John Daire. After him, James Wisant, who was very rich in merchandise and lands, offered himself, as companion to his two cousins; as did Peter Wisant, his brother. Two others then named themselves, which completed the number demanded by the King of England. The Lord John de Vienne then mounted a small hackney, for it was with difficulty that he could walk, and conducted them to the gate. There was the greatest sorrow and lamentation all over the town; and in such manner were they attended to the gate, which the governor ordered to be opened, and then shut upon him and the six citizens, whom he led to the barriers, and said to Sir Walter Manny, who was there waiting for him, 'I deliver up to you, as governor of Calais, with the consent of the inhabitants, these six citizens; and I swear to you that they were, and are at this day, the most wealthy and respectable inhabitants of Calais. I beg of you, gentle sir, that you would have the goodness to beseech the king that they may not be put to death.' 'I cannot answer for what the king will do with them,' replied Sir Walter, 'but you may depend that I will do all in my power to save them.' The barriers were opened, when these six citizens advanced toward the pavilion of the king, and the Lord de Vienne reëntered the town.

When Sir Walter Manny had presented these six citizens to the king, they fell upon their knees, and, with uplifted hands, said, 'Most gallant king, see before you six citizens of Calais who have been capital merchants, and who bring you the keys of the castle and of the town. We surrender ourselves to your absolute will and pleasure, in order to save the remainder of the inhabitants of Calais, who have suffered much distress and misery. Condescend, therefore, out of your nobleness of mind, to have mercy and compassion upon us.'

All the barons, knights, and squires, that were assembled there in great numbers, wept at this sight. The king eyed them with angry looks (for he hated much the people of Calais, for the great losses he had formerly suffered from them at sea), and ordered their heads to be stricken off. All present entreated the king, that he would be more merciful to them, but he would not listen to them. Then Sir Walter Manny said, 'Ah, gentle king, let me beseech you to restrain your anger: you have the reputation of great nobleness of soul, do not therefore tarnish it by such an act as this, nor allow anyone to speak in a disgraceful manner of you. In this instance, all the world will say you have acted cruelly, if you put to death six such respectable persons, who, of their own free will, have surrendered themselves to your mercy, in order to save their fellow-citizens.' Upon this, the king gave a wink, saying, 'Be it so,' and ordered the heads-men to be sent for; for that the Calesians had done him so much damage, it was proper they should suffer for it. The Queen of England, who at that time was very big with child, fell on her knees, and with tears, said, 'Ah, gentle sir, since I have crossed the sea with great danger to see you, I have never asked you one favor: now, I most humbly ask as a gift, for the sake of the Son of the blessed Mary, and for your love to me, that you will be merciful to these six men.' The king looked at her for some time in silence, and then said, 'Ah, lady, I wish you had been anywhere else than here: you have entreated in such a manner that I cannot refuse you; I therefore give them to you, to do as you please with them.' The queen conducted the six citizens to her apartments, and had the halters taken from round their necks, after which she new clothed them, and served them with a plentiful dinner. She then presented each with six nobles, and had them escorted out of the camp in safety.

VILLON (1431- ?)

François Villon's connection with the Revival of Learning hardly goes beyond the fact that he took his degree at the University of Paris; even as a student he was much more given to drunkenness, gluttony, thievery and violence than to the pursuit of knowledge. The date of his death is unknown, but between his excesses and the hardships by way of prison and punishment resulting from his excesses, his health must have been insecure, and it seems likely that he did not live long after his release by Louis XI in 1461, presumably on the plea that there were thousands of rogues in France no better than Villon, but no poet who was his equal. In his own manner there has been no poet equal to him since; he remains the prince of poetic vagabonds, who spares his readers no grim detail of the life he led, but succeeds in adding to the virtue of sincerity a melodious charm which has stood the test of nearly six centuries and stands today in higher appreciation than ever.

THE BALLAD OF DEAD LADIES

Translated by Dante Gabriel Rossetti

Tell me now in what hidden way is Lady Flora the lovely Roman?
Where's Hipparchia, and where is Thaïs,
Neither of them the fairer woman?
Where is Echo, beheld of no man, 5
Only heard on river and mere,—
She whose beauty was more than human?
But where are the snows of yester-year?

Where's Héloïse, the learned nun,
For whose sake Abelard, I ween, 10
Lost manhood and put priesthood on?
(From Love he won such dule and teen!)
And where, I pray you, is the Queen
Who willed that Buridan should steer
Sewed in a sack's mouth down the Seine? . . . 15
But where are the snows of yester-year?

White Queen Blanche, like a queen of lilies,
With a voice like any mermaid,—
Bertha Broadfoot, Beatrice, Alice,
And Ermengarde the lady of Maine,— 20
And that good Joan whom Englishmen
At Rouen doomed and burned her there,—
Mother of God, where are they then? . . .
But where are the snows of yester-year?

Nay, never ask this week, fair lord, 25
Where they are gone, nor yet this year,
Except with this for an overword,—
But where are the snows of yester-year?

BALLAD OF THE WOMEN OF PARIS

Translated by Algernon Charles Swinburne

- Albeit the Venice girls get praise
 For their sweet speech and tender air,
 And though the old women have wise ways
 Of chaffering for amorous ware,
 Yet at my peril dare I swear, 5
 Search Rome, where God's grace mainly tarries,
 Florence and Savoy, everywhere,
 There's no good girl's lip out of Paris.
- The Naples women, as folk prattle,
 Are sweetly spoken and subtle enough: 10
 German girls are good at tattle,
 And Prussians make their boast thereof;
 Take Egypt for the next remove,
 Or that waste land the Tartar harries,
 Spain or Greece, for the matter of love, 15
 There's no good girl's lip out of Paris.
- Breton and Swiss know nought of the matter,
 Gascony girls or girls of Toulouse;
 Two fishwives here with a half-hour's chatter
 Would shut them up by threes and twos; 20
 Calais, Lorraine, and all their crews,
 (Names enow the mad song marries)
 England and Picardy, search them and choose,
 There's no good girl's lip out of Paris.
- Prince, give praise to our French ladies 25
 For the sweet sound their speaking carries;
 'Twixt Rome and Cadiz many a maid is,
 But no good girl's lip out of Paris.

BALLAD OF THINGS KNOWN AND UNKNOWN

Translated by John Payne

- Flies in the milk I know full well;
 I know men by the clothes they wear;
 I know the walnut by the shell;
 I know the foul sky from the fair;
 I know the pear-tree by the pear; 5
 I know the worker from the drone,
 And eke the good wheat from the tare;
 I know all save myself alone.
- I know the pourpoint by the fell,
 And by his gown I know the frère; 10
 Master or varlet I can spell;
 Nuns by the veils that hide their hair;
 I know the sharper and his snare,
 And fools that fat on cates have grown;
 Wines by the cask I can compare; 15
 I know all save myself alone.

- I know how horse from mule to tell;
 I know the load that each can bear;
 I know both Beatrice and Bell;
 I know the hazards, odd and pair;
 I know of visions in the air;
 I know the power of Peter's throne,
 And how misled Bohemians were:
 I know all save myself alone. 20
- Prince, I know all things; fat and spare,
 Ruddy and pale, to me are known:
 And Death that endeth all our care:
 I know all save myself alone. 25

THE DISPUTE OF THE HEART AND BODY OF FRANÇOIS VILLON

Translated by Algernon Charles Swinburne

- Who is this I hear? Lo, this is I, thine heart,
 That holds on merely now by a slender string.
 Strength fails me, shape and sense are rent apart,
 The blood in me is turned to a bitter thing,
 Seeing thee skulk here like a dog shivering. 5
- Yea, and for what? For that thy sense found sweet.
 What irks it thee? I feel the sting of it.
 Leave me at peace. Why? Nay now, leave me at peace;
 I will repent when I grow ripe in wit.
 I say no more. I care not though thou cease. 10
- What art thou, trow? A man worth praise, perfoy.
 This is thy thirtieth year of wayfaring.
 'Tis a mule's age. Art thou a boy still? Nay.
 Is it hot lust that spurs thee with its sting,
 Grasping thy throat? Know'st thou not anything? 15
- Yea, black and white, when milk is specked with flies,
 I can make out. No more? Nay, in no wise.
 Shall I begin again the count of these?
 Thou art undone. I will make shift to rise.
 I say no more. I care not though thou cease. 20
- I have the sorrow of it, and thou the smart.
 Wert thou a poor mad fool or weak of wit,
 Then might'st thou plead this pretext with thine heart;
 But if thou know not good from evil a whit,
 Either thy head is hard as stone to hit, 25
- Or shame, not honor, gives thee most content.
 What canst thou answer to this argument?
 When I am dead I shall be well at ease.
 God! what good hope! Thou art over eloquent.
 I say no more. I care not though thou cease. 30
- Whence is this ill? From sorrow and not from sin.
 When Saturn packed my wallet up for me
 I well believe he put these ills therein.
 Fool, wilt thou make thy servant lord of thee?
 Hear now the wise king's counsel; thus saith he: 35

All power upon the stars a wise man hath;
 There is no planet that shall do him scathe.
 Nay, as they made me I grow and I decrease.
 What say'st thou? Truly this is all my faith.
 I say no more. I care not though thou cease.

40

Wouldst thou live still? God help me that I may!
 Then thou must—What? turn penitent and pray?
 Read always—What? Grave words and good to say;
 Leave off the ways of fools, lest they displease.
 Good; I will do it. Wilt thou remember? Yea.
 Abide not till there come an evil day.
 I say no more. I care not though thou cease.

THE EPITAPH IN FORM OF A BALLAD

WHICH VILLON MADE FOR HIMSELF AND HIS COMRADES, EXPECTING TO BE HANGED
 ALONG WITH THEM

Translated by Algernon Charles Swinburne

Men, brother men, that after us yet live,
 Let not your hearts too hard against us be;
 For if some pity of us poor men ye give,
 The sooner God shall take of you pity.

Here are we five or six strung up, you see,
 And here the flesh that all too well we fed
 Bit by bit eaten and rotten, rent and shred,
 And we the bones grow dust and ash withal;
 Let no man laugh at us discomforted,
 But pray to God that He forgive us all.

5

10

If we call on you, brothers, to forgive,
 Ye should not hold our prayer in scorn, though we
 Were slain by law; ye know that all alive
 Have not wit alway to walk righteously;
 Make therefore intercession heartily
 With him that of a virgin's womb was bred,
 That his grace be not as a dry well-head
 For us, not let hell's thunder on us fall;
 We are dead, let no man harry or vex us dead,
 But pray to God that He forgive us all.

15

The rain has washed and laundered us all five,
 And the sun dried and blackened; yea, perdie,
 Ravens and pies with beaks that rend and rive
 Have dug our eyes out, and plucked off for fee
 Our beards and eyebrows; never are we free,
 Not once, to rest; but here and there still sped,
 Drive at its wild will by the wind's change led,
 More pecked of birds than fruits on garden-wall;
 Men, for God's love, let no gibe here be said;
 But pray to God that He forgive us all.

Prince Jesus, that of all art lord and head,
 Keep us, that hell be not our bitter bed;
 We have nought to do in such a master's hall.
 Be not ye therefore of our fellowhead,
 But pray to God that He forgive us all.

III
THE RENAISSANCE

THE RENAISSANCE

No definite date can be fixed for the beginning of the Renaissance, which was not a single event, but a complex process including many elements. Of these two have been already mentioned—the revival of classical studies and the rise in the Italian cities of a free and independent spirit which found its natural expression in art and literature. The movement was forwarded in its later developments by other factors—the invention of printing about 1450; the dispersal of Greek scholars owing to the advance of the Turks on Constantinople, which they took in 1453; the discovery of America, which not only stimulated the minds of men but brought in its train vast changes in trade and international relations; and the discussion as to the source of authority in religion, begun in the fourteenth century by Wiclif in England and Huss in Bohemia, carried on in the fifteenth century by Erasmus and other scholars, and brought to a head by Martin Luther, who nailed his ninety-five ‘Theses against Indulgences’ on the church door at Wittenberg in 1517. His German version of the New Testament was published in 1522 and his translation of the Old Testament in 1536. Meanwhile Tyndale, following the footsteps of Wiclif and his co-workers, had printed the New Testament in English, and a number of other English translations of the Bible followed, culminating in the Authorized Version of 1611.

The whole period was one of intense and often violent discussion about the issues involved in the words Protestantism and Puritanism, which overturned governments, sent men and women to the stake to suffer death for their opinions, or drove them to look for freedom in the New World. It was a long time before people saw the way to peace through toleration and liberty of opinion, especially with reference to religious belief.

The characteristic of the Middle Ages was the acceptance of authority as a principle, though they might differ on the question of who should exercise it—Pope or Emperor or King or Baron or some other divinely ordained ruler. The rights of individual freedom and responsibility, of liberty of thought and expression, of a free press, are modern ideas, at which humanity has arrived only after prolonged argument and no little sacrifice and suffering. They are still subject to question and to legal limitation in time of war or in any other crisis in which popular passions are roused and men are thrown back upon more primitive instincts and impulses.

In all this ferment of the human intelligence, the revival of classical studies may seem to be a minor element, but in the free spirit of inquiry of Greek philosophy the artists, thinkers, and writers of the Renaissance found encouragement and stimulus for their desire to treat as open questions matters which had for centuries been regarded as closed and beyond discussion. These were questions not only of faith, but of practise, of morals. Released from the restraints of constituted authorities in church and state and from the pressure of a public opinion, once practically unanimous but now divided by differences of opinion on crucial issues, some men passed eagerly from liberty to license, for which the disorder of the times gave ample opportunity. To the more conservative, who were still in the majority, it seemed as if the pagan world had come back again, as if the whole structure of society were in process of dissolution.

The organization of society was in fact undergoing a process of momentous change, which is indeed still in progress. In the early stages, discussion was not free, and men of advanced opinions either kept silence about them or expressed them guardedly, from fear of punishment by the constituted authorities. The safest way of indirect expression was by means of literature, more or less imaginative or satirical. The printing press gave men the opportunity of influencing public opinion in this way on a scale hitherto impossible, and became the main instrument for creating the change of outlook which distinguishes the modern from the medieval world.

The date given for the birth of Desiderius Erasmus on his statue at Rotterdam, his birthplace, is October 28, 1467, but other authorities place it in 1465 or 1466, and if the life ascribed to him in the Elzevir edition is indeed from his own hand, he was uncertain about the precise year himself. He was an illegitimate son, and though his parents were cultivated people who did their best to provide for his education, they both died in his childhood and left him to the care of incompetent guardians, who tried to get rid of their responsibilities by handing him over to the care of the Church. The boy showed a precocious talent, especially for Latin literature, being able, so it is said, at an early age to recite all Terence and Horace by heart, and at that time the natural place for studious youth seemed to be a monastery. Young Erasmus had no taste for the monastic life and after a short experience of it he obtained service as Latin secretary to the Bishop of Cambrai, whom he induced to send him as a student to the University of Paris. From France he passed to England, where he was warmly received by Sir Thomas More and other leading men in church and state, with whom he made lasting friendships. He spent some time at the University of Oxford, where he ardently pursued the study of Greek, but not gaining the preferment he expected, he left England for the Continent. He took a doctor's degree at Turin, studied for a year at the famous University of Bologna, and at Venice published an enlarged edition of his Book of Adages at the famous Aldine press. From Venice he went to Padua and from Padua to Rome, where his fame as a scholar had already preceded him. The accession of Henry VIII in 1509 gave him renewed hope of preferment in England, and he returned thither to be again disappointed, for he was given only the small living of Aldington in Kent, the reigning favorite, Cardinal Wolsey, being apparently opposed to him. Returning to Flanders, he was appointed counselor to Charles of Austria, afterwards Emperor as Charles V. For some years he lived at Basel in Switzerland, but the reforming spirit in religion in that city going farther than commended itself to the studied moderation of Erasmus, he retired from it for seven years to Fribourg in Alsace, returning to Basel on grounds of health, only to die there soon after.

Erasmus was essentially a student and a critic, and it was his misfortune to live in an age of bitter and violent controversy in which he was offended by the extravagances of the more bigoted and vehement leaders on either side. They, on the other hand, were dissatisfied by what they regarded as his half-hearted and pusillanimous attitude on issues which his own writings had done much to raise. His edition of the Greek Testament (1516) was a notable contribution to learning, and his Adages (1500), Colloquies (1522), and very numerous Latin letters had a very wide circulation. Most influential of all was his Encomium Moriaë, The Praise of Folly (1511), 'an oration of feigned matter, spoken by Folly in her own person,' in which his satirical vein found free vent. Over forty editions of it were published during the author's lifetime, and Holbein's illustrations are still reproduced in modern reprints. Originally written in Latin, it has since appeared in frequent translations in nearly every European language. The first translation into English was made by Sir Thomas Chaloner in 1549, and many others have followed, of which the most popular is that done in 1683 by White Kennett, then a young Oxford graduate and afterwards Bishop of Peterborough. Although he has not succeeded in reproducing the conciseness of the Latin text, he has a quaint and lively style which is not inappropriate to the spirit of the original satire.

IN PRAISE OF FOLLY

Come now then as many of you as challenge the respect of being accounted wise, ingenuously confess how many insurrections of rebellious thoughts and pangs of a laboring mind ye are perpetually vexed and tortured with; reckon up all those inconveniences that you are unavoidably subject to, and then tell me whether fools, by being exempted from all these embroilments, are not infinitely more free and happy than yourselves? Add to this, that fools do not barely laugh and sing, and play the good-fellow alone to themselves; but as it is the nature of good to be communicative, so they impart their mirth to others, by making sport for the whole company they are at any time engaged in, as if providence purposely designed them for an antidote to melancholy: whereby they make all persons so fond of their society, that they are welcomed to all places, hugged, caressed, and defended, a liberty given them of saying or doing anything: so well beloved, that none dares to offer them the least injury; nay, the most ravenous beasts of prey will pass them by untouched, as if by instinct they were warned that such innocence ought to receive no hurt. Farther, their converse is so acceptable in the court of princes, that few kings will banquet, walk, or take any other diversion, without their attendance; nay, and had much rather have their company than that of their gravest counselors, whom they maintain more for fashion-sake than good-will; nor is it so strange that these fools should be preferred before graver politicians, since these last, by their harsh, sour advice, and ill-timing the truth, are fit only to put a prince out of humor, while the others laugh and talk and joke, without any danger of disobliging.

It is another very commendable property of fools, that they always speak the truth, than which there is nothing more noble and heroical. For so, though Plato relates it as a sentence of Alcibiades, that in the sea of drunkenness truth swims uppermost, and so wine is the only teller of truth, yet this character may more justly be assumed by me, as I can make good from the authority of Euripides, who lays down this as an axiom μωροὶ μωρὸς λέγει—children and fools always speak the truth.

Whatever the fool has in his heart he betrays it in his face, or what is more evident, discovers it by his words, while the wise man, as Euripides observes, carries a double tongue: the one to speak what may be said, the other what ought to be; the one what truth, the other what the times require: whereby he can in a trice so alter his judgment as to prove that to be now white, which he had just before sworn to be black; like the satyr at his porridge, blowing hot and cold at the same breath;

in his lips professing one thing, when in his heart he means another.

Furthermore, princes in their greatest splendor seem upon this account unhappy, in that they miss the advantage of being told the truth, and are shammed off by a parcel of insinuating courtiers, that acquit themselves as flatterers more than as friends. But some will perchance object that princes do not love to hear the truth, and therefore wise men must be very cautious how they behave themselves before them, lest they should take too great a liberty in speaking what is true rather than what is acceptable.

This much must be confessed, that truth indeed is seldom palatable to the ears of kings; yet fools have so great a privilege as to have free leave, not only to speak bare truths, but the most bitter ones too; so as the same reproof, which had it come from the mouth of a wise man would have cost him his head, being blurted out by a fool, is not only pardoned, but welcomed and rewarded. For truth has naturally a mixture of pleasure, if it carry with it nothing of offense to the person whom it is applied to; and the happy knack of ordering it so is bestowed only on fools.

'Tis for the same reason that this sort of men are more fondly beloved by women, who like their tumbling them about and playing with them, though never so boisterously; pretending to take that only in jest, which they would have to be meant in earnest, as that sex is very ingenious in palliating and dissembling the bent of their wanton inclinations.

But to return. An additional happiness of these fools appears farther in this, that when they have run merrily on to their last stage of life, they neither find any fear nor feel any pain to die, but march contentedly to the other world, where their company must surely be as acceptable as it was here upon earth.

Let us draw now a comparison between the condition of a fool and that of a wise man, and see how infinitely the one outweighs the other.

Give me any instance then, of a man as wise as you can fancy him possible to be, that has spent all his younger years poring over books and trudging after learning, in the pursuit whereof he squanders away the pleasantest time of his life in watching, sweating, and fasting; and in his latter days he never tastes one mouthful of delight, but is always stingy, poor, dejected, melancholy, burthensome to himself and unwelcome to others, pale, lean, thin-jawed, sickly, contracting by his seditariness such hurtful distempers as bring him to an untimely death, like rose-buds plucked before they bloom. Thus have you a picture of the wise man's happiness—more the object of commiseration and pity than of jealousy and envy. . . .

The next to be placed among the regiment of fools are such as make a trade of telling or enquiring after incredible stories of miracles and prodigies: never doubting that a lie will choke them, they will muster up a thousand several strange relations of spirits, ghosts, apparitions, raising of the devil, and such like bugbears of superstition, which the farther they are from being probably true, the more greedily they are swallowed and the more devoutly believed. And these absurdities do not only bring an empty pleasure and cheap diversion, but they procure a comfortable income to such priests and friars as by this craft get their gain. To these again are nearly related such others as attribute strange virtues to the shrines and images of saints and martyrs, and so would make their credulous proselytes believe that if they pay their devotion to St. Christopher in the morning, they shall be guarded and secured the day following from all dangers and misfortunes; if soldiers, when they first take arms, shall come and mumble over such a set prayer before the picture of St. Barbara, they shall return safe from all engagements; or if any pray to Erasmus on such particular holidays, with the ceremony of wax candles and other fopperies, he shall in a short time be rewarded with a plentiful increase of wealth and riches. The Christians have now their gigantic St. George, as well as the Pagans had their Hercules; they paint the saint on horseback, and picture the horse in splendid trappings, very gloriously accoutred; they scarce refrain in a literal sense from worshipping the very beast.

What shall I say of such as cry up and maintain the cheat of pardons and indulgences? that by these compute the time of each soul's residence in purgatory, and assign them a longer or shorter continuance, according as they purchase more or fewer of these paltry pardons and saleable exemptions? Or what can be said bad enough of others, who pretend that by the force of such magical charms, or by the fumbling over their beads in the rehearsal of such and such petitions (which some religious imposters invented, either for diversion, or what is more likely, for advantage), they shall procure riches, honor, pleasure, health, long life, a lusty old age, nay, after death a sitting at the right hand of our Savior in His kingdom; though as to this last part of their happiness, they care not how long it be deferred, having scarce any appetite toward a tasting the joys of heaven, till they are surfeited, glutted with, and can no longer relish their enjoyments on earth.

By this easy way of purchasing pardons, any notorious highwayman, any plundering soldier, or any bribe-taking judge, shall disburse some part of their unjust gains, and so think all their grossest impieties sufficiently atoned for; so many perjuries, lusts, drunkenness, quarrels, bloodsheds, cheats, treacheries, and all sorts of debaucheries, shall all be, as it were, struck a bargain for, and such a contract made, as if they had paid off all arrears, and might now begin upon a new score.

And what can be more ridiculous than for some others to be confident of going to heaven by repeating daily those seven verses out of the Psalms, which the devil taught St. Bernard, thinking thereby to have put a trick upon him, but that he was over-reached in his cunning.

Several of these fooleries, which are so gross and absurd as I myself am even ashamed to own, are practised and admired, not only by the vulgar, but by such proficient in religion as one might well expect should have more wit.

The custom of each country challenging their particular guardian-saint proceeds from the same principles of folly; nay, each saint has his distinct office allotted to him, and is accordingly addressed upon the respective occasions: as one for the toothache, a second to grant an easy delivery in childbirth, a third to recover lost goods, another to protect seamen in a long voyage, a fifth to guard the farmer's cows and sheep, and so on; for to rehearse all instances would be extremely tedious.

There are some more catholic saints petitioned to upon all occasions, as more especially the Virgin Mary, whose blind devotees think it manners now to place the mother before the son.

And of all the prayers and intercessions that are made to these respective saints, the substance of them is no more than downright Folly.

Among all the trophies that for tokens of gratitude are hung upon the walls and ceilings of churches, you shall find no relics presented as a memorandum of any that were ever cured of Folly, or had been made one dram the wiser. One perhaps after shipwreck got safe to shore; another recovered when he had been run through by an enemy; one, when all his fellow-soldiers were killed upon the spot, as cunningly perhaps as cowardly, made his escape from the field; another, while he was a hanging, the rope broke, and so he saved his neck, and renewed his license for practising his old-trade of thieving; another broke jail, and got loose; a patient (against his physician's will) recovered of a dangerous fever; another drank poison, which putting him into a violent looseness, did his body more good than harm, to the great grief of his wife, who hoped upon this occasion to have become a joyful widow; another had his wagon overturned, and yet none of his horses lamed; another had caught a grievous fall, and yet recovered from the bruise; another had been tampering with his neighbor's wife, and escaped very narrowly from being caught by the enraged husband in the very act. After all these acknowledgments of escapes from such singular dangers, there is none (as I have before intimated) that returns thanks for being freed from Folly; Folly being so sweet and luscious that it is rather sued for as a happiness than deprecated as a punishment. But why should I launch out into so wide a sea of superstitions?

Had I as many tongues as Argus eyes, Briareus hands, they all would not suffice Folly in all her shapes t' epitomize.

Almost all Christians are wretchedly enslaved to blindness and ignorance, which the priests are so far from preventing or removing that they blacken the darkness and promote the delusion; wisely foreseeing that the people (like cows, which never give down their milk so well as when they are gently stroked), would part with less if they knew more, their bounty proceeding only from a mistake of charity. Now if any grave, wise man should stand up, and unseasonably speak the truth, telling everyone that a pious life is the only way of securing a happy death; that the best title to a pardon of our sins is purchased by a hearty abhorrence of our guilt and sincere resolutions of amendment; that the best devotion which can be paid to any saints is to imitate them in their exemplary life; if he should proceed thus to inform them of their several mistakes, there would be quite another estimate put upon tears, watchings, masses, fastings, and other severities, which before were so much prized, as persons will now be vexed to lose that satisfaction they formerly found in them.

In the same predicament of fools are to be ranked such as while they are yet living and in good health, take so great a care how they shall be buried when they die that they solemnly appoint how many torches, how many escutcheons, how many gloves to be given, and how many mourners they will have at their funeral; as if they thought they themselves in their coffins could be sensible of what respect was paid to their corpse; or as if they doubted they should rest a whit the less quiet in the grave if they were with less state and pomp interred.

Now, though I am in so great haste as I would not willingly be stopped or detained, yet I cannot pass by without bestowing some remarks upon another sort of fools; who, though their first descent was perhaps no better than from a tapster or tinker, yet highly value themselves upon their birth and parentage. One fetches his pedigree from Æneas, another from Brutus, a third from king Arthur: they hang up their ancestors' worm-eaten pictures as records of antiquity, and keep a long list of their predecessors, with an account of all their offices and titles, while they themselves are but transcripts of their forefathers' dumb statues, and degenerate even into those very beasts which they carry in their coat of arms as ensigns of their nobility: and yet by a strong presumption of their birth and quality, they live not only the most unconcerned lives themselves, but there are not wanting others too who cry up these brutes as almost equal to the gods.

But why should I dwell upon one or two instances of Folly, when there are so many of like nature, conceitedness and self-love making many, by strength of Fancy, believe themselves happy, when otherwise they are really wretched and despicable. Thus the most ape-faced, ugliest fellow in the whole town shall think himself a mirror of beauty: another shall be so proud of his parts, that if he can but mark out a triangle with a pair of compasses, he thinks he has mastered all the difficulties of geometry and could outdo Euclid himself. A third shall admire himself for a ravishing musician, though he have no more skill in the handling of any instrument than a pig has of playing on the organ; and another, that rattles in the throat as hoarse as a cock crows, shall be proud of his voice and think that he sings like a nightingale.

There is another very pleasant sort of madness, whereby persons assume to themselves whatever of accomplishment they discern in others. Thus the happy rich churl in Seneca, who had so short a memory, that he could not tell the least story without a servant standing by to prompt him, and was at the same time so weak that he could scarce go upright, yet he thought he might adventure to accept a challenge to a duel, because he kept at home some lusty, sturdy fellows, whose strength he relied upon instead of his own.

It is almost needless to insist upon the several professors of arts and sciences, who are all so egregiously conceited that they would sooner give up their title to an estate in lands than part with the reversion of their wits: among these, more especially stage-players, musicians, orators, and poets, each of which, the more of duncery they have, and the more of pride, the greater is their ambition: and how notoriously soever dull they be, they meet with their admirers; nay, the more silly they are, the higher they are extolled; Folly (as we have before intimated) never failing of respect and esteem. If therefore everyone, the more ignorant he is, the greater satisfaction he is to himself and the more commended by others, to what purpose is it to sweat and toil in the pursuit of true learning, which shall cost so many gripes and pangs of the brain to acquire, and when obtained, shall only make the laborious student more uneasy to himself and less acceptable to others?

As nature in her dispensation of conceitedness has dealt with private persons, so has she given a particular smatch of self-love to each country and nation. Upon this account it is that the English challenge the prerogative of having the most handsome women, of being the most accomplished in the science of music, and of keeping the best tables. The Scotch brag of their gentility, and pretend the genius of their native soil inclines them to be good disputants. The French think themselves remarkable for complaisance and good breeding; the Sorbonists of Paris pretend before any others to have made the greatest proficiency in polemic divinity. The Italians value themselves for learning and eloquence; and, like the Grecians of old, account all the world barbarians compared to themselves; to which piece of vanity the inhabitants of Rome are more especially addicted, pretending themselves to be owners of all those heroic virtues which their city so many ages since was deservedly famous for. The Venetians stand upon their birth and pedigree. The Grecians pride themselves in having been the first inventors of most arts, and in their country being famed for the product of so many eminent philosophers. The Turks and all the other refuse of Mahometanism pretend they profess the only true religion, and laugh at all Christians for superstitious, narrow-scaled fools. The Jews to this day expect their Messias as devoutly as they believe in their first prophet Moses. The Spaniards challenge the repute of being accounted good soldiers. And the Germans are noted for their tall, proper stature, and for their skill in magic.

But not to mention any more, I suppose you are already convinced how great an improvement and addition to the happiness of human life is occasioned by self-love: the next step to which is flattery; for as self-love is nothing but the coaxing up of ourselves, so the same currying and humoring of others is termed flattery.

Flattery, it is true, is now looked upon as a scandalous name, but it is by such only as mind words more than things. They are prejudiced against it upon this account, because they suppose it jostles out all truth and sincerity, whereas indeed its property is quite contrary, as appears from the examples of several brute creatures. What is more fawning than a spaniel? And yet what animal is more faithful to its master? What is more fond and loving than a tame squirrel? And yet what is more sportive and inoffensive? This little frisking creature is kept up in a cage to play withal, while lions, tigers, leopards, and such other savage emblems of rapine and cruelty are shown only for their great rarity and otherwise yield no pleasure to their respective keepers.

There is indeed a pernicious and destructive sort of flattery wherewith rookers and sharks work their several ends upon such as they can make a prey of, by decoying them into traps and snares beyond recovery. But that which is the effect of folly is of a very different nature; it proceeds from a softness of spirit and a flexibleness of good humor, and comes far nearer to virtue than that other extreme of friendship, namely, a stiff, sour, dogged moroseness: it refreshes our minds when tired, enlivens them when melancholy, reinforces them when languishing, invigorates them when heavy, recovers them when sick, and pacifies them when rebellious; it puts us in a method of procuring friends, and teaches us how to keep them; it entices children to swallow the bitter rudiments of learning; it gives a new ferment to the almost stagnated souls of old men; it both reprove and inculcates principles without offense under the mask of commendation: in short, it makes every man fond and indulgent of himself, which is indeed no small part of each man's happiness, and at the same time renders him obliging and complaisant in all company, where it is pleasant to see how the asses rub and scratch one another.

This again is a great accomplishment to an orator, a greater to a physician, and the only one to a poet: in fine, it is the best sweetener to all afflictions, and gives a true relish to the otherwise insipid enjoyments of our whole life. 'Aye,' (say you) 'to flatter is to deceive; to deceive is very wrong and hurtful.' No, rather just the reverse; nothing is more welcome and bewitching than the being deceived. They are much to be blamed for an undistinguishing head, that make a judgment of things according to what they are in themselves, when their whole nature consists barely in the opinions that are had of them.

For all sublunary matters are enveloped in such a cloud of obscurity, that the short-sightedness of human understanding cannot pry through nor arrive at any comprehensive knowledge of them: hence the sect of academic philosophers have modestly resolved, that all things being no more than probable, nothing can be known as certain; or if there could, yet it would but interrupt and abate from the pleasure of a more happy ignorance. Finally, our souls are so fashioned and molded, that they are sooner captivated by appearances than by real truths; of which, if anyone would demand an example, he may find a familiar one in churches, where, if what is delivered from the pulpit be a grave, solid, rational discourse, all the congregation grow weary and fall asleep, till their patience be released; whereas, if the preacher (pardon the impropriety of the word, the prater I should have said) be zealous in his thumps of the cushion, his antic gestures, and spends his time in the telling of pleasant stories, his beloved shall then stand up, tuck their hair behind their ears, and be very devoutly attentive.

MACHIAVELLI (1469-1527)

Niccolo Machiavelli was the son of a Florentine lawyer of good family and entered the public service of his native city in 1494, the year in which Lorenzo de'Medici fell from power. Machiavelli served the Republic until 1512, when he was driven from office by the return of the Medici and retired to San Casciano to devote himself to study and literary work. For fifteen years he had read and meditated on the subject of statecraft, and in 1513 he completed a concise treatise discussing 'what a principality is, what kinds there are, how they can be acquired, how they can be kept, why they are lost.' The Prince was dedicated to Lorenzo de'Medici, grandson of Lorenzo the Magnificent mentioned above, and at the instance of Giuliano de'Medici (who soon afterwards became Pope under the title of Clement VII) Machiavelli undertook a History of Florence, which he finished in 1525. He was the author of many other discourses, poems, comedies, a story, but it is upon The Prince that his permanent fame rests.

In the sixteenth century The Prince brought him not only fame but notoriety. Especially in Western Europe the name of Machiavelli became a synonym for duplicity, and the more indirect ways of modern diplomacy are still known as Machiavellian. But obviously Machiavelli did not invent the use of cunning in international relations, nor was the application of his maxims unknown in his own time. He recommended no art that was not already known and practised; it was merely that he was unusually frank in discussing the advantages of deceit in the relations between states. Whether international morality can be elevated to the same plane as private morality is a question that is still discussed. Machiavelli was just the opposite of a successful schemer so far as his own career was concerned: he had a talent for allying himself with the losing side. He says of himself: 'Of my loyalty none could doubt, because having always kept faith I could not now learn how to break it; for he who has been faithful and honest, as I have, cannot change his nature; and my poverty is a witness to my honesty.'

Later ages, with fuller knowledge, have done more justice to Machiavelli, and the evil associations with which legend enveloped his character have been dissipated. His patriotism was as remarkable as his ability, and in the fourth centenary of his birth United Italy placed a tablet on his house in Florence hailing him as 'the intrepid and foresighted precursor of national unity.'

HOW A PRINCE SHOULD CONDUCT HIMSELF SO AS TO GAIN RENOWN

CHAPTER XXI

Nothing makes a prince so much esteemed as great enterprises and setting a fine example. We have in our time Ferdinand of Aragon, the present King of 10 Spain. He can almost be called a new prince, because he has risen, by fame and glory, from being an insignificant king to be the foremost king in Christendom; and if you will consider his deeds you will find 15 them all great and some of them extraordinary. In the beginning of his reign he attacked Granada, and this enterprise was the foundation of his dominions. He did this quietly at first and without any fear of hindrance, for he held the minds of the barons of Castille occupied in thinking of the war and not anticipating any innovations; thus they did not perceive that by these means he was acquiring power and authority over them. He was able with the money of the Church and of the people to sustain his armies, and by that long war to lay the foundation for the military skill which has since distinguished him. Further, always using religion as a plea, so as to undertake greater schemes, he devoted himself with a pious cruelty to driving out and clearing his kingdom of the Moors; nor could there be a more admirable example, nor one more rare. Under this same cloak he assailed Africa, he came down on Italy, he has finally attacked France; and thus his achievements and designs have always been great, and have kept the minds of his people in suspense and admiration and occupied with the issue of them. And his actions have arisen in such a way, one out of the other, that men have never been given time to work steadily against him.

Again, it much assists a prince to set unusual examples in internal affairs, similar to those which are related of Messer Bernabo da Milano, who when he had the opportunity, by anyone in civil life doing some extraordinary thing, either good or bad, would take some method of rewarding or punishing him, which would be much spoken about. And a prince ought, above all things, always to endeavor in every action to gain for himself the reputation of being a great and remarkable man.

A prince is also respected when he is either a true friend or a downright enemy, that is to say, when, without any reservation, he declares himself in favor of one party against the other; which course will always be more advantageous than standing neutral; because if two of your powerful neighbors come to blows, they are of such a character that, if one of them conquers, you have either to fear him or not. In either case it will always be more advantageous for you to declare yourself and to make war strenuously; because, in the first case, if you do not declare yourself, you will invariably fall a prey to the conqueror, to the pleasure and satisfaction of him who has been conquered, and you will have no reasons to offer, nor anything to protect or to shelter you. Because he who conquers does not want doubtful friends who will not aid him in the time of trial; and he who loses will not harbor you because you did not willingly, sword in hand, court his fate.

Antiochus went into Greece, being sent for by the Ætolians to drive out the Romans. He sent envoys to the Acheans, who were friends of the Romans, exhorting them to remain neutral; and on the other hand the Romans urged them to take up arms. This question came to be discussed in the council of the Acheans, where the legate of Antiochus urged them to stand neutral. To this the Roman legate answered: 'As for that which has been said, that it is better and more advantageous for your state not to interfere in our war, nothing can be more erroneous; because by not interfering you will be left, without favor or consideration, the guerdon of the conqueror.' Thus it will always happen that he who is not your friend will demand your neutrality, whilst he who is your friend will entreat you to declare yourself with arms. And irresolute princes, to avoid present dangers, generally follow the neutral path, and are generally ruined. But when a prince declares himself gallantly in favor of one side, if the party with whom he allies himself conquers, although the victor may be powerful and may have him at his mercy, yet he is indebted to him, and there is established a bond of amity; and men are never so shameless as to become a monument of ingratitude by oppressing you. Victories after all are never so complete that the victor must not show some regard, especially to justice. But if he with whom you ally yourself loses, you may be sheltered by him, and whilst he is able he may aid you, and you become companions in a fortune that may rise again.

In the second case, when those who fight are of such a character that you have no anxiety as to who may conquer, so much the more is it greater prudence to be allied, because you assist at the destruction of one by the aid of another who, if he had been wise, would have saved him; and conquering, as it is impossible that he should not with your assistance, he remains at your discretion. And here it is to be noted that a prince ought to take care never to make an alliance with one more powerful than himself for the purpose of attacking others, unless necessity compels him, as is said above; because if he conquers you are at his discretion, and princes ought to avoid as much as possible being at the discretion of anyone. The Venetians joined with France against the Duke of Milan, and this alliance, which caused their ruin, could have been avoided. But when it cannot be avoided, as happened to the Florentines when the Pope and Spain sent armies to attack Lombardy, then in such a case, for the above reasons, the prince ought to favor one of the parties.

Never let any Government imagine that it can choose perfectly safe courses; rather let it expect to have to take very doubtful ones, because it is found in ordinary affairs that one never seeks to avoid one trouble without running into another; but prudence consists in knowing how to distinguish the character of troubles, and for choice to take the lesser evil.

A prince ought also to show himself a patron of ability, and to honor the proficient in every art. At the same time he should encourage his citizens to practise their callings peaceably, both in commerce and agriculture, and in every other following, so that the one should not be deterred from improving his possessions for fear lest they be taken away from him, or another from opening up trade for fear of taxes; but the prince ought to offer rewards to whoever wishes to do these things and designs in any way to honor his city or state.

Further, he ought to entertain the people with festivals and spectacles at convenient seasons of the year; and as every city is divided into guilds or into societies, he ought to hold such bodies in esteem, and associate with them sometimes, and show himself an example of courtesy and liberality; nevertheless, always maintaining the majesty of his rank, for this he must never consent to abate in anything.

CONCERNING THE SECRETARIES OF PRINCES

CHAPTER XXII

The choice of servants is of no little importance to a prince, and they are good or not according to the discrimination of the prince. And the first opinion which one forms of a prince, and of his understanding, is by observing the men he has around him; and when they are capable and faithful he may always be considered wise, because he has known how to recognize the capable and to keep them faithful. But when they are otherwise one cannot form a good opinion of him, for the prime error which he made was in choosing them.

There were none who knew Messer Antonio da Venafrò as the servant of Pandolfo Petrucci, Prince of Siena, who would not consider Pandolfo to be a very clever man in having Venafrò for his servant. Because there are three classes of intellects: one which comprehends by itself; another which appreciates what others comprehend; and a third which neither comprehends by itself nor by the showing of others; the first is the most excellent, the second is good, the third is useless. Therefore, it follows necessarily that, if Pandolfo was not in the first rank, he was in the second, for whenever one has judgment to know good or bad when it is said and done, although he himself may not have the initiative, yet he can recognize the good and the bad in his servant, and the one he can praise and the other correct; thus the servant cannot hope to deceive him, and is kept honest.

But to enable a prince to form an opinion of his servant there is one test which never fails: when you see the servant thinking more of his own interests than of yours, and seeking inwardly his own profit in everything, such a man will never make a good servant, nor will you ever be able to trust him, because he who has the state of another in his hands ought never to think of himself, but always of his prince, and never pay any attention to matters in which the prince is not concerned.

On the other hand, to keep his servant honest the prince ought to study him, honoring him, enriching him, doing him kindnesses, sharing with him the honors and cares; and at the same time let him see that he cannot stand alone, so that many honors may not make him desire more, many riches make him wish for more, and that many cares may make him dread changes. When, therefore, servants, and princes towards servants, are thus disposed, they can trust each other, but when it is otherwise, the end will always be disastrous for either one or the other.

HOW FLATTERERS SHOULD BE AVOIDED

CHAPTER XXIII

I do not wish to leave out an important branch of this subject, for it is a danger from which princes are with difficulty preserved, unless they are very careful and discriminating. It is that of flatterers, of whom courts are full, because men are so self-complacent in their own affairs, and in a way so deceived in them, that they are preserved with difficulty from this pest, and if they wish to defend themselves they run the danger of falling into contempt. Because there is no other way of guarding one's self from flatterers except letting men understand that to tell you the truth does not offend you; but when everyone may tell you the truth, respect for you abates.

Therefore a wise prince ought to hold a third course by choosing the wise men in his state, and giving to them only the liberty of speaking the truth to him, and then only of those things of which he inquires, and of none others; but he ought to question them upon everything, and listen to their opinions, and afterwards form his own conclusions. With these counselors, separately and collectively, he ought to carry himself in such a way that each of them should know that, the more freely he shall speak, the more he shall be preferred; outside of these, he should listen to no one, pursue the thing resolved on, and be steadfast in his resolutions. He who does otherwise is either overthrown by flatterers, or is so often changed by varying opinions that he falls into contempt.

I wish on this subject to adduce a modern example. Fra Luca, the man of affairs to Maximilian, the present emperor, speaking of his Majesty, said: He consulted with no one, yet never got his own way in anything. This arose because of his following a practise the opposite to the above; for the emperor is a secretive man—he does not communicate his designs to anyone, nor does he receive opinions on them. But as in carrying them into effect they become revealed and known, they are at once obstructed by those men whom he has around him, and he, being pliant, is diverted from them. Hence it follows that those things he does one day he undoes the next, and no one ever understands what he wishes or intends to do, and no one can rely on his resolutions.

A prince, therefore, ought always to take counsel, but only when he wishes and not when others wish; he ought rather to discourage everyone from offering advice unless he asks it; but he ought to be a constant inquirer, and afterwards a patient listener concerning the things of which he inquired; also, on learning that anyone, on any consideration, has not told him the truth, he should let anger be felt.

And if there are some who think that a prince who conveys an impression of his wisdom is not so through his own ability, but through the good advisers that he has around him, beyond doubt they are deceived, because this is an axiom which never fails: that a prince who is not wise himself will never take good advice, unless by chance he has yielded his affairs entirely to one person who happens to be a very prudent man. In this case indeed he may be well governed, but it would not be for long, because such a governor would in a short time take away his state from him.

But if a prince who is not experienced should take counsel from more than one, he will never get united counsels, nor will he know how to unite them. Each of the counselors will think of his own interests, and the prince will not know how to control them or to see through them. And they are not to be found otherwise, because men will always prove untrue to you unless they are kept honest by constraint. Therefore it must be inferred that good counsels, whencesoever they come, are born of the wisdom of the prince, and not the wisdom of the prince from good counsels.

AN EXHORTATION TO LIBERATE ITALY FROM THE BARBARIANS

CHAPTER XXVI

Having carefully considered the subject of the above discourses, and wondering within myself whether the present times were propitious to a new prince, and whether there were the elements that would give an opportunity to a wise and virtuous one to introduce a new order of things which would do honor to him and good to the people of this country, it appears to me that so many things concur to favor a new prince that I never knew a time more fit than the present.

And if, as I said, it was necessary that the people of Israel should be captive so as to make manifest the ability of Moses; that the Persians should be oppressed by the Medes so as to discover the greatness of the soul of Cyrus; and that the Athenians should be dispersed to illustrate the capabilities of Theseus; then at the present time, in order to discover the virtue of an Italian spirit, it was necessary that Italy should be reduced to the extremity she is now in, that she should be more enslaved than the Hebrews, more oppressed than the Persians, more scattered than the Athenians; without head, without order, beaten, despoiled, torn, overrun; and to have endured every kind of desolation.

Although lately some spark may have been shown by one, which made us think he was ordained by God for our redemption, nevertheless it was afterwards seen, in the height of his career, that fortune rejected him; so that Italy, left as without life, waits for him who shall yet heal her wounds and put an end to the ravaging and plundering of Lombardy, to the swindling and taxing of the kingdom of Tuscany, and cleanse those sores that for long have festered. It is seen how she entreats God to send someone who shall deliver her from these wrongs and barbarous insolences. It is seen also that she is ready and willing to follow a banner if only someone will raise it.

Nor is there to be seen at present one in whom she can place more hope than in your illustrious house, with its valor and fortune, favored by God and by the Church of which it is now the chief, and which could be made the head of this redemption. This will not be difficult if you will recall to yourself the actions and lives of the men I have named. And although they were great and wonderful men, yet they were men, and each one of them had no more opportunity than the present offers, for their enterprises were neither more just nor easier than this, nor was God more their friend than He is yours.

With us there is great justice, because that war is just which is necessary, and arms are hallowed when there is no other hope but in them. Here there is the greatest willingness, and where the willingness is great the difficulties cannot be great if you will only follow those men to whom I have directed your attention. Further than this, how extraordinarily the ways of God have been manifested beyond example: the sea is divided, a cloud has led the way, the rock has poured forth water, it has rained manna, everything has contributed to your greatness; you ought to do the rest. God is not willing to do everything, and thus take away our free will and that share of glory which belongs to us.

And it is not to be wondered at if none of the above-named Italians have been able to accomplish all that is expected from your illustrious house; and if in so many revolutions in Italy, and in so many campaigns, it has always appeared as if military virtue were exhausted; this has happened because the old order of things was not good, and none of us have known how to find a new one. And nothing honors a man more than to establish new laws and new ordinances when he himself has newly risen. Such things when they are well founded and dignified will make him revered and admired, and in Italy there are not wanting opportunities to bring such into use in every form.

Here there is great valor in the limbs whilst it fails in the head. Look attentively at the duels and the hand-to-hand combats, how superior the Italians are in strength, dexterity, and subtlety. But when it comes to armies they do not bear comparison, and this springs entirely from the insufficiency of the leaders, since those who are capable are not obedient, and each one seems to himself to know, there having never been anyone so distinguished above the rest, either by valor or fortune, that others would yield to him. Hence it is that for so long a time, and during so much fighting in the past twenty years, whenever there has been an army wholly Italian, it has always given a poor account of itself; the first witness to this is Il Taro, afterwards Alexandria, Capua, Genoa, Vaila, Bologna, Mestri.

If, therefore, your illustrious house wishes to follow those remarkable men who have redeemed their country, it is necessary before all things, as a true foundation for every enterprise, to be provided with your own forces, because there can be no more faithful, truer, or better soldiers. And although singly they are good, altogether they will be much better when they find themselves commanded by their prince, honored by him, and maintained at his expense. Therefore it is necessary to be prepared with such arms, so that you can be defended against foreigners by Italian valor.

And although Swiss and Spanish infantry may be considered very formidable, nevertheless there is a defect in both, by reason of which a third order would not only be able to oppose them, but might be relied upon to overthrow them. For the Spaniards cannot resist cavalry, and the Switzers are afraid of infantry whenever they encounter them in close combat. Owing to this, as has been and may again be seen, the Spaniards are unable to resist French cavalry, and the Switzers are overthrown by Spanish infantry. And although a complete proof of this latter cannot be shown, nevertheless there was some evidence of it at the battle of Ravenna, when the Spanish infantry were confronted by German battalions, who follow the same tactics as the Swiss; when the Spaniards, by agility of body and with the aid of their shields, got in under the pikes of the Germans and stood out of danger, able to attack, while the Germans stood helpless, and, if the cavalry had not dashed up, all would have been over with them. It is possible, therefore, knowing the defects of both these infantries, to invent a new one, which will resist cavalry and not be afraid of infantry; this need not create a new order of arms, but a variation upon the old. And these are the kind of improvements which confer reputation and power upon a new prince.

This opportunity, therefore, ought not to be allowed to pass for letting Italy at last see her liberator appear. Nor can one express the love with which he would be received in all those provinces which have suffered so much from these foreign scourings, with what thirst for revenge, with what stubborn faith, with what devotion, with what tears. What door would be closed to him? Who would refuse obedience to him? What envy would hinder him? What Italian would refuse him homage? To all of us this barbarous dominion stinks. Let, therefore, your illustrious house take up this charge with that courage and hope with which all just enterprises are undertaken, so that under its standard our native country may be ennobled, and under its auspices may be verified that saying of Petrarch:—

Valor against fell wrath
Will take up arms, and be the combat quickly
For, sure, the ancient worth
That in Italians stirs the heart, is not yet dead.

ARIOSTO (1474-1533)

Ludovico Ariosto for practically the whole of his mature life was attached to the court of Ferrara. The principality was small, extending only about 20 miles on either side of the little city, but the d'Este family made it a brilliant center of artistic and literary activity. Serving first the Cardinal d'Este and afterwards Duke Alfonso, Ariosto took a leading part in the revival of classical comedy which was the principal achievement of the court. First translating Latin comedies and then adapting them to the conditions of modern life, Ariosto wrote and produced at Ferrara an original play, I Suppositi, of which a translation by one of the earlier Elizabethan poets, George Gascoigne, was a significant contribution to the beginnings of regular comedy in England.

In spite of its classical culture, the court at Ferrara had only half emerged from the Middle Ages. Ariosto's predecessor as court poet, Boiardo, had left unfinished at his death in 1494 a long rhyming romance about Roland, the hero of the Charlemagne cycle, entitled Orlando Innamorato. This story of Orlando in love Ariosto undertook to continue: people no longer took the old romantic tales seriously, and Ariosto dealt freely with his material, inventing new characters and episodes at will, and enlivening his narrative with fanciful accounts of necromancers, giants, flying horses and the like. The first edition of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso (Orlando in Madness) appeared in 1516, and the fourth, much enlarged and embellished, just before the author's death. Ariosto had a quick and lively fancy, and the poem was immensely popular, not only in Italy but throughout Europe. Sir John Harrington made a translation which he dedicated to Queen Elizabeth, and others followed during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, of which the last, by William Stewart Rose, is here used.

Ariosto was urged in the last years of his life to leave Ferrara for Rome, where he was promised the patronage of Clement VII, the second Pope of the House of the Medici. But he preferred the quiet of his own city and the home he had built there for himself, which may still be seen with the motto he placed over the door—'Parva, sed apta mihi' (A little house, but suited to me). In his Satires, written in imitation of Horace, he explains his lack of ambition and his preference for the little city where as many as half a dozen people touch their hats to him in the hope that he may some day be able to do them a good turn with the reigning Duke.

The selections from the Orlando Furioso given below include only two episodes from Ariosto's masterpiece. The first relates the love of the heroine Angelica for a young Moor, Medoro, who ventures forth from his cantonments accompanied by his friend Cloridan to recover the body of their leader, Dardinello, who has just been defeated and slain by the Christian hosts. In the second episode the poem reaches its climax in the madness of Orlando, consequent upon his discovery of Angelica's unfaithfulness to him.

MEDORO AND ANGELICA

CANTO XIX

By whom he is beloved can no one know
Who on the top of Fortune's wheel is seated;
Since he, by true and faithless friends, with
 show
Of equal faith, in glad estate is greeted.
But, should felicity be changed to woe, 5
The flattering multitude is turned and fled!
While he who loves his master from his heart,
Even after death performs his faithful part.

Were the heart seen as is the outward cheer,
He who at court is held in sovereign grace, ¹⁰
And he that to his lord is little dear,
With parts reversed, would fill each other's
place;
The humble man the greater would appear,
And he, now first, be hindmost in the race.
But be Medoro's faithful story said, 15
The youth who loved his lord, alive or dead.

The closest path, amid the forest gray,
To save himself, pursued the youth forlorn;

But all his schemes were marred by the delay
Of that sore weight upon his shoulders borne. 20
The place he knew not, and mistook the way,
And hid himself again in sheltering thorn.
Secure and distant was his mate, that through
The greenwood-shade with lighter shoulders flew.

So far was Cloridan advanced before, 25
He heard the boy no longer in the wind;
But when he marked the absence of Medore,
It seemed as if his heart was left behind.
'Ah! how was I so negligent,' (the Moor Exclaimed,) 'so far beside myself, and blind, 30
'That I, Medoro, should without thee fare,
Nor know when I deserted thee or where?'

So saying, in the wood he disappears,
Plunging into the maze with hurried pace;
And thither, whence he lately issued, steers,
And, desperate, of death returns in trace. 36
Cries and the tread of steeds this while he hears,
And word and threat of foemen, as in chase;
Lastly Medoro by his voice is known,
Disarmed, on foot, 'mid many horse, alone. 40

A hundred horsemen who the youth surround,
Zerbino leads, and bids his followers seize
The stripling; like a top, the boy turns round
And keeps him as he can: among the trees,
Behind oak, elm, beech, ash, he takes his ground, 45
Nor from the cherished load his shoulders frees.
Wearied, at length, the burden he bestowed
Upon the grass, and stalked about his load.

As in her rocky cavern the she-bear,
With whom close warfare Alpine hunters wage, 50
Uncertain hangs about her shaggy care,
And growls in mingled sound of love and rage.
To unsheath her claws, and blood her tushes bare,
Would natural hate and wrath the beast engage;
Love softens her, and bids from strife retire,
And for her offspring watch, amid her ire. 56

Cloridan, who to aid him knows not how,
And with Medoro willingly would die,

But who would not for death this being fore-
go,
Until more foes than one should lifeless lie,
Ambushed, his sharpest arrow to his bow 61
Fits, and directs it with so true an eye,
The feathered weapon bores a Scotchman's brain,
And lays the warrior dead upon the plain.

Together, all the others of the band 65
Turned thither, whence was shot the murderous reed;
Meanwhile he launched another from his stand,
That a new foe might by the weapon bleed,
Whom (while he made of this and that demand,
And loudly questioned who had done the deed) 70
The arrow reached transfixed the wretch's throat,
And cut his question short in middle note.

Zerbino, captain of those horse, no more
Can at the piteous sight his wrath refrain;
In furious heat, he springs upon Medore, 75
Exclaiming, 'Thou of this shalt bear the pain.'
One hand he in his locks of golden ore
Enwreaths, and drags him to himself amain;
But, as his eyes that beauteous face survey,
Takes pity on the boy, and does not slay. 80

To him the stripling turns, with suppliant cry,
And, 'By thy God, sir knight,' exclaims, 'I pray,
Be not so passing cruel, nor deny
That I in earth my honored king may lay:
No other grace I supplicate, nor I 85
This for the love of life, believe me, say.
So much, no longer, space of life I crave,
As may suffice to give my lord a grave.

'And if you needs must feed the beast and bird,
Like Theban Creon, let their worst be done 90
Upon these limbs; so that by me interred
In earth be those of good Almontes' son.'
Medoro thus his suit, with grace, preferred,
And words—to move a mountain; and so won
Upon Zerbino's mood, to kindness turned, 95
With love and pity he all over burned.

This while, a churlish horseman of the band,
Who little deference for his lord confessed,
His lance uplifting, wounded overhand
The unhappy suppliant in his dainty breast.

Zerbino, who the cruel action scanned, 101
Was deeply stirred, the rather that, oppressed

And livid with the blow the churl had sped,
Medoro fell as he was wholly dead.

So grieved Zerbino, with such wrath was stung, 105
'Not unavenged shalt thou remain,' he cries;
Then full of evil will in fury sprung
Upon the author of the foul emprise.
But he his vantage marks, and, from among
The warriors, in a moment slips and flies. 110
Cloridan, who beholds the deed, at sight
Of young Medoro's fall, springs forth to fight;

And casts away his bow, and, 'mid the band
Of foemen, whirls his faulchion, in desire
Rather of death, than hoping that his hand 115
May snatch a vengeance equal to his ire.
Amid so many blades, he views the sand
Tinged with his blood, and ready to expire,
And feeling he the sword no more can
guide,
Lets himself drop by his Medoro's side. 120

The Scots pursue their chief, who pricks before,
Through the deep wood, inspired by high disdain,
When he has left the one and the other Moor,
This dead, that scarce alive, upon the plain.
There for a mighty space lay young
Medoro, 125
Spouting his life-blood from so large a vein,
He would have perished, but that thither made
A stranger, as it chanced, who lent him aid.

By chance arrived a damsel at the place,
Who was (though mean and rustic was her wear) 130
Of royal presence and of beauteous face,
And lofty manners, sagely debonair:
Her have I left unsung so long a space,
That you will hardly recognize the fair
Angelica; in her (if known not) scan 135
The lofty daughter of Catay's great khan.

Angelica, when she had won again
The ring Brunello had from her conveyed,
So waxed in stubborn pride and haught disdain,
She seemed to scorn this ample world, and strayed 140
Alone, and held as cheap each living swain,
Although, amid the best, by Fame arrayed:

Nor brooked she to remember a gallant:
In Count Orlando or king Sacripant;

And above every other deed repented, 145
That good Rinaldo she had loved of yore;
And that to look so low she had consented,
(As by such choice dishonored) grieved her sore.

Love, hearing this, such arrogance resented,
And would the damsel's pride endure no
more. 150

Where young Medoro lay he took his
stand,
And waited her, with bow and shaft in hand.

When fair Angelica the stripling spies,
Nigh hurt to death in that disastrous fray,
Who for his king, that there unsheltered lies, 155
More sad than for his own misfortune lay,
She feels new pity in her bosom rise,
Which makes its entry in unwonted way.
Touched was her haughty heart, once hard and curst,
And more when he his piteous tale rehearsed. 160

And calling back to memory her art,
For she in Ind had learned chirurgery,
(Since it appears such studies in that part
Worthy of praise and fame are held to be,
And, as an heirloom, sires to sons impart, 165
With little aid of books, the mystery)
Disposed herself to work with simples' juice,
Till she in him should healthier life produce;

And recollects a herb had caught her sight
In passing hither, on a pleasant plain. 170
What (whether dittany or pansy light)
I know not; fraught with virtue to restrain
The crimson blood forth-welling, and of might
To sheathe each perilous and piercing pain,
She found it near, and having pulled the weed, 175
Returned to seek Medoro on the mead.

Returning, she upon a swain did light,
Who was on horseback passing through the wood.

Strayed from the lowing herd the rustic
wight

A heifer, missing for two days, pursued. 180
Him she with her conducted, where the might
Of the faint youth was ebbing with his
blood:

Which had the ground about so deeply dyed,
Life was nigh wasted with the gushing tide.

Angelica alights upon the ground, 185
 And he her rustic comrade, at her hest.
 She hastened 'twixt two stones the herb to pound,
 Then took it, and the healing juice expressed.
 With this did she foment the stripling's wound, 189
 And, even to the hips, his waist and breast;
 And (with such virtue was the salve endued)
 It stanch'd his life-blood, and his strength renewed.

And into him infused such force again,
 That he could mount the horse the swain conveyed:
 But good Medoro would not leave the plain 195
 Till he in earth had seen his master laid.
 He, with the monarch, buried Cloridane,
 And after followed whither pleased the maid,
 Who was to stay with him, by pity led,
 Beneath the courteous shepherd's humble
 shed. 200

Nor would the damsel quit the lowly pile
 (So she esteemed the youth) till he was sound;
 Such pity first she felt, when him erewhile
 She saw outstretched and bleeding on the ground.
 Touched by his mien and manners next, a file 205
 She felt corrode her heart with secret
 wound;
 She felt corrode her heart, and with desire,
 By little and by little warmed, took fire.

The shepherd dwelt, between two mountains hoar,
 In goodly cabin, in the greenwood-shade; 210
 With wife and children; in short time before,
 The brent-new shed had builded in the glade.
 Here of his griesly wound the youthful Moor
 Was briefly healed by the Catayan maid;
 But who in briefer space, a sorer smart 215
 Than young Medoro's, suffered at her heart.

A wound far wider and which deeper lies,
 Now in her heart she feels, from viewless
 bow;
 Which from the boy's fair hair and beauteous
 eyes 220
 Had the winged archer dealt: a sudden glow
 She feels, and still the flames increasing
 rise; 221
 Yet less she heeds her own than other's woe:
 Heeds not herself, and only to content
 The author of her cruel ill is bent.

Her ill but festered and increased the more,
 The stripling's wounds were seen to heal and close: 226

The youth grew lusty, while she suffered sore,
 And, with new fever parched, now burnt,
 now froze.

From day to day in beauty waxed Medore:
 She miserably wasted; like the snow's 230
 Unseasonable flake, which melts away
 Exposed, in sunny place, to scorching ray.

She, if of vain desire she will not die,
 Must help herself, nor yet delay the aid.
 And she in truth her will to satisfy, 235 Deemed 'twas no time to wait till she was prayed.

And next of shame renouncing every tie,
 With tongue as bold as eyes, petition made,
 And begged him, haply an unwitting foe, 239
 To sheathe the suffering of that cruel blow.

O Count Orlando, O king of Circassy,
 Say what your valor has availed to you!
 Say what your honor boots, what goodly fee
 Remunerates ye both, for service true!
 Sirs, show me but a single courtesy, 245
 With which she ever graced ye,—old or new,—

As some poor recompense, desert, or guerdon,
 For having born so long so sore a burden!

Oh! couldst thou yet again to life return,
 How hard would this appear, O Agricane! 250
 In that she whilom thee was wont to spurn,
 With sharp repulse and insolent disdain.
 O Ferraù, O ye thousand more, forlorn, Unsung, who wrought a thousand feats in vain 255
 For this ungrateful fair, what pain 'twould
 be 255
 Could you within his arms the damsel see!

To pluck, as yet untouched, the virgin rose,
 Angelica permits the young Medore,
 Was none so blessed as in that garden's close
 Yet to have set his venturous foot before. 260
 They holy ceremonies interpose,
 Somedea! to veil—to gild—the matter o'er.
 Young Love was bridesman there the tie to bless,
 And for brideswoman stood the shepherdess.

In the low shed, with all solemnities, 265
 The couple made their wedding as they might;
 And there above a month, in tranquil guise,
 The happy lovers rested in delight.
 Save for the youth the lady has no eyes,

Nor with his looks can satisfy her sight. 270
 Nor yet of hanging on his neck can tire,
 Or feel she can content her fond desire.

The beauteous boy is with her, night and day

Does she untent herself, or keep the shed.
 Morning or eve, they to some meadow stray,
 Now to this bank, and to that other led: 276
 Haply, in cavern harbored, at mid-day,
 Grateful as that to which Æneas fled
 With Dido, when the tempest raged above,
 The faithful witness to their secret love. 280

Amid such pleasures, where, with tree o'er-
 grown,
 Ran stream, or bubbling fountain's wave did spin,
 On bark or rock, if yielding were the stone,
 The knife was straight at work or ready pin.
 And there, without, in thousand places lone,
 And in as many places graved, within, 286
 Medoro and Angelica were traced,
 In divers cyphers quaintly interlaced.

When she believed they had prolonged their stay
 More than enow, the damsel made design 290
 In India to revisit her Catay,
 And with its crown Medoro's head entwine.
 She had upon her wrist an armlet, gay
 With costly gems, in witness and in sign
 Of love to her by Count Orlando borne, 295
 And which the damsel for long time had worn.

On Ziliantes, hid beneath the wave,
 This Morgue bestowed; and from captivity
 The youth (restored to Monodante's grave,
 His ancient sire, through Roland's chivalry)
 To Roland in return the bracelet gave: 301
 Roland, a lover, deigned the gorgeous fee
 To wear, with the intention to convey
 The present to his queen, of whom I say.

No love which to the paladin she bears, 305
 But that it costly is and wrought with care,
 This to Angelica so much endears,
 That never more esteemed was matter rare:
 This she was suffered in the Isle of Tears,
 I know not by what privilege, to wear, 310
 When, naked, to the whale exposed for food
 By that inhospitable race and rude.

She, not possessing wherewithal to pay
 The kindly couple's hospitality,
 Served by them in their cabin, from the day
 She there was lodged, with such fidelity, 316

Unfastened from her arm the bracelet gay,
 And bade them keep it for her memory.
 Departing hence the lovers climb the side
 Of hills, which fertile France from Spain divide. . . . 320

ORLANDO'S MADNESS

FROM CANTO XXIII

The course in pathless woods, which, without rein,
 The Tartar's charger had pursued astray,
 Made Roland for two days, with fruitless
 pain,
 Follow him, without tidings of his way.
 Orlando reached a rill of crystal vein, 5
 On either bank of which a meadow lay;
 Which, stained with native hues and rich, he
 sees,
 And dotted o'er with fair and many trees.

The mid-day fervor made the shelter sweet
 To hardy herd as well as naked swain; 10
 So that Orlando, well beneath the heat
 Someddeal might wince, oppressed with plate and chain.
 He entered, for repose, the cool retreat,
 And found it the abode of grief and pain;
 And place of sojourn more accursed and fell,
 On that unhappy day, than tongue can tell. 16

Turning him round, he there, on many a tree,
 Beheld engraved, upon the woody shore,
 What as the writing of his deity
 He knew, as soon as he had marked the
 lore. 20
 This was a place of those described by me,
 Whither ofttimes, attended by Medore,
 From the near shepherd's cot had wont to stray
 The beauteous lady, sovereign of Catay.

In a hundred knots, amid those green
 abodes, 25
 In a hundred parts, their cyphered names are dight;
 Whose many letters are so many goads,
 Which Love has in his bleeding heart-core pight.
 He would discredit in a thousand modes
 That which he credits in his own despite; 30
 And would perforce persuade himself, that rind
 Other Angelica than his had signed.

'And yet I know these characters,' he cried,
'Of which I have so many read and seen;
By her may this Medoro be belied, 35
And me, she, figured in the name, may mean.'

Feeding on such like fantasies, beside
The real truth, did sad Orlando lean
Upon the empty hope, though ill contented,
Which he by self-illusions had fomented. 40

But stirred and aye rekindled it, the more
That he to quench the ill suspicion wrought,
Like the incautious bird, by fowler's lore,
Hampered in net or lime; which, in the thought
To free its tangled pinions and to soar, 45
By struggling, is but more securely caught.
Orlando passes thither, where a mountain
O'erhangs in guise of arch the crystal fountain.

Splay-footed ivy, with its mantling spray,
And gadding vine the cavern's entry case: 50
Where often in the hottest noon of day
The pair had rested, locked in fond embrace.
Within the grotto, and without it, they
Had oftener than in any other place
With charcoal or with chalk their names portrayed, 55
Or flourished with the knife's indenting blade.

Here from his horse the sorrowing County lit,
And at the entrance of the grot surveyed
A cloud of words, which seemed but newly writ,
And which the young Medoro's hand had
made. 60
On the great pleasure he had known in it,
This sentence he in verses had arrayed;
Which in his tongue, I deem, might make pretense
To polished phrase; and such in ours the sense:

'Gay plants, green herbage, rill of limpid vein, 65
And, grateful with cool shade, thou gloomy cave,
Where oft, by many wooed with fruitless
pain,
Beauteous Angelica, the child of grave
King Galaphron, within my arms has lain;
For the convenient harborage you gave, 70
I, poor Medoro, can but in my lays,
As recompense, for ever sing your praise,

And any loving lord devoutly pray,
Damsel and cavalier, and everyone,
Whom choice or fortune hither shall convey, 75
Stranger or native,—to this crystal run,
Shade, caverned rock, and grass, and plants,
to say
Benignant be to you the fostering sun
And moon, and may the choir of nymphs provide,
That never swain his flock may hither
guide! 80

In Arabic was writ the blessing said,
Known to Orlando like the Latin tongue,
Who, versed in many languages, best read
Was in this speech; which oftentimes from wrong,
And injury, and shame, had saved his head, 85
What time he roved the Saracens among.
But let him boast not of its former boot,
O'erbalanced by the present bitter fruit.

Three times, and four, and six, the lines impressed
Upon the stone that wretch perused, in vain
Seeking another sense than was expressed, 91
And ever saw the thing more clear and plain;
And all the while, within his troubled breast,
He felt an icy hand his heart-core strain.
With mind and eyes close fastened on the block, 95
At length he stood, not differing from the rock.

Then well-nigh lost all feeling; so a prey
Wholly was he to that o'ermastering woe.
This is a pang, believe the experienced say
Of him who speaks, which does all griefs outgo. 100
His pride had from his forehead passed away,
His chin had fallen upon his breast below;
Nor found he, so grief barred each natural
vent,
Moisture for tears or utterance for lament.

Stifled within, the impetuous sorrow stays,
Which would too quickly issue; so to abide
Water is seen, imprisoned in the vase 107
Whose neck is narrow and whose swell is wide;
What time, when one turns up the inverted base
Toward the mouth, so hastes the hurrying tide, 110
And in the straight encounters such a stop,
It scarcely works a passage, drop by drop.

He somewhat to himself returned, and thought

How possibly the thing might be untrue:
That someone (so he hoped, desired, and sought
To think) his lady would with shame pursue;
115

Or with such weight of jealousy had wrought
To whelm his reason, as should him undo;
And that he, whosoe'er the thing had planned,
Had counterfeited passing well her hand. 120

With such vain hope he sought himself to cheat,

And manned somedea! his spirits and awoke;
Then pressed the faithful Bri!liadoro's seat,
As on the sun's retreat his sister broke.
Nor far the warrior had pursued his beat, 125
Ere eddying from a roof he saw the smoke;
Heard noise of dog and kine, a farm espied,
And thitherward in quest of lodging hied.

Languid, he lit, and left his Bri!liador
To a discreet attendant: one undressed 130
His limbs, one doffed the golden spurs he wore,

And one bore off, to clean, his iron vest.
This was the homestead where the young Medore
Lay wounded, and was here supremely blessed.

Orlando here, with other food unfed, 135
Having supped full of sorrow, sought his bed.

The more the wretched sufferer seeks for ease,

He finds but so much more distress and pain;
Who everywhere the loathed hand-writing sees,

On wall, and door, and window: he would fain 140

Question his host of this but holds his peace,
Because, in sooth, he dreads too clear, too plain

To make the thing and this would rather shroud,

That it may less offend him, with a cloud.

Little availed the Count his self-deceit; 145
For there was one who spake of it unsought;
The shepherd-swain, who to allay the heat,
With which he saw his guest so troubled, thought:

The tale which he was wonted to repeat
—Of the two lovers—to each listener taught,
A history which many loved to hear, 151
He now, without reserve, 'gan tell the peer

How at Angelica's persuasive prayer,
He to his farm had carried young Medore, 154
Grievously wounded with an arrow; where,
In little space she healed the angry sore.
But while she exercised this pious care,
Love in her heart the lady wounded more,
And kindled from small spark so fierce a fire,
She burnt all over, restless with desire: 160

Nor thinking she of mightiest king was born,

Who ruled in the east, nor of her heritage,
Forced by too puissant love, had thought no scorn

To be the consort of a poor foot-page.
His story done, to them in proof was borne
The gem, which, in reward for harborage, 166
To her extended in that kind abode,
Angelica, at parting, had bestowed.

A deadly axe was this unhappy ciose,
Which at a single stroke, lopped off the head; 170

When, satiate with innumerable blows,
That cruel hangman Love his hate had fed.
Orlando studied to conceal his woes;
And yet the mischief gathered force and spread,

And would break out perforce in tears and sighs, 175
Would he, or would he not, from mouth and eyes.

When he can give the rein to raging woe,
Alone, by other's presence unrepressed,
From his full eyes the tears descending flow;
In a wide stream, and flood his troubled breast. 180

'Mid sob and groan, he tosses to and fro
About his weary bed, in search of rest;
And vainly shifting, harder than a rock
And sharper than a nettle found its flock.

Amid the pressure of such cruel pain, 185
It passed into the wretched sufferer's head
That oft the ungrateful lady must have lain,
Together with her leman, on that bed;
Nor less he loathed the couch in his disdain,
Nor from the down upstart with less dread, 190

Than churl, who, when about to close his eyes,
Springs from the turf, if he a serpent spies.

In him, forthwith such deadly hatred breed
That bed, that house, that swain, he will not stay

Till the morn break, or till the dawn succeed 195
Whose twilight goes before the approaching day.

In haste, Orlando takes his arms and steed,
And to the deepest greenwood wends his way.
And, when assured that he is there alone,
Gives utterance to his grief in shriek and groan. 200

Never from tears, never from sorrowing,
He paused; nor found he peace by night or day:

He fled from town, in forest harboring,
And in the open air on hard earth lay. 204
He marveled at himself, how such a spring
Of water from his eyes could stream away,
And breath was for so many sobs supplied;
And thus oft-times, amid his mourning, cried:

'These are no longer real tears which rise,
And which I scatter from so full a vein. 210
Of tears my ceaseless sorrow lacked supplies;
They stopped when to mid-height scarce rose my pain.

The vital moisture rushing to my eyes,
Driven by the fire within me, now would gain
A vent; and it is this which I expend, 215
And which my sorrows and my life will end.

No; these, which are the index of my woes,
These are not sighs, nor sighs are such; they fail

At times, and have their season of repose:
I feel my breast can never less exhale 220
Its sorrow: Love, who with his pinions blows
The fire about my heart, creates this gale.
Love, by what miracle dost thou contrive,
It wastes not in the fire thou keep'st alive?

I am not—am not what I seem to sight: 225
What Roland was is dead and under ground,
Slain by that most ungrateful lady's spite,
Whose faithlessness inflicted such a wound.
Divided from the flesh, I am his sprite,
Which in this hell, tormented, walks its 230
round,
To be, but in its shadow left above,
A warning to all such as trust in love.'

All night about the forest roved the Count,
And, at the break of daily light, was brought
By his unhappy fortune to the fount, 235
Where his inscription young Medoro wrought.

To see his wrongs inscribed upon that mount,
Inflamed his fury so, in him was nought

But turned to hatred, frenzy, rage, and spite;
Nor paused he more, but bared his faulchion bright, 240

Cleft through the writing; and the solid block,

Into the sky, in tiny fragments sped.

Woe worth each sapling and that caverned rock,

Where Medoro and Angelica were read!

So scathed, that they to shepherd or to flock 245

Thenceforth shall never furnish shade or bed.
And that sweet fountain, late so clear and pure,

From such, tempestuous wrath was ill secure.

For he turf, stone, and trunk, and shoot, and lop

Cast without cease into the beauteous source;
Till, turbid from the bottom to the top, 251

Never again was clear the troubled course.

At length, for lack of breath, compelled to stop,

(When he is bathed in sweat, and wasted force Serves not his fury more) he falls, and lies

Upon the mead and, gazing upward, sighs. 256

Wearied and woe-begone, he fell to ground,
And turned his eyes toward heaven; nor spake he aught,

Nor ate, nor slept, till in his daily round
The golden sun had broken thrice, and sought

His rest anew; nor ever ceased his wound 261
To rankle, till it marred his sober thought.

At length, impelled by frenzy, the fourth day,
He from his limbs tore plate and mail away.

Here was his helmet, there his shield bestowed; 265

His arms far off, and farther than the rest,
His cuirass; through the greenwood wide was strowed

All his good gear, in fine; and next his vest
He rent; and, in his fury, naked showed

His shaggy paunch, and all his back and breast. 270

And 'gan that frenzy act, so passing dread,
Of stranger folly never shall be said.

So fierce his rage, so fierce his fury grew,
That all obscured remained the warrior's sprite;

Nor, for forgetfulness, his sword he drew,
Or wondrous deeds, I trow, had wrought the knight:

But neither this, nor bill, nor axe to hew,
 Was needed by Orlando's peerless might.
 He of his prowess gave high proofs and full,
 Who a tall pine uprooted at a pull. 280

He many others, with as little let
 As fennel, wall-wort-stem, or dill, up-tore;
 And ilex, knotted oak, and fir upset,
 And beech, and mountain ash, and elm tree
 hoar. 284
 He did what fowler, ere he spreads his net,
 Does to prepare the champagne for his
 lore,

By stubble, rush, and nettle-stalk; and broke,
 Like these, old sturdy trees and stems of oak.

The shepherd swains, who hear the tumult
 nigh,
 Leaving their flocks beneath the greenwood
 tree, 290
 Some here, some there, across the forest hie,
 And hurry thither, all, the cause to see,
 —But I have reached such point, my history,
 If I o'erpass this bound, may irksome be;
 And I my story will delay to end, 295
 Rather than by my tediousness offend.

RABELAIS (1483-1553)

François Rabelais was born at Chinon in Touraine, where his father kept an inn, and from 1509 to 1524 was in a Franciscan convent, taking priest's orders and acquiring a great treasure of classical and other erudition together with a violent distaste for the monastic life. About 1530 he registered in the Faculty of Medicine at Montpellier and took in due course the degrees of Bachelor, Master, and Doctor, the last in 1537. Meanwhile he had become physician to Jean du Bellay, Bishop of Paris, and accompanied him to Rome in 1534 on a mission which vainly attempted to prevent a rupture between the Pope and Henry VIII of England in connection with the latter's divorce from Catherine of Aragon. Rabelais was again in Rome in 1536 as physician and secretary to Cardinal du Bellay and obtained from the Pope permission to practise medicine as a member of the Order of St. Benedict. The Cardinal was head of the Benedictine abbey of St. Maur, and in this refuge Rabelais found 'a Paradise of salubrity, amenity, serenity, convenience, delights and all honest pleasures of agriculture and country life.' But he continued to wander about a great deal, although for two years he settled down, not long before his death, as curé of Meudon, near Paris.

Rabelais was an avowed partisan of the new learning against medieval bigotry and ignorance, but he says himself that he had no desire to be burnt at the stake. He poured his vast learning into a burlesque romance of a popular giant, Gargantua, continued in a second book, Pantagruel, recounting the adventures of his son. Both these had been published, with the name of Rabelais hidden in an anagram, before 1535; Book III appeared in 1546 under the King's protection with the full name of the author; Book IV was published just before his death, and Book V, which is perhaps not entirely his, some years after. In these five books Rabelais attacked the hypocrisy and bigotry of his time, not only in ecclesiastical life, but in law, science, literature and education. For his own protection and to indulge the popular taste for ribaldry, he wrapped up his doctrine in a great deal of grossly indecent nonsense; but it was the doctrine and not the nonsense that provoked the antagonism of the Sorbonne on the one hand, and the Calvinists on the other. In his wide tolerance Rabelais went beyond both the two religious factions of the time and struck the modern note of liberty.

Rabelais was well known in England in the sixteenth century, as references in Shakespeare and other authors prove; the translation of his masterpiece was begun by Sir Thomas Urquhart and completed by a French exile named Motteux in the seventeenth century; this classical translation provided the basis for the more correct modern version of W. F. Smith, which is here used.

THE ABBEY OF THELEMA

BOOK I, CHAPTER 52

There remained only the monk to provide for, whom Gargantua wished to make abbot of Seuillé, but he refused it. He wished to give him the Abbey of Bourgueil or Saint-Florent, which would suit him better, or both if it pleased him; but the monk gave him a decided answer that over monks he would have no charge or government.

'For how,' said he, 'should I be able to govern others, when I cannot govern myself? If you think that I have done you acceptable service, or that in the future I can do so, give me leave to found an abbey after my own device.'

The request pleased Gargantua, and he offered him all the country of Theleme by the river Loire to within two leagues of the great forest of Port-Hunault. The monk then requested Gargantua to institute his religious order in a manner exactly opposite to that of all others.

'In the first place then,' said Gargantua, 'you must not build walls all round it, for all other abbeys are proudly walled.'

'Exactly,' said the monk, 'not without reason; where there is mur before and mur behind, there is plenty of murmur, envy and mutual conspiracy.'

Moreover, seeing that in certain convents in the world it is the practise that if any woman or women (I speak of chaste and honest women) enter in, they immediately cleanse the place over which they have passed, it was ordered that if any man or woman of any religious orders should enter into this abbey by chance or accident, 10 all the places by which they had passed should be scrupulously cleansed.

And because in the religions of this world everything is compassed about, limited and regulated by hours, it was decreed that in this abbey there should not be clock or dial of any kind whatever, but that all their business should be arranged according to occasions and opportunities; 'for,' said Gargantua, 'the most real loss 20 of time that he knew was that of counting the hours—what good comes of it?—and the greatest dotage in the world was to regulate one's self by the sound of a bell, and not by the dictates of good sense and understanding.'

Item, because at that time they placed in religious houses no women save those who were one-eyed, lame, hunch-backed, ugly, ill-made, lunatic, senseless, bewitched or 30 blemished, nor men save those who were sickly, ill-born, silly and a burden to their family.

'Apropos,' said the monk, 'a woman who is neither fair nor good, to what purpose 35 serves such?'

'To make a nun of,' said Gargantua.

'Yes,' said the monk, 'and to make shirts.' It was ordered that here should be admitted no women that were not fair, well-featured 40 and of a good disposition, nor men that were not handsome, well-made and well-conditioned.

Item, because in the convents of women men never entered but at unawares and ciandestinely, it was decreed that here there should be no women in case there were no men, nor men in case there were no women.

Item, because men and women alike, once received into religious orders, after their year of probation, were forced and bound 50 to remain there forever, as long as their life should last, it was established that men and women alike, received into his house, might go out thence whenever it seemed good to 55 them, without let or hindrance.

Item, because ordinarily the religious orders made three vows, to wit, of Chastity, Poverty, and Obedience, it was appointed that those who took these orders might be honorably married, that everyone might be rich, and live at liberty.

5 With regard to the lawful age, the women were to be received there from ten to fifteen years, and the men from twelve to eighteen.

HOW THE THELEMITES WERE GOVERNED

BOOK I, CHAPTER 57

All their life was laid out, not by laws, statutes, or rules, but according to their will and free pleasure. They rose from their bed when it seemed good to them, they drank, ate, worked, slept, when the desire came upon them. None did awake them, none did constrain them either to drink or to eat, or to do anything else whatsoever; for so had Gargantua estab- 10 lished it.

In their rule there was but this clause:

DO WHAT THOU WILT,

because that men who are free, well-born, well-bred, conversant in honest company, have by nature an instinct and spur, which always prompteth them to virtuous actions and withdraweth them from vice; and this 15 they style honor. These same men, when by vile subjection and constraint they are brought down and enslaved, do turn aside the noble affection by which they freely were inclined unto virtue, in order to lay 40 aside and shake off this yoke of slavery; for we do always strive after things forbidden and covet that which is denied unto us.

By means of this liberty they entered 45 into a laudable emulation to do all of them what they saw did please one. If anyone of the men or ladies said 'Let us drink,' they all drank. If any said 'Let us play,' they all played. If one said 'Let us go 50 disport ourselves in the fields,' they all went thither.

If it were to go a-hawking or hunting, the ladies mounted on fine mares, with their prancing palfrey each carried on her fist, daintily begloved, either a sparrow-hawk or a lanneret or a merlin. The men carried 55 the other kinds of hawks.

So nobly were they taught that there was neither he nor she amongst them but could read, write, sing, play on musical instruments, speak five or six languages, and compose therein in verse as well as in prose.

Never were seen knights so worthy, so valiant, so dextrous both on foot and on horseback, more vigorous, more nimble, better at handling all kinds of weapons, as were there.

Never were seen ladies so handsome, so dainty, less froward, better taught with their hands, with their needle, in every womanly action that is honest and gentle, as were there.

For this reason, when the time was come that any man wished to go forth from the said abbey, either at the request of his parents or for some other cause, he carried with him one of the ladies, her who should have taken him for her faithful servant, and they were married together. And if they had formerly lived in Thelema in devotion and friendship, still more did they so continue in wedlock; insomuch that they loved one another to the end of their days as on the first day of their marriage.

HOW TO TREAT A CONQUERED COUNTRY

FROM BOOK III, CHAPTER I

You will note then here, good Topers, that the proper manner of preserving and retaining countries newly conquered is not (as hath been the erroneous opinion of certain tyrannical spirits, to their own hurt and dishonor) to pillage the people, distressing, racking with taxes, ruining, harassing and ruling them with rods of iron—in a word, eating and devouring them, after the fashion of the unjust king whom Homer calls Δηνύβορος, that is to say, Devourer of his people.

On this subject I will not bring to your notice the ancient histories; I will only call to your recollection what your fathers have seen, and yourselves too, if you are not too young.

Like children newly-born, one should suckle, cradle and dandle them.

Like trees newly planted, one should prop, strengthen and defend them against all tempests, injuries and calamities.

Like a person lately saved from a long and dangerous sickness, who is now upon his recovery, one should indulge them, spare them, cherish them.

So that they may conceive this opinion, that there is not in the world a king or prince, whom they would less desire to have for an enemy, more wish for as a friend.

Thus Osiris, the great king of the Egyptians, subdued all the earth, not so much by Force of arms, as by easing people of their burdens, teaching them to live well and healthfully by suitable laws, by graciousness and good deeds; insomuch that by mankind he was surnamed the great king Euergetés, that is to say benefactor, by the command of Jupiter made to one Pamyla.

Indeed, Hesiod in his Hierarchy places the good Dæmons—call them if you will angels or geniuses—as means and mediators between gods and men, superior to men but inferior to gods; and because from their hands come to us the riches and benefits of heaven, and they are continually doing good to us, ever preserving us from evil, therefore he declares that they perform toward us the office of kings, because ever to do good and never ill is an act singularly royal.

Thus was Alexander of Macedon Emperor of the universe.

Thus was the whole continent possessed by Hercules, by relieving men from monsters, oppressions, exactions and tyrannies; governing them with good direction, maintaining them in equity and justice, instructing them with kindly regiment and laws convenient for the situation of the various countries; supplying what was wanting, and retrenching what was superfluous; pardoning also all that was past, with a perpetual oblivion of all preceding offenses; as was the case with the Amnesty of the Athenians, when by the prowess and energy of Thrasybulus the tyrants were exterminated; an Amnesty afterwards set forth by Cicero in Rome, and renewed under the Emperor Aurelian.

These be the philters, allurements and enticements of love, by means of which a man peaceably retains what he had painfully acquired; and the conqueror cannot reign more happily, be he king, prince, or philosopher, than by making justice second his valor.

His valor has been shown in his victory and conquest; his justice will appear in that, by the goodwill and affection of the people he will give laws, publish edicts, establish religion, and do right to everyone, as the noble poet Maro says of Octavian Augustus:

He who was conqueror, with the goodwill
Of those he conquered, makes his laws prevail.
(Georgics IV, 561.)

Therefore it is that Homer in his Iliad styles the good princes and great kings κοσμήτορας λαών, that is, Orderers of the people.

Such was the consideration that weighed with Numa Pompilius, second king of the Romans, just, politic, and philosophical, when he ordained that on the day of his festival, which was called Terminalia, nothing should be offered to the god Terminus which had suffered death; thus teaching us that the boundaries, frontiers and dependencies of kingdoms should be guarded in peace, amity and gentleness, without polluting our hands with blood and rapine. Whoso doeth otherwise shall not only lose what he hath gained, but shall also undergo this scandal and reproach, that he will be esteemed to have wickedly and wrongfully acquired it, because that which he hath gained hath been lost in his hands; for things ill acquired fall away evilly; and although throughout his lifetime he have them in peaceable enjoyment, still if what he hath acquired be lost in the hands of his heirs, a like imputation will rest on the deceased, and his memory will be accursed as that of an unjust conqueror; for in common proverb you say: 'Of things evilly acquired the enjoyment cometh not to the third inheritor.'

Note also, ye gouty Fеоoffees, in this matter, how by this means Pantagruel of one angel made two, which is the opposite of what befell the counsel of Charlemagne, who of one devil made two when he transplanted the Saxons into Flanders and the Flemings into Saxony. For, not being able to keep in subjection the Saxons, whom he had united to the Empire, but that at all times they would break out into rebellion, if he happened to be drawn away into Spain or other distant lands, he transplanted them into a country that was his own and naturally obedient to him, namely Flanders; and the Hainaulters and Flemings, his born subjects, he transported into Saxony, without a doubt as to their loyalty, although they should be taken into a strange land. But it turned out that the Saxons continued in their rebellion and former obstinacy, and the Flemings, dwelling in Saxony, imbibed the manners and contradictory spirit of the Saxons.

BENVENUTO CELLINI (1500-1571)

Cellini, who was a sculptor of the second rank, takes a leading place in a curious kind of literature—the autobiography of a vagabond. He told the truth about himself without concealment—indeed, he is sometimes suspected of telling more than the truth and inventing or exaggerating adventures, amorous and other, not at all to his credit. A tremendous egotist, he was intensely interested in his own doings, and had the gift of conveying this interest to others in a perfectly ingenuous and extremely lively narrative of self-revelation. The original manuscript, written partly in Cellini's own hand and partly by his amanuenses, was deposited just a century ago in the Laurentian Library at Florence; until 1730 it was jealously guarded from the press, although it had considerable circulation in manuscript copies. It has long been recognized as the most valuable single document accessible to students of the Renaissance on account of its vigorous and lifelike pictures of the variegated life of the time.

Benvenuto was so called because his coming into the world was a welcome surprise: his father had been expecting a girl. His parents were citizens of Florence of good repute, and Benvenuto in all seriousness traced his ancestry back to a captain under Julius Cæsar, Fiorino of Cellino, who gave Florence its name at the time the city was founded. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed at his own request to a goldsmith, this being then esteemed the best training for a youth with artistic ambitions. At sixteen he was banished from Florence for six months on account of a dueling affair in which he was mixed up, together with his younger brother, who was fourteen. A year or two later, a street quarrel in Florence led to his flight from the city in disguise, and he made his way to Rome, where he won the patronage of Pope Clement VII and set up a shop of his own. He gives us a very lively picture of the Bohemian life of the Roman artists of the time, especially their carousings and merry-makings. The siege and ultimate capture of Rome by the imperial forces in 1526 provided him with more serious employment, first in the direction of the papal artillery and then in taking to pieces the papal regalia so that the jewels and their gold settings (which Cellini melted down) could be more safely carried away. Cellini kept some of the gold to pay himself for his trouble, and even about this he could not restrain his inclination for what he calls 'natural bragging.' The upshot was that Pope Clement's successor, Paul III, imprisoned Cellini in the Castle of St. Angelo, from which, after vain efforts to obtain a legal release, he made his escape as related in the selection from his Autobiography printed below.

Recaptured, he was subsequently released on the intercession of Francis I, who invited him to Paris and employed him in his service there. Cellini made a great many things for the King, and, as invariably happened, a great many enemies for himself, among them Madame d'Etampes, the King's mistress. Duels, quarrels, criminal prosecutions, lawsuits, attempts at assassination, of which Cellini was in turn the victim and the aggressor, were daily incidents, and it is not surprising that the artist in 1545 returned to Florence. Duke Cosimo engaged him to make a Perseus to stand on the Piazza by the side of Donatello's Judith and Michael Angelo's David. It was the casting of this masterpiece which was the triumph of Cellini's career as a sculptor, and his own account of it (reproduced below in the admirable translation of John Addington Symonds) marks the culminating point in his autobiographical story.

Cellini saw his Perseus put in place on the Loggia de' Lanzi in 1554 amid the rejoicings of the populace, but he had great difficulty in persuading the Duke to pay for it. It is an endless tale, broken off in 1562, of promises, disappointments, lawsuits, quarrels, and a serious illness in 1559-60, from the results of which Cellini never entirely recovered.

CELLINI'S ESCAPE FROM THE CASTLE OF ST. ANGELO

On the evening of that feast-day, then, I made my mind up to escape, come what might; and first I prayed most devoutly to God, imploring His Divine Majesty to protect and succor me in that so perilous a venture. Afterwards I set to work at all the things I needed, and labored the whole of the night. It was two hours before daybreak when at last I removed those hinges with the greatest toil; but the wooden panel itself and the bolt too offered such resistance that I could not open the door; so I had to cut into the wood; yet in the end I got it open, and shouldering the strips of linen which I had rolled up like bundles of flax upon two sticks, I went forth and directed my steps toward the latrines of the keep. Spying from within two tiles upon the roof, I was able at once to clamber up with ease. I wore a white doublet with a pair of white hose and a pair of half boots, into which I had stuck the poniard I have mentioned.

After scaling the roof, I took one end of my linen roll and attached it to a piece of antique tile which was built into the fortress wall; it happened to jut out scarcely four fingers. In order to fix the band, I gave it the form of a stirrup. When I had attached it to that piece of tile, I turned to God and said: 'Lord God, give aid to my good cause; you know that it is good; you see that I am aiding myself.' Then I let myself go gently by degrees, supporting myself with the sinews of my arms, until I touched the ground. There was no moonshine, but the light of a fair open heaven. When I stood upon my feet on solid earth, I looked up at the vast height which I had descended with such spirit, and went gladly away, thinking I was free. But this was not the case; for the castellan on that side of the fortress had built two lofty walls, the space between which he used for stable and hen-yard; the place was barred with thick iron bolts outside. I was terribly disgusted to find there was no exit from this trap; but while I paced up and down debating what to do, I stumbled on a long pole which was covered up with straw. Not without great trouble I succeeded in placing it against the wall, and then swarmed up it by force of my arms until I reached the top. But since the wall ended in a sharp ridge, I had not strength enough to drag the pole up after me. Accordingly I made my mind up to use a portion of the second roll of linen which I had there; the other was left hanging from the keep of the castle. So I cut a piece off, tied it to the pole, and clambered down the wall, enduring the utmost toil and fatigue. I was quite exhausted, and had, moreover, flayed the inside of my hands, which bled freely. This compelled me to rest awhile, and I bathed my hands in my own urine. When I thought that my strength was recovered, I advanced quickly toward the last rampart, which faces toward Prati. There I put my bundle of linen lines down upon the ground, meaning to fasten them round a battlement, and descend the lesser as I had the greater height. But no sooner had I placed the linen, than I became aware behind me of a sentinel, who was going the rounds. Seeing my designs interrupted and my life in peril, I resolved to face the guard. This fellow when he noticed my bold front, and that I was marching on him with weapon in hand, quickened his pace and gave me a wide berth. I had left my lines some little way behind; so I turned with hasty steps to regain them; and though I came within sight of another sentinel, he seemed as though he did not choose to take notice of me. Having found my lines and attached them to the battlement, I let myself go. On the descent, whether it was that I thought I had really come to earth and relaxed my grasp to jump, or whether my hands were so tired that they could not keep their hold, at any rate I fell, struck my head in falling, and lay stunned for more than an hour and a half, so far as I could judge.

It was just upon daybreak, when the fresh breeze which blows an hour before the sun revived me; yet I did not immediately recover my senses, for I thought my head had been cut off and fancied that I was in purgatory. With time, little by little, my faculties returned, and I perceived that I was outside the castle, and in a flash remembered all my adventures. I was aware of the wound in my head before I knew my leg was broken; for I put my hands up, and withdrew them covered with blood. Then I searched the spot well, and judged and ascertained that I had sustained no injury of consequence there; but when I wanted to stand up, I discovered that my right leg was broken three inches above the heel. Not even this dismayed me; I drew forth my poniard with its scabbard; the latter had a metal point ending in a large ball, which had caused the fracture of my leg; for the bone, coming into violent contact with the ball, and not being able to bend, had snapped at that point. I threw the sheath away, and with the poniard cut a piece of the linen which I had left. Then I bound my leg up as well as I could, and crawled on all fours with the poniard in my hand toward the city gate. When I reached it, I found it shut; but I noticed a stone just beneath the door which did not appear to be very firmly fixed. This I attempted to dislodge; after setting my hands to it, and feeling it move, it easily gave way, and I drew it out. Through the gap thus made I crept into the town.

I had crawled more than five hundred paces from the place where I fell, to the gate by which I entered. No sooner had I got inside than some mastiff dogs set upon and bit me badly. When they returned to the attack and worried me, I drew my poniard and wounded one of them so sharply that he howled aloud, and all the dogs, according to their nature, ran after him. I meanwhile made the best way I could on all fours toward the church of the Trespontina.

On arriving at the opening of the street which leads to Sant' Agnolo, I turned off in the direction of San Piero; and now the dawn had risen over me, and I felt myself in danger. When therefore I chanced to meet a water-carrier driving his donkey laden with full buckets, I called the fellow, and begged him to carry me upon his back to the terrace by the steps of San Piero, adding, 'I am an unfortunate young man, who, while escaping from a window in a love-adventure, have fallen and broken my leg. The place from which I made my exit is one of great importance; and if I am discovered, I run risk of being cut to pieces; so for heaven's sake lift me quickly, and I will give you a crown of gold.' Saying this, I clapped my hand to my purse, where I had a good quantity. He took me up at once, hitched me on his back, and carried me to the raised terrace by the steps to San Piero. There I bade him leave me, saying he must run back to his donkey.

I resumed my march, crawling always on all fours, and making for the palace of the Duchess, wife of Duke Ottavio and daughter of the Emperor. She was his natural child, and had been married to Duke Alessandro. I chose her house for refuge, because I was quite certain that many of my friends, who had come with that great princess from Florence, were tarrying there; also because she had taken me into favor through something which the castellan had said in my behalf. Wishing to be of service to me, he told the Pope that I had saved the city more than a thousand crowns of damage, caused by heavy rain on the occasion when the Duchess made her entrance into Rome. He related how he was in despair, and how I put heart into him, and went on to describe how I had pointed several large pieces of artillery in the direction where the clouds were thickest, and whence a deluge of water was already pouring; then, when I began to fire, the rain stopped, and at the fourth discharge the sun shone out; and so I was the sole cause of the festival succeeding, to the joy of everybody. On hearing this narration the Duchess said: 'That Benvenuto is one of the artists of merit, who enjoyed the good-will of my late husband, Duke Alessandro, and I shall always hold them in mind if an opportunity comes of doing such men service.' She also talked of me to Duke Ottavio. For these reasons I meant to go straight to the house of her Excellency, which was a very fine palace situated in Borgio Vecchio.

I should have been quite safe from recapture by the Pope if I could have stayed there; but my exploits up to this point had been too marvelous for a human being, and God was unwilling to encourage my vain-gloiy; accordingly, for my own good, He chastised me a second time worse even than the first. The cause of this was that while I was crawling on all fours up those steps, a servant of Cardinal Cornaro recognized me. His master was then lodging in the palace; so the servant ran up to his room and woke him, crying: 'Most reverend Monsignor, your friend Benvenuto is down there; he has escaped from the castle, and is crawling on all fours, streaming with blood; to all appearances he has broken a leg, and we don't know whither he is going.' The Cardinal exclaimed at once: 'Run and carry him upon your back into my room here.' When I arrived, he told me to be under no apprehension, and sent for the first physicians of Rome, to take my case in hand. Among them was Maestro

Jacomo of Perugia, a most excellent and able surgeon. He set the bone with dexterity, then bound the limb up, and bled me with his own hand. It happened that my veins were swollen far beyond their usual size, and he too wished to make a pretty wide incision; accordingly the blood sprang forth so copiously, and spurted with such force into his face, that he had to abandon the operation. He regarded this as a very bad omen, and could hardly be prevailed upon to undertake my cure. Indeed, he often expressed a wish to leave me, remembering that he ran no little risk of punishment for having treated my case, or rather for having proceeded to the end with it. The Cardinal had me placed in a secret chamber, and went off immediately to beg me from the Pope.

THE CASTING OF THE PERSEUS

Having succeeded so well with the cast of the Medusa, I had great hope of bringing my Perseus through; for I had laid the wax on, and felt confident that it would come out in bronze as perfectly as the Medusa. The waxen model produced so fine an effect that when the Duke saw it and was struck with its beauty—whether somebody had persuaded him it could not be carried out with the same finish in metal, or whether he thought so for himself—he came to visit me more frequently than usual, and on one occasion said: ‘Benvenuto, this figure cannot succeed in bronze; the laws of art do not admit of it.’ These words of his Excellency stung me so sharply that I answered: ‘My lord, I know how very little confidence you have in me; and I believe the reason of this is that your most illustrious Excellency lends too ready an ear to my calumniators, or else indeed that you do not understand my art.’ He hardly let me close the sentence when he broke in: ‘I profess myself a connoisseur, and understand it very well indeed.’ I replied: ‘Yes, like a prince, not like an artist; for if your Excellency understood my trade as well as you imagine, you would trust me on the proofs I have already given. These are, first, the colossal bronze bust of your Excellency, which is now in Elba; secondly, the restoration of the Ganymede in marble, which offered so many difficulties and cost me so much trouble that I would rather have made the whole statue new from the beginning; thirdly, the Medusa, cast by me in bronze, here now before your Excellency’s eyes, the execution of which was a greater triumph of strength and skill than any of my predecessors in this fiendish art have yet achieved. Look you, my lord! I constructed that furnace anew on principles quite different from those of other founders; in addition to many technical improvements and ingenious devices, I supplied it with two issues for the metal, because this difficult and twisted figure could not otherwise have come out perfect. It is only owing to my intelligent insight into means and appliances that the statue turned out as it did; a triumph judged impossible by all the practitioners of this art. I should like you furthermore to be aware, my lord, for certain, that the sole reason why I succeeded with all those great and arduous works in France under his most admirable Majesty King Francis was the high courage which that good monarch put into my heart by the liberal allowances he made me, and the multitude of workpeople he left at my disposal. I could have as many as I asked for, and employed at times above forty, all chosen by myself. These were the causes of my having there produced so many masterpieces in so short a space of time. Now then, my lord, put trust in me; supply me with the aid I need. I am confident of being able to complete a work which will delight your soul. But if your Excellency goes on disheartening me, and does not advance me the assistance which is absolutely required, neither I nor any man alive upon this earth can hope to achieve the slightest thing of value.’

It was as much as the Duke could do to stand by and listen to my pleadings. He kept turning first this way and then that; while I, in despair, poor wretched I, was calling up remembrance of the noble state I held in France, to the great sorrow of my soul. All at once he cried: ‘Come, tell me, Benvenuto, how is it possible that yonder splendid head of Medusa, so high up there in the grasp of Perseus, should ever come out perfect?’ I replied upon the instant: ‘Look you now, my lord! If your Excellency possessed that knowledge of the craft which you affirm you have, you would not fear one moment for the splendid head you speak of. There is good reason, on the other hand, to feel uneasy about this right foot, so far below and at a distance from the rest.’ When he heard these words, the Duke turned, half in anger, to some gentlemen in waiting, and exclaimed: 'I verily believe that this Benvenuto prides himself on contradicting everything one says.' Then he faced round to me with a touch of mockery, upon which his attendants did the like, and began to speak as follows: 'I will listen patiently to any argument you can possibly produce in explanation of your statement, which may convince me of its probability.' I said in answer: 'I will adduce so sound an argument that your Excellency shall perceive the full force of it.' So I began: 'You must know, my lord, that the nature of fire is to ascend, and therefore I promise you that Medusa's head will come out famously; but since it is not in the nature of fire to descend, and I must force it downwards six cubits by artificial means, I assure your Excellency upon this most convincing ground of proof that the foot cannot possibly come out. It will, however, be quite easy for me to restore it.' 'Why, then,' said the Duke, 'did you not devise it so that the foot should come out as well as you affirm the head will?' I answered: 'I must have made a much larger furnace, with a conduit as thick as my leg; and so I might have forced the molten metal by its own weight to descend so far. Now, my pipe, which runs six cubits to the statue's foot, as I have said, is not thicker than two fingers. However, it was not worth the trouble and expense to make a larger; for I shall easily be able to mend what is lacking. But when my mold is more than half full, as I expect, from this middle point upwards, the fire ascending by its natural property, then the heads of Perseus and Medusa will come out admirably; you may be quite sure of it.' After I had thus expounded these convincing arguments, together with many more of the same kind, which it would be tedious to set down here, the Duke shook his head and departed without further ceremony.

Abandoned thus to my own resources, I took new courage, and banished the sad thoughts which kept recurring to my mind, making me often weep bitter tears of repentance for having left France; for though I did so only to revisit Florence, my sweet birth-place, in order that I might charitably succor my six nieces, this good action, as I well perceived, had been the beginning of my great misfortune. Nevertheless, I felt convinced that when my Perseus was accomplished, all these trials would be turned to high felicity and glorious well-being.

Accordingly I strengthened my heart, and with all the forces of my body and my purse, employing what little money still remained to me, I set to work. First I provided myself with several loads of pine-wood from the forests of Serristori, in the neighborhood of Montelupo. While these were on their way, I clothed my Perseus with the clay which I had prepared many months beforehand, in order that it might be duly seasoned. After making its clay tunic (for that is the term used in this art) and properly arming it and fencing it with iron girders, I began to draw the wax out by means of a slow fire. This melted and issued through numerous air-vents I had made; for the more there are of these, the better will the mold fill. When I had finished drawing off the wax, I constructed a funnel-shaped furnace all round the model of my Perseus. It was built of bricks, so interlaced, the one above the other, that numerous apertures were left for the fire to exhale at. Then I began to lay on wood by degrees, and kept it burning two whole days and nights. At length, when all the wax was gone, and the mold was well baked, I set to work at digging the pit in which to sink it. This I performed with scrupulous regard to all the rules of art. When I had finished that part of my work, I raised the mold by windlasses and stout ropes to a perpendicular position, and suspending it with the greatest care one cubit above the level of the furnace, so that it hung exactly above the middle of the pit, I next lowered it gently down into the very bottom of the furnace, and had it firmly placed with every possible precaution for its safety. When this delicate operation was accomplished, I began to bank it up with the earth I had excavated; and, ever as the earth grew higher, I introduced its proper air-vents, which were little tubes of earthenware, such as folk use for drains and such-like purposes.

At length, I felt sure that it was admirably fixed, and that the filling-in of the pit and the placing of the air-vents had been properly performed. I also could see that my workpeople understood my method, which differed very considerably from that of all the other masters in the trade. Feeling confident, then, that I could rely upon them, I next turned to my furnace, which I had filled with numerous pigs of copper and other bronze stuff. The pieces were piled according to the laws of art, that is to say, so resting one upon the other that the flames could play freely through them, in order that the metal might heat and liquefy the sooner. At last I called out heartily to set the furnace going. The logs of pine were heaped in, and, what with the unctuous resin of the wood and the good draught I had given, my furnace worked so well that I was obliged to rush from side to side to keep it going. The labor was more than I could stand; yet I forced myself to strain every nerve and muscle. To increase my anxieties, the workshop took fire, and we were afraid lest the roof should fall upon our heads; while, from the garden, such a storm of wind and rain kept blowing in, that it perceptibly cooled the furnace.

Battling thus with all these untoward circumstances for several hours, and exerting myself beyond even the measure of my powerful constitution, I could at last bear up no longer, and a sudden fever, of the utmost possible intensity, attacked me. I felt absolutely obliged to go and fling myself upon my bed. Sores against my will having to drag myself away from the spot, I turned to my assistants, about ten or more in all, what with master-founders, hand-workers, country-fellows, and my own special journeymen, among whom was Bernardino Mannellini of Mugello, my apprentice through several years. To him in particular I spoke: 'Look, my dear Bernardino, that you observe the rules which I have taught you; do your best with all despatch, for the metal will soon be fused. You cannot go wrong; these honest men will get the channels ready; you will easily be able to drive back the two plugs with this pair of iron crooks; and I am sure that my mold will fill miraculously. I feel more ill than I ever did in all my life, and verily believe that it will kill me before a few hours are over.' Thus, with despair at heart, I left them, and betook myself to bed.

No sooner had I got to bed, than I ordered my serving-maids to carry food and wine for all the men into the workshop; at the same I cried: 'I shall not be alive to-morrow.' They tried to encourage me, arguing that my illness would pass over, since it came from excessive fatigue.

In this way I spent two hours battling with the fever, which steadily increased, and calling out continually: 'I feel that I am dying.' My housekeeper, who was named Mona Fiore da Castel del Rio, a very notable manager and no less warmhearted, kept chiding me for my discouragement; but, on the other hand, she paid me every kind attention which was possible. However, the sight of my physical pain and moral dejection so affected her, that, in spite of that brave heart of hers, she could not refrain from shedding tears; and yet, so far as she was able, she took good care I should not see them. While I was thus terribly afflicted, I beheld the figure of a man enter my chamber, twisted in his body into the form of a capital S. He raised a lamentable, doleful voice, like one who announces their last hour to men condemned to die upon the scaffold, and spoke these words: 'O Benvenuto! your statue is spoiled, and there is no hope whatever of saving it.'

No sooner had I heard the shriek of that wretch than I gave a howl which might have been heard from the sphere of flame. Jumping from my bed, I seized my clothes and began to dress. The maids, and my lad, and every one who came around to help me, got kicks or blows of the fist, while I kept crying out in lamentation: 'Ah! traitors! enviers! This is an act of treason, done by malice prepense! But I swear by God that I will sift it to the bottom, and before I die will leave such witness to the world of what I can do as shall make a score of mortals marvel.'

When I had got my clothes on, I strode with soul bent on mischief toward the workshop; there I beheld the men, whom I had left erewhile in such high spirits, standing stupefied and downcast. I began at once and spoke: 'Up with you! Attend to me! Since you have not been able or willing to obey the directions I gave you, obey me now that I am with you to conduct my work in person. Let no one contradict me, for in cases like this we need the aid of hand and hearing, not of advice.' When I had uttered these words, a certain Maestro Alessandro Lastricati broke silence and said: 'Look you, Benvenuto, you are going to attempt an enterprise which the laws of art do not sanction, and which cannot succeed.' I turned upon him with such fury and so full of mischief that he and all the rest of them exclaimed with one voice: 'On then! Give orders! We will obey your least commands, so long as life is left in us.' I believe they spoke thus feelingly because they thought I must fall shortly dead upon the ground. I went immediately to inspect the furnace, and found that the metal was all curdled; an accident which we express by 'being caked.' I told two of the hands to cross the road, and fetch from the house of the butcher Capretta a load of young oak-wood, which had lain dry for above a year; this wood had been previously offered me by Madame Ginevra, wife of the said Capretta. So soon as the first armfuls arrived, I began to fill the grate beneath the furnace. Now oak-wood of that kind heats more powerfully than any other sort of tree; and for this reason, where a slow fire is wanted, as in the case of gun-foundry, alder or pine is preferred. Accordingly, when the logs took fire, oh! how the cake began to stir beneath that awful heat, to glow and sparkle in a blaze! At the same time I kept stirring up the channels, and sent men upon the roof to stop the conflagration, which had gathered force from the increased combustion in the furnace; also I caused boards, carpets, and other hangings to be set up against the garden, in order to protect us from the violence of the rain.

When I had thus provided against these several disasters, I roared out first to one man and then to another: 'Bring this thing here! Take that thing there!' At this crisis, when the whole gang saw the cake was on the point of melting, they did my bidding, each fellow working with the strength of three. I then ordered half a pig of pewter to be brought, which weighed about sixty pounds, and flung it into the middle of the cake inside the furnace. By this means, and by piling on wood and stirring now with pokers and now with iron rods, the curdled mass rapidly began to liquefy. Then, knowing I had brought the dead to life again, against the firm opinion of these ignoramuses, I felt such vigor fill my veins, that all those pains of fever, all those fears of death, were quite forgotten.

All of a sudden an explosion took place, attended by a tremendous flash of flame, as though a thunderbolt had formed and been discharged amongst us. Unwonted and appalling terror astonished everyone, and me more even than the rest. When the din was over and the dazzling light extinguished, we began to look each other in the face. Then I discovered that the cap of the furnace had blown up, and the bronze was bubbling over from its source beneath. So I had the mouths of my mold immediately opened, and at the same time drove in the two plugs which kept back the molten metal. But I noticed that it did not flow as rapidly as usual, the reason being probably that the fierce heat of the fire we kindled had consumed its base alloy. Accordingly I sent for all my pewter platters, porringers, and dishes, to the number of some two hundred pieces, and had a portion of them cast, one by one, into the channels, the rest into the furnace. This expedient succeeded, and every one could now perceive that my bronze was in most perfect liquefaction, and my mold was filling; whereupon they all with heartiness and happy cheer assisted and obeyed my bidding, while I, now here, now there, gave orders, helped with my own hands, and cried aloud: 'O God! Thou that by Thy immeasurable power didst rise from the dead, and in Thy glory didst ascend to heaven! . . . even thus in a moment my mold was filled; and seeing my work finished, I fell upon my knees, and with all my heart gave thanks to God.

After all was over, I turned to a plate of salad on a bench there, and ate with hearty appetite and drank together with the whole crew. Afterwards I retired to bed, healthy and happy, for it was not two hours before morning, and slept as sweetly as though I had never felt a touch of illness. My good housekeeper, without my giving any orders, had prepared a fat capon for my repast. So that, when I rose, about the hour for breaking fast, she presented herself with a smiling countenance, and said: 'Oh! is that the man who felt that he was dying? Upon my word, I think the blows and kicks you dealt us last night, when you were so enraged and had that demon in your body as it seemed, must have frightened away your mortal fever! The fever feared that it might catch it too, as we did!' All my poor household, relieved in like measure from anxiety and overwhelming labor, went at once to buy earthen vessels in order to replace the pewter I had cast away. Then we dined together joyfully; nay, I cannot remember a day in my whole life when I dined with greater gladness or a better appetite.

RONSARD (1524-1585)

The four hundredth anniversary of Pierre de Ronsard's birth was duly celebrated in September, 1924, not only in France but in England and America. Yet he is one of the most striking examples of the vicissitudes of poetic fame. His father was attached to the court of Francis I and something of a poet; he himself began life as page to the Dauphin of France, and in his maturity was favorite and friend of six successive French kings. Catherine de Medici, Marguerite of Savoy, Elizabeth of England, and Mary, Queen of Scots were among his patronesses, and the poets and scholars of the time paid him the highest honors. Yet after Malherbe had blue-penciled the poems of Ronsard until there was hardly one line left unblotted, the older French poet was for two centuries practically forgotten. It was Sainte-Beuve who in 1827-28 brought Ronsard again to the light and made him again popular. Subsequent criticism has upheld Sainte-Beuve's judgment and counts the beginning of modern French literature from the Défense et Illustration de la Langue Française published in 1549. This important literary document was written by Joachim du Bellay, but the acknowledged head of the School which issued it and undertook to carry out its program was Ronsard. The Pléiade—a group of half a dozen young poets—was the first of those literary coteries which, recurring from age to age, have contributed so large a part of French literary history—and of French literature.

Put briefly, the plan of the Pléiade was by diligent study of the ancient classics to make their own language and literature the equals of those of Greece and Rome. Not all of this ambitious program could be carried out; Ronsard's epic, La Franciade, has dropped into oblivion, but he has kept his hold on posterity by a few lyrics in which he has succeeded in combining the Greek simplicity of form, the natural spontaneity of medieval poetry, and a personal note which is his own.

ROSES

Translated by Andrew Lang

I send you here a wreath of blossoms blown,
And woven flowers at sunset gathered,
Another dawn had seen them ruined, and shed
Loose leaves upon the grass at random strown.

By this their sure example be it known, 5
That all your beauties, now in perfect flower,
Shall fade as these, and wither in an hour,
Flower-like, and brief of days, as the flower sown.

Ah, time is flying, lady—time is flying;
Nay, 'tis not time that flies but we that go, 10
Who in short space shall be in churchyard lying,
And of our loving parley none shall know,
Nor any man consider what we were;
Be therefore kind, my love, whiles thou art
fair.

THE ROSE

Translated by Andrew Lang

See, Mignonne, hath not the Rose,
That this morning did uncloset
Her purple mantle to the light,
Lost, before the day be dead,
The glory of her raiment red, 5
Her color, bright as yours is bright?

Ah, Mignonne, in how few hours,
The petals of her purple flowers
All have faded, fallen, died;
Sad Nature, mother ruinous, 10
That seest thy fair child perish thus
'Twixt matin song and eventide.

Hear me, my darling, speaking sooth,
Gather the fleet flower of your youth,
Take ye your pleasure at the best; 15
Be merry ere your beauty flit,
For length of days will tarnish it
Like roses that were loveliest.

TO HIS YOUNG MISTRESS

Translated by Andrew Lang

Fair flower of fifteen springs, that still
 Art scarcely blossomed from the bud,
 Yet hast such store of evil will,
 A heart so full of hardihood,
 Seeking to hide in friendly wise 5
 The mischief of your mocking eyes.

If you have pity, child, give o'er;
 Give back the heart you stole from me,
 Pirate, setting so little store
 On this your captive from Love's sea, 10
 Holding his misery for gain,
 And making pleasure of his pain.

Another, not so fair of face,
 But far more pitiful than you,
 Would take my heart, if of his grace, 15
 My heart would give her of Love's due;
 And she shall have it, since I find
 That you are cruel and unkind.

Nay, I would rather that it died,
 Within your white hands prisoning, 20
 Would rather that it still abide
 In your ungentle comforting
 Than change its faith, and seek to her
 That is more kind, but not so fair.

TO CASSANDRA

Translated by George Wyndham

O little maid more tender
 Than any bud in May
 That rose-bushes engender
 To hail the break of day
 In one part green, in one 5
 Flushing vermilion.

Fasten, Beloved, around me
 Your twin arms intertwined;
 And when those bonds have bound me
 Forever let them bind: 10
 In that kiss each shall give
 For ever let us live.

Nor time nor the misgiving
 That other lips may please
 Shall lure my lips, while living, 15
 From living upon these:
 And so clasped we will lie
 Till in that kiss we die.

You, Love, and I your lover,
 Both in the self-same breath 20
 Shall fare out to discover
 The pallid House of Death
 And fields assigned by Fate
 To lovers fortunate.

There Eros mid the flowering 25
 Of that Eternal Spring
 Shall watch his Mother showering
 Sweets on our dallying,
 And we shall know what good
 Befalls within her wood. 30

Along the grassy meadows
 Below the shelving dunes
 The river shores and shadows
 Re-echo many tunes.
 One plays and to him one 35
 Dances in unison.

The fair sky there discloses
 A face for ever kind,
 No viper o'er the roses
 Leaves venom tracks behind, 40
 The birds there never cease
 From singing in the trees.

The winds are ever chanting
 Soft songs of fitful sound,
 And laurels ever slanting 45
 Cool shadows on the ground,
 The flowers there never lose
 The glory of their hues.

Somewhere in the deep spaces
 That happy orchard screens, 50
 We two shall find our places
 Where Lovers and their Queens
 Love on without a care,
 And like them we shall fare.

TO MARIE

Translated by George Wyndham

Awake, awake, Marie, how lazy you are grown,
 By now the happy lark has caroled to the sky,
 The nightingale by now, in dulcet agony,
 Leaning against her thorn, has uttered all her moan.
 Come! we'll go see the grass with seeds of 5
 crystal sown,
 Your rose-tree crowned with buds that nightly multiply,

And those sweet pinks that, sure, of thirst will never die
 If, as last night, the hand that tends them be your own.
 Yestreen you swore to me when our good-nights were said,
 To be awake today or ever I should rise; 10
 And yet the sleep of dawn, that well becomes a maid,
 Still presses the soft seal of slumber on your eyes.
 I'll kiss them both and kiss the beauty of your breast
 To teach you when 'tis time to be about and dressed.

TO MARIE

Translated by Henry Francis Cary

Two flowers I love, the March-flower and
 the rose,
 The lovely rose that is to Venus dear,
 The March-flower that of her the name doth bear,
 Who will not leave my spirit in repose:
 Three birds I love; one, moist with May-dew,
 goes 5
 To dry his feathers in the sunshine clear;
 One for his mate laments throughout the year,
 And for his child the other wails his woes:
 And Bourgueil's pine I love, where Venus hung,
 For a proud trophy on the darksome
 bough,
 Ne'er since released my youthful liberty:
 And Phœbus' tree love I, the laurel tree,
 Of whose fair leaves, my mistress, when I sung,
 Bound with her locks a garland for my brow.

TO HELEN

Translated by Andrew Lang

When you are very old, at evening
 You'll sit and spin beside the fire, and say,
 Humming my songs, 'Ah well, ah well-a-day!
 When I was young, of me did Ronsard sing.'

None of your maidens that doth hear the thing, 5
 Albeit with her weary task foredone,
 But wakens at my name, and calls you one
 Blessed, to be held in long remembering.
 I shall be low beneath the earth, and laid
 On sleep, a phantom in the myrtle shade, 10
 While you beside the fire, a grandame grey,
 My love, your pride, remember and regret;
 Ah, love me, love! we may be happy yet,
 And gather roses, while 'tis called today.

THACKERAY'S PARAPHRASE OF
THE SAME

Some winter night, shut snugly in Beside the fagot in the hall,
 I think I see you sit and spin,
 Surrounded by your maidens all.
 Old tales are told, old songs are sung, 5
 Old days come back to memory:
 You say, 'When I was fair and young,
 A poet sang of me!'

There's not a maiden in your hall,
 Though tired and sleepy ever so, 10
 But wakes as you my name recall,
 And longs the history to know.
 And as the piteous tale is said
 Of lady cold and lover true,
 Each, musing, carries it to bed, 15
 And sighs and envies you!

'Our lady's old and feeble now,'
 They'll say: 'she once was fresh and fair,
 And yet she spurned her lover's vow,
 And heartless left him to despair: 20
 The lover lies in silent earth,
 No kindly mate the lady cheers;
 She sits beside a lonely hearth,
 With threescore and ten years!'

Ah! dreary thoughts and dreams are those, 25
 But wherefore yield me to despair,
 While yet the poet's bosom glows,
 While yet the dame is peerless fair!
 Sweet lady mine! while yet 'tis time,
 Requite my passion and my truth; 30
 And gather in their blushing prime
 The roses of your youth.

MONTAIGNE (1533-1592)

Michel de Montaigne carried a step further the enrichment and purification of the French language prescribed by the Pléiade. While he served as a soldier in his youth, and in his maturity was Mayor of Bordeaux, he was essentially a student, and his alert mind was richly stored with classical learning. Rabelais had asserted the freedom of the human will and the futility of the various forms of coercion which constituted the framework of medieval society. Montaigne, with his curious, sceptical intelligence, exercised the virtue of the open mind, and was always willing to end the discussion of a problem with the question 'Que sais-je?' (What do I know?) He was the precursor of modern agnosticism, but his easy-going scepticism aroused no alarm. He was the first master of the discursive essay, not omitting the personal touch which has become habitual to later practitioners in this gentle art. His attitude towards life was one of acceptance, based upon a keen curiosity to know the facts and an inclination to make the best of them. 'I love life and cherish it, such as it has pleased God to give it to us.' His experience of men and things, extended by public office and frequent travel, was supplemented by the diligent study of books which he began as a boy and to which he devoted many quiet years in his comfortable circular library, situated in a high tower on his ancestral estate about thirty miles from Bordeaux.

The Essays, first published in 1580, and re-issued in greatly enlarged editions in 1588 and 1595, were known to Shakespeare through the translation of John Florio (1603) and have formed part of the heavier baggage of the serious student of literature ever since. Florio's translation is still highly esteemed on account of its antique flavor, but is not always correct or clear, and for students today the more modern version of Charles Cotton, as revised by W. C. Hazlitt, seems preferable.

OF CANNIBALS

FROM BOOK I, CHAPTER 30

When King Pyrrhus invaded Italy, having viewed and considered the order of the army the Romans sent out to meet him, 'I know not,' said he, 'what kind of barbarians' (for so the Greeks called all other nations) 'these may be; but the disposition of this army that I see has nothing of barbarism in it.' As much said the Greeks of that which Flaminius brought into their country; and Philip, beholding from an eminence the order and distribution of the Roman camp formed in his kingdom by Publius Sulpicius Galba, spake to the same effect. By which it appears how cautious men ought to be of taking things upon trust from vulgar opinion, and that we are to judge by the eye of reason, and not from common report.

I long had a man in my house that lived ten or twelve years in the New World, discovered in these latter days, and in that part of it where Villegaignon landed, which he called Antarctic France. This discovery of so vast a country seems to be of very great consideration. I cannot be sure that hereafter there may not be another, so many wiser men than we having been deceived in this. I am afraid our eyes are bigger than our bellies, and that we have more curiosity than capacity; for we grasp at all, but catch nothing but wind. . . .

This man that I had was a plain ignorant fellow, and therefore the more likely to tell truth; for your better bred sort of men are much more curious in their observation, 'tis true, and discover a great deal more, but then they gloss upon it, and to give the greater weight to what they deliver and allure your belief, they cannot forbear a little to alter the story; they never represent things to you simply as they are, but rather as they appeared to them, or as they would have them appear to you, and to gain the reputation of men of judgment and the better to induce your faith, are willing to help out the business with something more than is really true, of their own invention. Now in this case, we should either have a man of irreproachable veracity, or so simple that he has not wherewithal to contrive and to give a color of truth to false relations, and who can have no ends in forging an untruth. Such a one was mine; and besides, he has at divers times brought to me several seamen and merchants who at the same time went the same voyage. I shall therefore content myself with his information, without inquiring what the cosmographers say to the business.

We should have topographers to trace out to us the particular places where they have been; but for having had this advantage over us, to have seen the Holy Land, they would have the privilege, forsooth, to tell us stories of all the other parts of the world besides. I would have everyone write what he knows, and as much as he knows, but no more; and that not in this only, but in all other subjects; for such a person may have some particular knowledge and experience of the nature of such a river, or such a fountain, who, as to other things, knows no more than what everybody does, and yet to keep a clutter with this little pittance of his, will undertake to write the whole body of physics: a vice from which great inconveniences derive their original.

Now, to return to my subject, I find that there is nothing barbarous and savage in this nation, by anything that I can gather, excepting that everyone gives the title of barbarism to everything that is not in use in his own country. As, indeed, we have no other level of truth and reason than the example and idea of the opinions and customs of the place wherein we live: there is always the perfect religion, there the perfect government, there the most exact and accomplished usage of all things. They are savages at the same rate that we say fruits are wild which nature produces of herself and by her own ordinary progress; whereas in truth, we ought rather to call those wild whose natures we have changed by our artifice and diverted from the common order. In those, the genuine, most useful and natural virtues and properties are vigorous and sprightly which we have helped to degenerate in these by accommodating them to the pleasure of our own corrupted palate. And yet for all this, our taste confesses a flavor and delicacy, excellent even to emulation of the best of ours, in several fruits wherein those countries abound without art or culture. Neither is it reasonable that art should gain the pre-eminence of our great and powerful mother nature. We have so surcharged her with the additional ornaments and graces, we have added to the beauty and riches of her own works by our inventions that we have almost smothered her; yet in other places, where she shines in her own purity proper luster, she marvelously baffles and disgraces all our vain and frivolous attempts.

Et veniunt hederæ sponte sua melius;
Surgit et in solis formosior arbutus antris;
Et volucres nulla dulcius arte canunt.

[The ivy grows best spontaneously; the arbutus best in shady caves; and the wild notes of birds are sweeter than art can teach.]

Our utmost endeavors cannot arrive at so much as to imitate the nest of the least of birds, its contexture, beauty, and convenience: not so much as the web of a poor spider.

All things, says Plato, are produced either by nature, by fortune, or by art; the greatest and most beautiful by the one or the other of the former, the least and the most imperfect by the last.

These nations then seem to me to be so far barbarous, as having received but very little form and fashion from art and human invention, and consequently to be not much remote from their original simplicity. The laws of nature, however, govern them still, not as yet much vitiated with any mixture of ours: but 'tis in such purity that I am sometimes troubled we were not sooner acquainted with these people, and that they were not discovered in those better times, when there were men much more able to judge of them than we are. I am sorry that Lycurgus and Plato had no knowledge of them; for to my apprehension, what we now see in those nations does not only surpass all the pictures with which the poets have adorned the golden age and all their inventions in feigning a happy state of man but, moreover, the fancy and even the wish and desire of philosophy itself; so native and so pure a simplicity, as we by experience see to be in them, could never enter into their imagination, nor could they ever believe that human society could have been maintained with so little artifice and human patchwork. I should tell Plato, that it is a nation wherein there is no manner of traffic, no knowledge of letters, no science of numbers, no name of magistrate or political superiority; no use of service, riches or poverty, no contracts, no successions, no dividends, no properties, no employments but those of leisure, no respect of kindred, but common, no clothing, no agriculture, no metal, no use of corn or wine; the very words that signify lying, treachery, dissimulation, avarice, envy, detraction, pardon, never heard of. How much would he find his imaginary Republic short of his perfection? 'Viri a diis recentes.' ['Men fresh from the gods.'] 'Hos natura modos primum dedit.' ['These were the manners first taught by nature.']

As to the rest, they live in a country very pleasant and temperate so that, as my witnesses inform me, 'tis rare to hear of a sick person, and they moreover assure me that they never saw any of the natives either paralytic, blear-eyed, toothless, or crooked with age. The situation of their country is along the sea-shore, enclosed on the other side towards the land with great and high mountains, having about a hundred leagues in breadth between. They have great store of fish and flesh that have no resemblance to those of ours, which they eat without any other cookery than plain boiling, roasting, and broiling. The first that rode a horse thither, though in several other voyages he had contracted an acquaintance and familiarity with them, put them into so terrible a fright with his centaur appearance that they killed him with their arrows before they could come to discover who he was. Their buildings are very long and of capacity to hold two or three hundred people, made of the barks of tall trees, reared with one end upon the ground and leaning to and supporting one another at the top, like some of our barns, of which the coverings hang down to the very ground and serve for the side walls. They have wood so hard that they cut with it, and make their swords of it, and their grills of it to broil their meat. Their beds are of cotton, hung swinging from the roof, like our seaman's hammocks, every man his own, for the wives lie apart from their husbands.

They rise with the sun and so soon as they are up, eat for all day, for they have no more meals but that; they do not then drink, as Suidas reports of some other people of the East that never drank at their meals; but drink very often all day after, and sometimes to a rousing pitch.

Their drink is made of a certain root, and is of the color of our claret, and they never drink it but lukewarm. It will not keep above two or three days; it has a somewhat sharp, brisk taste, is nothing heady, but very comfortable to the stomach; laxative to strangers, but a very pleasant beverage to such as are accustomed to it. They make use, instead of bread, of a certain white compound, like coriander comfits; I have tasted of it; the taste is sweet and a little flat. The whole day is spent in dancing. Their young men go a-hunting after wild beasts with bows and arrows; one part of their women are employed in preparing their drink the while, which is their chief employment.

One of their old men, in the morning before they fall to eating, preaches to the whole family, walking from one end of the house to the other, and several times repeating the same sentence, till he has finished the round, for their houses are at least a hundred yards long. Valor toward their enemies and love toward their wives are the two heads of his discourse, never failing in the close, to put them in mind, that 'tis their wives who provide them their drink warm and well seasoned. The fashion of their beds, ropes, swords, and of the wooden bracelets they tie about their wrists, when they go to fight, and of the great canes, bored hollow at one end, by the sound of which they keep the cadence of their dances, are to be seen in several places, and amongst others, at my house. They shave all over, and much more neatly than we, without other razor than one of wood or stone. They believe in the immortality of the soul, and that those who have merited well of the gods are lodged in that part of heaven where the sun rises, and the accursed in the west.

They have I know not what kind of priests and prophets, who very rarely present themselves to the people, having their abode in the mountains. At their arrival, there is a great feast and solemn assembly of many villages; each house, as I have described, makes a village, and they are about a French league distant from one another. This prophet declaims to them in public, exhorting them to virtue and their duty; but all their ethics are comprised in these two articles, resolution in war, and affection to their wives. He also prophesies to them events to come and the issues they are to expect from their enterprises, and prompts them to or diverts them from war. But let him look to't; for if he fail in his divination, and anything happen otherwise than he has foretold, he is cut into a thousand pieces, if he be caught and condemned for a false prophet; for that reason, if any of them has been mistaken, he is no more heard of.

Divination is a gift of God, and therefore to abuse it ought to be a punishable imposture. Amongst the Scythians, where their diviners failed in the promised effect, they were laid, bound hand and foot, upon carts, loaded with furze and bavins and drawn by oxen, on which they were burned to death. Such as only meddle with things subject to the conduct of human capacity are excusable in doing the best they can; but those other fellows that come to delude us with assurances of an extraordinary faculty, beyond our understanding, ought they not to be punished, when they do not make good the effect of their promise, and for the temerity of their imposture?

They have continual war with the nations that live further within the mainland, beyond their mountains, to which they go naked, and without other arms than their bows and wooden swords, fashioned at one end like the head of our javelins. The obstinacy of their battles is wonderful, and they never end without great effusion of blood; for as to running away, they know not what it is. Everyone for a trophy brings home the head of an enemy he has killed, which he fixes over the door of his house.

After having a long time treated their prisoners very well, and given them all the regales they can think of, he to whom the prisoner belongs invites a great assembly of his friends. They being come, he ties a rope to one of the arms of the prisoner, of which, at a distance, out of his reach, he holds the one end himself, and gives to the friend he loves best the other arm to hold after the same manner; which being done, they two, in the presence of all the assembly, despatch him with their swords. After that they roast him, eat him amongst them, and send some chops to their absent friends. They do not do this, as some think, for nourishment, as the Scythians anciently did, but as a representation of an extreme revenge, as will appear by this: that having observed the Portuguese, who were in league with their enemies, to inflict another sort of death upon any of them they took prisoners, which was to set them up to the girdle in the earth, to shoot at the remaining part till it was stuck full of arrows, and then to hang them, they thought those people of the other world (as being men who had sown the knowledge of a great many vices amongst their neighbors and who were much greater masters in all sorts of mischief than they) did not exercise this sort of revenge without a meaning, and that it must needs be more painful than theirs; they began to leave their old way, and to follow this.

I am not sorry that we should here take notice of the barbarous horror of so cruel an action, but that, seeing so clearly into their faults, we should be so blind to our own. I conceive there is more barbarity in eating a man alive than when he is dead; in tearing limb from limb by racks and tortments a body that is yet in perfect sense; in roasting it by degrees; in causing it to be bitten and worried by dogs and swine (as we have not only read, but lately seen, not amongst inveterate and mortal enemies, but among neighbors and fellow-citizens, and, which is worse, under color of piety and religion) than to roast and eat him after he is dead.

Chrysippus and Zeno, the two heads of the Stoic sect, were of opinion that there was no hurt in making use of our dead carcasses, in what way soever for our necessity, and in feeding upon them too; as our own ancestors, who being besieged by Caesar in the city of Alexia, resolved to sustain the famine of the siege with the bodies of their old men, women, and other persons who were incapable of bearing arms.

Vascones, ut fama est, alimentis talibus uti Produxere animas.

[Tis said the Gascons with such meats appeased their hunger.]

And the physicians make no bones of employing it to all sorts of use, either to apply it outwardly, or to give it inwardly for the health of the patient. But there never was any opinion so irregular as to excuse treachery, disloyalty, tyranny, and cruelty, which are our familiar vices. We may then call these people barbarous, in respect to the rules of reason, but not in respect to ourselves, who in all sorts of barbarity exceed them. Their wars are throughout noble and generous, and carry as much excuse and fair pretense, as that human malady is capable of, having with them no other foundation than the sole jealousy of valor. Their disputes are not for the conquest of new lands, for these they already possess are so fruitful by nature, as to supply them, without labor or concern, with all things necessary, in such abundance that they have no need to enlarge their borders. And they are, moreover, happy in this, that they only covet so much as their natural necessities require; all beyond that is superfluous to them. Men of the same age call one another generally brothers, those who are younger, children; and the old men are fathers to all. These leave to their heirs in common the full possession of goods, without any manner of division or other title than what nature bestows upon her creatures in bringing them into the world. If their neighbors pass over the mountains to assault them, and obtain a victory, all the victors gain by it is glory only and the advantage of having proved themselves the better in valor and virtue; for they never meddle with the goods of the conquered but presently return into their own country, where they have no want of anything necessary, nor of this greatest of all goods, to know happily how to enjoy their condition and to be content. And those in turn do the same; they demand of their prisoners no other ransom than acknowledgment that they are overcome; but there is not one found in an age who will not rather choose to die than make such a confession, or, either by word or look, recede from the entire grandeur of an invincible courage. There is not a man amongst them who had not rather be killed and eaten than so much as to open his mouth to entreat he may not. They use them with all liberality and freedom to the end their lives may be so much the dearer to them; but frequently entertain them with menaces of their approaching death, of the torments they are to suffer, of the preparations making in order to it, of the mangling of their limbs, and of the feast that is to be made where their carcass is to be the only dish. All which they do to no other end but only to extort some gentle or submissive word from them, or to frighten them so as to make them run away, to obtain this advantage that they were terrified, and that their constancy was shaken; and indeed, if rightly taken, it is in this point only that a true victory consists. . . .

But to return to my story: these prisoners are so far from discovering the least weakness, for all the terrors that can be represented to them, that, on the contrary, during the two or three months they are kept they always appear with a cheerful countenance; importune their masters to make haste to bring them to the test, defy, rail at them, and reproach them with cowardice and the number of battles they have lost against those of their country. I have a song made by one of these prisoners, wherein he bids them 'come all, and dine upon him and welcome, for they shall withal eat their own fathers and grandfathers whose flesh has served to feed and nourish him. These muscles,' says he, 'this flesh and these veins, are your own: poor silly souls as you are, you little think that the substance of your ancestors' limbs is here yet; notice what you eat, and you will find in it the taste of your own flesh:' in which song there is to be observed an invention that nothing relishes of the barbarian. Those that paint these people dying after this manner represent the prisoner spitting in the faces of his executioners and making wry mouths at them. And 'tis most certain that to the very last gasp they never cease to brave and defy them both in word and gesture. In plain truth, these men are very savage in comparison of us; of necessity, they must either be absolutely so or else we are savages; for there is a vast difference betwixt their manners and ours.

The men there have several wives, and so much the greater number, by how much they have the greater reputation for valor. And it is one very remarkable feature in their marriages, that the same jealousy our wives have to hinder and divert us from the friendship and familiarity of other women, those employ to promote their husbands' desires, and to procure them many spouses; for being above all things solicitous of their husbands' honor, 'tis their chiefest care to seek out and to bring in the most companions they can, forasmuch as it is a testimony of the husband's virtue. Most of our ladies will cry out that 'tis monstrous, whereas in truth, it is not so, but a truly matrimonial virtue, and of the highest form. In the Bible, Sarah, with Leah and Rachel, the two wives of Jacob, gave the most beautiful of their handmaids to their husbands; Livia preferred the passions of Augustus to her own interest; and the wife of King Deiotarus, Stratonice, did not only give up a fair young maid that served her to her husband's embraces, but moreover carefully brought up the children he had by her, and assisted them in the succession to their father's crown.

And that it may not be supposed that all this is done by a simple and servile obligation to their common practise, or by any authoritative impression of their ancient custom, without judgment or reasoning and from having a soul so stupid that it cannot contrive what else to do, I must here give you some touches of their sufficiency in point of understanding. Beside what I repeated to you before, which was one of their songs of war, I have another, a love-song, that began thus: 'Stay, adder, stay, that by thy pattern my sister may draw the fashion and work of a rich ribbon that I may present to my beloved, by which means thy beauty and the excellent order of thy scales shall for ever be preferred before all other serpents.' Wherein the first couplet, 'Stay, adder,' &c., makes the burden of the song. Now I have conversed enough with poetry to judge thus much that not only there is nothing of barbarous in this invention, but, moreover, that it is perfectly Anacreontic. To which may be added, that their language is soft, of a pleasing accent, and something bordering on the Greek terminations.

Three of these people, not foreseeing how dear their knowledge of the corruptions of this part of the world will one day cost their happiness and repose, and that the effect of this commerce will be their ruin, as I presuppose it is in a very fair way (miserable men to suffer themselves to be deluded with desire of novelty and to have left the serenity of their own heaven to come so far to gaze at ours!) were at Rouen at the time that the late king Charles IX. was there. The king himself talked to them a good while, and they were made to see our fashions, our pomp, and the form of a great city. After which, someone asked their opinion and would know of them what of all the things they had seen, they found most to be admired? To which they made answer, three things, of which I have forgotten the third, and am troubled at it, but two I yet remember. They said that in the first place they thought it very strange that so many tall men wearing beards, strong, and well armed, who were about the king ('tis like they meant the Swiss of his guard) should submit to obey a child, and that they did not rather choose out one amongst themselves to command. Secondly (they have a way of speaking in their language, to call men the half of one another), that they had observed that there were amongst us men full and crammed with all manner of commodities, whilst, in the meantime, their halves were begging at their doors, lean, and half-starved with hunger and poverty; and they thought it strange that these necessitous halves were able to suffer so great an inequality and injustice, and that they did not take the others by the throats, or set fire to their houses.

I talked to one of them a great while together, but I had so ill an interpreter, and one who was so perplexed by his own ignorance to apprehend my meaning, that I could get nothing out of him of any moment. Asking him, what advantage he reaped from the superiority he had amongst his own people (for he was a captain, and our mariners called him king), he told me: to march at the head of them to war. Demanding of him further, how many men he had to follow him, he showed me a space of ground to signify as many as could march in such a compass, which might be four or five thousand men; and putting the question to him, whether or no his authority expired with the war, he told me this remained: that when he went to visit the villages of his dependence, they planned him paths through the thick of their woods, by which he might pass at his ease. All this does not sound very ill, and the last was not at all amiss, for they wear no breeches.

OF REPENTANCE

FROM BOOK III, CHAPTER 2

For my own part, I may desire in general to be other than I am; I may condemn and dislike my whole form, and beg of Almighty God for an entire reformation, and that He will please to pardon my natural infirmity; but I ought not to call this repentance, methinks, no more than the being dissatisfied that I am not an angel or Cato. My actions are regular and conformable with what I am and to my condition; I can do no better; and repentance does not properly touch things that are not in our power; sorrow does. I imagine an infinite number of natures more elevated and regular than mine; and yet I do not for all that improve my faculties, no more than my arm or will grow more strong and vigorous for conceiving those of another to be so. If to conceive and wish a nobler way of acting than that we have should produce a repentance of our own, we must then repent us of our most innocent actions, forasmuch as we may well suppose that in a more excellent nature they would have been carried on with greater dignity and perfection; and we would that ours were so. When I reflect upon the deportments of my youth, with that of my old age, I find that I have commonly behaved myself with equal order in both, according to what I understand; this is all that my resistance can do. I do not flatter myself; in the same circumstances I should do the same things. It is not a patch but rather a universal tincture with which I am stained. I know no repentance, superficial, half-way, and ceremonious; it must sting me all over before I can call it so, and must prick my bowels as deeply and universally as God sees into me.

As to business, many excellent opportunities have escaped me for want of good management; and yet my deliberations were sound enough, according to the occurrences presented to me; 'tis their way to choose always the easiest and safest course. I find that, in my former resolves, I have proceeded with discretion, according to my own rule and according to the state of the subject proposed, and should do the same a thousand years hence in like occasions; I do not consider what it is now, but what it was then, when I deliberated on it; the force of all counsel consists in the time: occasions and things eternally shift and change. I have in my life committed some important errors, not for want of good understanding, but for want of good luck. There are secret and not to be foreseen parts in matters we have in hand, especially in the nature of men; mute conditions that make no show, unknown sometimes even to the possessors themselves, that spring and start up by incidental occasions; if my prudence could not penetrate into nor foresee them, I blame it not: 'tis commissioned no further than its own limits; if the event be too hard for me, and take the side I have refused, there is no remedy; I do not blame myself, I accuse my fortune, and not my work; this cannot be called repentance.

Phocion, having given the Athenians an advice that was not followed, and the affair nevertheless succeeding contrary to his opinion, someone said to him: 'Well, Phocion, art thou content that matters go so well?' 'I am very well content,' replied he, 'that this has happened so well, but I do not repent that I counseled the other.' When any of my friends address themselves to me for advice, I give it candidly and clearly, without sticking, as almost all other men do, at the hazard of the thing's falling out contrary to my opinion, and that I may be reproached for my counsel; I am very indifferent as to that, for the fault will be theirs for having consulted me, and I could not refuse them that office.

I, for my own part, can rarely blame anyone but myself for my oversights and misfortunes, for indeed I seldom solicit the advice of another, if not by honor of ceremony, or excepting where I stand in need of information, special science, or as to matter of fact. But in things wherein I stand in need of nothing but judgment, other men's reasons may serve to fortify my own, but have little power to dissuade me; I hear them all with civility and patience; but, to my recollection, I never made use of any but my own. With me, they are but flies and atoms, that confound and distract my will; I lay no great stress upon my opinions; but I lay as little upon those of others, and fortune rewards me accordingly; if I receive but little advice, I also give but little. I am seldom consulted, and still more seldom believed, and know no concern, either public or private, that has been mended or bettered by my advice. Even they whom fortune had in some sort tied to my direction have more willingly suffered themselves to be governed by any other counsels than mine. And as a man who am as jealous of my repose as of my authority, I am better pleased that it should be so; in leaving me there they honor what I profess, which is to settle and wholly contain myself within myself. I take a pleasure in being uninterested in other men's affairs and disengaged from being their warranty and responsible for what they do.

In all affairs that are past, be it how it will, I have very little regret; for this imagination puts me out of my pain, that they were so to fall out; they are in the great revolution of the world and in the chain of stoical causes; your fancy cannot, by wish and imagination, move one tittle but that the great current of things will not reverse both the past and the future.

As to the rest, I abominate that incidental repentance which old age brings along with it. He who said of old that he was obliged to his age for having weaned him from pleasure, was of another opinion than I am; I can never think myself beholden to impotency, for any good it can do to me; 'Nec tam aversa unquam videbitur ab opere suo providentia, ut debilitas inter optima inventa sit.' ['Nor can Providence ever be seen so averse to her own work, that debility should be ranked amongst the best things.'] Our appetites are rare in old age; a profound satiety seizes us after the act; in this I see nothing of conscience; chagrin and weakness imprint in us a drowsy and rheumatic virtue. We must not suffer ourselves to be so wholly carried away by natural alterations as to suffer our judgments to be imposed upon by them. Youth and pleasure have not formerly so far prevailed with me that I did not well enough discern the face of vice in pleasure; neither does the distaste that years have brought me so far prevail with me now that I cannot discern pleasure in vice. Now that I am no more in my flourishing age, I judge as well of these things as if I were. I, who narrowly and strictly examine it, find my reason the very same it was in my most licentious age, except, perhaps, that 'tis weaker and more decayed by being grown older; and I find that the pleasure it refuses me upon the account of my bodily health, it would no more refuse now, in consideration of the health of my soul, than at any time heretofore. I do not repute it the more valiant for not being able to combat; my temptations are so broken and mortified that they are not worth its opposition; holding but out my hands, I repel them. Should one present the old concupiscence before it, I fear it would have less power to resist it than heretofore; I do not discern that in itself it judges anything otherwise now than it formerly did, nor that it has acquired any new light; wherefore, if there be convalescence, 'tis an enchanted one.

Miserable kind of remedy, to owe one's health to one's disease! 'Tis not that our misfortune should perform this office but the good fortune of our judgment. I am not to be made to do anything by persecutions and afflictions but to curse them; that is for people who cannot be roused but by a whip. My reason is much more free in prosperity, and much more distracted and put to it to digest pains than pleasures: I see best in a clear sky; health admonishes me more cheerfully, and to better purpose, than sickness. I did all that in me lay to reform and regulate myself from pleasures at a time when I had health and vigor to enjoy them; I should be ashamed and envious that the misery and misfortune of my old age should have credit over my good, healthful, sprightly, and vigorous years; and that men should estimate me, not by what I have been, but by what I have ceased to be.

In my opinion, 'tis the happy living, and not (as Antisthenes said) the happy dying, in which human felicity consists. I have not made it my business to make a monstrous addition of a philosopher's tail to the head and body of a libertine; nor would I have this wretched remainder give the lie to the pleasant, sound, and long part of my life: I would present myself uniformly throughout. Were I to live my life over again, I should live it just as I have lived it; I neither complain of the past, nor do I fear the future; and if I am not much deceived, I am the same within that I am without. 'Tis one main obligation I have to my fortune, that the succession of my bodily estate has been carried on according to the natural seasons; I have seen the grass, the blossom, and the fruit, and now see the withering,—happily, however, because naturally. I bear the infirmities I have the better, because they came not till I had reason to expect them, and because also they make me with greater pleasure remember that long felicity of my past life. My wisdom may have been just the same in both ages, but it was more active, and of better grace whilst young and sprightly than now it is when broken, peevish, and uneasy. I repudiate, then, these casual and painful reformations. God must touch our hearts; our consciences must amend of themselves by the aid of our reason and not by the decay of our appetites; pleasure is, in itself, neither pale nor discolored, to be discerned by dim and decayed eyes.

We ought to love temperance for itself, and because God has commanded that and chastity; but that which we are reduced to by catarrhs, and for which I am indebted to the stone, is neither chastity nor temperance; a man cannot boast that he despises and resists pleasure, if he cannot see it, if he knows not what it is, and cannot discern its graces, its force, and most alluring beauties; I know both the one and the other, and may therefore the better say it. But methinks our souls, in old age, are subject to more troublesome maladies and imperfections than in youth; I said the same when young and when I was reproached with the want of a beard; and I say so now that my grey hairs give me some authority. We call the difficulty of our humors and the disrelish of present things wisdom; but, in truth, we do not forsake vices as we change them, and, in my opinion, for worse. Beside a foolish and feeble pride, an impertinent prating, forward and insociable humors, superstition, and a ridiculous desire of riches when we have lost the use of them, I find there more envy, injustice, and malice. Age imprints more wrinkles in the mind than it does on the face; and souls are never or very rarely seen that in growing old do not smell sour and musty. Man moves all together, both toward his perfection and decay. In observing the wisdom of Socrates and many circumstances of his condemnation, I should dare to believe that he in some sort himself purposely, by collusion, contributed to it, seeing that, at the age of seventy years, he might fear to suffer the lofty notions of his mind to be cramped and his wonted luster obscured. What strange metamorphoses do I see age every day make in many of my acquaintance! 'Tis a potent malady, and that naturally and imperceptibly steals into us; a vast provision of study and great precaution are required to evade the imperfections it loads us with, or at least, to weaken their progress. I find that, notwithstanding all my entrenchments, it gets foot by foot upon me; I make the best resistance I can, but I do not know to what at last it will reduce me. But fall out what will, I am content the world may know, when I am fallen, from what I fell.

OF INTERCOURSE WITH BOOKS

FROM BOOK III, CHAPTER 3

These two commerces [of friendship and love] are fortuitous, and depending upon others; the one is troublesome by its rarity, the other withers with age, so that they could never have been sufficient for the business of my life. That of books, which is the third, is much more certain, and much more our own. It yields all other advantages to the two first, but has the constancy and facility of its service for its own share. It goes side by side with me in my whole course, and everywhere is assisting me; it comforts me in my old age and solitude; it eases me of a troublesome weight of idleness, and delivers me at all hours from company that I dislike; it blunts the point of griefs, if they are not extreme, and have not got an entire possession of my soul. To divert myself from a troublesome fancy, 'tis but to run to my books; they presently fix me to them and drive the other out of my thoughts; and do not mutiny at seeing that I have only recourse to them for want of other more real, natural, and lively commodities; they always receive me with the same kindness.

He may well go afoot, they say, who leads his horse in his hand; and our James, king of Naples and Sicily, who, handsome, young and healthful, caused himself to be carried about on a barrow, extended upon a pitiful mattress in a poor robe of grey cloth and a cap of the same, but attended withal by a royal train of litters, led horses of all sorts, gentlemen and officers, did yet herein represent a tender and unsteady authority: 'The sick man is not to be pitied who has his cure in his sleeve.' In the experience and practise of this maxim, which is a very true one, consists all the benefit I reap from books; and yet I make as little use of them, almost, as those who know them not: I enjoy them as a miser doth his money, in knowing that I may enjoy them when I please; my mind is satisfied with this right of possession. I never travel without books, either in peace or war; and yet sometimes I pass over several days, and sometimes months, without looking on them; I will read by-and-by, say I to myself, or tomorrow, or when I please; and in the interim, time steals away without any inconvenience. For it is not to be imagined to what degree I please myself and rest content in this consideration, that I have them by me to divert myself with them when I am so disposed, and to call to mind what a refreshment they are to my life. 'Tis the best viaticum I have yet found out for this human journey, and I very much pity those men of understanding who are unprovided of it. I the rather accept of any other sort of diversion, how light soever, because this can never fail me.

When at home, I a little more frequent my library, whence I overlook at once all the concerns of my family. 'Tis situated at the entrance into my house, and I thence see under me my garden, court, and base-court, and almost all parts of the building. There I turn over now one book, and then another, on various subjects, without method or design. One while I meditate, another I record and dictate, as I walk to and fro, such whimsies as these I present to you here. 'Tis in the third storey of a tower, of which the ground room is my chapel, the second storey a chamber with a withdrawing-room and closet, where I often lie, to be more retired; and above is a great wardrobe. This formerly was the most useless part of the house. I there pass away both most of the days of my life and most of the hours of those days. In the night I am never there. There is by the side of it a cabinet handsome enough, with a fireplace very commodiously contrived, and plenty of light; and were I not more afraid of the trouble than the expense—the trouble that frights me from all business—I could very easily adjoin on either side, and on the same floor, a gallery of a hundred paces long and twelve broad, having found walls already raised, for some other design, to the requisite height. Every place of retirement requires a walk: my thoughts sleep if I sit still; my fancy does not go by itself, as when my legs move it; and all those who study without a book are in the same condition.

The figure of my study is round, and there is no more open wall than what is taken up by my table and my chair, so that the remaining parts of the circle present me a view of all my books at once, ranged upon five rows of shelves round about me. It has three noble and free prospects, and is sixteen paces in diameter. I am not so continually there in the winter; for my house is built upon an eminence, as its name imports, and no part of it is so much exposed to the wind and weather as this, which pleases me the better, as being of more difficult access and a little remote, as well upon the account of exercise, as also being there more retired from the crowd. 'Tis there that I am in my kingdom, and there I endeavor to make myself an absolute monarch, and to sequester this one corner from all society, conjugal, filial, and civil; elsewhere I have but verbal authority only, and of a confused essence. That man, in my opinion, is very miserable, who has not at home where to be by himself, where to entertain himself alone, or to conceal himself from others. Ambition sufficiently plagues her proselytes, by keeping them always in show, like the statue of a public square: 'Magna servitus est magna fortuna.' ['A great fortune is a great slavery.'] They cannot so much as be private in the water-closet. I have thought nothing so severe in the austerity of life that our monks affect as what I have observed in some of their communities; namely, by rule to have a perpetual society of place and numerous persons present in every action whatever; and think it much more supportable to be always alone than never to be so.

If anyone shall tell me that it is to undervalue the Muses, to make use of them only for sport and to pass away the time, I shall tell him that he does not know, so well as I, the value of the sport, the pleasure, and the pastime; I can hardly forbear to add that all other end is ridiculous. I live from hand to mouth, and, with reverence be it spoken, I only live for myself; there all my designs terminate. I studied, when young, for ostentation; since, to make myself a little wiser; and now for my diversion, but never for any profit. A vain and prodigal humor I had after this sort of furniture, not only for the supplying my own need, but, moreover, for ornament and outward show, I have since quite cured myself of.

Books have many charming qualities to such as know how to choose them; but every good has its ill; 'tis a pleasure that is not pure and clean, no more than others; it has its inconveniences, and great ones too. The soul indeed is exercised therein; but the body, the care of which I must withal never neglect, remains in the meantime without action, and grows heavy and somber. I know no excess more prejudicial to me, nor more to be avoided in this my declining age.

These have been my three favorite and particular occupations; I speak not of those I owe to the world by civil obligation.

TASSO (1544-1595)

Torquato Tasso's father was a poet and secretary to the Prince of Salerno. Educated first by the Jesuits at Naples and afterwards at the University of Padua, the younger Tasso showed his poetic abilities by the composition of the Rinaldo, an epic poem in twelve cantos, printed at Venice in 1562 and dedicated to the Cardinal d'Este, who later established Tasso at the court of his brother Alfonso II, Duke of Ferrara. In the cardinal's suite, Tasso visited Paris in 1571, and made acquaintance with Ronsard, then leading poet of the French court. His pastoral play, the Aminia, was produced at Ferrara, in 1573, and his great epic, the Jerusalem Delivered, was finished in 1575. Always of a melancholy, jealous, and suspicious disposition, he became subject to hallucinations and from 1579 to 1586 was confined in a hospital, but there seems to be no historical foundation for the story used by Goethé in his drama, Torquato Tasso, that the poet was imprisoned by the reigning Duke on account of a mad passion for the Duke's sister Leonora. After his release he retired to Mantua and then to Naples, whence he was called to Rome by the Pope to be crowned with laurel in the capitol as Petrarch had been, but the poet died while the preparations for the ceremony were in progress.

The twenty books or cantos of the Jerusalem Delivered are conceived in an entirely different spirit from the epic of Tasso's great predecessor, Ariosto. Tasso, deeply religious by temperament and training, took as his subject the recovery of the holy city of Jerusalem by the French Crusader Godfrey, Duke of Lorraine, in 1099, and gathered together all his episodes in subordination to this central theme, while the lighter-hearted Ariosto allowed his wit and fancy to roam at will. As a work of art, the Jerusalem Delivered is better planned, but it lacks the verve and charm of the Orlando Furioso.

Edward Fairfax, whose translation of the Jerusalem Delivered is here used, was born at Leeds in the North of England, and like his contemporary, Edmund Spenser, who had also northern connections, retained in his verse some archaic and dialectal forms which suggest a certain flavor of antiquity. Fairfax published his translation in 1600 with a dedication to Queen Elizabeth, and its position as the standard English version of Tasso's famous epic has never been disputed.

ARMIDA'S WILES

CANTO IV, STANZAS 20-96

The town Damascus and the lands about
 Ruled Hidraort, a wizard grave and sage,
 Acquainted well with all the damnéd rout
 Of Pluto's reign, even from his tender age;
 Yet of this war he could not figure out ⁵
 The wishéd ending, or success presage;
 For neither stars above, nor powers of hell,
 Nor skill, nor art, nor charm, nor devil could tell.

And yet he thought, O vain conceit of man!
 Which as thou wishest judgest things to come, ¹⁰
 That the French host to sure destruction ran,
 Condemnéd quite by heaven's eternal doom;

He thinks no force withstand or vanquish can
 Th' Egyptian strength, and therefore would that some,
 Both of the prey and glory of the fight, ¹⁵
 Upon his Syrian folk should haply light.
 But for he held the Frenchmen's worth in
 prise,
 And feared the doubtful gain of bloody war,
 He, that was closely false and slyly wise,
 Cast how he might annoy them most from far: ²⁰
 And as he 'gan upon this point devise,
 (As counselors in ill still nearest are),
 At hand was Satan, ready ere men need,
 If once they think to make them do the deed.

He counseled him how best to hunt his game, 25
What dart to cast, what net, what toil to pitch:

A niece he had, a nice and tender dame,
Peerless in wit, in nature's blessings rich,
To all deceit she could her beauty frame,
False, fair and young, a virgin and a witch; 30
To her he told the sum of this emprise,
And praised her thus, for she was fair and
wise:

'My dear, who underneath these locks of gold,
And native brightness of thy lovely hue,
Hidest grave thoughts, ripe wit, and wisdom
old, 35
More skill than I in all mine arts untrue,
To thee my purpose great I must enfold,
This enterprise thy cunning must pursue,
Weave thou to end this web which I begin,
I will the distaff hold, come thou and spin.' 40

Go to the Christians' host and there assay
All subtle sleights that women use in love,
Shed brinish tears, sob, sigh, entreat and pray,
Wring thy fair hands, cast up thine eyes
above,
For mourning beauty hath much power, men
say, 45
The stubborn hearts with pity frail to move;
Look pale for dread and blush sometime for shame,
In seeming troth thy lies will soonest frame.

Take with the bait Lord Godfrey, if thou may'st
Frame snares of looks, trains of alluring
speech; 50
For if he love, the conquest then thou hast:
Thus purposed war thou may'st with each impeach;
Else lead the other Lords to deserts waste,
And hold them slaves far from their leader's reach.
Thus taught he her, and for conclusion
saith, 55
'All things are lawful for our lands and faith.'

The sweet Armida took this charge on hand,
A tender piece, for beauty, sex and age.
The sun was sunken underneath the land
When she began her wanton pilgrimage; 60
In silken weeds she trusteth to withstand,
And conquer knights in warlike equipage.

Of their night-ambuling dame the Syrians prated,
Some good, some bad, as they her loved or hated.

Within few days the Nymph arrivéd there, 65
Where puissant Godfrey had his tents
ypight;
Upon her strange attire, and visage clear,
Gazéd each soldier, gazéd every knight:
As when a comet doth in skies appear,
The people stand amazéd at the light, 70
So wondered they, and each at other sought,
What mister wight she was, and whence ybrought.

Yet never eye to Cupid's service vowed
Beheld a face of such a lovely pride;
A tinsel veil her amber locks did shroud, 75
That strove to cover what it could not hide;
The golden sun, behind a silver cloud,
So streameth out his beams on every side;
The marble goddess, set at Cnidos naked,
She seemed, were she unclothed, or that awakéd. 80

The gamesome wind among her tresses plays,
And curleth up those growing riches short;
Her spareful eye to spread his beams denays,
But keeps his shot where Cupid keeps his fort;
The rose and lily on her cheek assays 85
To paint true fairness out in bravest sort;
Her lips, where blooms nought but the single rose,
Still blush, for still they kiss while still they
close.

Her breasts, two hills o'erspread with purest snow,
Sweet, smooth and supple, soft and gently
swelling, 90
Between them lies a milken dale below,
Where love, youth, gladness, whiteness
make their dwelling;
Her breasts half hid and half were laid to
show;
Her envious vesture greedy sight repel'ing:
So was the wanton clad, as if thus much 95
Should please the eye, the rest unseen the touch.

As when the sun-beams dive through Tagus'
wave,
To spy the store-house of his springing
gold,

Love-piercing thought so through her mantle
drave, 99

And in her gentle bosom wandered bold:
It viewed the wondrous beauty virgins have,
And all too fond desire with vantage told:
Alas! what hope is left to quench his fire,
That kindled is by sight, blown by desire.

Thus passed she, praised, wished and wondered at, 105

Among the troops who there encampéd lay,
She smiled for joy, but well dissembled that
Her greedy eye chose out her wishéd prey;
On all her gestures seeming virtue sat,
Toward the imperial tent she asked the
way: 110

With that she met a bold and lovesome
knight,
Lord Godfrey's youngest brother, Eustace hight.

This was the fowl that first fell in the snare,
He saw her fair, and hoped to find her kind;

The throne of Cupid hath an easy stair, 115
His bark is fit to sail with every wind,
The breach he makes no wisdom can repair.
With reverence meet the baron low inclined,

And thus his purpose to the virgin told,
For youth, use, nature, all had made him
bold: 120

Lady, if thee beseem a style so low,
In whose sweet looks such sacred beauties shine,

For never yet did heaven such grace bestow
On any daughter born of Adam's line,
Thy name let us, though far unworthy,
know, 125

Unfold thy will, and whence thou art in fine,

Lest my audacious boldness learn too late,
What honors due become thy high estate.'

'Sir knight,' quoth she, 'your praises reach too high

Above her merit you commendén so, 130
A hapless maid I am, both born to die
And dead to joy, that livè in care and woe,
A virgin helpless, fugitive pardie,

My native soil and kingdom thus foregoe
To seek Duke Godfrey's aid, such store men
tell 135

Of virtuous ruth doth in his bosom dwell.

Conduct me then that mighty Duke before,
If you be courteous, sir, as well you seem.'

'Content,' quoth he; 'since of one womb
ybore,

We brothers are, your fortune good esteem 140

T' encounter me, whose word prevaiileth more
In Godfrey's hearing than you haply deem,
Mine aid I grant and his I promise too,
All that his scepter, or my sword, can do.'

He led her easily forth when this was said,
Where Godfrey sat among his lords and peers; 146

She reverence did, then blushed as one dismayed

To speak, for secret wants and inward fears;

It seemed a bashful shame her speeches stayed.

At last the courteous Duke her gently
cheers; 150

Silence was made, and she began her tale,
They sit to hear, thus sung the nightingale:

'Victorious Prince, whose honorable name
Is held so great among our pagan kings,
That to those lands thou dost by conquest tame, 155

That thou hast won them some content it brings;

Well known to all is thy immortal fame,
The earth thy worth, thy foe thy praises
sings,

And Painims wrongéd come to seek thine aid,
So doth thy virtue, so thy power persuade. 160

And I, though bred in Macon's heathenish
lore,

Which thou oppressest with thy puissant
might,

Yet trust thou wilt an helpless maid restore,
And repossess her in her father's right:
Others in their distress do aid implore 165

Of kin and friends; but I in this sad plight
Invoke thy help my kingdom to invade,
So doth thy virtue, so my need persuade.

In thee I hope, thy succors I invoke,
To win the crown whence I am dispos-
sessed; 170

For like renown awaiteth on the stroke
To cast the haughty down, or raise the oppressed;

Nor greater glory brings a scepter broke,
Than doth deliverance of a maid distressed:

And since thou canst at will perform the
thing, 175

More is thy praise to make, than kill a king.

But if thou would'st thy succors due excuse,
 Because in Christ I have no hope nor trust,
 Ah! yet for virtue's sake thy virtue use; 179
 Who scorneth gold because it lies in dust?
 Be witness, heaven, if thou to grant refuse,
 Thou dost forsake a maid in cause most just,
 And for thou shalt at large my fortunes
 know,
 I will my wrongs, and their great treasons
 show.

Prince Arbilan, that reignéd in his life 185
 On fair Damascus, was my noble sire,
 Born of mean race he was, yet got to wife
 The Queen Chariclia, such was the fire
 Of her hot love, but soon the fatal knife
 Had cut the thread that kept their joys entire, 190
 For so mishap her cruel lot had cast,
 My birth, her death, my first day was her last.

And ere five years were fully come and gone
 Since his dear spouse to hasty death did yield,
 My father also died, consumed with moan, 195
 And sought his love amid the Elysian field,
 His crown and me, poor orphan, left alone.
 Mine uncle governed in my tender eild;
 For well he thought, if mortal men have
 faith,
 In brother's breast true love his mansion
 hath. 200

He took the charge of me, and of the crown,
 And with kind shows of love so brought to pass,
 That through Damascus great report was blown
 How good, how just, how kind mine uncle was; 204
 Whether he kept his wicked hate unknown,
 And hid the serpent in the flowering grass,
 Or that true faith did in his bosom won,
 Because he meant to match me with his son.

Which son, within short while, did undertake Degree of knighthood, as besemed him well, 210
 Yet never durst he for his lady's sake
 Break sword or lance, advanced in lofty cell:

As fair he was as Citherea's make,
 As proud as he that signoriseeth hell,
 In fashions wayward, and in love unkind, 215
 For Cupid deigns not wound a currish mind.

This paragon should Queen Armida wed,
 A goodly swain to be a Princess' pheer,
 A lovely partner of a lady's bed,
 A noble head a golden crown to wear! 220
 His glosing sire his errand daily said,
 And sugared speeches whispered in mine
 ear,
 To make me take this darling in mine
 arms,
 But still the adder stopped her ears from charms.

At last he left me with a troubled grace, 225
 Through which transparent was his inward spite;
 Methought I read the story in his face
 Of these mishaps that on me since have light.
 Since that, foul spirits haunt my resting
 place,
 And ghastly visions break my sleep by
 night; 230
 Grief, horror, fear, my fainting soul did kill,
 For so my mind foreshowed my coming ill.

Three times the shape of my dear mother came,
 Pale, sad, dismayed, to warn me in my
 dream:
 Alas! how far transforméd from the same,
 Whose eyes shone erst like Titan's glorious beam. 236
 "Daughter," she says, "fly, fly, behold thy dame
 Foreshows the treasons of thy wretched
 eame,
 Who poison 'gainst thy harmless life provides." 239
 This said, to shapeless air unseen she glides.

But what avails high walls or bulwarks strong,
 Where fainting cowards have the peece to guard?
 My sex too weak, mine age was all too young,
 To undertake alone a work so hard;
 To wander wild the desert woods among, 245
 A banished maid, of wonted ease debarred,
 So grievous seemed, that leifer were my death,
 And there to expire where first I drew my breath.

I fearéd deadly evil if long I stayed, 249
 And yet to fly had neither will nor power;
 Nor durst my heart declare it waxed afraid,
 Lest so I hasten might my dying hour:

Thus restless waited I, unhappy maid!
 What hand should first pluck up my springing flower;
 Even as the wretch, condemned to lose his life, ²⁵⁵
 Awaits the falling of the murdering knife.

In these extremes (for so my fortune would Perchance preserve me to my further ill),
 One of my noble father's servants old,
 That for his goodness bore his child good will, ²⁶⁰
 With store of tears this treason 'gan unfold,
 And said, my guardian would his pupil kill;
 And that himself, if promise made he kept,
 Should give me poison dire ere next I slept.

And further told me, if I wished to live, ²⁶⁵
 I must convey myself by secret flight;
 And offered then all succors he could give
 To aid his mistress, banished from her right.
 His words of comfort fear to exile drive,
 The dread of death made lesser dangers light: ²⁷⁰
 So we concluded, when the shadows dim
 Obscured the earth, I should depart with him.

Of close escapes the aged patroness,
 Blacker than erst, her sable mantle spread,
 When with two trusty maids in great distress, ²⁷⁵
 Both from mine uncle and my realm I fled.
 Oft looked I back, but hardly could suppress Those streams of tears mine eyes incessant
 shed;
 For when I looked on my kingdom lost,
 It was a grief, a death, an hell almost. ²⁸⁰

My steeds drew on the burden of my limbs,
 But still my looks, my thoughts, drew back
 as fast;
 So fare the men that, from the haven's brims,
 Far out to sea by sudden storm are cast.
 Swift o'er the grass the rolling chariot
 swims, ²⁸⁵
 Through ways unknown, all night, all day,
 we haste;
 At last, nigh tired, a castle strong we fand,
 The utmost border of my native land;

The fort Arontes was, for so the knight
 Was called that my deliverance thus had wrought. ²⁹⁰
 But when the tyrant saw, by mature flight
 I had escaped the treasons of his thought,

The rage increased in the cursed wight,
 'Gainst me, and him that me to safety
 brought;
 And us accused, we would have poisoned ²⁹⁵
 Him; but descried, to save our lives we fled:

And that, in lieu of his approved truth,
 To poison him I hired had my guide;
 That he dispatched, mine unbridled youth
 Might range at will, in no subjection tied,
 And that each night I slept (O foul untruth!) ³⁰¹
 Mine honor lost, by this Arontes' side;—
 But heaven I pray send down revenging fire,
 When so base love shall change my chaste desire!

Not that he sitteth on my regal throne, ³⁰⁵
 Nor that he thirst to drink my lukewarm
 blood,
 So grieveth me as this despite alone,
 That my renown, which ever blameless
 stood,
 Hath lost the light wherewith it always shone.
 With forged lies he makes his tale so good, ³¹⁰
 And holds my subjects' hearts in such suspense,
 That none take armor for their Queen's defense.

And though he doth my regal throne possess,
 Clothed in purple, crowned with burnished
 gold;
 Yet in his hate, his rancor, ne'er the less, ³¹⁵
 Since nought assuageth malice when 'tis
 old:
 He threatens to burn Arontes' forteress,
 And murder him unless he yield the hold;
 And me and mine threats not with war, but
 death;
 Thus causeless hatred endless is uneth. ³²⁰

And so he trusts to wash away the stain,
 And hide his shameful fact with mine offence;
 And saith he will restore the throne again,
 To its late honor and due excellence;
 And therefore would I should be algates slain, ³²⁵
 For while I live his right is in suspense.
 This is the cause my guiltless life is sought,
 For on my ruin is his safety wrought.

And let the tyrant have his heart's desire,
 Let him perform the cruelty he meant, ³³⁰

My guiltless blood must quench the ceaseless fire,
On which my endless tears were bootless
spent,
Unless thou help. To thee, renowned sire,
I fly, a virgin, orphan, innocent;
And let these tears that on thy feet distill, 335
Redeem the drops of blood he thirsts to spill.

By these thy glorious feet that tread secure
On necks of tyrants, by thy conquests brave,
By that right hand, and by those temples pure
Thou seekest to free from Macon's lore, I crave 340
Help for this sickness, none but thou can'st cure;
My life and kingdom let thy mercy save
From death and ruin: but in vain I prove thee,
If right, if truth, if justice cannot move thee.

Thou, who dost all thou wishest at thy will, 345
And never willest ought but what is right, Preserve this guiltless blood they seek to spill;
Thine be my kingdom, save it with thy might.
Among these captains, lords, and knights of skill,
Appoint me ten approvéd most in fight, 350
Who, with assistance of my friends and kin,
May serve my kingdom lost again to win.

For lo, a knight that hath a gate to ward,
A man of chiefest trust about his king,
Hath promised so to beguile the guard, 355
That me and mine he undertakes to bring
Safe where the tyrant haply sleepeth hard.
He counseled me to undertake this thing,
Of thee some little succor to entreat, 359
Whose name alone accomplish can the feat.'

This said, his answer did the nymph attend;
Her looks, her sighs, her gestures all did pray him;
But Godfrey wisely did his grant suspend,
He doubts the worst, and that a while did stay him;
He knows, who fears no God, he loves no friend, 365
He fears the heathen false would thus betray him:
But yet such ruth dwelt in his princely mind,
That, 'gainst his wisdom, pity made him kind.

Besides the kindness of his gentle thought,
Ready to comfort each distressed wight, 370
The maiden's offer profit with it brought;
For if the Syrian kingdom were her right,
That won, the way were easy which he sought,
To bring all Asia subject to his might;
There might he raise munition, arms, and treasure, 375
To work th' Egyptian king and his displeasure.

Thus was his noble heart long time betwixt
Fear and remorse, not granting nor denying.
Upon his eyes the dame her lookings fixed,
As if her life and death lay on his saying;
Some tears she shed, with sighs and sobbings
mixed, 381
As if her hope were dead through his delaying.
At last her earnest suit the Duke denyed,
But with sweet words thus would content the maid:—

'If not in service of our God we fought, 385
In meaner quarrel if this sword were shaken,
Well might thou gather in thy gentle thought,
So fair a Princess should not be forsaken;
But since these armies, from the world's end
brought, 389
To free this sacred town have undertaken,
It were unfit we turned our strength away,
And victory, even in her coming, stay.

I promise thee, and on my princely word
The burden of thy wish and hope repose,
That when this chosen temple of the Lord 395
Her holy doors shall to his saints unclose
In rest and peace, then this victorious sword
Shall execute due vengeance on thy foes:
But if, for pity of a worldly dame, 399
I left this work, such pity were my shame.'

At this the Princess bent her eyes to ground,
And stood unmoved, though not unmarked,
a space;
The secret bleeding of her inward wound
Shed heavenly dew upon her angel's face.
'Poor wretch,' quoth she, in tears and sorrows drowned, 405
'Death be thy peace, the grave thy resting
place,
Since such thy hap, that, lest thou mercy find,
The gentlest heart on earth is proved unkind.

Where none attends what boots it to complain?

Men's froward hearts are moved with women's tears 410

As marble stones are pierced with drops of rain;

No plaints find passage through unwilling ears.

The tyrant haply would his wrath restrain,
Heard he these prayers ruthless Godfrey hears;

Yet not thy fault is this, my chance, I see, 417
Hath made even pity pitiless in thee.

So both thy goodness and good hap denayed me,

Grief, sorrow, mischief, care, hath overthrown me,

The star that ruled my birthday hath betrayed me,

My genius sees his charge, but dares not own me; 420

Of Queen-like state my flight hath disaray'd me;

My father died ere he five years had known me;

My kingdom lost, and lastly resteth now;
Down with the tree sith broke is every bough.

And, for the modest lore of maidenhood 425

Bids me not sojourn with these armed men,
Oh! whither shall I flee? What secret wood

Shall hide me from the tyrant? Or what den,

What rock, what vault, what cave can do me good?

No, no, where death is sure, it resteth then 430

To scorn his power, and be it therefore seen,
Armida lived, and died, both like a Queen.'

With that she looked as if a proud disdain
Kindled displeasure in her noble mind;

The way she came she turned her steps again, 435

With gestures sad, but in disdainful kind;
A tempest rail'd down her cheeks amain,

With tears of woe, and sighs of anger's wind;

The drops her footsteps wash whereon she treads, 439

And seems to step on pearls or crystal beads.

Her cheeks on which this streaming nectar fell,

'Still'd through the limbeck of her diamond eyes,

The roses white and red resembled well,
Whereon the rory May-dew sprinkled lies,
When the fair morn first blusheth from her cell, 445

And breatheth balm from opened paradise:
Thus sighed, thus mourned, thus wept this lovely Queen,

And in each drop bathed a Grace unseen.

Thrice twenty Cupids unperceived flew
To gather up this liquor, ere it fall, 450

And of each drop an arrow forgéd new;
Else, as it came, snatched up the crystal ball,

And at rebellious hearts for wild-fire threw.
O wondrous love; thou makest gain of all;

For if she weeping sit, or smiling stand, 455
She bends thy bow, or kindleth else thy brand.

This forgéd plaint drew forth unfeignéd tears
From many eyes, and pierced each worthy's heart;

Each one condoleth with her that her hears,
And of her grief would help her bear the smart: 460

If Godfrey aid her not, not one but swears
Some tigress gave him suck, on roughest part,

'Midst the rude crags, on Alpine cliffs aloft:
Hard is that heart which beauty makes not soft.

But jolly Eustace, in whose breast the brand
Of love and pity kindled had the flame, 466

While others softly whispered under hand,
Before the Duke, with comely boldness, came:—

'Brother and Lord,' quoth he, 'too long you stand

In your first purpose, yet vouchsafe to frame 470

Your thoughts to ours, and lend this virgin aid.

Thanks are half lost when good turns are delayed.

And think not that Eustace's talk assays

To turn these forces from this present war,
Or that I wish you should your armies raise 475

From Zion's walls; my speech tends not so far;

But we that venture all for fame and praise,
That to no charge nor service bounden are,

Forth of our troop may ten well sparéd be
To succor her, which nought can weaken thee. 480

And know they shall in God's high service
fight,

That virgins innocent save and defend;
Dear will the spoils be in the heaven's sight
That from a tyrant's hateful head we rend:
Nor seem I forward in this lady's right, 485
With hope of gain or profit in the end;
But, for I know he arms unworthy bears,
To help a maiden's cause that shuns or fears.

Ah! be it not pardie declared in France
Or elsewhere told where courtesy is in prize, 490

That we forsook so fair a chevisance,
For doubt or fear that might from fight arise:

Else, here surrender I both sword and lance,
And swear no more to use this martial
guise;

For ill deserves he to be termed a knight, 495
That bears a blunt sword in a lady's right.'

Thus parléd he, and with confuséd sound
The rest approvéd what the gallant said.
Their General the knights encompassed
round;

With humble grace and earnest suit they
prayed. 500

'I yield,' quoth he, 'and be it happy found
What I have granted; let her have your aid;

Yours be the thanks, for yours the danger is
If aught succeed, as much I fear, amiss.

But, if with you my words may credit find,
Oh! temper then this heat misguides you
so.' 506

Thus much he said: but they with fancy
blind,

Accept his grant and let his counsel go.
What works not beauty! man's relenting
mind

Is eath to move with complaints and shows of
woe: 510

Her lips cast forth a chain of sugared words,
That captive led most of the Christian Lords.

Eustace recalled her, and bespake her thus:
'Beauty's chief darling, let these sorrows be,
For such assistance shall you find in us, 515
As with your need or will may best agree.'
With that she cheered her forehead dolorous,
And smiled for joy, that Phœbus blushed
to see;

And had she deigned her veil for to remove,
The god himself once more had fallen in love. 520

With that she broke the silence once again,
And gave the knight great thanks in little
speech;

She said she would his handmaid poor remain,

So far as honor's laws received no breach.
Her humble gestures made the residue plain,
Dumb eloquence persuading more than
speech. 526

This women know, and thus they use the guise

T' enchant the valiant, and beguile the wise.

And when she saw her enterprise had got Some wishéd mean of quick and good proceeding, 530

She thought to strike the iron that was hot;
For every action hath its hour of speeding.
Medea or false Circe changéd not

So far the shapes of men, as her eyes spreading

Altered their hearts, and with her Siren's
sound, 535

In lust their minds, their hearts in love, she drowned.

All wily sleights, that subtle women know,
Hourly she used to catch some lover new.
None kened the bent of her unsteadfast bow,
For with the time her thoughts her looks renew: 540

From some she cast her modest eyes below,
At some her gazing glances roving flew;
And while she thus pursued her wanton sport,
She spurred the slow, and reined the forward
short.

If some, as hopeless that she would be won,
Forbore to love, because they durst not move her, 546

On them her gentle looks to smile begun,
As who say, she is kind, if you dare prove her.

On every heart thus shone this lustful sun,
All strove to serve, to please, to woo, to love her; 550

And in their hearts that chaste and bashful were,

Her eye's hot glance dissolved the frost of fear.

On them, who durst with fingering bold assay
To touch the softness of her tender skin,
She looked as coy as if she list not play, 555
And made as things of worth were hard to win;

Yet tempered so her dainful looks alway
That outward scorn showed store of grace within:

Thus with false hope their longing hearts she fired, 559
For hardest gotten things are most desired.

Alone sometimes she walked in secret, where
To ruminate upon her discontent;
Within her eyelids sat the swelling tear,
Not pouréd forth, though sprung from sad lament;

And with this craft a thousand souls well near 565

In snares of foolish ruth and love she bent,
And kept as slaves; by which we fitly prove,
That witless pity breedeth fruitless love.

Sometimes, as if her hope unlooséd had
The chains of grief wherein her thoughts lay fettered, 570

Upon her minions looked she blithe and glad;
In that deceitful lore so was she lettered.
Not glorious Titan, in his brightness clad,
The sunshine of her face in luster bettered;

For when she list to cheer her beauties so, 575
She smiled away the clouds of grief and woe.

Her double charm of smiles and sugared words

Lulléd on sleep the virtue of their senses;
Reason small aid 'gainst those assaults affords,

Wisdom no warrant from those sweet offenses; 580

Cupid's deep rivers have their shallow fords,
His griefs bring joys, his losses recom-
penses;

He breeds the sore, and cures us of the pain;
Achilles' lance, that wounds and heals again.

While thus she them torments 'twixt frost and fire, 585

'Twixt joy and grief, 'twixt hope and restless fear,

The sly enchantress felt her gain the nigher;
These were her flocks that golden fleeces
bear:

But if some one durst utter his desire,
And by complaining make his griefs appear; 590

He laboréd hard rocks with complaints to move,
She had not learned the gamut then of love.

For down she bent her bashful eyes to
ground,

And donned the weed of women's modest grace;

Down from her eyes welléd the pearlés round
Upon the bright enamel of her face: 595

Such honey drops on springing flowers are found,

When Phœbus holds the crimson morn in chase:

Full seemed her looks of anger and of shame,
Yet pity shone transparent through the same. 600

If she perceivéd by his outward cheer,
That any would his love by talk bewray,
Sometimes she heard him, sometimes stopped
her ear,

And playéd fast and loose the livelong day:
Thus all her lovers kind deluded were, 605

Their earnest suit got neither yea nor nay;
But like the sort of weary huntsmen fare,
That hunt all day and lose at night the hare.

These were the arts by which she captivéd
A thousand souls of young and lusty knights; 610

These were the arms wherewith love conqueréd

Their feeble hearts subdued in wanton fighths.

What wonder if Achilles were misled,
Or great Alcides, at their ladies' sights,
Since these true champions of the Lord
above 615

Were thralls to beauty, yielden slaves to love.

CERVANTES (1547-1616)

Miguel de Cervantes was born at Alcala in Spain and fought as a soldier in the naval battle of Lepanto, in which the combined Christian forces defeated the Turks in 1571. Although severely wounded in the left hand, he continued in the Spanish service, and on his way home three years later had the misfortune to be captured by Algerian pirates; it was not until 1580 that his family succeeded in raising the modest sum required for his ransom. He entered the civil service and had a share in the outfitting of the Spanish Armada. His attempts to gain fame and fortune on the stage had no success, and a pastoral romance he wrote was as great a failure as his plays. He was at the lowest ebb of his fortunes—in fact, in prison—when he conceived the idea of 'Don Quixote.'

Medieval romance had been as popular in Spain as in the rest of Europe, and in spite of the predominance of the new learning, the old stories of knightly adventure took a long time in dying. Cervantes conducted them to an honorable grave and at the same time laid the foundations of the modern novel, in which the element of satire is seldom altogether absent. The first part of Don Quixote (1605), with its genial spirit and rich, kindly humor, commanded immediate success; Cervantes appreciated the spirit of medieval chivalry, as it had been idealized in the later romances, but he saw that its achievements had been exaggerated, and that its forms were not suited to the modern world of commerce and industry. With the high-minded and good-hearted, long and lean hero, whose head is filled with the outworn ideals and absurd exploits of romance, Cervantes contrasted the matter-of-fact, stocky figure of Sancho Panza, whose guide in life is the practical wisdom of popular proverbs and the teaching of experience.

Before his death Cervantes succeeded in completing his greatest work and published also a collection of shorter tales, the Novelas Exemplares, which were exceedingly popular in Spain, though they have not won the worldwide reputation of Don Quixote. The latter, translated into every European language, took a firm hold on the popular imagination and has not lost its charm, presenting, as it does, the eternal contrast between the claims of the ideal and the necessity of adjusting these to the practical necessities of every-day life.

A few years before the death of Cervantes, Don Quixote suggested to Beaumont and Fletcher the subject of their play The Knight of the Burning Pestle, in which the place of the chivalrous hero is taken by a London apprentice. Shelton's translation of the First Part appeared in 1612, and there followed eighteenth century versions by Motteux, Jervas, Smollett and others. There are more modern and exact translations by Duffield, and by Ormsby, of which the last is generally accounted the best and is here used.

DON QUIXOTE RELATES HIS ACHIEVEMENTS

FROM PART II, CHAPTER 16

As they were engaged in this conversation they were overtaken by a man who was following the same road behind them, mounted on a very handsome flea-bitten mare, and dressed in a gaban of fine green cloth, with tawny velvet facings, and a montera of the same velvet. The trappings of the mare were of the field and jineta fashion, and of mulberry color and green. He carried a Moorish cutlass hanging from 15 a broad green and gold baldric; the buskins were of the same make as the baldric; the spurs were not gilt, but lacquered green, and so brightly polished that, matching as 5 they did the rest of his apparel, they looked better than if they had been of pure gold.

When the traveler came up with them he saluted them courteously, and spurring his mare was passing them without stopping, but Don Quixote called out to him, 'Gallant sir, if so be your worship is going our road, and has no occasion for speed, it would be a pleasure to me if we were to join company.'

'In truth,' replied he on the mare, 'I would not pass you so hastily but for fear that your horse might turn restive in the company of my mare.'

'You may safely hold in your mare, señor,' said Sancho in reply to this, 'for our horse is the most virtuous and well-behaved horse in the world; he never does anything wrong on such occasions, and the only time he misbehaved, my master and I suffered for it sevenfold; I say again your worship may pull up if you like; for if she was offered to him between two plates the horse would not hanker after her.'

The traveler drew rein, amazed at the trim and features of Don Quixote, who rode without his helmet, which Sancho carried like a valise in front of Dapple's pack-saddle; and if the man in green examined Don Quixote closely, still more closely did Don Quixote examine the man in green, who struck him as being a man of intelligence. In appearance he was about fifty years of age, with but few gray hairs, an aquiline cast of features, and an expression between grave and gay; and his dress and accoutrements showed him to be a man of good condition. What he in green thought of Don Quixote of La Mancha was that a man of that sort and shape he had never yet seen; he marveled at the length of his hair, his lofty stature, the lankness and sallowness of his countenance, his armor, his bearing and his gravity—a figure and picture such as had not been seen in those regions for many a long day.

Don Quixote saw very plainly the attention with which the traveler was regarding him, and read his curiosity in his astonishment; and courteous as he was and ready to please everybody, before the other could ask him any question he anticipated him by saying, 'The appearance I present to your worship being so strange and so out of the common, I should not be surprised if it filled you with wonder; but you will cease to wonder when I tell you, as I do, that I am one of those knights who, as people say, go seeking adventures. I have left my home, I have mortgaged my estate, I have given up my comforts, and committed myself to the arms of Fortune, to bear me whithersoever she may please. My desire was to bring to life again knight-errantry, now dead, and for some time past, stumbling here, falling there, now coming down headlong, now raising myself up again, I have carried out a great portion of my design, succoring widows, protecting maidens, and giving aid to wives, orphans, and minors, the proper and natural duty of knights-errant; and, therefore, because of my many valiant and Christian achievements, I have been already found worthy to make my way in print to well-nigh all, or most, of the nations of the earth. Thirty thousand volumes of my history have been printed, and it is on the high-road to be printed thirty thousand thousands of times, if heaven does not put a stop to it. In short, to sum up all in a few words, or in a single one, I may tell you I am Don Quixote of La Mancha, otherwise called "The Knight of the Rueful Countenance;" for though self-praise is degrading, I must perforce sound my own sometimes, that is to say, when there is no one at hand to do it for me. So that, gentle sir, neither this horse, nor this lance, nor this shield, nor this squire, nor all these arms put together, nor the sallowness of my countenance, nor my gaunt leanness, will henceforth astonish you, now that you know who I am and what profession I follow.'

With these words Don Quixote held his peace, and, from the time he took to answer, the man in green seemed to be at a loss for a reply; after a long pause, however, he said to him, 'You were right when you saw curiosity in my amazement, sir knight; but you have not succeeded in removing the astonishment I feel at seeing you; for although you say, señor, that knowing who you are ought to remove it, it has not done so; on the contrary, now that I know, I am left more amazed and astonished than before. What! is it possible that there are knights-errant in the world in these days, and histories of real chivalry printed? I cannot realize the fact that there can be anyone on earth now-a-days who aids widows, or protects maidens, or defends wives, or succors orphans; nor should I believe it had I not seen it in your worship with my own eyes. Blessed be heaven! for by means of this history of your noble and genuine chivalrous deeds, which you say has been printed, the countless stories of fictitious knights-errant with which the world is filled, so much to the injury of morality and the prejudice and discredit of good histories, will have been driven into oblivion.'

'There is a good deal to be said on that point,' said Don Quixote, 'as to whether the histories of the knights-errant are fiction or not.'

'Why, is there anyone who doubts that those histories are false?' said the man in green.

'I doubt it,' said Don Quixote, 'but never mind that now; if our journey lasts long enough, I trust in God I shall show your worship that you do wrong in going with the stream of those who regard it as a matter of certainty that they are not true.'

From this last observation of Don Quixote's, the traveler began to have a suspicion that he was some crazy being, and was waiting for him to confirm it by something further; but before they could turn to any new subject Don Quixote begged him to tell him who he was, since he himself had rendered account of his station and life. To this, he in the green gaban replied, 'I, Sir Knight of the Rueful Countenance, am a gentleman by birth, native of the village where, please God, we are going to dine today; I am more than fairly well off, and my name is Don Diego de Miranda. I pass my life with my wife, children, and friends; my pursuits are hunting and fishing, but I keep neither hawks nor greyhounds, nothing but a tame partridge or a bold ferret or two; I have six dozen or so of books, some in our mother tongue, some Latin, some of them history, others devotional; those of chivalry have not as yet crossed the threshold of my door; I am more given to turning over the profane than the devotional, so long as they are books of honest entertainment that charm by their style and attract and interest by the invention they display, though of these there are very few in Spain. Sometimes I dine with my neighbors and friends, and often invite them; my entertainments are neat and well served without stint of anything. I have no taste for tattle, nor do I allow tattling in my presence; I pry not into my neighbors' lives, nor have I lynx-eyes for what others do. I hear mass every day; I share my substance with the poor, making no display of good works, lest I let hypocrisy and vainglory, those enemies that subtly take possession of the most watchful heart, find an entrance into mine. I strive to make peace between those whom I know to be at variance; I am the devoted servant of Our Lady, and my trust is ever in the infinite mercy of God our Lord.'

Sancho listened with the greatest attention to the account of the gentleman's life and occupations; and thinking it a good and a holy life, and that he who led it ought to work miracles, he threw himself off Dapple, and running in haste seized his right stirrup and kissed his foot again and again with a devout heart and almost with tears.

Seeing this the gentleman asked him, 'What are you about, brother? What are these kisses for?'

'Let me kiss,' said Sancho, 'for I think your worship is the first saint in the saddle I ever saw in all the days of my life.'

'I am no saint,' replied the gentleman, 'but a great sinner; but you are, brother, for you must be a good fellow, as your simplicity shows.'

Sancho went back and regained his pack-saddle, having extracted a laugh from his master's profound melancholy, and excited fresh amazement in Don Diego. Don Quixote then asked him how many children he had, and observed that one of the things wherein the ancient philosophers, who were without the true knowledge of God, placed the summum bonum [the highest good], was in the gifts of nature, in those of fortune, in having many friends, and many and good children.

'I, Señor Don Quixote,' answered the gentleman, 'have one son, without whom, perhaps, I should count myself happier than I am, not because he is a bad son, but because he is not so good as I could wish. He is eighteen years of age; he has been for six at Salamanca studying Latin and Greek, and when I wished him to turn to the study of other sciences I found him so wrapped up in that of poetry (if that can be called a science) that there is no getting him to take kindly to the law, which I wished him to study, or to theology, the queen of them all. I would like him to be an honor to his family, as we live in days when our kings liberally reward learning that is virtuous and worthy; for learning without virtue is a pearl on a dunghill. He spends the whole day in settling whether Homer expressed himself correctly or not in such and such a line of the Iliad, whether Martial was indecent or not in such an such an epigram, whether such and such lines of Virgil are to be understood in this way or that; in short, all his talk is of the works of these poets, and those of Horace, Persius, Juvenal, and Tibullus; for of the moderns in our own language he makes no great account; but with all his seeming indifference to Spanish poetry, just now his thoughts are absorbed in making a gloss on four lines that have been sent him from Salamanca, which I suspect are for some poetical tournament.'

To all this Don Quixote said in reply, 'Children, señor, are portions of their parents' bowels, and therefore, be they good or bad, are to be loved as we love the souls that give us life; it is for the parents to guide them from infancy in the ways of virtue, propriety, and worthy Christian conduct, so that when grown up they may be the staff of their parents' old age, and the glory of their posterity; and to force them to study this or that science I do not think wise, though it may be no harm to persuade them; and when there is no need to study for the sake of pane lucrando [daily bread], and it is the student's good fortune that heaven has given him parents who provide him with it, it would be my advice to them to let him pursue whatever science they may see him most inclined to; and though that of poetry is less useful than pleasurable, it is not one of those that bring discredit upon the possessor. Poetry, gentle sir, is, as I take it, like a tender young maiden of supreme beauty, to array, bedeck, and adorn whom is the task of several other maidens, who are all the rest of the sciences; and she must avail herself of the help of all, and all derive their luster from her. But this maiden will not bear to be handled, nor dragged through the streets, nor exposed either at the corners of the market-places, or in the closets of palaces. She is the product of an Alchemy of such virtue that he who is able to practise it will turn her into pure gold of inestimable worth. He that possesses her must keep her within bounds, not permitting her to break out in ribald satires or soulless sonnets. She must on no account be offered for sale, unless, indeed, it be in heroic poems, moving tragedies, or sprightly and ingenious comedies. She must not be touched by the buffoons, nor by the ignorant vulgar, incapable of comprehending or appreciating her hidden treasures. And do not suppose, señor, that I apply the term vulgar here merely to plebeians and the lower orders; for everyone who is ignorant, be he lord or prince, may and should be included among the vulgar. He, then, who shall embrace and cultivate poetry under the conditions I have named shall become famous, and his name honored throughout all the civilized nations of the earth. And with regard to what you say, señor, of your son having no great opinion of Spanish poetry, I am inclined to think that he is not quite right there, and for this reason: the great poet Homer did not write in Latin, because he was a Greek, nor did Virgil write in Greek, because he was a Latin; in short, all the ancient poets wrote in the language they imbibed with their mother's milk, and never went in quest of foreign ones to express their sublime conceptions; and that being so, the usage should in justice extend to all nations, and the German poet should not be undervalued because he writes in his own language, nor the Castilian, nor even the Biscayan, for writing in his. But your son, señor, I suspect, is not prejudiced against Spanish poetry, but against those poets who are mere Spanish versewriters, without any knowledge of other languages or sciences to adorn and give life and vigor to their natural inspiration; and yet even in this he may be wrong; for, according to a true belief, a poet is born one; that is to say, the poet by nature comes forth a poet from his mother's womb; and following the bent that heaven has bestowed upon him, without the aid of study or art, he produces things that show how truly he spoke who said, 'Est Deus in nobis,' &c. At the same time, I say that the poet by nature who calls in art to his aid will be a far better poet and will surpass him who tries to be one relying upon his knowledge of art alone. The reason is that art does not surpass nature, but only brings it to perfection; and thus, nature combined with art, and art with nature, will produce a perfect poet. To bring my argument to a close, I would say then, gentle sir, let your son go on as his star leads him, for being so studious as he seems to be, and having already successfully surmounted the first step of the sciences, which is that of the languages, with their help he will by his own exertions reach the summit of polite literature, which so well becomes an independent gentleman, and adorns, honors, and distinguishes him, as much as the miter does the bishop, or the gown the learned counselor. If your son write satires reflecting on the honor of others, chide and correct him, and tear them up; but if he compose discourses in which he rebukes vice in general, in the style of Horace, and with elegance like his, commend him; for it is legitimate for a poet to write against envy and lash the envious in his verse, and the other vices too, provided he does not single out individuals; there are, however, poets who, for the sake of saying something spiteful, would run the risk of being banished to the coast of Pontus. If the poet be pure in his morals, he will be pure in his verses too; the pen is the tongue of the mind, and as the thought engendered there, so will be the things that it writes down. And when kings and princes observe this marvelous science of poetry in wise, virtuous, and thoughtful subjects, they honor, value, exalt them, and even crown them with the leaves of that tree which the thunderbolt strikes not, as if to show that they whose brows are honored and adorned with such a crown are not to be assailed by anyone.

He of the green gaban was filled with astonishment at Don Quixote's argument, so much so that he began to abandon the notion he had taken up about his being crazy. But in the middle of the discourse, it being not very much to his taste, Sancho had turned aside out of the road to beg a little milk from some shepherds, who were milking their ewes hard by; and just as the gentleman, highly pleased with Don Quixote's sound sense and intelligence, was about to renew the conversation, Don Quixote, raising his head, perceived a cart covered with royal flags coming along the road they were traveling; and persuaded that this must be some new adventure, he called aloud to Sancho to come and bring him his helmet. Sancho, hearing himself called, quitted the shepherds, and, prodding Dapple vigorously, came up to his master, to whom there fell fear and apprehension, he has recorded it without adding to the story or leaving out a particle of the truth, and entirely disregarding the charges of falsehood that might be brought against him; and he was right, for the truth may run fine but will not break, and always rises above falsehood as oil above water; and so, going on with his story, he says that when Don Quixote called out to Sancho to bring him his helmet, Sancho was buying some curds the shepherds agreed to sell him, and flurried by the great haste his master was in, did not know what to do with them or what to carry them in; so, not to lose them, for he had already paid for them, he thought it best to throw them into his master's helmet, and acting on this bright idea he went to see what his master wanted with him. He, as he approached, exclaimed to him, 'Give me that helmet, my friend, for either I know little of adventures, or what I observe yonder is one that will, and does, call upon me to arm myself.' He of the green gaban on hearing this looked in all directions, but could perceive nothing, except a cart coming toward them with two or three small flags, which led him to conclude it must be carrying treasure of the King's, and he said so to Don Quixote. He, however, would not believe him, being always persuaded and convinced that all that happened to him must be adventures and still more adventures; so he replied to the gentleman, 'He who is prepared has his battle half fought; nothing is lost by my preparing myself, for I know by experience that I have enemies, visible and invisible, and I know not when, or where, or at what moment, or in what shapes they will attack me;' and turning to Sancho he called for his helmet; and Sancho, as he had no time to take out the curds, had to give it just as it was. Don Quixote took it, and without perceiving what was in it thrust it down in hot haste upon his head; but as the curds were pressed and squeezed, the whey began to run all over his face and beard, whereat he was so startled that he cried out to Sancho, 'Sancho, what's this? I think my head is softening, or my brains are melting, or I am sweating from head to foot! If I am sweating, it is not indeed from fear. I am convinced beyond a doubt that the adventure which is about to befall me is a terrible one. Give me something to wipe myself with, if thou hast it, for this profuse sweat is blinding me.'

A TERRIFIC AND DESPERATE ADVENTURE

PART II, CHAPTER 17

When the author of this great history comes to relate what is set down in this chapter he says he would have preferred to pass it over in silence, fearing it would not be believed, because here Don Quixote's madness reaches the confines of the greatest that can be conceived, and even goes a couple of bowshots beyond the greatest. But after all, though still under the same

Sancho held his tongue, and gave him a cloth, and gave thanks to God at the same time that his master had not found out what was the matter. Don Quixote then wiped himself, and took off his helmet to see what it was that made his head feel so cool, and seeing all that white mash inside his helmet he put it to his nose, and as soon as he had smelt it he exclaimed, 'By the life of my lady Dulcinea del Toboso, but it is curds thou hast put here, thou treacherous, impudent, ill-mannered squire!'

To which, with great composure and pretended innocence, Sancho replied, 'If they are curds let me have them, your worship, and I'll eat them; but let the devil eat them, for it must have been he who put them there. I dare to dirty your worship's helmet! You have guessed the offender finely! Faith, sir, by the light God gives me, it seems I must have enchanters too, that persecute me as a creature and limb of your worship, and they must have put that nastiness there in order to provoke your patience to anger, and make you baste my ribs as you are wont to do. Well, this time, indeed, they have missed their aim, for I trust to my master's good sense to see that I have got no curds or milk, or anything of the sort; and that if I had it is in my stomach I would put it and not in the helmet.'

'May be so,' said Don Quixote. All this the gentleman was observing, and with astonishment, more especially when, after having wiped himself clean, his head, face, beard, and helmet, Don Quixote put it on and settling himself firmly in his stirrups, easing his sword in the scabbard, and grasping his lance, he cried, 'Now, come who will, here am I, ready to try conclusions with Satan himself in person!'

By this time the cart with the flags had come up, unattended by anyone except the carter on a mule, and a man sitting in front. Don Quixote planted himself before it and said, 'Whither are you going, brothers? What cart is this? What have you got in it? What flags are those?'

To this the carter replied, 'The cart is mine; what is in it is a pair of fine caged lions, which the governor of Oran is sending to court as a present to his Majesty; and the flags are our lord the King's, to show that what is here is his property.'

'And are the lions large?' asked Don Quixote.

'So large,' replied the man who sat at the door of the cart, 'that larger, or as large, have never crossed from Africa to Spain; I am the keeper, and I have brought over others, but never any like these. They are male and female; the male is in that first cage and the female in the one behind, and they are hungry now, for they have eaten nothing today, so let your worship stand aside, for we must make haste to the place where we are to feed them.'

Hereupon, smiling slightly, Don Quixote exclaimed, 'Lion-whelps to me! to me whelps of lions, and at such a time! Then, by God! these gentlemen who send them here shall see if I am a man to be frightened by lions. Get down, my good fellow, and as you are the keeper open the cages, and turn me out those beasts, and in the midst of this plain I will let them know who Don Quixote of La Mancha is, in spite and in the teeth of the enchanters who send them to me.'

'So, so,' said the gentleman to himself at this; 'our worthy knight has shown of what sort he is; the curds, no doubt, have softened his skull and brought his brains to a head.'

At this instant Sancho came up to him, saying, 'Señor, for God's sake do something to keep my master, Don Quixote, from tackling these lions; for if he does they'll tear us all to pieces here.'

'Is your master then so mad,' asked the gentleman, 'that you believe and are afraid he will engage such fierce animals?'

'He is not mad,' said Sancho, 'but he is venturesome.'

'I will prevent it,' said the gentleman; and going over to Don Quixote, who was insisting upon the keeper's opening the cages, he said to him, 'Sir knight, knight-errant should attempt adventures which encourage the hope of a successful issue, not those which entirely withhold it; for valor that trenches upon temerity savors rather of madness than of courage; moreover, these lions do not come to oppose you, nor do they dream of such a thing; they are going as presents to his Majesty, and it will not be right to stop them or delay their journey.'

'Gentle sir,' replied Don Quixote, 'you go and mind your tame partridge and your bold ferret, and leave everyone to manage his own business; this is mine, and I know whether these gentlemen the lions come to me or not;' and then turning to the keeper he exclaimed, 'By all that's good, sir scoundrel, if you don't open the cages this very instant, I'll pin you to the cart with this lance.'

The carter, seeing the determination of this apparition in armor, said to him, 'Please your worship, for charity's sake, señor, let me unyoke the mules and place myself in safety along with them on me before the lions are turned out; for if they kill them on me I am ruined for life, for I possess is this cart and mules.'

'O man of little faith,' replied Don Quixote, 'get down and unyoke; you will soon see that you are exerting yourself for nothing, and that you might have spared yourself the trouble.'

The carter got down and with all speed unyoked the mules, and the keeper called out at the top of his voice, 'I call all here to witness that against my will and under compulsion I open the cages and let the lions loose, and that I warn this gentleman that he will be accountable for all the harm and mischief which these beasts may do, and for my salary and dues as well. You, gentlemen, place yourselves in safety before I open, for I know they will do me no harm.'

Once more the gentleman strove to persuade Don Quixote not to do such a mad thing, as it was tempting God to engage in such a piece of folly. To this Don Quixote replied that he knew what he was about. The gentleman in return entreated him to reflect, for he knew he was under a delusion.

'Well, señor,' answered Don Quixote, 'if you do not like to be a spectator of this tragedy, as in your opinion it will be, spur your flea-bitten mare, and place yourself in safety.'

Hearing this, Sancho with tears in his eyes entreated him to give up an enterprise compared with which the one of the wind-mills, and the awful one of the fulling mills, and, in fact, all the feats he had attempted in the whole course of his life, were cakes and fancy bread. 'Look ye, señor,' said Sancho, 'there's no enchantment here, nor anything of the sort, for between the bars and chinks of the cage I have seen the paw of a real lion, and judging by that I reckon the lion such a paw could belong to must be bigger than a mountain.'

'Fear, at any rate,' replied Don Quixote, 'will make him look bigger to thee than half the world. Retire, Sancho, and leave me; and if I die here thou knowest our old compact; thou wilt repair to Dulcinea—I say no more.' To these he added some further words that banished all hope of his giving up his insane project. He of the green gaban would have offered resistance, but he found himself ill-matched as to arms, and did not think it prudent to come to blows with a madman, for such Don Quixote now showed himself to be in every respect; and the latter, renewing his commands to the keeper and repeating his threats, gave warning to the gentleman to spur his mare, Sancho his Dapple, and the carter his mules, all striving to get away from the cart as far as they could before the lions broke loose. Sancho was weeping over his master's death, for this time he firmly believed it was in store for him from the claws of the lions; and he cursed his fate and called it an unlucky hour when he thought of taking service with him again; but with all his tears and lamentations he did not forget to thrash Dapple so as to put a good space between himself and the cart. The keeper, seeing that the fugitives were now some distance off, once more entreated and warned Don Quixote as he had entreated and warned him before; but he replied that he heard him, and that he need not trouble himself with any further warnings or entreaties, as they would be fruitless, and bade him make haste.

During the delay that occurred while the keeper was opening the first cage, Don Quixote was considering whether it would not be well to do battle on foot, instead of on horseback, and finally resolved to fight on foot, fearing that Rozinante might take fright at the sight of the lions; he therefore sprang off his horse, flung his lance aside, braced his buckler on his arm, and drawing his sword, advanced slowly with marvelous intrepidity and resolute courage, to plant himself in front of the cart, commending himself with all his heart, first to God, and then to his lady Dulcinea.

It is to be observed, that on coming to this passage, the author of this veracious history breaks out into exclamations. 'O doughty Don Quixote! high mettled past extolling! Mirror, wherein all the heroes of the world may see themselves! Second and modern Don Manuel de Leon, once the glory and honor of Spanish knighthood! In what words shall I describe this dread exploit, by what language shall I make it credible to ages to come, what eulogies are there unmeet for thee, though they be hyperboles piled on hyperboles! On foot, alone, undaunted, high-souled, but with a simple sword, and that no trenchant blade of the Perrillo brand, a shield, but no bright polished steel one, there stoodst thou, biding and awaiting the two fiercest lions that Afric's forests ever bred! Thy own deeds be thy praise, O valiant Manchegan, and here I leave them as they stand, wanting the words wherewith to glorify them!

Here the author's outburst came to an end, and he proceeded to take up the thread of his story, saying that the keeper, seeing that Don Quixote had taken up his position, and that it was impossible for him to avoid letting out the male without incurring the enmity of the fiery and daring knight, flung open the doors of the first cage, containing, as has been said, the lion, which was now seen to be of enormous size, and grim and hideous mien. The first thing he did was to turn round in the cage in which he lay, and protrude his claws, and stretch himself thoroughly; he next opened his mouth, and yawned very leisurely, and with near two palms'-length of tongue that he had thrust forth, he licked the dust out of his eyes and washed his face; having done this, he put his head out of the cage and looked all round with eyes like glowing coals, a spectacle and demeanor to strike terror into temerity itself. Don Quixote merely observed him steadily, longing for him to leap from the cart and come to close quarters with him, when he hoped to hew him to pieces.

So far did his unparalleled madness go; but the noble lion, more courteous than arrogant, not troubling himself about silly bravado, after having looked all round, as has been said, turned about and presented his hind-quarters to Don Quixote, and very coolly and tranquilly lay down again in the cage. Seeing this, Don Quixote ordered the keeper to take a stick to him and provoke him to make him come out.

'That I won't,' said the keeper; 'for if I anger him, the first he'll tear in pieces will be myself. Be satisfied, sir knight, with what you have done, which leaves nothing more to be said on the score of courage, and do not seek to tempt fortune a second time. The lion has the door open; he is free to come out or not to come out; but as he has not come out so far, he will not come out today. The greatness of your worship's courage has been fully manifested already; no brave champion, so it strikes me, is bound to do more than challenge his enemy and wait for him on the field; if his adversary does not come, on him lies the disgrace, and he who waits for him carries off the crown of victory.'

'That is true,' said Don Quixote; 'close the door, my friend, and let me have, in the best form thou canst, what thou has seen me do, by way of certificate; to wit, that thou didst open for the lion, that I waited for him, that he did not come out, that I still waited for him and that still he did not come out, and lay down again. I am not bound to do more; enchantments avaunt, and God uphold the right, the truth, and true chivalry! Close the door as I bade thee, while I make signals to the fugitives that have left us, that they may learn this exploit from thy lips.'

The keeper obeyed, and Don Quixote, fixing on the point of his lance the cloth he had wiped his face with after the deluge of curds, proceeded to recall the others, who still continued to fly, looking back at every step, all in a body, the gentleman bringing up the rear. Sancho, however, happening to observe the signal of the white cloth, exclaimed, 'May I die, if my master has not overcome the wild beasts, for he is calling to us.'

They all stopped, and perceived that it was Don Quixote who was making signals, and shaking off their fears to some extent, they approached slowly until they were near enough to hear distinctly Don Quixote's voice calling to them. They returned at length to the cart, and as they came up, Don Quixote said to the carter, 'Put your mules to once more, brother, and continue your journey; and do thou, Sancho, give him two gold crowns for himself and the keeper, to compensate for the delay they have incurred through me.'

'That will I give with all my heart,' said Sancho; 'but what has become of the lions? Are they dead or alive?'

The keeper, then, in full detail, and bit by bit, described the end of the contest, exalting to the best of his power and ability the valor of Don Quixote, at the sight of whom the lion quailed, and would not and dared not come out of the cage, although he had held the door open ever so long; and showing how, in consequence of his having represented to the knight that it was tempting God to provoke the lion in order to force him out, which he wished to have done, he very reluctantly, and altogether against his will, had allowed the door to be closed.

'What dost thou think of this, Sancho?' said Don Quixote. 'Are there any enchantments that can prevail against true valor? The enchanters may be able to rob me of good fortune, but of fortitude and courage they cannot.'

Sancho paid the crowns, the carter put to, the keeper kissed Don Quixote's hands for the bounty bestowed upon him, and promised to give an account of the valiant exploit to the king himself, as soon as he saw him at court.

'Then,' said Don Quixote, 'if his Majesty should happen to ask who performed it, you must say THE KNIGHT OF THE LIONS; for it is my desire that into this the name I have hitherto borne of Knight of the Rueful Countenance be from this time forward changed, altered, transformed and turned; and in this I follow the ancient usage of knights-errant, who changed their names when they pleased, or when it suited their purpose.'

The cart went its way, and Don Quixote, Sancho, and he of the green gaban went theirs. All this time, Don Diego de Miranda had not spoken a word, being entirely taken up with observing and noting all that Don Quixote did and said, and the opinion he formed was that he was a man of brains gone mad, and a madman on the verge of rationality. The first part of his history had not yet reached him, for, had he read it, the amazement with which his words and deeds filled him would have vanished, as he would then have understood the nature of his madness; but knowing nothing of it, he took him to be rational one moment, and crazy the next, for what he said was sensible, elegant, and well expressed, and what he did, absurd, rash, and foolish; and said he to himself, 'What could be madder than putting on a helmet full of curds, and then persuading one's self that enchanters are softening one's skull; or what could be greater rashness and folly than wanting to fight lions tooth and nail?'

Don Quixote roused him from these reflections and this soliloquy by saying, 'No doubt, Señor Don Diego de Miranda, you set me down in your mind as a fool and a madman, and it would be no wonder if you did, for my deeds do not argue anything else. But for all that, I would have you take notice that I am neither so mad nor so foolish as I must have seemed to you. A gallant knight shows to advantage bringing his lance to bear adroitly upon a fierce bull under the eyes of his sovereign, in the midst of a spacious plaza; a knight shows to advantage arrayed in glittering armor, pacing the lists before the ladies in some joyous tournament, and all those knights show to advantage that entertain, divert, and, if we may say so, honor the courts of their princes by warlike exercises, or what resemble them; but to greater advantage than all these does a knight-errant show when he traverses deserts, solitudes, cross-roads, forests, and mountains, in quest of perilous adventures, bent on bringing them to a happy and successful issue, all to win a glorious and lasting renown. To greater advantage, I maintain, does the knight-errant show bringing aid to some widow in some lonely waste than the court knight dallying with some city damsel. All knights have their own special parts to play; let the courtier devote himself to the ladies, let him add luster to his sovereign's court by his liveries, let him entertain poor gentlemen with the sumptuous fare of his table, let him arrange joustings, marshal tournaments, and prove himself noble, generous, and magnificent, and above all a good Christian, and so doing he will fulfil the duties that are especially his; but let the knight-errant explore the corners of the earth and penetrate the most intricate labyrinths, at each step let him attempt impossibilities, on desolate heaths let him endure the burning rays of the midsummer sun, and the bitter inclemency of the winter winds and frosts; let no lions daunt him, no monsters terrify him, no dragons make him quail: for to seek these, to attack those, and to vanquish all, are in truth his main duties. I, then, as it has fallen to my lot to be a member of knight-errantry, cannot avoid attempting all that to me seems to come within the sphere of my duties; thus it was my bounden duty to attack those lions that I just now attacked, although I knew it to be the height of rashness; for I know well what valor is, that it is a virtue that occupies a place between two vicious extremes, cowardice and temerity; but it will be a lesser evil for him who is valiant to rise till he reaches the point of rashness than to sink until he reaches the point of cowardice; for, as it is easier for the prodigal than for the miser to become generous, so it is easier for a rash man to prove truly valiant than for a coward to rise to true valor; and believe me, Señor Don Diego, in attempting adventures it is better to lose by a card too many than by a card too few; for to hear it said, "such a knight is rash and daring," sounds better than "such a knight is timid and cowardly."

'I protest, Señor Don Quixote,' said Don Diego, 'everything you have said and done is proved correct by the test of reason itself; and I believe, if the laws and ordinances of knight-errantry should be lost, they might be found in your worship's breast as in their own proper depository and muniment-house; but let us make haste, for it grows late, and reach my village and house, where you shall take rest after your late exertions; for if they have not been of the body, they have been of the spirit, and these sometimes tend to produce bodily fatigue.'

'I take the invitation as a great favor and honor, Señor Don Diego,' replied Don Quixote; and pressing forward at a better pace than before, at about two in the afternoon they reached the village and house of Don Diego, or, as Don Quixote called him, "The Knight of the Green Gaban."

DON QUIXOTE'S GOOD COUNSEL TO GOVERNOR SANCHE

PART II, CHAPTER 42 AND CHAPTER 43

'First of all, my son, thou must fear God, for in the fear of him is wisdom, and being wise thou canst not err in aught.'

'Secondly, thou must keep in view what thou art, striving to know thyself, the most difficult thing to know that the mind can imagine. If thou knowest thyself, it will follow thou wilt not puff thyself up like the frog that strove to make himself as large as the ox; if thou dost, the recollection of having kept pigs in thine own country will serve as the ugly feet for the wheel of thy folly.'

'That's the truth,' said Sancho; 'but that was when I was a boy; afterwards when I was something more of a man it was geese I kept, not pigs. But to my thinking that has nothing to do with it; for all who are governors don't come of a kingly stock.'

'True,' said Don Quixote, 'and for that reason those who are not of noble origin should take care that the dignity of the office they hold be accompanied by a gentle suavity, which wisely managed will save them from the sneers of malice that no station escapes.'

'Glory in thy humble birth, Sancho, and be not ashamed of saying thou art peasant-born; for when it is seen thou art not ashamed, no one will set himself to put thee to the blush; and pride thyself rather upon being one of lowly virtue than a lofty sinner. Countless are they who, born of mean parentage, have risen to the highest dignities, pontifical and imperial, and of the truth of this I could give thee instances enough to weary thee.'

'Remember, Sancho, if thou make virtue thy aim, and take a pride in doing virtuous actions, thou wilt have no cause to envy those who are born princes and lords, for blood is an inheritance, but virtue an acquisition, and virtue has in itself alone a worth that blood does not possess.'

'This being so, if perchance anyone of thy kinsfolk should come to see thee when thou art in thine island, thou art not to repel or slight him, but on the contrary to welcome him, entertain him, and make much of him; for in so doing thou wilt be approved of Heaven (which is not pleased that any should despise what it hath made), and wilt comply with the laws of well-ordered nature.'

'If thou carriest thy wife with thee (and it is not well for those that administer governments to be long without their wives), teach and instruct her, and strive to smooth down her natural roughness; for all that may be gained by a wise governor may be lost and wasted by a boorish stupid wife.'

'If perchance thou art left a widower—a thing that may happen—and in virtue of thy office seekest a consort of higher degree, choose not one to serve thee for a hook or for a fishing-rod, or for the hood of thy "won't have it"; for verily, I tell thee, for all the judge's wife receives, the husband will be held accountable at the general calling to account; where he will have to repay in death fourfold items that in life he regarded as naught.

'Never go by arbitrary law, which is so much favored by ignorant men who plume themselves on cleverness.

'Let the tears of the poor man find with thee more compassion, but not more justice, than the pleadings of the rich.

'Strive to lay bare the truth, as well amid the promises and presents of the rich man, as amid the sobs and entreaties of the poor.

'When equity may and should be brought into play, press not the utmost rigor of the law against the guilty; for the reputation of the stern judge stands not higher than that of the compassionate.

'If perchance thou permittest the staff of justice to swerve, let it be not by the weight of a gift, but by that of mercy.

'If it should happen thee to give judgment in the cause of one who is thine enemy, turn thy thoughts away from thy injury and fix them on the justice of the case.

'Let not thine own passion blind thee in another man's cause; for the errors thou wilt thus commit will be most frequently irremediable; or if not, only to be remedied at the expense of thy good name and fortune.

'If any handsome woman come to seek justice of thee, turn away thine eyes from her tears and thine ears from her lamentations, and consider deliberately the merits of her demand, if thou wouldst not have thy reason swept away by her weeping, and thy rectitude by her sighs.

'Abuse not by word him whom thou hast to punish in deed, for the pain of punishment is enough for the unfortunate without the addition of thine oburgations.

'Bear in mind that the culprit who comes under thy jurisdiction is but a miserable man subject to all the propensities of our depraved nature, and so far as may be in thy power show thyself lenient and forbearing; for though the attributes of God are all equal, to our eyes that of mercy is brighter and loftier than that of justice.

'If thou followest these precepts and rules, Sancho, thy days will be long, and thy fame eternal, thy reward abundant, thy felicity unutterable; thou wilt marry thy children as thou wouldst; they and thy grandchildren will bear titles; thou wilt live in peace and concord with all men;

and, when life draws to a close, death will come to thee in calm and ripe old age, and the light and loving hands of thy great grandchildren will close thine eyes.

5 'What I have thus far addressed to thee are instructions for the adornment of thy mind; listen now to those which tend to that of the body.'

Who, hearing the foregoing discourse 10 of Don Quixote, would not have set him down for a person of great good sense and greater rectitude of purpose? But, as has been frequently observed in the course of this great history, he only talked nonsense when he touched on chivalry, and in discussing all other subjects showed that he had a clear and unbiased understanding; so that at every turn his acts gave the lie to his intellect, and his intellect to his acts; but in the case of these 20 second counsels that he gave Sancho he showed himself to have a lively turn of humor, and displayed conspicuously his wisdom and also his folly.

25 Sancho listened to him with the deepest attention, and endeavored to fix his counsels in his memory, like one who meant to follow them and by their means bring the full promise of his government to a happy issue. Don Quixote, then, went on to say:

'With regard to the mode in which thou shouldst govern thy person and thy house, Sancho, the first charge I have to give thee is to be clean, and to cut thy 35 nails, not letting them grow as some do, whose ignorance makes them fancy that long nails are an ornament to their hands, as if those excrescences they neglect to cut were nails, and not the talons of a lizard-catching kestrel—a filthy and unnatural abuse.

'Go not ungirt and loose, Sancho; for disordered attire is a sign of an unstable mind, unless indeed the slovenliness and slackness is to be set down to craft, as was the common opinion in the case of Julius Cæsar.

'Ascertain cautiously what thy office 50 may be worth; and if it will allow thee to give liveries to thy servants, give them respectable and serviceable, rather than showy and gay ones, and divide them between thy servants and the poor; that is to say, if thou canst clothe six pages, 55 clothe three and three poor men, and thus thou wilt have pages for heaven and pages for earth; the vain-glorious never think of this new mode of giving liveries.

'Eat not garlic nor onions, lest they find out thy boorish origin by the smell; walk slowly and speak deliberately, but not in such a way as to make it seem thou art listening to thyself; for all affectation is bad.

'Dine sparingly and sup more sparingly still; for the health of the whole body is forged in the workshop of the stomach.

'Be temperate in drinking, bearing in mind that wine in excess keeps neither secrets nor promises.

'Take care, Sancho, not to chew on both sides, and not to eruct in anybody's presence.'

'Eruct!' said Sancho; 'I don't know what that means.'

'To eruct, Sancho,' said Don Quixote, 'means to belch, and that is one of the filthiest words in the Spanish language though a very expressive one; and therefore nice folk have had recourse to the Latin, and instead of belch say eruct, and instead of belches say eructations; and if some do not understand these terms it matters little, for custom will bring them into use in the course of time, so that they will be readily understood; this is the way a language is enriched; custom and the public are all-powerful there.'

'In truth, señor,' said Sancho, 'one of the counsels and cautions I mean to bear in mind shall be this, not to belch, for I'm constantly doing it.'

'Eruct, Sancho, not belch,' said Don Quixote.

'Eruct, I shall say henceforth, and I swear not to forget it,' said Sancho.

'Likewise, Sancho,' said Don Quixote, 'thou must not mingle such a quantity of proverbs in thy discourse as thou dost; for though proverbs are short maxims, thou dost drag them in so often by the head and shoulders that they savor more of nonsense than of maxims.'

'God alone can cure that,' said Sancho; 'for I have more proverbs in me than a book, and when I speak they come so thick together into my mouth that they fall to fighting among themselves to get out; that's why my tongue lets fly the first that come, though they may not be pat to the purpose. But I'll take care henceforward to use such as befit the dignity of my office; for "in a house where there's plenty, supper is soon cooked," and "he who binds does not wrangle," and "the bell-ringer's in a safe berth," and "giving and keeping require brains."'

'That's it, Sancho!' said Don Quixote; 'pack, tack, string proverbs together; nobody is hindering thee! "My mother beats me, and I go on with my tricks." I am bidding thee avoid proverbs, and here in a second thou hast shot out a whole litany of them, which have as much to do with what we are talking about as "over the hills of Ubeda." Mind, Sancho, I do not say that a proverb aptly brought in is objectionable; but to pile up and string together proverbs at random makes conversation dull and vulgar.

'When thou ridest on horseback, do not go lolling with thy body on the back of the saddle, nor carry thy legs stiff or sticking out from the horse's belly, nor yet sit so loosely that one would suppose thou wert on Dapple; for the seat on a horse makes gentlemen of some and grooms of others.

'Be moderate in thy sleep; for he who does not rise early does not get the benefit of the day; and remember, Sancho, diligence is the mother of good fortune, and indolence, its opposite, never yet attained the object of an honest ambition.

'The last counsel I will give thee now, though it does not tend to bodily improvement, I would have thee carry carefully in thy memory, for I believe it will be no less useful to thee than those I have given thee already, and it is this—never engage in a dispute about families, at least in the way of comparing them one with another; for necessarily one of those compared will be better than the other, and thou wilt be hated by the one thou hast disparaged, and get nothing in any shape from the one thou hast exalted.

'Thy attire shall be hose of full length, a long jerkin, and a cloak a trifle longer; loose breeches by no means, for they are becoming neither for gentlemen nor for governors.

'For the present, Sancho, this is all that has occurred to me to advise thee; as time goes by and occasions arise my instructions shall follow, if thou take care to let me know how thou are circumstanced.'

'Señor,' said Sancho, 'I see well enough that all these things your worship has said to me are good, holy, and profitable; but what use will they be to me if I don't remember one of them? To be sure that about not letting my nails grow, and marrying again if I have the chance, will not slip out of my head; but all that other hash, muddle, and jumble—I don't and can't recollect any more of it than of last year's clouds; so it must be given me in writing; for though I can't either read or write, I'll give it to my confessor, to drive it into me and remind me of it whenever it is necessary.'

'Ah, sinner that I am!' said Don Quixote, 'how bad it looks in governors 10 not to know how to read or write; for let me tell thee, Sancho, when a man knows not how to read, or is left-handed, it argues one of two things; either that he was the son of exceedingly mean and lowly 15 parents, or that he himself was so incorrigible and ill-conditioned that neither good company nor good teaching could make any impression on him. It is a great defect that thou laborest under, and therefore I would have thee learn at any rate to sign thy name.'

'I can sign my name well enough,' said Sancho, 'for when I was steward of the brotherhood in my village I learned to 25 make certain letters, like the marks on bales of goods, which they told me made out my name. Besides, I can pretend my right hand is disabled and make some one else sign for me, for "there's a remedy 30 for everything except death;" and as I shall be in command and hold the staff, I can do as I like; moreover, "he who has the alcalde for his father—," and I'll be governor, and that's higher than alcalde. 35 Only come and see! Let them make light of me and abuse me; "they'll come for wool and go back shorn"; "whom God loves, his house is sweet to him"; "the silly sayings of the rich pass for saws in 40 the world"; and as I'll be rich, being a governor, and at the same time generous, as I mean to be, no fault will be seen in me. "Only make yourself honey and the flies will suck you"; "as much as thou hast, 45 so much art thou worth," as my grandmother used to say; and "thou canst have no revenge of a man of substance."

'Oh, God's curse upon thee, Sancho!' here exclaimed Don Quixote; 'sixty thousand 50 devils fly away with thee and thy proverbs! For the last hour thou hast been stringing them together and inflicting the pangs of torture on me with every one of them. Those proverbs will bring 55 thee to the gallows one day, I promise thee; thy subjects will take the government from thee, or there will be revolts among them, all because of them. Tell me, where dost thou pick them up, thou booby? How dost thou apply them, thou blockhead? For with me, to utter one of 5 them and make it apply properly, I have to sweat and labor as if I were digging.'

'By God, master mine,' said Sancho, 'your worship is making a fuss about very little. Why the devil should you be vexed 10 if I make use of what is my own? And I have got nothing else, nor any other stock in trade except proverbs and more proverbs; and here are three just this instant come into my head, pat to the 15 purpose and like pears in a basket; but I won't repeat them, for "Sage silence is called Sancho."

'That, Sancho, thou art not,' said Don Quixote; 'for not only art thou not sage 20 silence, but thou art pestilent prate and perversity; still I would like to know what three proverbs have just now come into thy memory, for I have been turning over mine own—and it is a good one—and none 25 occur to me.'

'What can be better,' said Sancho, 'than "never put thy thumbs between two back teeth"; and "to 'get out of my house' 30 and "what do you want with my wife?" there is no answer"; and "whether the pitcher hits the stone, or the stone the pitcher, it's a bad business for the pitcher"; all which fit to a hair? For no one should 35 quarrel with his governor, or him in authority over him, because he will come off the worst, as he does who puts his finger between two back teeth, and if they are not back teeth it makes no difference, so long as they are teeth; and to whatever the 40 governor may say there's no answer, any more than to "get out of my house" and "what do you want with my wife?" and then, as for that about the stone and the pitcher, a blind man could see that. So 45 that he who sees the mote in another's eye had need to see the beam in his own, that it be not said of himself, "the dead woman was frightened at the one with her throat cut"; and your worship knows well that the 50 fool knows more in his own house than the wise man in another's.'

'Nay, Sancho,' said Don Quixote, 'the fool knows nothing, either in his own house or in anybody else's, for no wise 55 structure of any sort can stand on a foundation of folly; but let us say no more about it, Sancho, for if thou governest badly, thine will be the fault and mine the shame; but I comfort myself with having done my duty in advising thee as earnestly and as wisely as I could; and thus I am released from my obligations and my promise. God guide thee, Sancho, and govern thee in thy government, and deliver me from the misgiving I have that thou wilt turn the whole island upside down, a thing I might prevent by explaining to the duke what thou art and telling him that all that fat little person of thine is nothing else but a sack full of proverbs and sauciness.'

'Señor,' said Sancho, 'if your worship thinks I'm not fit for this government, I 15 give it up on the spot; for the mere black of the nail of my soul is dearer to me than my whole body; and I can live just as well, simple Sancho, on bread and onions, as governor, on partridges and capons; and what's more, while we're asleep we're all equal, great and small, rich and poor. But if your worship looks into it, you will see it was your worship alone that put me on to this business of governing; for I know 20 no more about the government of islands than a buzzard; and if there's any reason to think that because of my being a governor the devil will get hold of me, I'd rather go Sancho to heaven than governor to hell.'

'By God, Sancho,' said Don Quixote, 'for those last words thou hast uttered alone, I consider thou deservest to be governor of a thousand islands. Thou hast good natural instincts, without which no knowledge is worth anything; commend thyself to God, and try not to swerve in the pursuit of thy main object. I mean, always make it thy aim and fixed purpose 40 to do right in all matters that come before thee, for heaven always helps good intentions; and now let us go to dinner, for I think my lord and lady are waiting for us.'

THE DEATH OF DON QUIXOTE

The confession over, the curate came out saying, 'Alonso Quixano the Good is indeed dying, and is indeed in his right mind; we may now go in to him while he makes his will.'

This news gave a tremendous impulse to the brimming eyes of the housekeeper, 55 niece, and Sancho Panza his good squire, making the tears burst from their eyes and a host of sighs from their hearts; for of a truth, as has been said more than once, whether as plain Alonso Quixano the Good, or as Don Quixote of La Mancha, Don Quixote was always of a gentle disposition 5 and kindly in all his ways, and hence he was beloved, not only by those of his own house but by all who knew him.

The notary came in with the rest, and as soon as the preamble of the will had been 10 set out and Don Quixote had commended his soul to God with all the devout formalities that are usual, coming to the bequests he said, 'Item, it is my will that, touching certain moneys in the hands of Sancho 15 Panza (whom in my madness I made my squire), inasmuch as between him and me there have been certain accounts and debits and credits, no claim be made against him, nor any account demanded of him in re- 20 spect of them; but that if anything remain over and above, after he has paid himself what I owe him, the balance, which will be but little, shall be his, and much good may it do him; and if, as when I was mad I had 25 a share in giving him the government of an island, so, now that I am in my senses, I could give him that of a kingdom, it should be his, for the simplicity of his character and the fidelity of his conduct deserve it.' And then, turning to Sancho, 30 he said, 'Forgive me, my friend, that I led thee to seem as mad as myself, making thee fall into the same error I myself fell into, that there were and still are knights-errant 35 in the world.'

'Ah!' said Sancho weeping, 'don't die, master, but take my advice and live many years; for the foolishlest thing a man can do in this life is to let himself die without 40 rime or reason, without anybody killing him, or any hands but melancholy's making an end of him. Come, don't be lazy, but get up from your bed and let us take to the fields in shepherd's trim as we agreed. 45 Perhaps behind some bush we shall find the lady Dulcinea disenchanted, as fine as fine can be. If it be that you are dying of vexation at having been vanquished, lay the blame on me, and say you were over- 50 thrown because I had girthed Rocinante badly; besides you must have seen in your books of chivalry that it is a common thing for knights to upset one another, and for him who is conquered today to be con- 55 queror tomorrow.'

'Very true,' said Samson, 'and good Sancho Panza's view of these cases is quite right.'

'Sirs, not so fast,' said Don Quixote; "In last year's nests there are no birds this year." I was mad, now I am in my senses; I was Don Quixote of La Mancha; I am now, as I said, Alonso Quixano the Good; and may my repentance and sincerity restore me to the esteem you used to have for me; and now let Master Notary proceed. . . .

At last Don Quixote's end came, after 10

he had received all the sacraments, and had in full and forcible terms expressed his detestation of books of chivalry. The notary was there at the time, and he said that in no book of chivalry had he ever read of any knight-errant dying in his bed so calmly and so like a Christian as Don Quixote, who amid the tears and lamentations of all present yielded up his spirit, that is to say died.

THE FRENCH CLASSICAL PERIOD

THE FRENCH CLASSICAL PERIOD

Under the severe critical authority of Malherbe and Boileau in the seventeenth century, French poetry passed under the control of rules of order and restraint from which it was not freed until well on into the nineteenth century. The great name in all theory was Aristotle, and as his literary criticism in the Poetics was confined almost exclusively to tragedy, it was natural that discussion should center about the rules for this form of art. The Three Unities—of Action, Time and Place—which Italian and French critics extracted, partly from Aristotle, partly from their own perceptions of what was reasonable, became accepted principles of classic perfection in tragedy. Corneille, with his masculine vigor, accommodated himself to these restrictions with some difficulty; but the more supple genius of Racine found within their limitations an opportunity for the development of an exquisite art which appealed to the French sense of logic, order, lucidity and sobriety, although outside of France its appeal has been less universal than that of Molière's more robust work in comedy.

In prose the achievements of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were remarkable, carrying on the Renaissance spirit of free inquiry to new fields; but in poetry the weight of classical authority seemed to hamper any great flight of the imagination. Louis XIV liked to be flattered as 'le grand monarque' and the age was quite inclined to regard itself as 'the great age' in French history; but posterity has taken a more sober view of both the monarch and the achievements of the time. The phrase 'a despotism tempered by epigrams' seems a juster description of the age, and some of the epigrams have proved worthy of remembrance.

ROCHEFOUCAULD (1615-1680)

François, second Duc de la Rochefoucauld, Prince of Marsillac, belonged to the ancient nobility of France, and spent much of his youth in fighting on their behalf against the growing power of the Crown. He plotted against Richelieu and found himself in the Bastille; his services to Anne of Austria found no recompense when, on Richelieu's death, she was in a position to reward him; as a lover he was hardly more successful than as a soldier and a politician; and when he retired from all these activities to nurse the results of his wounds (and the gout) he could not be expected to take a rosy view of life. Dean Swift, who no doubt found in his own mind much in common with Rochefoucauld's way of thinking, remarked that as Rochefoucauld drew his maxims from his observation of human nature, the fault was not in him but in mankind; but it would argue no lack of generosity to attribute part of the fault to the observer.

Epigrams were the favorite intellectual exercise of the time, and among the French epigrammatists Rochefoucauld easily holds the first place, both for malicious insight into human frailty and for the polish of his phrase. First published in 1665, the Maxims appeared in five editions during the author's lifetime, variously corrected and enlarged, and in a still fuller edition soon after his death; the longer Reflections were not given to the public till half a century after that event. The Maxims have been frequently translated into English, as into other languages; the translation here used is that of Bund and Friswell.

MAXIMS

What we term virtue is often but a mass of various actions and divers interests, which fortune, or our own industry, manages to arrange; and it is not always from valor or from chastity that men are brave and women chaste.

Whatever discoveries have been made in the region of self-love, there remain many unexplored territories there.

Passion often renders the most clever man a fool, and even sometimes renders the most foolish man clever.

This clemency of which they make a merit arises oftentimes from vanity, sometimes from idleness, oftentimes from fear, and almost always from all three combined.

We have all sufficient strength to support the misfortunes of others.

Philosophy triumphs easily over past evils and future evils; but present evils triumph over it.

We need greater virtues to sustain good than evil fortune.

Jealousy is in a manner just and reasonable, as it tends to preserve a good which belongs, or which we believe belongs to us; on the other hand, envy is a fury which cannot endure the happiness of others.

Pride has a larger part than goodness in our remonstrances with those who commit faults, and we reprove them not so much to correct as to persuade them that we ourselves are free from faults.

We promise according to our hopes; we perform according to our fears.

Strength and weakness of mind are misnamed; they are really only the good or unhappy arrangement of our bodily organs.

Happiness is in the taste, and not in the things themselves; we are happy from possessing what we like, not from possessing what others like.

The happiness or unhappiness of men depends no less upon their dispositions than their fortunes.

Sincerity is an openness of heart; we find it in very few people; what we usually see is only an artful dissimulation to win the confidence of others.

There is no praise we have not lavished upon Prudence; and yet she cannot assure to us the most trifling event.

What grace is to the body good sense is to the mind.

There are few people who would not be ashamed of being beloved when they love no longer.

If we judge of love by the majority of its results, it rather resembles hatred than friendship.

The love of justice is simply in the majority of men the fear of suffering injustice.

Men would not live long in society were they not the dupes of each other.

Everyone blames his memory, no one blames his judgment.

Old men delight in giving good advice as a consolation for the fact that they can no longer set bad examples.

The test of extraordinary merit is to see those who envy it the most, yet obliged to praise it.

The heart is ever the dupe of the heart.

Those who know their minds do not necessarily know their hearts.

The blemishes of the mind, like those of the face, increase by age.

There may be good but there are no pleasant marriages.

If we conquer our passions it is more from their weakness than from our strength.

Cunning and treachery are the offspring of incapacity.

The true way to be deceived is to think one's self more knowing than others.

We are never so ridiculous from the habits we have as from those that we affect to have.

A man would rather say evil of himself than say nothing.

The refusal of praise is only the wish to be praised twice.

Idleness and fear keep us in the path of duty, but our virtue often gets the praise.

What makes us like new studies is not so much the weariness we have of the old or the wish for change as the desire to be admired by those who know more than ourselves, and the hope of advantage over those who know less.

Our repentance is not so much sorrow for the ill we have done as fear of the ill that may happen to us.

The health of the mind is not less uncertain than that of the body, and when passions seem furthest removed we are no less in danger of infection than of falling ill when we are well.

The reason which often prevents us abandoning a single vice is having so many.

The desire to appear clever often prevents our being so.

Virtue would not go far did not vanity escort her.

Virtue in woman is often the love of reputation and repose.

Most people judge men only by success or by fortune.

Hypocrisy is the homage vice pays to virtue.

Flirtation is at the bottom of woman's nature, although all do not practise it, some being restrained by fear, others by sense.

There are people whose faults become them, others whose very virtues disgrace them.

The pleasure of love is in loving; we are happier in the passion we feel than in that we inspire.

What we call liberality is often but the vanity of giving, which we like more than that we give away.

Absence extinguishes small passions and increases great ones, as the wind will blow out a candle, and blow in a fire.

We always like those who admire us; we do not always like those whom we admire.

The gratitude of most men is but a secret desire of receiving greater benefits.

Almost all the world takes pleasure in paying small debts; many people show gratitude for trifling, but there is hardly one who does not show ingratitude for great favors.

We may forgive those who bore us; we cannot forgive those whom we bore.

Lovers are never tired of each other,—they always speak of themselves.

The extreme delight we take in talking of ourselves should warn us that it is not shared by those who listen.

Weak persons cannot be sincere.

There is more self-love than love in jealousy.

We well know that it is bad taste to talk of our wives; but we do not so well know that it is the same to speak of ourselves.

There are few virtuous women who are not tired of their part.

The greater number of good women are like concealed treasures, safe—as no one has searched for them.

It is generally the fault of the loved one not to perceive when love ceases.

Most young people think they are natural when they are only boorish and rude.

Rank is to merit what dress is to a pretty woman.

The most dangerous folly of old persons who have been lovable is to forget that they are no longer so.

Old fools are more foolish than young fools.

No one believes that in every respect he is behind the man he considers the ablest in the world.

Of all the violent passions the one that becomes a woman best is love.

In their first passion women love their lovers; in all others they love love.

However rare true love is, true friendship is rarer.

Timidity is a fault which it is dangerous to blame in those we desire to cure of it.

Those who have had great passions often find all their lives made miserable by being cured of them.

When we do not find peace of mind in ourselves, it is useless to seek it elsewhere.

In the adversity of our best friends we always find something which is not wholly displeasing to us.

There are crimes which become innocent and even glorious by their brilliance, their number, or their excess; thus it happens that public robbery is called financial skill, and the unjust capture of provinces is called a conquest.

The pomp of funerals concerns rather the vanity of the living than the honor of the dead.

There is a general revolution which changes the tastes of the mind as well as the fortunes of the world.

Women for the most part surrender themselves more from weakness than from passion. Whence it is that bold and pushing men succeed better than others, although they are not so lovable.

Not to love is, in love, an infallible means of being beloved.

The power which women whom we love have over us is greater than that which we have over ourselves.

REFLECTIONS ON CONVERSATION

The reason why so few persons are agreeable in conversation is that each thinks more of what he desires to say, than of what the others say, and that we make bad listeners when we want to speak.

Yet it is necessary to listen to those who talk, we should give them the time they want, and let them say even senseless things; never contradict or interrupt them; on the contrary, we should enter into their mind and taste, illustrate their meaning, praise anything they say that deserves praise, and let them see we praise more from our choice than from agreement with them.

To please others we should talk on subjects they like and that interest them, avoid disputes upon indifferent matters, seldom ask questions, and never let them see that we pretend to be better informed than they are.

We should talk in a more or less serious manner, and upon more or less abstruse subjects, according to the temper and understanding of the persons we talk with, and readily give them the advantage of deciding without obliging them to answer when they are not anxious to talk.

After having in this way fulfilled the duties of politeness, we can speak our opinions to our listeners when we find an opportunity without a sign of presumption or opinionatedness. Above all things we should avoid often talking of ourselves and giving ourselves as an example; nothing is more tiresome than a man who quotes himself for everything.

We cannot give too great study to find out the manner and the capacity of those with whom we talk, so as to join in the conversation of those who have more than ourselves without hurting by this preference the wishes or interests of others.

Then we should modestly use all the modes above-mentioned to show our thoughts to them, and make them, if possible, believe that we take our ideas from them.

We should never say anything with an air of authority, nor show any superiority of mind. We should avoid far-fetched expressions, expressions hard or forced, and never let the words be grander than the matter.

It is not wrong to retain our opinions if they are reasonable, but we should yield to reason; wherever she appears and from whatever side she comes, she alone should govern our opinions; we should follow her without opposing the opinions of others, and without seeming to ignore what they say.

It is dangerous to seek to be always the leader of the conversation, and to push a good argument too hard, when we have found one. Civility often hides half its understanding, and when it meets with an opinionated man who defends the bad side, spares him the disgrace of giving way.

We are sure to displease when we speak too long and too often on one subject, and when we try to turn the conversation upon subjects that we think more instructive than others; we should enter indifferently upon every subject that is agreeable to others, stopping where they wish, and avoiding all they do not agree with.

Every kind of conversation, however witty it may be, is not equally fitted for all clever persons; we should select what is to their taste and suitable to their condition, their sex, their talents, and also choose the time to say it.

We should observe the place, the occasion, the temper in which we find the person who listens to us, for if there is much art in speaking to the purpose, there is no less in knowing when to be silent. There is an eloquent silence which serves to approve or to condemn, there is a silence of discretion and of respect. In a word, there is a tone, an air, a manner, which renders everything in conversation agreeable or disagreeable, refined or vulgar.

But it is given to few persons to keep this secret well. Those who lay down rules too often break them, and the safest we are able to give is to listen much, to speak little, and to say nothing that will ever give ground for regret.

PASCAL (1623-1662)

Blaise Pascal, though he was always a faithful Catholic, had much in common with the higher types of English and American Puritanism. He cast longing glances back to the purity and simplicity of primitive Christianity, and interested himself profoundly in the attempt to make the Convent of Port Royal, of which his sister was a member, into a center of learning and piety. Unfortunately the Port Royalists became entangled in a theological controversy about the orthodoxy of the writings of Cornelius Jansen, Bishop of Ypres, and though they had not only the able pen of Pascal, but the sympathy of Racine and La Fontaine on their side, the influence of the Jesuits, backed by Richelieu and Mazarin for political reasons, proved sufficient to win from the ecclesiastical authorities the condemnation of the Jansenist doctrines. This once famous dispute was the occasion of the most notable of the works of Pascal (except on mathematical subjects), published during his lifetime, the Provincial Letters. His Thoughts, scattered reflections he wrote down on scraps of paper during his last illness or dictated to an amanuensis, were published after his death by the members of Port Royal.

Pascal was a precocious genius and as a child addicted himself to the study of geometry, from which he was only diverted by his father's advice that he should first learn Latin and Greek. Before he was twelve he had worked out by himself the principles of plane geometry, and at sixteen he wrote a treatise on conic sections; his later treatise on the cycloid is a mathematical classic. Excessive study, added to a natural melancholy of disposition, undermined Pascal's health, and though for a time he gave himself to the pleasures of society, he was driven back on himself by a bad carriage accident which ruined his nerves. The last few years of his life were passed in extreme suffering and the closest confinement; he died before he was forty, having accomplished only a part of what his exceptional mind would, under happier conditions, have achieved.

The translation used is that of Isaac Taylor.

ANCIENT AND MODERN CHRISTIANS

At the first formation of the Christian Church, all Christians were perfectly instructed in the points necessary to salvation. Instead of this, at the present day, the general ignorance is so great as must deeply grieve all who have the welfare of the church at heart. Persons were formerly admitted into the church only after laborious preparation and long-cherished desires; now they find themselves in it without trouble, care, or labor. Formerly they were admitted after a very strict examination; now they are received before they are capable of being examined. Formerly they were not received till after they had abjured their past life, and had renounced the world, the flesh, and the devil; now they enter while they are incapable of any such acts. In former times, it was necessary to come out of the world in order to be received into the church;

now men enter into the church at the same time as they enter into the world. Formerly, by assuming the Christian profession, an essential distinction was recognized between the church and the world; they were considered as two opposites, as two irreconcilable antagonists, one of which would assail the other without intermission, but of which the feeblest in appearance was destined to triumph one day over the strongest. Such being the state of the two contending parties, men renounced the one, to join the other; they abandoned the maxims of the one; to adopt those of the other; they divested themselves of the sentiments peculiar to the one, to assume those of the other; in fine, they quitted, they renounced, they abjured the world, the scene of their first birth, to devote themselves wholly to the church, in which their second birth had taken place, and thus the mighty difference between them was most clearly discerned. Nowadays, men find themselves in the one almost at the same time as they come into the other; the very moment of our birth into the world is that of our second birth in the church; so that as reason expands, it makes no distinction between these opposite worlds; it is educated and formed in both at the same time. People take the sacrament, and indulge in the gaieties of life; the essential distinction, formerly so palpable, is done away; the church and the world are so confounded and mingled as to render it impossible to distinguish them.

Hence it was, that formerly, among Christians, none were seen but well-instructed persons; whereas now they are in a state of frightful ignorance. Hence those who in former times became Christians by baptism, and who quitted the vices of the world to practise the devotions of the church, very rarely apostatized; now nothing is more common than to see the vices of the world in the midst of Christians. The church of the saints is defiled by the admixture of the wicked; and her children, whom she has conceived and carried from infancy are the same who bring into her very heart, that is to say, to the participation of her most awful mysteries, her greatest enemies, the spirit of the world, the spirit of ambition, the spirit of revenge, the spirit of impurity, the spirit of concupiscence; and the love she has for her children obliges her to introduce into her vitals her most cruel foes. But it is not to the church that we must impute the calamities that have followed so disastrous a change; for as she saw that the delay of baptism would leave a great number of children under Adam's curse, she wished to deliver them from perdition, by hastening the succor she gave them; and this kind mother beheld, with extreme regret, that what she procured for the salvation of her infants became an occasion of the destruction of the adults.

THE SOLITARY STUDENT

I used to spend much of my time in the study of the abstract sciences, but I lost my relish for them when I found so few with whom I could exchange thoughts respecting them. As soon as I began the study of Man, I saw that these subjects were not suited to his nature, and that I had mistaken the best method of employing my faculties, in attempting to investigate them, much more than others in remaining ignorant of them. I felt persuaded, however, that I should have plenty of companions in the study of Man, which is our proper study. But here again I have been mistaken. There are fewer students of human nature than of Geometry.

THE POWER OF CUSTOM

We must not forget our own nature; we are body as well as spirit, and hence pure demonstration is not the instrument of persuasion. How very few things are there demonstrable! Arguments act only on the mind. Custom adds strength to argument; it enlists the senses on its side, which imperceptibly carry the understanding along with them. Who can demonstrate that the sun will rise tomorrow, or that we shall die? Yet what is more universally believed? Custom persuades men of it; this it is which makes so many Turks and Pagans, this makes soldiers and artisans. It is true we must not appeal to custom when we are in quest of truth, but we must have recourse to it as soon as the understanding sees where the truth lies, that our minds may be thoroughly imbued with belief, of itself so volatile a thing; for to keep the arguments constantly before us would be endless trouble. We must acquire a more easy belief, and such is that of custom, which, without violence, without art, without argument, produces belief, and so inclines all our faculties, that it costs us no effort to retain it. The two parts of our frame must act in unison: the mind convinced by those arguments which it suffices to have understood once in our lives, and the senses persuaded by habit, and not allowed to allure us in a contrary direction.

THOUGHTS

It is a strange thing that men long to comprehend the first principles of all things, and to know everything! It would be impossible, doubtless, to form such a project, without a presumption or a capacity unlimited as nature itself.

Nature has its perfections, to show that it is the image of God; and its defects, to show that it is only his image.

Men are so necessarily foolish that it would only be a new freak of folly to pretend to be free from folly.

All men naturally hate themselves. We take advantage, as we can, of concupiscence, to promote the public good. But it is only a pretense and a false image of charity: in reality, it is nothing but hatred. The wickedness of man's heart is only covered; it is not taken away.

Scientific inventions advance from age to age. The virtue and the vice in the world generally remain the same.

A wise man will have some thoughts on the background by which to judge of everything; but in society, he will use the current mode of talking.

Thoughts come by chance, and are lost by chance; there is no art either of preserving or acquiring them.

A multitude not reduced to unity is confusion. A unity not dependent on the multitude is despotism.

Force is the queen of the world, and not opinion; but opinion is that which makes use of force.

Why are the majority followed? Is it because they have more reason? No: but because they have more force. Why are ancient laws, and ancient customs, observed? Is it because they are most agreeable to truth and justice? No; but because they are uniform, and destroy the germ of discord.

Dominion founded on opinion and imagination lasts for a time, and submission to it is agreeable and voluntary; but the dominion of force is perpetual. Thus opinion is the queen of the world, but force is its tyrant.

What an excellent regulation it is to distinguish men by their exterior rather than by their mental qualities! As I am traveling, I meet another man, and the point to be decided is which shall pass? Which of us shall yield the precedence? The least clever, do you say? Why, I am as clever as he is. We must come to blows to settle the matter. But he has four lackeys, and I have only one. This difference is seen at a glance; we have only to count. It is my part to yield; and I should be a fool to pick a quarrel. Thus we go on peaceably, which is the greatest thing in life.

How is it that a lame man does not offend us, but that a lame reasoner does offend us? Why, because the former allows that we have the right use of our legs, but the latter maintains that we are the lame reasoners. Were it not for this, his blunders would excite pity rather than anger.

To be well dressed is not without its advantages: it shows that a number of persons have been at work for us; by our head-dress it will be seen that we have a valet, a perfumer, etc. But there is something more than mere show or decoration in having so many hands at one's service.

Few men possess the power of invention: those who cannot invent form the majority, and consequently are the most powerful; and we may observe, that in general, inventors are denied the glory they merit and claim for their discoveries. If they persist in wishing for it, and treat with contempt those who do not invent, all they gain is to be nicknamed and treated as visionaries. Let them take care, then, not to be ostentatious of their superiority, great as it unquestionably is, and learn to be content with the esteem of the few who can appreciate its value.

The commands of reason are far more imperious than those of a master, for, in disobeying the one a man is unhappy; in disobeying the other he is a fool.

Justice is that which is established; and therefore, all our established laws are considered just without examination, simply because they are established.

No doubt an equality of goods is just; but as it is impossible to make men follow the dictates of justice by suasion, we must make them submit to force. Since it is impossible for justice alone to regulate men's minds without external force, physical power is legalized; so that justice and force being combined, peace, the greatest of all blessings, is the result. Summum jus, summa injuria. [The greatest justice is the greatest injury.]

It is just to obey what is just; it is necessary to obey what is strongest. Justice without force is powerless; power without justice is tyrannical. Justice without force will be thwarted, as long as wicked men exist; force without justice will be reprobated by all the good. Therefore, justice and force must be joined, in order that what is just may be powerful, and that what is powerful may be just.

It is dangerous to tell the people that the laws are not just; for their obedience depends on the contrary belief. For this reason, they must be told, at the same time, that they must obey, because they are the laws; as our superiors must be obeyed, not because they are just but because they are our superiors. If they fall in with these views, all sedition is prevented. This is all that properly belongs to the definition of justice.

It is well that the laws and customs of a state should be obeyed, simply because they are established, and that the people should understand that this makes them just. In this case, they will never disown their authority; but if it is attempted to assert their justice on any other grounds, it will easily be rendered questionable; and nothing more is wanted to dispose the people to revolt.

When the question to be decided is whether a war should be made, in which thousands will perish and numbers of Spaniards be condemned to die, all depends on the will of one man, and he, too, an interested individual; the right of decision ought to be vested in a third unbiased party.

It is the contest, and not the victory, which gives us pleasure. We like to see the combats of animals, but not the victor tearing the vanquished in pieces. We may ask, what object can there be excepting the victory? Yet when that is gained, our interest in the whole affair is lost. It is the same in games of hazard; it is the same in the investigation of truth. We are pleased to witness the collision of opinions, but not to contemplate truth when discovered; we behold it with pleasure only in a militant state. We are not interested by the things themselves, but by the search for them. And so there is pleasure in observing the conflict of two opposite passions; but when one gains the mastery, it becomes brute violence. In dramatic representations, we turn away from scenes which are placid without uncertainty, wretched without hope, and full of passion without refinement.

How silly the attempt of Montaigne to delineate his own character! And that not in an accidental manner, and contrary to his own fixed principles, a mistake to which every one is liable, but in accordance with his principles, and as his main and principal design! For to talk nonsense by accident, and without reflection, is common enough; but to take pains to gossip, as he has done, is intolerable.

Time puts an end to our sorrows and our quarrels, because our characters alter, and we become as it were different beings. Neither the offender nor the offended is the same person. It is like a nation with which all intercourse has been broken off, but renewed after a generation or two have passed away. They are still Frenchmen, but not the same individuals.

What are the features of our condition? Inconstancy, weariness, disquietude. If any one wishes to be thoroughly acquainted with the vanity of man, he has only to consider the causes and effects of love. The cause is un je ne sais quoi, and the effects are terrible. This je ne sais quoi, such a little thing that we can scarcely discern its existence, shakes the earth, agitates princes, and armies, and the whole human race. If Cleopatra's nose had been a few lines shorter, the state of the world would have been changed.

It seems to me that Cæsar was too old to set about amusing himself with the conquest of the world. This sort of amusement was suited to Alexander; he was a young man whose impetuosity it was almost impossible to restrain, but Cæsar should have been too sedate for such an enterprise.

Fickleness in our pleasures arises from a sense of the emptiness of those we have tried and ignorance of the vanity of the rest.

Kings and princes sometimes divert themselves. If they were always on their thrones they would soon be tired of them. Grandeur must be laid aside in order to be felt.

'This dog is mine,' says the child of a poor man: 'this is my place in the sunshine;' in such expressions we may detect the germ and image of the tyranny that would extend itself over the whole earth.

Let not men ridicule those who are honored on account of their official situation; but ask themselves whether they love any one excepting for adventitious qualities. All men naturally hate one another. I venture to assert, that if everything were known which men say of each other, there would not be four friends in the whole world. To be convinced to this, only consider the quarrels produced by talebearing.

The ties which secure the regard of one class of men to another are, generally speaking, ties of necessity; for a distinction of ranks is unavoidable. All men are ambitious of dominion, but only some possess the power. But the ties which secure the respect of individuals to one another are ties of the imagination.

10 Some men speak well, who are very different writers. The reason is that the place, the audience, and other circumstances kindle their minds, and excite them to greater efforts than they could make without such a stimulus.

Man is neither an angel nor a brute, but the misfortune is that a being who aspires to be an angel sinks into a brute.

LA FONTAINE (1621-1695)

Almost all races of men who have told stories at all have told them about animals, and it was an easy step for these early story-tellers, after ascribing to the beasts the motives and thoughts of men, to endow them with speech. In Sanskrit we have two very ancient collections of fables, one in prose, called the Pantcha Tantra, or Five Books (in Greek, Pentateuch), and the other in verse, Hitopadesa, or Friendly Instruction. Part of the latter was translated early in the Christian era into Persian, and from Persian into Arabic under the title The Fables of Pilpai. From Arabic, translations were made into Greek, Latin, and, directly or indirectly, into the languages of modern Europe.

In classical literature the fable is first associated with the name of Æsop, who lived about 600 B.C., and transmitted his pithy apologues to posterity by word of mouth; they were known to Socrates, Plato and Aristotle, but Æsop himself became a fabulous person, and the large collection of fables to which his name is attached was made in Greek prose in 1447 by Planudes, a monk of Constantinople. The Romans had a collection of fables in Greek verse by Babrias, of which only half a dozen have survived, and they had their own fabulist in Phædrus, a freedman of Augustus, to whom La Fontaine is perhaps most directly indebted. But by La Fontaine's time, the material at his disposal was immense. The Middle Ages, drawing partly from classical, partly from Oriental sources, and adding inventions of their own poets, had made Reynard the Fox the hero of a cycle of romance in which he passed through innumerable adventures.

La Fontaine made little claim to originality, either in matter or form, but he raised the fable to a height of concise and significant elegance which has never been surpassed. His life was modest, and though he was elected a member of the Academy and courted by rich patrons and great ladies, he would probably have been greatly astonished if he could have known that his work would become familiar to many to whom his friends Boileau, Racine, Molière, the Duc de la Rochefoucauld, Madame La Fayette, and Madame de Sevigné are merely names. A gentle careless soul, much more like the grasshopper than the ant of his first fable, he was by no means a model of the domestic virtues, though in his old age he turned to piety and versified the Psalms of David for the Convent of Port Royal. The first six books of his Fables Choisies mises en Vers were published in 1668, the next five some ten years later, and the twelfth book, completing the collection, not long before his death. Almost everyone who begins to learn French makes a start with La Fontaine in the original, on account of the simplicity and ease of his diction as well as of his matter, but he is a great artist, and it is extremely difficult for the translator to carry over into another language the elusive charm of the French text, which is still held significant enough to try the powers of talented French actresses. For all these reasons English translators are few, in consideration of the author's merits. A complete translation of the Fables seems to have waited for the hand of Elizur Wright, a Yale graduate, who picked up an old copy of the French text in Broadway, New York, at the beginning of the Victorian era, and translated it, partly for the amusement of his little boy. The most recent versions, those of Edward Marsh, sometimes go beyond the text in their allusions to great personages and popular weaknesses of our own time, but will not on that account be less welcome to the modern reader. Of the following ten fables, the first six are translated by Wright, the last four by Marsh; for permission to reprint the latter we are indebted to Harper & Brothers, the American publishers.

THE WOLF AND THE LAMB

I. 10

That innocence is not a shield,
A story teaches, not the longest.

The strongest reasons always yield
To reasons of the strongest.

A lamb her thirst was slaking,
Once, at a mountain rill.
A hungry wolf was taking

5

His hunt for sheep to kill,
 When, spying on the streamlet's brink
 This sheep of tender age, 10
 He howled in tones of rage,
 'How dare you roil my drink?
 Your impudence I shall chastise!
 'Let not your majesty,' the lamb replies,
 'Decide in haste or passion! 15
 For sure 'tis difficult to think
 In what respect or fashion
 My drinking here could roil your drink
 Since on the stream your majesty now faces
 I'm lower down, full twenty paces.' 20
 'You roil it,' said the wolf; 'and, more I
 know,
 You cursed and slandered me a year ago.'
 'O no! how could I such a thing have done!
 A lamb that has not seen a year,
 A suckling of its mother dear?' 25
 'Your brother then.' 'But brother I have none.'
 'Well, well, what's all the same,
 'Twas some one of your name.
 Sheep, men, and dogs of every nation,
 Are wont to stab my reputation, 30
 As I have truly heard.'

Without another word,
 He made his vengeance good,—
 Bore off the lambkin to the wood,
 And there, without a jury, 35
 Judged, slew, and ate her in his fury.

THE OAK AND THE REED

I. 22

The oak one day addressed the reed:—
 'To you ungenerous indeed
 Has nature been, my humble friend,
 With weakness aye obliged to bend.
 The smallest bird that flits in air 5
 Is quite too much for you to bear;
 The slightest wind that wreathes the lake
 Your ever-trembling head doth shake.
 The while, my towering form
 Dares with the mountain top 10
 The solar blaze to stop,
 And wrestle with the storm.
 What seems to you the blast of death,
 To me is but a zephyr's breath.
 Beneath my branches had you grown, 15
 That spread far round their friendly bower,
 Less suffering would your life have known,
 Defended from the tempest's power.
 Unhappily you oftenest show
 In open air your slender form, 20

Along the marshes wet and low,
 That fringe the kingdom of the storm.
 To you, declare I must,
 Dame Nature seems unjust.'

Then modestly replied the reed: 25
 'Your pity, sir, is kind indeed,
 But wholly needless for my sake.
 The wildest wind that ever blew
 Is safe to me compared with you.
 I bend, indeed, but never break. 30
 Thus far, I own the hurricane
 Has beat your sturdy back in vain;
 But wait the end.' Just at the word,
 The tempest's hollow voice was heard.
 The North sent forth her fiercest child, 35
 Dark, jagged, pitiless, and wild.
 The oak, erect, endured the blow;
 The reed bowed gracefully and low.
 But, gathering up its strength once more,
 In greater fury than before, 40
 The savage blast
 O'erthrew, at last,
 That proud, old, sky-encircled head,
 Whose feet entwined the empire of the dead!

THE LION GOING TO WAR

V. 19

The lion had an enterprise in hand;
 Held a war-council, sent his provost-marshal,
 And gave the animals a call impartial—
 Each, in his way, to serve his high command.
 The elephant should carry on his back 5
 The tools of war, the mighty public pack,
 And fight in elephantine way and form;
 The bear should hold himself prepared to storm;
 The fox all secret stratagems should fix;
 The monkey should deceive the foe by tricks.
 'Dismiss,' said one, 'the blockhead asses, 11
 And hares, too cowardly and fleet.'
 'No,' said the king; 'I use all classes;
 Without their aid my force were incomplete.
 The ass shall be our trumpeter, to scare 15
 Our enemy. And then, the nimble hare
 Our royal bulletins shall homeward bear.'

A monarch provident and wise
 Will hold his subjects all of consequence,
 And know in each what talent lies, 20
 There's nothing useless to a man of sense.

THE ANIMALS SICK OF THE PLAGUE

VII. 1

The sorest ill that Heaven hath Sent on this lower world in wrath,—
 The plague (to call it by its name),
 One single day of which
 Would Pluto's ferryman enrich,— 5
 Waged war on beasts, both wild and tame.
 They died not all, but all were sick:
 No hunting now, by force or trick,
 To save what might so soon expire.
 No food excited their desire; 10
 Nor wolf nor fox now watched to slay
 The innocent and tender prey.
 The turtles fled;
 So love and therefore joy were dead.
 The lion council held, and said: 15
 'My friends, I do believe
 This awful scourge, for which we grieve,
 Is for our sins a punishment
 Most righteously by Heaven sent.
 Let us our guiltiest beast resign, 20
 A sacrifice to wrath divine.
 Perhaps this offering, truly small,
 May gain the life and health of all.
 By history we find it noted
 That lives have been just so devoted. 25
 Then let us all turn eyes within,
 And ferret out the hidden sin.
 Himself let no one spare nor flatter,
 But make clean conscience in the matter.
 For me, my appetite has played the glutton 30
 Too much and often upon mutton.
 What harm had e'er my victims done?
 I answer, truly, None.
 Perhaps, sometimes, by hunger pressed,
 I've slain the shepherd with the rest. 35
 I yield myself, if need there be;
 And yet I think in equity,
 Each should confess his sins with me;
 For laws of right and justice cry,
 The guiltiest alone should die.' 40
 'Sire,' said the fox, 'your majesty
 Is humbler than a king should be,
 And over-squeamish in the case.
 What! eating stupid sheep a crime?
 No, never, sire, at any time. 45
 It rather was an act of grace,
 A mark of honor to their race.
 And as to shepherds, one may swear,
 The fate your majesty describes,
 Is recompense less full than fair 50
 For such usurpers o'er our tribes.'

Thus Renard glibly spoke,
 And loud applause from flatterers broke.

Of neither tiger, boar, nor bear,
 Did any keen inquirer dare 55
 To ask for crimes of high degree;
 The fighters, biters, scratchers, all
 From every mortal sin were free;
 The very dogs, both great and small,
 Were saints, as far as dogs could be. 60

The ass, confessing in his turn,
 Thus spoke in tones of deep concern:—
 'I happened through a mead to pass;
 The monks, its owners, were at mass;
 Keen hunger, leisure, tender grass, 65
 And add to these the devil too,
 All tempted me the deed to do.
 I browsed the bigness of my tongue;
 Since truth must out, I own it wrong.'

On this, a hue and cry arose, 70
 As if the beasts were all his foes;
 A wolf, haranguing lawyer-wise,
 Denounced the ass for sacrifice—
 The bald-pate, scabby, ragged lout,
 By whom the plague had come, no doubt. 75
 His fault was judged a hanging crime.
 'What? eat another's grass? O shame!
 The noose of rope and death sublime,
 For that offense, were all too tame!
 And soon poor Grizzle felt the same. 80

Thus human courts acquit the strong,
 And doom the weak, as therefore wrong.

THE TWO DOVES

IX. 2

Two doves once cherished for each other
 The love that brother hath for brother.
 But one, of scenes domestic tiring,
 To see the foreign world aspiring,
 Was fool enough to undertake 5
 A journey long, o'er land and lake.
 'What plan is this?' the other cried;
 'Wouldst quit so soon thy brother's side?
 This absence is the worst of ills;
 Thy heart may bear, but me it kills. 10
 Pray, let the dangers, toil, and care,
 Of which all travelers tell,
 Your courage somewhat quell.
 Still if the season later were—
 O wait the zephyrs!—hasten not—' 15
 Just now the raven, on his oak,
 In hoarser tones than usual spoke:
 'My heart forebodes the saddest lot,—
 The falcons, nets—Alas, it rains!
 My brother, are thy wants supplied?— 20

Provisions, shelter, pocket-guide,
 And all that unto health pertains?
 These words occasioned some demur
 In our imprudent traveler.
 But restless curiosity 25
 Prevailed at last; and so said he,—
 'The matter is not worth a sigh;
 Three days, at most, will satisfy,
 And then returning, I shall tell
 You all the wonders that befell,— 30
 With scenes enchanting and sublime
 Shall sweeten all our coming time.
 Who seeth nought, hath nought to say.
 My traveler's course, from day to day,
 Will be the source of great delight. 35
 A store of tales I shall relate,—
 Say there I lodged at such a date,
 And saw there such and such a sight.
 You'll think it all occurred to you.
 On this, both, weeping, bade adieu. 40
 Away the lonely wanderer flew.
 A thunder-cloud began to lower;
 He sought, as shelter from the shower,
 The only tree that graced the plain,
 Whose leaves ill turned the pelting rain. 45
 The sky once more serene above,
 On flew our drenched and dripping dove,
 And dried his plumage as he could.
 Next, on the borders of a wood,
 He spied some scattered grains of wheat, 50
 Which one, he thought, might safely eat;
 For there another dove he saw.
 He felt the snare around him draw!
 This wheat was but a treacherous bait
 To lure poor pigeons to their fate. — 55
 The snare had been so long in use,
 With beak and wings he struggled loose:
 Some feathers perished while it stuck;
 But, what was worst in point of luck,
 A hawk, the cruellest of foes, 60
 Perceived him clearly as he rose,
 Off dragging, like a runaway,
 A piece of string. The bird of prey
 Had bound him, in a moment more,
 Much faster than he was before, 65
 But from the clouds an eagle came,
 And made the hawk himself his game.
 By war of robbers profiting,
 The dove for safety plied the wing,
 And, lighting on a ruined wall, 70
 Believed his dangers ended all.
 A roguish boy had there a sling,
 (Age pitiless!
 We must confess)
 And, by a most unlucky fling, 75
 Half killed our hapless dove;
 Who now, no more in love
 With foreign traveling,

And lame in leg and wing,
 Straight homeward urged his crippled flight, 80
 Fatigued, but glad, arrived at night,
 In truly sad and piteous plight.
 The doves rejoined, I leave you all to say
 What pleasure might their pains repay.
 Ah, happy lovers, would you roam? 85
 Pray, let it not be far from home.
 To each the other ought to be
 A world of beauty ever new;
 In each the other ought to see
 The whole of what is good and true. 90

Myself have loved; nor would I then,
 For all the wealth of crown'd men,
 Or arch celestial, paved with gold,
 The presence of those woods have sold,
 And fields, and banks, and hillocks, which 95
 Were by the joyful steps made rich,
 And smiled beneath the charming eyes
 Of her who made my heart a prize—
 To whom I pledged it nothing loath,
 And sealed the pledge with virgin oath. 100
 Ah, when will time such moments bring again?
 To me are sweet and charming objects vain—
 My soul forsaking to its restless mood?
 O, did my withered heart but dare
 To kindle for the bright and good, 105
 Should not I find the charm still there?
 Is love, to me, with things that were?

THE MONKEY AND THE CAT

IX. 17

Sly Bertrand and Ratto in company sat,
 (The one was a monkey, the other a cat),
 Co-servants and lodgers:
 More mischievous codgers
 Ne'er messed from a platter, since platters were flat. 5
 Was anything wrong in the house or about it,
 The neighbors were blameless,—no mortal could doubt it;
 For Bertrand was thievish and Ratto so nice,
 More attentive to cheese than he was to the mice.
 One day the two plunderers sat by the fire, 10
 Where chestnuts were roasting, with looks of desire.
 To steal them would be a right noble affair.
 A double inducement our heroes drew there—
 'Twould benefit them, could they swallow their fill,
 And then 'twould occasion to somebody ill. 15

Said Bertrand to Ratto, 'My brother, today
 Exhibit your powers in a masterly way,
 And take me these chestnuts, I pray,
 Which were I but otherwise fitted
 (As I am ingeniously witted) 20
 For pulling things out of the flame,
 Would stand but a pitiful game.'
 "'Tis done,' replied Ratto, all prompt to
 obey;
 And thrust out his paw in a delicate way.
 First giving the ashes a scratch, 25
 He opened the coveted batch;
 Then lightly and quickly impinging,
 He drew out, in spite of the singeing,
 One after another, the chestnuts at last,— While Bertrand contrived to devour them as fast. 30
 A servant girl enters. Adieu to the fun.
 Our Ratto was hardly contented, says one.

No more are the princes by flattery paid
 For furnishing help in a different trade,
 And burning their fingers to bring 35
 More power to some mightier king.

THE WOLF AND THE MASTIFF

I. 5

A wolf was down to skin and bone,
 (Those watchdogs did their work so well).
 He met a mastiff, a tremendous swell,
 Sleek, plump, and portly, on the road alone.
 Here was a chance, to tear him limb from limb! 5
 But no, he looked a nasty one to fight;
 'Twere better, on the whole, to be polite;
 So with a smirk the wolf goes up to him,
 And compliments him on his corporation,
 And on the smoothness of his fur. 10
 'You could be just as fat, good sir,'
 Said Towser, 'if you left those plaguy woods
 Where you poor devils pig it in starvation.
 Just fancy, no fixed meals, no fire, no bed,
 A constant fight for daily bread! 15
 Come on, I'll help you find a situation,
 Where you can have your share of this world's goods.'
 'Well,' said the wolf, 'that sounds all right,
 But pray what would my duties be?'
 'Oh,' said the mastiff, 'very light— 20
 Just bark at any beggars you may see,
 Or folk with crutches; suit the master's moods,
 Be civil to his servants and his wife,
 Play with the children—it's a scrumptious life;

Chicken-bones, pigeon-bones, no lack, 25
 And lots of scratching on the back.'
 At such a prospect for his future years
 The wolf's eyes filled with wistful tears.
 But as they ran, he spied a curious ring
 Of bald white patch behind his comrade's ears. 30
 'What's that?' he asked with dawning fears.
 'Nothing.' 'How so?' 'Well, hardly anything;
 The collar of my chain, maybe,
 Has been the cause of what you see.'
 'Your chain!' exclaimed the wolf, 'then you're not free 35
 To run at will?' 'Not quite—but it don't matter.'
 'Don't it, indeed? It wouldn't do for me,' Replied the starveling. 'You may be the fatter,
 But I prefer my liberty
 To all the riches of your platter. 40
 He didn't pause to say good-night,
 But ran till he was out of sight.

THE DONKEY AND THE LAP DOG

IV. 5

To ape a gift we don't possess
 Can only end in clumsiness.
 A boor may strive as best he can,
 He'll never be a gentleman.
 Each here and there, and every now and then, 5
 Some being is born into the world of men
 To whom, spoilt darling of high Heaven,
 The magic grace of charm is given.
 'Tis well to leave it to them—those who try
 To invade their exquisite monopoly 10
 Will put the cap on when they grasp my moral,
 Drawn from a too ambitious donkey,
 Who pitched his singing in a wrong key.
 An ass was musing on a quarrel
 He had with life. 'That little dog,' thought he, 15
 'Because, forsooth, his ways are so bewitching,
 Is treated like the family,
 And lives in ease and luxury,
 While I get nothing but a switching.
 I never, personally, saw 20
 Much in him: he just gives his paw,
 And then lets out a little yap,
 And everybody starts to clap
 And pass him round from lap to lap.

I can't see why I shouldn't do 25
The like, and get some spoiling too.'

The plan was well worth putting to the
proof,
Seeing his master sweetly slumbering,
Up to his chair the ass goes lumbering,
Raises a hard and shabby hoof, 30
And archly pats him on the chin,
Enhancing the audacious action
With bursts of his own tuneful din.
'Oh!' cried his lord in stupefaction,
'Such a caress and such a song 35
I never knew my whole life long!
Martin, here's someone wants a whacking.'
Martin ran up, and started thwacking.
From that day forth our hero was
A sadder and a wiser ass. 40

THE PIG, THE GOAT, AND THE SHEEP

VIII. 12

A goat, a sheep, and a prize pig,
Packed close together in their gig—
Or cart—were driving to the fair.
'Twas not amusement led them there;
It wasn't the idea at all 5
To take them to the music-hall;
They were for sale, to tell you true.

And master pig, he squawls and squeals
As if he had ten butchers at his heels.
'Twas simply deafening. The other two, 10
Good easy folk, who saw no cause for dread,
Or what the rout was all about,
Wondered that he should shriek and shout
And raise a din to rouse the dead.

'Be quiet, sir,' the carter said, 15
'And let us hear each other speak.
What ails you, pray, to squawk and squeak?
These friends of yours, so calm and meek,
Are infinitely better bred.

'Tis they should teach you manners, or at least 20
To hold your tongue. See how this gentle beast,

Sir sheep, sits mumchance. That's what I call sense.'

'Then it's what I call dense,'
Replied the porker. 'If he knew what's what,
He'd baa his head off; and your other sample
Of breeding, if she realized her lot, 26
Would quickly follow my example,
And bleat her gullet sore; but she's a fool,
And so is he: they both suppose
Their only danger is to lose, 30

The goat her milk, the sheep his wool.
For aught I know, they may be right;
But I, who only furnish bacon,
Can be quite sure I'm not mistaken
In thinking I shall die tonight. 35
Farewell my wife, farewell my sty,
My old ancestral home, good-bye!'

It was a subtle ratiocination,
But profitless. We have our destinies,
Not to be changed by fear or lamentation, 40
And he's the wisest who the least foresees.

THE FISHES AND THE FLUTE- PLAYER

X. 11

The shepherd Thyrsis wooed Annette
With music of his flute and voice
So beautiful that hearing it
The souls in Hades might rejoice.
One day he sang upon the bank 5
Of a fair stream which ran through meadows
Where Zephyr o'er the flowers chased the shadows:

And while the singing rose and sank,
Annette sat fishing by his side—
But past the bait the victims glide, 10
And still no capture crowns her wishes.
Thyrsis, who by his tuneful art
Had melted many a ruthless heart, Thought, but thought wrongly, 'twould attract the fishes.

'O citizens of this pure wave,' sang he, 15
'Come, leave your Naiad in her watery chamber,

And swimming up through green and amber
Behold a goddess lovelier far than she.
Fear not to enter her captivity;
Toward men alone her heart is hard; 20
You will be nourished tenderly,
And not one silver scale be marred.
Against your life she harbors no design;
A globe awaits you, clear as crystal fine;
And even though two or three should die, 25
In Anne's white arms one moment they would lie,

And I should wish their lot were mine.'

The speech was eloquent in form and
matter,
But nothing could have fallen flatter.
The audience was no less deaf than dumb, 30
The stream undimpled lay, untwitched the line,

And not a single fish would come.

When his last lovely note had died unheeded,

It struck him that a net was what he needed.

He fetched a large one. In a minute 35

Every single fish was in it;

The next, laid out in order neat

At the fair shepherdess' feet.

Oh, shepherds, ye whose flocks are men, not sheep!

Kings, who by reason hope to win and
keep 40

Th' allegiance of an alien population!

That never was the way to set

About your task—so try a net.

Force is your tool, not self-determination.

MOLIÈRE (1622-1673)

Jean Baptiste Poquelin, who adopted for stage and literary purposes the name of Molière, was the son of Louis XIV's court upholsterer and received an excellent education at Paris, where he seems to have begun the study of law, but when he was barely twenty, he became a strolling player and, not long after, a professional playwright, taking as his models the Italian, Spanish and older French plays then in vogue. Gifted by nature with keen common sense and a rich fund of humor, he developed his knowledge of the stage and of French life by years of touring in the provinces before he obtained a permanent foothold in Paris. Even there his satirical wit made him many enemies, and Louis XIV, with whom he was a favorite, had on more than one occasion to interfere to prevent one or other of his plays from being banished from the stage. His dramatic work is extensive and various, and even in comedy, in which he excelled, his scope extended from ballets and farces to social and literary satire of the highest order. To the latter class belong Les Précieuses (The Affected Ladies), Les Femmes Savantes (The Learned Ladies), Tartuffe (The Hypocrite), and Le Misanthrope; richer in humor are the lighter comedies such as Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, Le Médecin Malgré Lui (given below from the translation of A. R. Waller), and Le Malade Imaginaire (The Imaginary Invalid). Molière burst a blood vessel while acting the last play at the Théâtre Français and died within an hour. The royal influence had again to be exercised to secure the actor and playwright Christian burial. His position as the leading French dramatic author and one of the greatest names in French literature has been fully established by time, and among the world's dramatic masters he occupies a very high place. Although thoroughly French, his genius has a universal appeal, for his humor and satire are directed against failings which are characteristic of the human race in all countries and times.

ACT I

SCENE I

SGANARELLE, MARTINE [appearing on the stage quarreling]

Sg. No; I tell you, I will not do anything of the kind, it is for me to speak, and to be master.

Ma. And I tell you you shall live as I choose. I didn't marry you to put up with your freaks.

Sg. Oh! what a plaguy nuisance it is to have a wife! Aristotle was quite right when he said a woman is worse than a devil.

Ma. Look at the clever man with his blockhead of an Aristotle!

Sg. Yes, clever indeed. Find me a faggot-binder who can argue on things as I can, who has served a famous doctor for six years, and who, in his boyish years, had his rudiments by heart.

Ma. Plague on the arrant dolt!

Sg. Plague on the slut!

Ma. Cursed be the hour and the day when I took it into my head to say yes.

Sg. Cursed be the notary who made me sign my own ruination.

Ma. Truly it well becomes you to complain on that score. Ought you not rather to thank heaven every moment that you have me for a wife? Did you deserve to marry a woman like me?

Sg. It is true you did me too much honor, and I had good reason to thank my stars for my wedding night. Good Heavens! do not make me say too much: I might tell you certain things.

Ma. Well! what could you say?

Sg. Enough; let us drop the subject. It is sufficient that I know what I know, and you were very lucky to light on me.

Ma. What do you mean by very lucky to light on you? A fellow who will drive me to beggary, a drunken rascal who gobbles up all I have!

Sg. That is a lie: I drink part of it.

Ma. Who sells piecemeal everything there is in the house!

Sg. That is living on one's means.

Ma. Who has taken away even the bed from under me!

Sg. You will get up all the earlier.

Ma. In short, who does not leave me a stick in the whole house.

Sg. There will be less trouble when we move.

Ma. And who from morning to night does nothing but gamble and guzzle!

Sg. That is done to keep one's self out of the dumps.

Ma. And what do you intend me to do all the while with my family?

Sg. Whatever you like.

Ma. I have four poor little children on my hands.

Sg. Put them on the ground.

Ma. Who ask me every hour for bread.

Sg. Give them a birch rod. When I have had enough to eat and drink, everyone else ought to be gluttoned.

Ma. And you mean to tell me, you drunkard, that things can always go on like this.

Sg. Gently, wife, if you please.

Ma. That I am forever to put up with your insolence and debauchery?

Sg. Do not let us get into a passion, wife.

Ma. And that I do not know the way to bring you to a sense of your duty?

Sg. Wife, you know I have not a very patient nature, and that my arm is none of the lightest.

Ma. I laugh at your threats.

Sg. My sweet wife, my honey, your hide itches as usual.

Ma. I will soon let you see I am not afraid of you.

Sg. My better half, you have made up your mind to have a larruping.

Ma. Do you think I am frightened by your talk?

Sg. Sweet object of my love, I shall box your ears for you.

Ma. Drunkard!

Sg. I shall bang you.

Ma. Wine-cask!

Sg. I shall leather you.

Ma. Scoundrel!

Sg. I shall dress your hide.

Ma. Rascal! villain! knave! cur! scoundrel! hangdog! blackguard! wretch! scamp! rogue! thief!...

Sg. [He takes a stick and beats her] You will have it, then?

Ma. Oh! oh! oh! oh!

Sg. That is the smartest way to make you hold your tongue.

SCENE II

M. ROBERT, SGANARELLE, MARTINE

M. R. Hulloo, Hulloo, Hulloo! Fie! What is this? What a disgraceful thing! Plague take the coward to beat his wife like that.

Ma. [her hands on her hips: she speaks to him, and makes him draw back: at last she smacks his face] I like him to beat me.

M. R. Nay, then I agree with all my heart.

Ma. What have you to do with it?

M. R. I am wrong.

Ma. Is it your business?

M. R. You are right.

Ma. The impertinent fellow, to wish to hinder husbands from beating their wives.

M. R. I am sorry.

Ma. What have you to say to it?

M. R. Nothing.

Ma. Is it for you to poke your nose into it?

M. R. No.

Ma. Mind your own business.

M. R. I shall not utter another word.

Ma. I like being beaten.

M. R. Very well.

Ma. It does not sting you.

M. R. Quite true.

Ma. And you are a fool to interfere with what does not concern you.

M. R. [He goes up to the husband, who addresses him in the same fashion, making him go back, hitting him with the same stick and putting him to flight. He says at length:]

Neighbor, I ask your pardon with all my heart. Go on, whack and bash your wife about as much as you please; I will help you, if you like.

Sg. I do not like.

M. R. Ah! that is another thing.

Sg. I will beat her if I like: and if I do not like, I will not beat her.

M. R. Very well.

Sg. She is my wife, and not yours.

M. R. Certainly.

Sg. It is not for you to order me about.

M. R. I grant that.

Sg. I do not want your help.

M. R. All right.

Sg. And it is like your impudence to meddle with other people's concerns. Remember what Cicero says; that between the tree and the finger you must not thrust in the bark. [Then he comes back to his wife, and says to her, taking hold of her hand] Come now, let us make it up. Shake hands.

Ma. Yes, after you have beaten me like this.

Sg. Never mind that. Shake hands.

Ma. I will not.

Sg. Eh!

Ma. No.

Sg. My little wife!

Ma. No.

Sg. Come, I tell you.

Ma. I will not do anything of the kind.

Sg. Come, come, come.

Ma. No; I will be angry.

Sg. Come! it is a trifle. Come, come.

Ma. Leave me alone.

Sg. Shake hands, I tell you.

Ma. You have ill-used me too much.

Sg. Come now, I ask your pardon; give me your hand.

Ma. I forgive you; [she says the rest in a low voice] but you will have to pay for it.

Sg. You are silly to take notice of it; these are little things that are necessary now and then for friendship's sake: five or six strokes of a switch between folks who love each other only whet the affections. There, I am going to the wood, and I promise you more than a hundred faggots today.

SCENE III

Ma. [alone] Go, whatever pretense I make I shall not forget I have a score to settle with you. I am dying to find out something that will punish you for the blows you gave me. I know well enough that a wife has always at hand the means of being avenged on her husband; but that is too delicate a punishment for my hangdog. I want a revenge that shall make him smart a bit more, or it will not pay me for the insult I have received.

SCENE IV

VALÈRE, LUCAS, MARTINE

5

Luc. I'll be blowed if we haven't got a deuce of an errand; I don't know, neither, what I shall collar by it.

Val. What would you have us do, my poor foster-father? We must do as our master bids us: and, besides, we have both of us an interest in the health of his daughter, our mistress; for her wedding, which is put off through her sickness, will no doubt bring something in our way. Among her suitors, Horace, who is liberal, is the most likely to succeed, and, although she has shown some inclination for a certain Léandre, you know well that her father will never be willing to receive him for his son-in-law.

Ma. [musings, aside] Can I not think of some way of avenging myself?

Luc. What fancy has he taken into his head, since the doctors have all forgot their 25 Latin?

Val. You may often find by searching carefully what cannot be found at first; and frequently in the most unlikely places.

Ma. Yes; I must pay him out, no matter what it costs me. Those whacking blows stick in my gizzard; I cannot digest them, and . . . [She says all this musingly, so that, not noticing the two men, she knocks against them in turning round, and says to them:] Ah, gentlemen, I ask your pardon, I did not see you, I was puzzling my brains about something that bothers me.

Val. Everyone has his troubles in this world; we also are looking out for something that we should like to find.

Ma. Is it something in which I can help you?

Val. It may be so. We are trying to find some skilful man, some specialist, who might bring some relief to our master's daughter: she is seized with an illness which has suddenly deprived her of her power of speech. Several doctors have already exhausted all their art in her behalf; but sometimes one may find persons with wonderful secrets and certain special remedies, who very often succeed where others have failed; that is the sort of man we are looking for.

Ma. [She says the first lines to herself] Ah! This is an inspiration from Heaven to avenge myself on my hangdog. [Aloud] You could never have fallen in with anyone better able to get you what you want. We have a man here, the most marvelous fellow in the world for desperate illnesses.

Val. Ah! for mercy's sake, where can we find him?

Ma. You will find him now in that little place there, where he is amusing himself in chopping wood.

Luc. A doctor chopping wood!

Val. You mean who is amusing himself in gathering herbs?

Ma. No; he is an odd fellow who pleases himself in that way; a fantastic, eccentric, fanciful man, whom you would never take to be what he is. He goes about dressed in an absurd way, pretends sometimes to appear ignorant, keeps his learning to himself, and dislikes nothing so much every day as using the wonderful talents which Heaven has given him in the art of medicine.

Val. It is a strange thing that all these great men have always some caprice, some slight alloy of madness mixed with their learning.

Ma. The madness of this man is greater than you can imagine, for sometimes he has even to be thrashed before he will own his skill. I warn you that you will not succeed, that he will never own he is a doctor if the whim is on him, unless you each take a stick and thrash him until you make him confess at last what he will hide at first. We use him like that when we need him.

Val. What a strange whim!

Ma. It is true; but, when that is over, you will see him work wonders.

Val. What is he called?

Ma. He is called Sganarelle. But it is easy to recognize him. He is a man with a large black beard, and wears a ruff, and a yellow and green coat.

Luc. A yellow and green coat! He must be fit to be a parrot-doctor.

Val. But is it really true he is as skilful as you say?

Ma. Ah! He works miracles. About six months ago, a woman was given up by all the other doctors; for six hours they thought her dead, and they were going to bury her, when they dragged the man we are speaking of to her by force. Having seen her, he poured a small drop of something in her mouth; at that very moment she rose from her bed, and began to walk about her room at once as if nothing had happened.

Luc. Ah!

Val. It must have been a golden drug.

Ma. Possibly it was. Not more than three weeks ago a young lad of twelve years old fell from the top of the belfry, and smashed his skull, arms and legs on the pavement. They had no sooner brought our man on the scene than he rubbed the whole body with a certain ointment, which he is clever at; and the lad got up at once on his legs, and ran away to play at chuck-farthing.

Luc. Ah!

Val. This man must have the universal elixir.

Ma. No one doubts it.

Luc. By jingo! yon's the very man we want. Let's look sharp and fetch him.

Val. We are much obliged to you for the service you have done us.

Ma. But do not fail to remember the warning I gave you.

Luc. Goodness me, leave it to us. If he only wants a tannin', we've got the hide.

Val. We are very lucky to have had this meeting. I am very hopeful about the result.

SCENE V

SGANARELLE, VALÈRE, LUCAS

Sg. [enters on the stage singing, and holding a bottle] La, la, la.

Val. I hear someone singing and chopping wood.

Sg. La, la, la, . . . Really I have done enough for one spell. Let us take a little breath. [He drinks and, after this, he says:] This wood is devilish salt. [Sings:]

What pleasure's so sweet as the bottle can give,

What music's so good as thy little gull-gull!

My fate might be envied by all on the earth

Were my dear jolly flask but constantly full.

Say why, my sweet bottle, I pray thee, say why,

Since, full you're delightful, you ever are dry?

Come on! we must not have the blues.

Val. That is he himself.

Luc. I think you're right; we've hit on him straight.

Val. Let us look nearer.

Sg. [seeing them, he looks at them, turning toward one and then toward the other, lowers his voice, and says:] Ah! my little rogue!

How I love you, my pretty darling. My fate . . . might be envied . . . by all . . . on the earth.—What the deuce do these people want?

Val. It is surely he.

Luc. That's him, the very spit of him, as he was made out to us.

Sg. [puts his bottle on the ground, and Valère stooping down to salute him he thinks it is in order to rob him of it, so he puts it on the other side; then, as Lucas does the same thing, he takes it up again, and hugs it against his stomach with various gestures, and so makes plenty of 'business.'] [Aside] 10 They are consulting each other while looking at me. What can they mean?

Val. Monsieur, is not your name Sganarelle?

Sg. Eh! What?

Val. I ask you if your name is not Sganarelle.

Sg. [turning first to Valère, then to Lucas] Yes, and no. It depends on what you want with him.

Val. We do not want anything with him except to offer him our cordial greetings.

Sg. In that case, my name is Sganarelle.

Val. We are delighted to have met you, Monsieur. We have been recommended to 25 you for what we are in need of: we have come to beg your help, of which we are in want.

Sg. If it is anything, gentlemen, that concerns my little trade, I am very ready to 30 serve you.

Val. You are too kind to us, Monsieur. But, pray, put on your hat, Monsieur, the sun might hurt you.

Luc. Clap it on, Master.

Sg. [aside] How very ceremonious these people are.

Val. You must not think it strange that we have come to you, Monsieur. Skilful people are always much sought after, and we have 40 been told of your ability.

Sg. It is true, gentlemen, that I am the best man in the world at making faggots.

Val. Ah! Monsieur.

Sg. I do not spare any pains. I make 45 them in such a manner that leaves nothing to be desired.

Val. That is not the question we have come about, Monsieur.

Sg. But I sell them at ten sous the hundred.

Val. Let us not talk about that, if you please.

Sg. I promise you I cannot sell them for less.

Val. We know what is what, Monsieur.

Sg. If you know what is what, you know I sell them thus.

Val. You are jesting, Monsieur, and . . .

Sg. I am not jesting: I cannot take any less.

Val. Pray, now, let us talk differently.

Sg. You may find someone else who will let you have them for less; there are faggots and faggots; but for those I make . . .

Val. Ah! Monsieur, let us cease talking like this.

Sg. I swear you shall not have them for a farthing less.

Val. Oh! Fie!

Sg. No, on my word, you will have to pay that. I am talking to you frankly. I am not 15 the man to overcharge.

Val. Ought a gentleman like you, Monsieur, to amuse himself with these absurd pretenses, and demean himself to talk thus? Ought so learned a man, such a skilful doctor 20 as you are, wish to disguise himself from the eyes of the world, and keep buried the great talents he possesses?

Sg. [aside] He is mad.

Val. Pray, Monsieur, do not dissemble 25 with us.

Sg. What do you mean?

Luc. All this flimflam's neither here nor there. I know what I know.

Sg. What is it, then? What do you want to say to me? For whom do you take me?

Val. For what you are, a great doctor.

Sg. Doctor yourself; I am not one; I have never been one.

Val. [aside] Now his fit is on him. [Aloud] 35 Do not hide matters longer, Monsieur, and do not, we beseech you, cause us to take extreme measures.

Sg. What do you mean?

Val. Certain things we should be sorry to 40 do.

Sg. Goodness me! Come on and do what you like. I am not a doctor. I do not understand what you are talking about.

Val. [aside] Well, I see we shall have to apply the remedy. [Aloud] Once more, Monsieur, I beg you will admit what you are.

Luc. Now then, don't let's have no more shamming; say outright you're a doctor.

Sg. This makes me wild.

Val. What is the good of denying what everybody knows?

Luc. Why all these lies? What's the good of 'em?

Sg. One word is as good as two thousand, 55 gentlemen. I tell you I am not a doctor.

Val. You are not a doctor?

Sg. No.

Luc. You ain't a doctor?

Sg. No, I tell you.

Val. Since you will have it so, we must make up our minds to it. [They take sticks and thrash him.]

Sg. Ah! ah! gentlemen! I will be everything you like.

Val. Why do you force us to use this violence, Monsieur?

Luc. What's the good of bothering us to wallop you?

Val. I assure you I regret it with all my heart.

Luc. I'll take my davy I'm sorry for it, I tell you straight.

Sg. What the devil is this, gentlemen? For pity's sake, is it a joke, or are you both gone out of your wits, that you wish to make out I am a doctor?

Val. What! you do not give in yet, you deny that you are a doctor?

Sg. The devil take me if I am one!

Luc. It ain't true you're a doctor?

Sg. No, plague choke me! [Upon this they begin again to beat him] Ah! ah! Oh well! gentlemen, yes, since you will have it so, I am a doctor, I am a doctor, an apothecary too, if you think well. I had rather agree to everything than be bashed about.

Val. Ah! that is all right, Monsieur; I am delighted to see you so reasonable.

Luc. It does my heart good to hear you talk like that.

Val. I ask your pardon with all my heart.

Luc. I hope you'll overlook the liberty I took.

Sg. [aside] Bless my soul! Am I really deceived, and have I become a doctor without knowing it?

Val. You shall not have cause to regret, Monsieur, having told us what you are; you shall certainly be satisfied.

Sg. But tell me, gentlemen, may you not yourselves be mistaken? Is it quite certain I am a doctor?

Luc. Yes, by gum!

Sg. Really and truly?

Val. Undoubtedly.

Sg. The devil take me if I knew it!

Val. Why, you are the most skilful doctor in the world.

Sg. Ah! ah!

Luc. A doctor who's mended I don't know how many complaints.

Sg. The deuce I did!

Val. A woman was thought dead for six hours; they were going to bury her, when you, with a drop of something, brought her to again, and at once made her walk about the room.

Sg. The plague I did!

Luc. A little lad of twelve years fell from the top of the belfry, and got his head, legs and arms smashed; and you, with some ointment or other, made him jump on his feet, and off he went to play chuck-farthing.

Sg. The devil I did!

Val. In short, Monsieur, you will be satisfied with us, and we will pay you any fee you like, if you will allow us to take you where we want to take you.

Sg. I shall have what fees I choose?

Val. Yes.

Sg. In that case I am a doctor, without dispute. I had forgotten it; but I remember it now. What is the matter? Where am I to go?

Val. We will conduct you. We want you to see a girl who has lost her speech.

Sg. Indeed! I have not found it.

Val. He loves to joke! Come, Monsieur.

Sg. Without a doctor's gown?

Val. We will get one.

Sg. [giving his bottle to Valère] You carry this: it is where I put my juleps. [Then, turning towards Lucas, and spitting] And you can step on that by order of the doctor.

Luc. By jingo! I like this doctor. I think he'll get on, for he's fond of a lark.

ACT II

SCENE I

GÉRONTE, VALÈRE, LUCAS, JACQUELINE

Val. Yes, Monsieur, I think you will be satisfied; we have brought you the greatest doctor in the world.

Luc. Oh! my eyes! you can let the others go hang after this one: the rest aren't fit to lick his boots.

Val. He is a man who has performed some marvelous cures.

Luc. He's mended folks after they were dead.

Val. He is rather whimsical, as I have told you; sometimes his mind wanders, and he does not seem to be what he really is.

Luc. Yes, he loves a joke; you'll excuse me, but, as a body may say, he's got a tile loose somewhere.

Val. But, in reality, this is all learning;

he very often says things quite beyond one's understanding.

Luc. When he sets about it, he talks as fine as if he were reading a book.

Val. He has already a great reputation here, everyone comes to him.

Gér. I should much like to see him; send him to me quickly.

Val. I will go and fetch him.

Jac. You may take my word for it, Master, this one'll do just the same as all the rest. I think it's six of one and half a dozen of the others; I think the best medicine to give your daughter would be a fine strapping husband, whom she could fancy.

Gér. Lord bless my soul, good Nurse, you are over meddlesome.

Luc. Hold your tongue, Mother Jacqueline; it isn't for you to poke your nose in there.

Jac. I say and I sez that all these doctors 'll do her no more good than a swig o' water; your daughter wants summat else than rhubarb and senna; a husband's a plaster what cures all lasses' complaints.

Gér. Would anyone have her as she is now, with her affliction? When I intended her to marry, did she not oppose my wishes?

Jac. No wonder. You wanted to give her a man she didn't like. Why not give her to Monsieur Léandre, who takes her fancy? She'd be good enough, and I bet he'd take her as she is, if you were to give her to him.

Gér. Léandre is not the man we want; he has not a fortune like the other.

Jac. He's got an uncle who's rich, and he'll come into the money.

Gér. All these expectations seem to me to be moonshine. A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush: we run a great risk in waiting for dead men's shoes. Death is not eager to listen to the desires and prayers of young heirs; teeth go on growing all the same, while one's waiting for somebody's death.

Jac. However, I've always heard say that in marriage, as in everything else, better be happy than rich. Fathers and mothers all have this cursed habit of asking, 'How much has he got?' and 'How much has she got?' 50 Gaffer Peter married his Simonette to that lout of a Thomas 'cos he'd got a paltry scrap of a vineyard more'n young Robin had, whom the lass had a mind to: and now the poor critter's as yaller's a guinea, and is no better for marrying. That's a good example for you, Master. What's the good of anything if you can't be happy? I'd sooner give my daughter a lusty fellow that she likes, than all the riches in the countryside.

Gér. Bless me, Nurse, how you prate! Hold your tongue, for goodness' sake: you bother yourself too much: you will spoil your milk.

Luc. [While he says this, he slaps Géronte's chest] Come, no more of yer chatter, you sauce-box. Master doesn't want your jaw: he knows what he's about. All you've got to do is to suckle your baby, without argifying so much. Master's the lass's father, and he's good enough and 'cute enough to know what's good for her.

Gér. Gently, I say, gently!

Luc. I want to take her down a peg, Master, and teach her how she ought to behave to you.

Gér. Very well. But it does not need all this gesticulation.

SCENE II

VALÈRE, SGANarelle, GÉRONTE, LUCAS, JACQUELINE

Val. Look out, Monsieur, here is our doctor coming.

Gér. I am delighted to see you here, Monsieur: we have very great need of you.

Sg. [in a doctor's gown, with a very pointed cap] Hippocrates says . . . that we should both put on our hats.

Gér. Hippocrates says that?

Sg. Yes.

Gér. In which chapter, if you please!

Sg. In his chapter on hats.

Gér. Since Hippocrates says so, it must be so.

Sg. Having heard, Doctor, of the marvelous things . . .

Gér. To whom are you speaking, pray?

Sg. To you.

Gér. I am not a doctor.

Sg. You are not a doctor?

Gér. Indeed I am not.

Sg. [Sganarelle now takes a stick and thrashes him in the same way that he was thrashed] Really?

Gér. Really. Oh! Oh! Oh!

Sg. Now you are a doctor: I have never taken any other degree.

Gér. What a devil of a fellow you have brought here!

Val. Did I not tell you he was an eccentric doctor?

Gér. Yes; but I would like to send him about his business with his eccentricities.

Luc. Don't take no notice of it, Master. It's only his joking.

Gér. That kind of joke does not suit me.

Sg. I beg your pardon, Monsieur, for the liberty I have taken.

Gér. I am your servant, Monsieur.

Sg. I am sorry . . .

Gér. It is nothing.

Sg. For the thrashing . . .

Gér. There is no harm done.

Sg. Which I have had the honor to give you.

Gér. Do not say any more about that. I have a daughter, Monsieur, who has fallen ill of a strange complaint.

Sg. I am delighted, Monsieur, that your daughter has need of me. I wish with all my heart, that you had need of me also, you and all your family, so that I might make evident my wish to serve you.

Gér. I am obliged to you for these desires.

Sg. I assure you I speak from my very heart.

Gér. You do me too much honor.

Sg. What is your daughter's name?

Gér. Lucinde.

Sg. Lucinde! Ah! a pretty name to physic! Lucinde!

Gér. I will just see what she is doing.

Sg. Who is that tall woman?

Gér. She is my baby's nurse.

Sg. My eyes! what a fine piece of household furniture. Ah! Nurse! Charming Nurse! my doctorship is the very humble slave of your nurseship, and I wish I were the happy bantling who sucks the milk of your good graces. All my science, all my skill, all my cleverness, is at your service; and . . .

Luc. Here, Mr. Doctor, you just leave my wife alone, I say.

Sg. What! is she your wife?

Luc. Yes.

Sg. [He pretends to embrace Lucas, and turning to the Nurse, embraces her] Oh, indeed! I did not know that, but I am very glad of it for both your sakes.

Luc. [pulling Sganarelle away] Stop that, I say.

Sg. I assure you I am delighted you are mated together. I congratulate her upon having [he again pretends to embrace Lucas, and, slipping under his arms, throws himself on the neck of his wife] such a husband as you; and I congratulate you upon having so handsome, so sober, and so buxom a wife as she is.

Luc. [pulling him away again] Now then, don't be so free with compliments, d'ye hear?

Sg. I rejoice with you over such a pleasant union.

Luc. As much as you like with me, but you can cut your palaver short with my wife.

Sg. I have the happiness of both of you equally at heart; and [he continues the same by-play] if I embrace you to show my delight in yours, I embrace her in the same way to show my delight in hers.

Luc. [pulling him away once more] Upon my word, Mr. Doctor, you're a nice fellow!

SCENE IV

15 LUCINDE, VALÈRE, GÉRONTE, LUCAS, SGANARELLE, JACQUELINE

Sg. Is this the patient?

20 Gér. Yes. I have but one daughter; I should never get over it, were she to die.

Sg. Do not let her do anything of the sort. She must not die without a doctor's prescription.

25 Gér. Bring a chair here.

Sg. This is not at all a disagreeable patient. I don't think she would be at all amiss for a sound healthy fellow.

Gér. You have made her laugh, Monsieur.

30 Sg. So much the better. It is the best symptom imaginable when a doctor makes his patient laugh. Well, what is the matter? What ails you? Where are your pains?

Lucin. [replies by signs, putting her hand to her mouth, to her head, and under her chin] Ha, hi, ha, ha, hi, ho.

Sg. Eh! what is that?

Lucin. [continues the same gestures] Ha, hi, ho, ha, ha, hi, ho.

40 Sg. What?

Lucin. Ha, hi, ho.

Sg. [imitating her] Ha, hi, ho, ha, ha: I do not understand you. What the deuce of a language is that?

Gér. That is just what her complaint is, Monsieur. She became dumb, without our knowing the cause. It is this accident that has compelled us to put off the marriage.

Sg. Why is that?

Gér. The man she is going to marry wishes to wait for her to get better before concluding the marriage.

Sg. Who is the fool that does not want his wife to be dumb? Would to heaven that mine had that disease! I should take very good care not to have her cured.

Gér. Well, Monsieur, I beg of you to use all your skill to cure her of this malady.

Sg. Do not be anxious. Tell me, does this affliction trouble her much?

Gér. Yes, Monsieur.

Sg. So much the better. Is the pain very acute?

Gér. Very acute.

Sg. That is quite right. Does she go to . . . you know where?

Gér. Yes.

Sg. Freely?

Gér. I do not know anything about that.

Sg. Is the matter all that could be desired?

Gér. I do not understand these things.

Sg. [turning to the patient] Let me feel your pulse. This tells me your daughter is dumb.

Gér. Yes, Monsieur, that is just what is the matter with her; you have found it out at once.

Sg. Ah, ah!

Jac. See how he's fathomed what's the matter wⁱ her.

Sg. We great doctors, we know things instantly. An ignoramus would have been puzzled, and would have said to you: it is this, it is that, but I hit the nail on the head with the first stroke: I tell you your daughter is dumb.

Gér. Yes. But I would very much like you to tell me how this happened.

Sg. There is nothing easier: it is because she has lost her speech.

Gér. Very good: but what was the cause of this loss of speech?

Sg. All our best authorities will tell you that it arises from an impediment in the action of her tongue.

Gér. But, nevertheless, let us have your opinion on this impediment in the action of her tongue.

Sg. Aristotle on this subject says . . . many clever things.

Gér. I can quite believe it.

Sg. Ah! he was a great man!

Gér. No doubt.

Sg. [holding out his arm from the elbow] A very great man. A man who was greater than I am by this much. But to return to our argument: I am of opinion that this impediment in the action of her tongue is caused by certain humors, which we learned men call peccant humors; peccant—that is to say . . . peccant humors; for, as the vapors formed by the exhalations of the influences which arise in the very region of diseases, coming . . . as we may say . . . to . . . Do you understand Latin?

Gér. Not in the least.

Sg. [rising astonished] You do not understand Latin?

Gér. No.

Sg. [assuming various comic attitudes] Cabricias arci thuram, catalamus, singulariter, nominativo, haec Musa, 'the Muse,' bonus, bona, bonum, Deus sanctus, estne oratio latinas? Etiam, 'Yes.' Quare? 'Why?' Quia substantivo et adjectivum concordat in generi, numerum, et casus.

Gér. Ah! why did I not study!

Jac. What a clever 'un he is.

Luc. Yes, it's so fine that I don't understand a word of it.

Sg. Thus these vapors, of which I speak, passing from the left side, where the liver is, to the right side, where the heart is, it so happens that the lungs, which in Latin we speak of as armyan, communicating with the brain, which in Greek we style nasmus, by means of the venæ cavæ, which in Hebrew we call cubile, in their course meet the said vapors, which fill the ventricles of the omoplate; and as the said vapors . . . please follow this argument, closely; and as these said vapors are gifted with a certain malignity . . . listen well to this, I beseech you.

Gér. Yes.

Sg. Are gifted with a certain malignity which is caused . . . please pay attention to this.

Gér. I am doing so.

Sg. Which is caused by the acridity of these humors engendered in the concavity of the diaphragm, it so happens that these vapors . . . Ossabandus, nequeys, nequer potarium, quipsa milus. That is precisely the reason your daughter is dumb.

Jac. Ah! How well the gentleman explains it all!

Luc. Why doesn't my tongue wag as well as his?

Gér. No one could possibly argue better. There is but one thing that baffles me; that is the whereabouts of the liver and the heart. It seems to me that you place them differently from where they are; the heart is on the left side, and the liver on the right.

Sg. Yes; this was so formerly; but we have changed all that, and nowadays we practise medicine in an entirely different way.

Gér. I did not know that. I hope you will pardon my ignorance.

Sg. There is no harm done, you have no need to be so clever as we are.

Gér. Certainly not. But what do you think, Monsieur, ought to be done for this affliction?

Sg. What do I think ought to be done?

Gér. Yes.

Sg. My advice is that she be put to bed again, and, for a remedy, you must make her take plenty of bread soaked in wine.

Gér. Why so, Monsieur?

Sg. Because in bread and wine when mixed together there is a sympathetic virtue which produces speech. Do you not remember that they give nothing else to parrots, and that it teaches them to speak?

Gér. That is true. Oh! what a great man you are! Quick, bring plenty of bread and wine.

Sg. I shall come back tonight to see how she is getting on. [To the Nurse] You stop a little. I must give some medicine to your nurse, Monsieur.

Jac. To whom? Me? I'm as well as can be.

Sg. So much the worse, Nurse, so much the worse. Too much health is a dangerous thing: it would not be amiss to bleed you a little, gently, and to administer a slight soothing injection.

Gér. But, Monsieur, I do not understand this method. Why bleed people who are not ill?

Sg. It does not signify: the method is salutary; even as we drink in advance to quench thirst, so must we bleed for the coming disease.

Jac. [going] Get along with you. I don't care a fig for all this. I won't have my carcass made a chemist's shop.

Sg. So you object to my remedies. Well, we shall know how to bring you to reason. [Speaking to G ronte] I wish you good day.

G r. Just wait a moment, please.

Sg. What do you want?

G r. To give you your fee, Monsieur.

Sg. [holding his hand from under his gown, while G ronte opens his purse] I shall not take it, Monsieur.

G r. Monsieur . . .

Sg. Not at all.

G r. One moment.

Sg. Under no circumstances.

G r. I beseech you.

Sg. You are jesting.

G r. That is settled.

Sg. I will not.

G r. What!

Sg. I do not practise for money.

G r. I am sure of that.

Sg. [after having taken the money] Is it good weight?

G r. Yes, Monsieur.

Sg. I am not a mercenary doctor.

G r. That I readily believe.

Sg. I am not inspired by interested considerations.

G r. I do not for a moment think it.

SGANARELLE, L ANDRE

Sg. [alone, looking at his money] Upon my word, this does not turn out badly; and provided that . . .

L . I have been waiting for you some time, Monsieur. I have come to beg your help.

Sg. [feeling his pulse] Your pulse is very bad.

L . I am not ill, Monsieur: it is not for that I came to see you.

Sg. If you are not ill, why the deuce do you not say so?

L . No. To tell you the matter in a few words, my name is L andre. I am in love with Lucinde, whom you have just seen; and, as all access to her is denied me, through the ill-will of her father, I venture to beseech you to help me in my love affair, and to assist me in carrying out a plan I have devised to enable me to say a few words to her: my life and happiness entirely depend on my doing this.

Sg. [feigning anger] For whom do you take me? How dare you address yourself to me to help you in your love affair, and seek to lower the dignity of a doctor by such an employment?

L . Do not make a noise, Monsieur.

Sg. [driving him back] I will make a noise. You are an impudent rogue.

L . Ah! gently, Monsieur.

Sg. An ill-mannered puppy.

L . I beseech you.

Sg. I will teach you I am not the sort of man you take me for: it is the most audacious insolence . . .

L . [taking out a purse which he gives him] Monsieur . . .

Sg. [taking the purse] To wish to employ me. . . . I am not speaking of you, for you are a gentleman, and I shall be delighted to be of service to you. But there are some impudent fellows in this world who take people for what they are not; and I tell you frankly they make my passions rise.

Lé. I beg your pardon, Monsieur, for the liberty I have . . .

Sg. Don't mention it. What is the business in question?

Lé. I must tell you, Monsieur, that this illness which you want to cure is a sham illness. The doctors have argued about it, to the extent of their powers, and they have not failed to say—this one, that in his opinion, it arises from the brain; that one, from the intestines; another, from the spleen; another, from the liver; the truth is, love is the sole cause; Lucinde has only feigned this illness in order to free herself from a marriage which is hateful to her. But lest we should be seen together, let us go away from here; I will tell you as we walk along what I wish from you.

Sg. Very well, Monsieur. You have inspired me with an inconceivable interest in your love; and if all my physic does not fail me, the patient shall either die or be yours.

ACT III

SCENE I

SGANARELLE, LÉANDRE

30

Lé. I do not think I make a bad apothecary; and, as her father has hardly ever seen me, this change of dress and wig is probably sufficient, I imagine, to disguise me in his eyes.

Sg. There is no doubt of it.

Lé. Only I wish I knew five or six long medical words to mix in my conversation, and to give me the air of a clever man.

Sg. Nonsense, nonsense; it is not at all necessary. The dress is sufficient; I don't know any more about it than you do.

Lé. What?

Sg. The deuce take me if I understand anything about physic! You are a gentleman, and I am perfectly willing to confide in you, as you have confided in me.

Lé. What! Then you are not really . . .

Sg. No, I tell you. They have made me a doctor in spite of my teeth. I never tried to be so learned as that; all my studies came to an end in the sixth and lowest class. I do not know what put the whim in their heads, but when I saw that in spite of everything they would have it that I was a doctor, I made up my mind to be one at other people's expense. You would not believe, however, how this error has spread, and how everyone is full of it, and believes me to be a great man. They come to fetch me on all sides; and, if things go on always in this way, I have made up my mind to stick to physic all my life. I find that it is the best trade of all; for, whether we do right or wrong, we are paid just the same. Blunders never do us a bad turn; we cut away the material we have to work with as we choose. A shoemaker, in making a pair of shoes, cannot spoil a scrap of leather without having to pay for it; but in our trade we can spoil a man without its costing us a farthing. The blunders are never put down to our charge: it is always the fault of the fellow who dies. In short, the best of this profession is, that there is the greatest excellence and discretion current among the dead; for they have never yet been known to complain of the doctor who killed them.

Lé. It is true the dead are very honorable fellows in this respect.

Sg. [seeing some people come toward him]

25 Here are some people who seem as though they wished to consult me. Go and wait for me near the house of your lady-love.

SCENE VI

JACQUELINE, LUCINDE, GÉRONTE, LÉANDRE, SGANARELLE

35 Jac. Here's your daughter, Master: she wishes to walk a bit.

Sg. It will do her good. Go to her, Mr. Apothecary, and feel her pulse, and I will consult with you presently about her malady.

40 [At this point he draws Geronte to one side of the stage, puts one arm on his shoulder, places his hand under his chin, and makes him turn toward him, each time that Geronte wants to look at what is going on between his daughter and the apothecary, while he holds the following discourse with him to keep him occupied]

Monsieur, it is a great and subtle question among doctors whether women or men are most easy to cure. Pray listen to this. Some say 'no, some say 'yes'; I say both 'yes' and 'no'; forasmuch as the incongruity of the opaque humors, which are found in the natural temperament of women, causes the animal part to struggle ever for mastery over the spiritual, we find that the inequality of their opinions depends on the oblique motion of the circle of the moon; and as the sun, which darts its rays on the concavity of the earth, meets . . .

Lucin. No; I can never change my feelings.

Gér. Hark! my daughter speaks! O the great virtue of physic! O excellent Doctor! How deeply am I indebted to you, Monsieur, for this marvelous cure! How can I repay you for such a service?

Sg. [strutting about the stage, wiping his forehead] This case has given me much trouble.

Lucin. Yes, father, I have recovered my speech; but I have recovered it only to tell you I will never have any other husband than Léandre, and that it is useless for you to try to give me to Horace.

Gér. But . . .

Lucin. Nothing will shake the resolution I have taken.

Gér. What . . . ?

Lucin. All your fine arguments will be in vain.

Gér. If . . .

Lucin. Nothing you say will have any effect.

Gér. I . . .

Lucin. I have made up my mind on the subject.

Gér. But . . .

Lucin. No paternal authority can force me to marry against my will.

Gér. I have . . .

Lucin. You may try as much as you like.

Gér. It . . .

Lucin. My heart cannot submit to such a tyranny.

Gér. There . . .

Lucin. And I will sooner go into a convent than marry a man I do not love.

Gér. But . . .

Lucin. [speaking in a piercing tone of voice] No. Not by any means. It is of no use. You waste your breath. I will not do anything of the kind. I am determined.

Gér. Ah! what a torrent of words! One cannot stand against it. I beseech you, Monsieur, to make her dumb again.

Sg. That is impossible. All that I can do for you is to make you deaf, if you like.

Gér. Many thanks. Do you think . . .

Lucin. No; all your arguments will not have the least effect on me.

Sg. Stop, for Heaven's sake! Let me take this affair in hand: it is a disease that has got hold of her, and I know the remedy for it.

Gér. Is it really possible, Monsieur, that you can cure this affliction of the mind also?

Sg. Yes; let me arrange it. I have remedies for everything; and our apothecary is the man for this cure. [He calls the apothecary and speaks to him] One word. You see that the passion she has for this Léandre is altogether against the wishes of her father; that there is no time to lose; that the humors are very acrimonious; and that it is important to find a remedy for this complaint without loss of time, since it may become worse by delay. For my part, I see but one remedy, which is a dose of purgative flight, mixed, as it ought to be, with two drachms of matrimonium, in pills. Perhaps she may object to this remedy; but as you are a clever man in your calling, you must persuade her to agree to it, and make her swallow the thing as best you can. Go and take a little turn in the garden with her to prepare the humors, while I talk here with her father; but, above all, do not lose a moment. Apply the remedy at once, apply the specific remedy.

SCENE VII

GÉRONTE, SGANARELLE

Gér. What drugs are those you have just mentioned, Monsieur? I do not remember ever to have heard of them before.

Sg. They are drugs which are only used in urgent cases.

Gér. Did you ever see such insolence as hers?

Sg. Daughters are somewhat obstinate at times.

Gér. You would hardly believe how infatuated she is over this Léandre.

Sg. The heat of the blood causes these things in young people.

Gér. Well, the moment I found out the violence of this passion, I took care to keep my daughter always under lock and key.

Sg. You acted wisely.

Gér. And I prevented the slightest communication passing between them.

Sg. Quite right.

Gér. They would have committed some folly or other, if they had been allowed to see each other.

Sg. Undoubtedly.

Gér. I think she is just the girl who would have eloped with him.

Sg. You have acted prudently.

Gér. I was warned that he tried every means to see her.

Sg. The villain!

Gér. But he will waste his time.

Sg. Ah! ah!

Gér. I will take good care he does not see her.

Sg. He has no fool to deal with; you know some tricks he doesn't guess. A cleverer than you is no fool.

SCENE VIII

LUCAS, GÉRONTE, SGANARELLE

Luc. Oh Lord! Master, here's a fine to do. Your daughter's run away with her Léandre. It was him as played the 'poth-ecary, and this is t' doctor what's performed t' operation.

Gér. What! to use me in this manner! Quick, fetch the police, and see he does not go away. Ah, villain! I will have you punished by the law.

Luc. I give you my word, Mister Doctor, you'll swing for this. Don't budge a step.

SCENE IX

MARTINE, SGANARELLE, LUCAS

Ma. Good gracious! what a bother I have had to find this place! Just tell me what has become of the doctor I recommended to you?

Luc. Here he is; just going to be hanged.

Ma. What! my husband hanged! Alas, what has he done to deserve that?

Luc. He's helped someone to bolt with our Master's daughter.

Ma. Alas, my dear husband, is it true you are going to be hanged?

Sg. You see. Ah!

Ma. Will they put you to death before so many people?

Sg. What can I do?

Ma. If you had only finished chopping our wood, I should be somewhat comforted.

Sg. Go away, you break my heart.

Ma. No, I will stay and encourage you to die; I will not leave you until I have seen you hanged.

Sg. Ah!

SCENE X

GÉRONTE, SGANARELLE, MARTINE, LUCAS

Gér. The official will be here soon, and we shall put you in a place of safety where they will answer for you.

Sg. [hat in hand] Alas! will not a few blows with a stick do instead?

Gér. No, no; the law shall decide. But what do I see?

SCENE XI

LÉANDRE, LUCINDE, JACQUELINE, LUCAS, GÉRONTE, SGANARELLE, MARTINE

Lé. Monsieur, I appear before you as Léandre, and I am come to restore Lucinde to your authority. We intended to run away and be married; but this intention has yielded to a more honorable proceeding. I will not venture to steal your daughter from you: it is from your hands alone that I will receive her. I have at the same time to acquaint you, Monsieur, that I have just now received letters which tell me of the death of my uncle, and that he has left me heir to all his fortune.

Gér. Monsieur, your virtue is worthy of the greatest consideration: I give you my daughter with the utmost pleasure in the world.

Sg. Physic has had a narrow escape.

Ma. Since you are not going to be hanged, you may thank me for making you a doctor: it was I who gained you that honor.

Sg. Yes, it was you gained me I do not know how many thwacks with a stick.

Lé. The result has proved too fortunate for you to harbor any grudge.

Sg. Be it so. I forgive you the beating because of the dignity to which you have raised me; but be prepared henceforth to show greater respect toward a man of my consequence; and remember that the anger of a doctor is more to be feared than people imagine.

LESAGE (1668-1747)

Gil Blas has been generally appreciated as the classical example of the autobiography of a picaro or rogue, for the expedient of making the villain of the piece into the hero occurred early in the history of fiction; but Alain René Lesage, who combined native common sense with the skill of a professional writer, was wise enough to make his hero not too villainous and to have his story tell on the side of good morals. His chief aim, however, was, as he himself puts it, 'to represent life as it is,' and he may justly be regarded as one of the founders of modern realism. Smollett, who translated Gil Blas into English, shows obvious indebtedness to Lesage in his own novels, and so does Fielding. Indeed, most modern novelists, including Gogol in Russian, Maupassant in French, and Thackeray and many others in English, have seen the advantages offered by the device of an adventurous and not too scrupulous hero, whose wandering life takes him into various scenes and brings him into contact with all sorts and conditions of men. Lesage, from motives of prudence, shifted his general scene from France to Spain, but he wrote from his own experience of the world as he knew it in the eighteenth century in Paris. The twelve books of Gil Blas were published in three parts, the first when Lesage was 47, the second when he was 56, and the third when he was 67. The advancing years of the author correspond with the maturity of his hero and account, not only for the latter's growth in prudence and worldly-wisdom, but for the greater restraint of the author's invention, though he keeps to the last an amused and lively sympathy with human nature as he found it, and as it still is, in spite of the changes of time and place. Gil Blas, proceeding by his own cleverness from footman to confidential secretary, and from a secretaryship to a place of political influence and a patent of nobility, retires to the country to pass a quiet old age amid the joys of family life.

THE WATER CURE

FROM BOOK II, CH. 3 AND 4

I determined to throw myself in the way of Signor Arias de Londona, and to look out for a new berth in his register; but as I was on my way to No Thoroughfare, who should come across me but Doctor Sangrado, whom I had not seen since the day of my master's death. I took the liberty of touching my hat. He kenne'd me in a twinkling, though I had changed my dress; and with as much warmth as his temperament would allow him: 'Hey day!' said he, 'the very lad I wanted to see; you have never been out of my thought. I have occasion for a clever fellow about me, and pitched upon you as the very thing, if you can read and write.' 'Sir,' replied I, 'if that is all you require, I am your man.' 'In that case,' rejoined he, 'we need look no further. Come home with me; it will be all comfort: I shall behave to you like a brother. You will have no wages, but everything will be found you. You shall eat and drink according to the true faith, and be taught to cure all diseases. In a word, you shall rather be my young Sangrado than my footman.'

I closed in with the doctor's proposal, in the hope of becoming an Esculapius under so inspired a master. He carried me home on the spur of the occasion, to instal me in my honorable employment; which honorable employment consisted in writing down the name and residence of the patients who sent for him in his absence. There had indeed been a register for this purpose, kept by an old domestic; but she had not the gift of spelling accurately, and wrote a most perplexing hand. This account I was to keep. It might truly be called a bill of mortality; for my members all went from bad to worse during the short time they continued in this system. I was a sort of bookkeeper for the other world, to take places in the stage, and to see that the first come were the first served. My pen was always in my hand, for Doctor Sangrado had more practise than any physician of his time in Valladolid. He got into reputation with the public by a certain professional slang, humored by a medical face, and some extraordinary cases, more honored by implicit faith than scrupulous investigation.

He was in no want of patients, nor consequently of property. He did not keep the best house in the world: we lived with some little attention to economy. The usual bill of fare consisted of peas, beans, boiled apples or cheese. He considered this food as best suited to the human stomach, that is to say, as most amenable to the grinders, whence it was to encounter the process of digestion. Nevertheless, easy as was their passage, he was not for stopping the way with too much of them; and, to be sure, he was in the right. But though he cautioned the maid and me against repletion in respect of solids, it was made up by free permission to drink as much water as we liked. Far from prescribing us any limits there, he would tell us sometimes: 'Drink, my children; health consists in the pliability and moisture of the parts. Drink water by pails full, it is a universal dissolvent; water liquefies all the salts. Is the course of the blood a little sluggish? this grand principle sets it forward; too rapid? its career is checked.' Our doctor was so orthodox on this head, that he drank nothing himself but water, though advanced in years. He defined old age to be a natural consumption which dries us up and wastes us away: on this principle, he deplored the ignorance of those who call wine old men's milk. He maintained that wine wears them out and corrodes them, and pleaded with all the force of eloquence against that liquor, fatal in common both to young and old, that friend with a serpent in its bosom, that pleasure with a dagger under its girdle.

In spite of these fine arguments, at the end of a week a looseness ensued with some twinges, which I was blasphemous enough to saddle on the universal dissolvent and the new-fashioned diet. I stated my symptoms to my master, in the hope that he would relax the rigor of his regimen, and qualify my meals with a little wine, but his hostility to that liquor was inflexible. 'If you have not philosophy enough,' said he, 'for pure water, there are innocent infusions to strengthen the stomach against the nausea of aqueous quaffings. Sage, for example, has a very pretty flavor; and if you wish to heighten it into a debauch, it is only mixing rosemary, wild poppy, and other simples, but no compounds.'

In vain did he crack off his water, and teach me the secret of composing delicious messes. I was so abstemious, that, remarking my moderation, he said: 'In good sooth, Gil Blas, I marvel not that you are no better than you are; you do not drink enough, my friend. Water taken in a small quantity serves only to separate the particles of bile and set them in action; but our practise is to drown them in a copious drench. Fear not, my good lad, lest a superabundance of liquid should either weaken or chill your stomach; far from thy better judgment be that silly fear of unadulterated drink. I will ensure you against all consequences; and if my authority will not serve your turn, read Celsus. That oracle of the ancients makes an admirable panegyric on water; in short, he says in plain terms that those who plead an inconstant stomach in favor of wine, publish a libel on their own bowels, and make their organization a pretense for their sensuality.'

As it would have been ungenteel in me to have run riot on my entrance into the career of practise, I affected thorough conviction; indeed, I thought there was something in it. I therefore went on drinking water on the authority of Celsus, or, to speak in scientific terms, I began to drown the bile in copious drenches of that unadulterated liquor; and though I felt myself more out of order from day to day, prejudice won the cause against experience. It is evident, therefore, that I was in the right road to the practise of physic. Yet I could not always be insensible to the qualms which increased in my frame, to that degree as to determine me on quitting Doctor Sangrado. But he invested me with a new office which changed my tone. 'Hark you, my child,' said he to me one day, 'I am not one of those hard and ungrateful masters who leave their household to grow gray in service without suitable reward. I am well pleased with you, I have a regard for you, and without waiting till you have served your time, I will make your fortune. Without more ado, I will initiate you in the healing art, of which I have for so many years been at the head. Other physicians make the science to consist of various unintelligible branches; but I will shorten the road for you, and dispense with the drudgery of studying natural philosophy, pharmacy, botany, and anatomy. Remember, my friend, that bleeding and drinking warm water are the two grand principles, the true secret of curing all the distempers incident to humanity. Yes, this marvelous secret which I reveal to you, and which nature, beyond the reach of my colleagues, has failed in rescuing from my pen, is comprehended in these two articles—namely, bleeding and drenching. Here you have the sum total of my philosophy; you are thoroughly bottomed in medicine, and may raise yourself to the summit of fame on the shoulders of my long experience. You may enter into partnership at once, by keeping the books in the morning, and going out to visit patients in the afternoon. While I dose the nobility and clergy, you shall labor in your vocation among the lower orders; and when you have felt your ground a little, I will get you admitted into our body. You are a philosopher, Gil Blas, though you have never graduated; the common herd of them, though they have graduated in due form and order, are likely to run out the length of their tether without knowing their right hand from their left.'

I thanked the doctor for having so speedily enabled me to serve as his deputy; and, by way of acknowledging his goodness, promised to follow his system to the end of my career, with a magnanimous indifference about the aphorisms of Hippocrates. But that engagement was not to be taken to the letter. This tender attachment to water went against the grain, and I had a scheme for drinking wine every day snugly among the patients. I left off wearing my own suit a second time, to take up one of my master's, and look like an inveterate practitioner. After which I brought my medical theories into play, leaving them to look to the event whom it might concern. I began on an alguazil in a pleurisy; he was condemned to be bled with the utmost rigor of the law, at the same time that the system was to be replenished copiously with water. Next I made a lodgment in the veins of a gouty pastry-cook, who roared like a lion by reason of gouty spasms. I stood on no more ceremony with his blood than with that of the alguazil, and laid no restriction on his taste for simple liquors. My prescriptions brought me in twelve rials; an incident so auspicious in my professional career that I only wished for the plagues of Egypt on all the hale subjects of Valladolid.

As I was coming out of the pastry-cook's whom should I meet but Fabricio, a total stranger since the death of the licentiate Sédillo! He looked at me with astonishment for some seconds; then set up a laugh with all his might and held his sides. He had no reason to be grave, for I had a cloak trailing on the ground, with a doublet and breeches of four times my natural dimensions. I was certainly a complete original. I suffered him to make merry as long as he liked, and could scarcely help joining in the ridicule, but I kept a guard on my muscles to preserve a becoming dignity in public and the better to enact the physician, whose part in society is not that of a buffoon. If the absurdity of my appearance excited Fabricio's merriment, my affected gravity added zest to it; and when he had nearly exhausted his lungs, 'By all the powers, Gil Blas,' quoth he, 'thou art in complete masquerade. Who the devil has dressed you up in this manner?' 'Fair and softly, my friend,' replied I, 'fair and softly; be a little on your good behavior with a modern Hippocrates. Understand me to be the substitute of Doctor Sangrado, the most eminent physician in Valladolid. I have lived with him these three weeks. He has bottomed me thoroughly in medicine; and as he cannot perform the obsequies of all the patients who send for him, I visit a part of them to take the burden off his conscience. He does execution in great families, I among the vulgar.' 'Vastly well,' replied Fabricio; 'that is to say, he grants you a lease on the blood of the commonality, but keeps to himself the fee-simple of the fashionable world. I wish you joy of your lot; it is a pleasanter line of practise among the populace than among great folk. Long live a snug connection in the suburbs! a man's mistakes are easily buried, and his murders elude all but God's revenge. Yes, my brave boy, your destiny is truly enviable; in the language of Alexander, were I not Fabricio, I would wish to be Gil Blas.'

To show the son of Nunez the barber that he was not much out of his reckoning on my present happiness, I chinked the fees of the alguazil and the pastry-cook; and this was followed by an adjournment to a tavern to drink to their perfect recovery.

The wine was very fair, and my impatience for the well-known smack made me think it better than it was. I took some good long draughts, and without gainsaying my Latin oracle, in proportion as I poured it into its natural reservoir, I felt my accommodating entrails to owe me no grudge for the hard service into which I pressed them. As for Fabricio and myself, we sat some time in the tavern, making merry at the expense of our masters, as servants are too much accustomed to do. At last, seeing the night approach, we parted, after engaging to meet at the same place on the following day after dinner.

I was no sooner at home than Doctor Sangrado came in. I talked to him about the patients I had seen, and paid into his hands eight remaining rials of the twelve I had received for my prescriptions. 'Eight rials!' said he, as he counted them, 'mighty little for two visits! But we must take things as we find them.' In the spirit of taking things as he found them, he laid violent hands on six, giving me the other two—'Here, Gil Blas,' continued he, 'see what a foundation to build upon. I make over to you the fourth of all you may bring me. You will soon feather your nest, my friend, for, by the blessing of Providence, there will be a great deal of ill health this year.'

I had reason to be content with my dividend; since, having determined to keep back the third part of what I received in my rounds, and afterwards touching another fourth of the remainder, half the whole, if arithmetic is anything more than a deception, would become my perquisite. This inspired me with new zeal for my profession. The next day, as soon as I had dined, I resumed my medical paraphernalia, and took the field once more. I visited several patients on the list, and treated their several complaints in one invariable routine. Hitherto things went on under the rose, and no individual, thank heaven, had risen up in rebellion against my prescriptions. But let a physician's cures be as extraordinary as they will, some quack or other is always ready to rip up his reputation. I was called in to a grocer's son in a dropsy. Whom should I find there before me but a little black-looking physician, by name Doctor Cuchillo, introduced by a relation of the family. I bowed round most profoundly, but dipped lowest to the personage whom I took to have been invited to a consultation with me. He returned my compliment with a distant air; then, having stared me in the face for a few seconds, 'Signor Doctor,' said he, 'I beg pardon for being inquisitive; I thought I had been acquainted with all my brethren in Valladolid, but I confess your physiognomy is altogether new. You must have been settled but a short time in town.' I avowed myself a young practitioner, acting as yet under the direction of Doctor Sangrado. 'I wish you joy,' replied he politely, 'you are studying with a great man. You must doubtless have seen a vast deal of sound practise, young as you appear to be.' He spoke with so easy an assurance that I was at a loss whether he meant it seriously or was laughing at me. While I was conning over my reply, the grocer, seizing on the opportunity, said, 'Gentlemen, I am persuaded of your both being perfectly competent in your art; have the goodness without ado to take the case in hand and devise some effectual means for the restoration of my son's health.'

Thereupon the little pulse-counter set himself about reviewing the patient's situation; and after having dilated to me on all the symptoms, asked me what I thought the fittest method of treatment. 'I am of the opinion,' replied I, 'that he should be bled once a day, and drink as much warm water as he can swallow.' At these words, our diminutive doctor said to me with a malicious simper, 'And so you think such a course will save the patient?' 'Never doubt it,' exclaimed I in a confident tone; 'it must produce that effect, because it is a certain method of cure for all distempers. Ask Signor Sangrado.' 'At that rate,' retorted he, 'Celsus is altogether in the wrong; for he contends that the readiest way to cure a dropsical subject is to let him almost die of hunger and thirst.' 'Oh! as for Celsus,' interrupted I, 'he is no oracle of mine, as fallible as the meanest of us; I often have occasion to bless myself for going contrary to his dogmas.' 'I discover by your language,' said Cuchillo, 'the safe and sure method of practise Doctor Sangrado instils into his pupils. Bleeding and drenching are the extent of his resources. No wonder so many worthy people are cut off under his direction.' 'No defamation!' interrupted I with some acrimony; 'a member of the faculty had better not begin throwing stones. Come, come, my learned doctor, patients can get to the other world without bleeding and warm water; and I question whether the most deadly of us has ever signed more passports than yourself. If you have any crow to pick with Signor Sangrado, write against him, and he will answer you, and we shall soon see who will have the best of the battle.' 'By all the saints in the calendar!' swore he, in a transport of passion, 'you little know whom you are talking to. I have a tongue and a fist, my friend, and am not afraid of Sangrado, who, with all his arrogance and affectation is but a ninny.' The size of the little death-dealer made me hold his anger cheap. I gave him a sharp retort; he sent back as good as I brought, till at last we came to cuffs. We had pulled a few handfuls of hair from each other's heads before the grocer and his kinsman could part us. When they had brought this about, they feed me for my attendance, and retained my antagonist, whom they thought the more skilful of the two.

Another adventure succeeded close on the heels of this. I went to see a huge chanter in a fever. As soon as he heard me talk of warm water, he showed himself so averse to the specific as to fall into a fit of swearing; he abused me in all possible shapes and threatened to throw me out at window. I was in a greater hurry to get out of the house than to get in. I did not choose to see any more patients that day, and repaired to the inn where I had agreed to meet Fabricio. He was there first. As we found ourselves in a tipling humor, we drank hard, and returned to our employers in a pretty pickle, that is to say, so-so in the upper storey. Signor Sangrado was not aware of my being drunk, because he took the lively gestures which accompanied the relation of my quarrel with the little doctor for an effect of the agitation not yet subsided after the battle. Besides, he came in for his share in my report; and feeling himself nettled by Cuchillo, 'You have done well, Gil Blas,' said he, 'to defend the character of our practise against this little abortion of the faculty. So he takes upon himself to set his face against watery drenches in dropsical cases? An ignorant fellow! I maintain, I do, in my own person, that the use of them may be reconciled to the best theories. Yes, water is a cure for all sorts of dropsies, just as it is good for rheumatisms and the green sickness. It is excellent, too, in those fevers where the effect is at once to parch and to chill, and even miraculous in those disorders ascribed to cold, thin, phlegmatic, and pituitous humors. This opinion may seem strange to young practitioners like Cuchillo; but it is right orthodox in the best and soundest systems; so that if persons of that description were capable of taking a philosophical view, instead of crying me down, they would become my most zealous advocates.'

In his rage, he never suspected me of drinking; for, to exasperate him still more against the little doctor, I had thrown into my recital some circumstances of my own addition. Yet, engrossed as he was by what I had told him, he could not help taking notice that I drank more water than usual that evening.

In fact the wine had made me very thirsty. Anyone but Sangrado would have distrusted my being so very dry as to swallow down glass after glass; but as for him, he took it for granted, in the simplicity of his heart, that I began to acquire a relish for aqueous potations. 'Apparently, Gil Blas,' said he with a gracious smile, 'you have no longer such a dislike to water. As heaven is my judge! you quaff it off like nectar. It is no wonder, my friend; I was certain you would take a liking to that liquor.' 'Sir,' replied I, 'there is a tide in the affairs of men; with my present lights, I would give all the wine in Valladolid for a pint of water.' This answer delighted the doctor, who would not lose so fine an opportunity of expatiating on the excellence of water. He undertook to ring the changes once more in its praise, not like a hireling pleader, but as an enthusiast in the cause. 'A thousand times,' exclaimed he, 'a thousand and a thousand times of greater value, as being more innocent than our modern taverns, were those baths of ages past, whither the people went not shamefully to squander their fortunes and expose their lives, by swilling themselves with wine, but assembled there for the decent and economical amusement of drinking warm water. It is difficult enough to admire the patriotic forecast of those ancient politicians who established places of public resort, where water was dealt out gratis to all comers, and who confined wine to the shops of the apothecaries, that its use might be prohibited but under the direction of physicians. What a stroke of wisdom! It is doubtless to preserve the seeds of that antique frugality, emblematic of the golden age, that persons are found to this day, like you and me, who drink nothing but water, and are persuaded they possess a prevention or a cure for every ailment, provided our warm water has never boiled; for I have observed that water, when it has boiled, is heavier and sits less easily on the stomach.'

While he was holding forth thus eloquently, I was in danger more than once of splitting my sides with laughing. But I contrived to keep my countenance: nay, more, to chime in with the doctor's theory. I found fault with the use of wine, and pitied mankind for having contracted an untoward relish to so pernicious a beverage. Then, finding my thirst not sufficiently allayed, I filled a large goblet with water, and after having swilled it like a horse; 'Come, sir,' said I to my master, 'let us drink plentifully of this beneficial liquor. Let us make those early establishments of dilution you so much regret, to live again in your house.' He clapped his hands in ecstasy at these words and preached to me for a whole hour about suffering no liquid but water to pass my lips. To confirm the habit, I promised to drink a large quantity every evening; and to keep my word with less violence to my private inclinations, I went to bed with a determined purpose of going to the tavern every day.

GIL BLAS AS THE ARCHBISHOP'S SECRETARY

FROM BOOK VII, CH. 3 AND 4

I had been after dinner to get together my baggage and take home my horse from the inn where I had put up, and afterwards returned to supper at the archbishop's palace, where a neatly furnished room was got ready for me, and such a bed as was more likely to pamper than to mortify the flesh. The day following, his grace sent for me quite as soon as I was ready to go to him. It was to give me a homily to transcribe. He made a point of having it copied with all possible accuracy. It was done to please him; for I omitted neither accent, nor comma, nor the minutest title of all he had marked down. His satisfaction at observing this was heightened by its being unexpected. 'Eternal Father!' exclaimed he in a holy rapture, when he had glanced his eyes over the folios of my copy, 'was ever anything seen so correct? You are too good a transcriber not to have some little smattering of the grammarian. Now tell me with the freedom of a friend: in writing it over, have you been struck with nothing that grated upon your feelings? Some little careless idiom, or some word used in an improper sense?' 'Oh! may it please your grace,' answered I with a modest air, 'it is not for me, with my confined education and coarse taste, to aim at making critical remarks. And though ever so well qualified, I am satisfied that your grace's work would come out pure from the assay.' The successor of the apostles smiled at my answer. He made no observation on it; but it was easy to see, through all his piety, that he was an arrant author at the bottom: there is something in that dye that not heaven itself can wash out.

I seemed to have purchased the fee-simple of his good graces by my flattery. Day after day did I get a step further in his esteem; and Don Ferdinand, who came to see him very often, told me my footing was so firm that there could be not a doubt but my fortune was made. Of this my master himself gave me a proof some little time afterwards: and the occasion was as follows:—One evening in his closet he rehearsed before me, with appropriate emphasis and action, a homily which he was to deliver the next day in the cathedral. He did not content himself with asking me what I thought of it in the gross, but insisted on my telling him what passages struck me most. I had the good fortune to pick out those which were nearest to his own taste, his favorite common-places. Thus, as luck would have it, I passed in his estimation for a man who had a quick and natural relish of the real and less obvious beauties in a work. 'This, indeed,' exclaimed he, 'is what you may call having discernment and feeling in perfection! Well, well, my friend! it cannot be said of you, "Bæotum in crasso jurâtes ære natum." [That you were born in the thick air of Bæotia.] In a word, he was so highly pleased with me, as to add in a tone of extraordinary emotion, 'Never mind, Gil Blas! henceforward take no care about hereafter. I shall make it my business to place you among the favored children of my bounty. You have my best wishes; and to prove to you that you have them, I shall take you into my inmost confidence.'

These words were no sooner out of his mouth, than I fell at his grace's feet, quite overwhelmed with gratitude. I embraced his elliptical legs with almost pagan idolatry, and considered myself as a man on the high road to a very handsome fortune. 'Yes, my child,' resumed the archbishop, whose speech had been cut short by the rapidity of my prostration, 'I mean to make you the receiver-general of all my inmost ruminations. Harken attentively to what I am going to say. I have a great pleasure in preaching. The Lord sheds a blessing on my homilies; they sink deeply into the hearts of sinners, set up a glass in which vice sees its own image, and bring back many from the paths of error into the highroad of repentance. What a heavenly sight when a miser, scared at the hideous picture drawn by my eloquence of his avarice, opens his coffers to the poor and needy, and dispenses the accumulated store with a liberal hand! The voluptuary, too, is snatched from the pleasures of the table; ambition flies at my command to the wholesome discipline of the monastic cell; while female frailty, tottering on the brink of ruin, with one ear open to the siren voice of the seducer, and the other to my saintly correctives, is restored to domestic happiness and the approving smile of heaven, by the timely warnings of the pulpit. These miraculous conversions, which happen almost every Sunday, ought of themselves to goad me on in the career of saving souls. Nevertheless, to conceal no part of my weakness from my monitor, there is another reward on which my heart is intent, a reward which the seraphic scrupulousness of my virtue to little purpose condemns as too carnal: a literary reputation for a sublime and elegant style. The honor of being handed down to posterity as a perfect pulpit orator has its irresistible attractions. My compositions are generally thought to be equally powerful and persuasive; but I could wish of all things to steer clear of the rock on which good authors split, who are too long before the public, and to retire from professional life with my reputation in undiminished luster.

'To this end, my dear Gil Blas,' continued the prelate, 'there is one thing requisite from your zeal and friendship. Whenever it shall strike you that my pen begins to contract, as it were, the ossification of old age, whenever you see my genius in its climacteric, do not fail to give me a hint. There is no trusting to one's self in such a case; pride and conceit were the original sin of man. The probe of criticism must be entrusted to an impartial stander-by, of fine talents and unshaken probity. Both these requisites center in you: you are my choice, and I give myself up to your direction.' 'Heaven be praised, my lord,' said I, 'there is no need for to trouble yourself with any such thoughts yet. Besides, an understanding of your grace's mold and caliber will last out double the time of a common genius; or to speak with more certainty and truth, it will never be the worse for the wear, if you live to the age of Methusalem. I consider you as a second Cardinal Ximenes, whose powers, superior to decay, instead of flagging with years, seemed to derive new vigor from their approximation with the heavenly regions.' 'No flattery, my friend!' interrupted he. 'I know myself to be in danger of failing all at once. At my age one begins to be sensible of infirmities, and those of the body communicate with the mind. I repeat it to you, Gil Blas, as soon as you shall be of opinion that my head is not so clear as usual, give me warning of it instantly. Do not be afraid of offending by frankness and sincerity; to put me in mind of my own frailty will be the strongest proof of your affection for me. Besides, your very interest is concerned in it, for if it should, by any spite of chance toward you, come to my ears that the people say in town, "His grace's sermons produce no longer their accustomed impression; it is time for him to abandon his pulpit to younger candidates," I do assure you most seriously and solemnly, you will not only lose my friendship, but the provision for life I have promised you. Such will be the result of your silly tampering with truth.'

Here my patron left off to wait for my answer, which was an echo of his speech and a promise to obey him in all things. From that moment there were no secrets from me; I became the prime favorite. All the household, except Melchior de la Ronda, looked at me with an eye of envy.

It was curious to observe the manner in which the whole establishment, from the highest to the lowest, thought it necessary to demean themselves toward his grace's confidential secretary; there was no meanness to which they would not stoop to curry favor with me; I could scarcely believe they were Spaniards. I left no stone unturned to be of service to them, without being taken in by their interested assiduities. My lord archbishop, at my entreaty, took them by the hand. He got a company for one, and fitted him out so as to make a handsome figure in the army. Another he sent to Mexico, with a considerable appointment which he procured him; and I obtained a good slice of his bounty for my friend Melchior. It was evident from these facts that if the prelate was not particularly active in good works, at least he rarely gave a churlish refusal when anyone had the courage to importune him for his benevolence. . . .

Two months after this worthy gentleman had left us, in the luxuriant harvest of my highest favor, a lowering storm came suddenly over the episcopal palace; the archbishop had a stroke of apoplexy. By dint of immediate applications and good nursing, in a few days there was no bodily appearance of disease remaining. But his reverend intellects did not so easily recover from their lethargy. I could not help observing it to myself in the very first discourse that he composed. Yet there was no such a wide gap between the merits of the present and the former ones as to warrant the inference that the sun of oratory was many degrees advanced in its post-meridian course. A second homily was worth waiting for; because that would clearly determine the line of my conduct. Alas, and well-a-day! when that second homily came, it was a knock-down argument. Sometimes the good prelate moved forward, and sometimes he moved backwards; sometimes he mounted up in the garret; and sometimes dipped down into the cellar. It was a composition of more sound than meaning, something like a superannuated schoolmaster's theme, when he attempts to give his boys more sense than he possesses of his own, or like a capuchin's sermon, which only scatters a few artificial flowers of paltry rhetoric over a barren desert of doctrine.

I was not the only person whom the alteration struck. The audience at large, when he delivered it, as if they too had been pledged to watch the advances of dotage, said one to another in a whisper all around the church, 'Here is a sermon, with symptoms of apoplexy in every paragraph.' 'Come, my good Coryphæus of the public taste in homilies,' said I then to myself, 'prepare to do your office. You see that my lord archbishop is going very fast; you ought to warn him of it, not only as his bosom friend, on whose sincerity he relies, but lest some blunt fellow should anticipate you, and bolt out the truth in an offensive manner. In that case you know the consequences; you would be struck out of his will, where no doubt you have a more convertible bequest than the licentiate Sédillo's library.'

But as reason, like Janus, looks at things with two faces, I began to consider the other side of the question; the hint seemed difficult to wrap up so as to make it palatable. Authors in general are stark mad on the subject of their own works, and such an author might be more testy than the common herd of the irritable race; but that suspicion seemed illiberal on my part, for it was impossible that my freedom should be taken amiss, when it had been forced upon me by so positive an injunction. Add to this, that I reckoned upon handling the subject skilfully, and cramming discretion down his throat like a high-seasoned epicurean dish. After all my pro and con, finding that I risked more by keeping silence than by breaking it, I determined to venture on the delicate duty of speaking my mind.

Now there was but one difficulty—a difficulty indeed!—how to open the business. Luckily the orator himself extricated me from that embarrassment, by asking what they said of him in the world at large, and whether people were tolerably well pleased with his last discourse. I answered that there could be but one opinion about his homilies; but that it should seem as if the last had not quite struck home to the hearts of the audience, like those which had gone before. 'Do you really mean what you say, my friend?' replied he, with a sort of wriggling surprise. 'Then my congregation are more in the temper of Aristarchus than of Longinus!' 'No, may it please your grace,' rejoined I, 'quite the contrary. Performances of that order are above the reach of vulgar criticism: there is not a soul but expects to be saved by their influence. Nevertheless, since you have made it my duty to be sincere and unreserved, I shall take the liberty of just stating that your last discourse is not written with quite the overpowering eloquence and conclusive argument of your former ones. Does not your grace feel just as I do on the subject?"

This ignorant and stupid frankness of mine completely blanched my master's cheek; but he forced a fretful smile, and said, "Then, good master Gil Blas, that piece does not exactly hit your fancy?" "I did not mean to say that, your grace," interrupted I, looking very foolish. "It is very far superior to what anyone else could produce, though a little below par with respect to your own works in general." "I know what you mean," replied he. "You think I am going down hill, do not you?"

Out with it at once. It is your opinion that it is time for me to think of retiring?" "I should never have had the presumption to deliver myself with so little reserve, if it had not been your grace's express command. I act in entire obedience to your grace's orders; and I most obsequiously implore your grace not to take offense at my boldness." "I were unfit to live in a Christian land!" interrupted he, with stamping impatience; "I were unfit to live in a Christian land if I liked you less for such a Christian virtue as sincerity. A man who does not love sincerity sets his face against the distinguishing mark between a friend and a flatterer. I should have given you infinite credit for speaking what you thought, if you had thought anything that deserved to be spoken. I have been finely taken in by your outside show of cleverness, without any solid foundation of sober judgment!"

Though completely unhorsed and at the enemy's mercy, I wanted to make terms of decent capitulation and to go unmolested into winter quarters: but let those who think to appease an exasperated author, and especially an author whose ear has long been attuned to the music of his own praises, take warning by my fate. "Let us talk no more on the subject, my very young friend," said he. "You are as yet scarcely in the rudiments of good taste and utterly incompetent to distinguish between gold and tinsel. You are yet to learn that never in all my life composed a finer homily than that unfortunate one which had not the honor of your approbation. The immortal part of me, by the blessing of heaven on me and my congregation, is less weighed down by human infirmity than when the flesh was stronger. We all grow wiser as we grow older, and I shall in future select the people about me with more caution; nor submit the castigation of my works but to a much abler critic than yourself." "Get about your business!" pursued he, giving me an angry shove by the shoulders out of his closet. "Go and tell my treasurer to pay you a hundred ducats, and take my priestly blessing in addition to that sum. God speed you, good Master Gil Blas! I heartily pray that you may do well in the world! There is nothing to stand in your way, but the want of a little better taste."

THE REWARD OF LITERARY MERIT

FROM BOOK XI, CH. 7 AND 10

One day, returning from one of these little conversational parties, my road lay in front of a hospital. It occurred to me to go in. I walked through two or three of the wards, filled with diseased patients, and examined their beds to see that they were properly taken care of. Among these unhappy wretches, whom I could not look at without the most painful feelings, I observed one whose features struck me: it surely could be no other than Fabricio, my countryman and chum! To look at him more closely, I drew near his bedside, and finding beyond a possibility of doubt that it was the poet Nunez, I stopped to look at him for a few seconds without saying a word. He also fixed his regards on me. At length breaking silence, "Do not my eyes deceive me?" said I. "Is it indeed Fabricio, and here?" "It is indeed," answered he coldly, "and you need not wonder at it. Since we parted, I have been working indefatigably at the trade of an author: I have written novels, plays, and works of genius in every department. My brain is fairly spun out, and here I am."

I could not help laughing at such a sketch of literary biography, and still more at the serious air of the accompanying action. "What!" cried I, "has your Muse brought you to this pass? Has she played you such a jade's trick as this?" "Even as you witness," answered he; "this establishment is a sort of half-pay receptacle for invalids on the muster-roll of disabled wit. You have acted discreetly, my friend, to lay yourself out for promotion in a different line. But they tell me you are no longer a courtier, and that your prospects in political life were all blasted; nay, they went so far as to affirm, that you were committed to close custody by the king's order.' 'They told you no more than the truth,' replied I. 'The delightful vision of political eminence wherein you left me last soon shifted the scene of my incoherent dreams to a prison and complete destitution. But for all that, my friend, here you behold me again in a better plight than ever.' 'That is quite out of the question,' said Nunez; 'your deportment is discreet and decent, you have not that supercilious and devil-take-the-hindmost sort of aspect which good keep communicates to the human face.' 'The reverses of this chequered life,' replied I, 'have brought me down to the level of the more modest virtues; I have taken a lesson in the school of adversity, to enjoy the possession of a good stud without riding the great horse.'

'Tell me then candidly,' cried Fabricio, raising his head upon his hand with his elbow upon the pillow, 'what your present occupation can possibly be. A steward perhaps to some nobleman out at elbows or man of business to some rich widow?' 'Something better than either the one or the other,' rejoined I, 'but excuse me from saying more at present: another time your curiosity shall be satisfied. It is enough at present to assure you that my means are equal to my inclination, and that you may command independence through me; but then you must submit to an embargo on your wit and a non-intercourse act between you and the faculty of writing, whether in verse or prose. Can you make this sacrifice to my friendship?' 'I have already made it to the powers above,' said he, 'in my last critical sickness. A Dominican made me forswear poetry, as an amusement bordering on criminality, but at all events beside the turnpike-road of good sense.' 'I wish you joy, my dear Nunez,' replied I; 'beware of a revoke.' 'There is not the least danger on that head,' rejoined he; 'the Muses and I have agreed on terms of separation: just as you came in at that door, I was conning over a farewell ode.' 'Good Master Fabricio,' said I, with a wise swaggering to and fro of my head, 'it is a doubtful question whether your vow of abjuration ought to pass current with the Dominican and myself; you seem head over heels in love with those virgins incarnate.' 'No, no,' contended he, peevishly, 'I have cut the connection asunder. Nay, more, I have quarreled with their keepers, the public. The readers of these days do not deserve an author of more genius than themselves: I should be sorry to write down to their comprehension. You are not to suppose that this is the language of disgust; it is my sincere and well-weighed opinion. Applause and hisses are just the same to me. It is a toss-up who fails and who succeeds: the wit of today is the blockhead of tomorrow. What cursed fools our dramatists must be, to care for anything but their poundage when their plays happen to be received! It is all very well for a few nights! But only fancy a revival at the end of twenty years, and what a figure they will cut then! The audiences of the present day turn up their noses at the stock pieces of the last age, and it is a question whether their taste will fare better with their more critical descendants. If that conjecture be probable, the inventors of clap-traps now will be the butt of cat-calls hereafter. It is just the same with novel-writers and all other manufacturers of unnecessary literature: they strut and fret for an hour, and then are no more seen or heard of. The glories of successful authorship are the mere vapors of a murky atmosphere, meteors of a marsh, foul coruscations of a dunghill, cathedral tapers to put out the galaxy, blue flames of coarse paper held over a candle.'

Though these caricatures of rival renown were the mere creations of jealousy in the poet of the Asturias, it was not my business to correct his ill temper. 'I am delighted,' said I, 'that wit and you have had so serious a quarrel; and that the diarrhoea of your inventive faculties has been cured by an astringent. You may depend on it, I will put you in the way of a good livelihood, without drawing deep upon your intellectual credit.' 'So much the better,' cried he; 'wit smells like carrion in my nostrils, or rather like a pungent and deleterious perfume: fragrant to the sense, but corrosive to the vitals.' 'I heartily wish, my dear Fabricio,' resumed I, 'that you may always keep in that mind. Only wash your hands completely of poetry, and you may depend on it, I will enable you to keep your head above water without picking or stealing.' 'In the meanwhile,' added I, slipping a purse of sixty pistoles into his hand, 'accept this as a slight instance of my regard.'

'Oh friend like the friends in days of yore,' cried the son of barber Nunez, 'out of his wits with joy and gratitude, 'it was heaven itself which sent you into this hospital, whence your goodness is now discharging me!' Before we parted, I gave him my address, and invited him to come and see me as soon as his health would permit. He opened his eyes as an oyster does its shell, when I told him that I lodged under the minister's roof. 'O illustrious Gil Blas!' said he, 'great as Pompey and fortunate as Sylla, whose lot it is to be hand in glove with the dictators of modern times! I rejoice most disinterestedly in your good fortune, because it is so very evident what a noble use you make of it.' . . .

The minister began to pick up his crumbs and myself consequently to get into feather again, when one evening I went out alone in the carriage to take an airing. On the road I met the poet of the Asturias, who had been lost to my knowledge ever since his discharge from the hospital. He was very decently dressed. I called him up, gave him a seat in my carriage, and we drove together to Saint Jerome's meadow.

'Master Nunez,' said I, 'it is lucky for me to have met you accidentally; for otherwise I should not have had the pleasure.' 'No severe speeches, Santillane,' interrupted he with considerable eagerness; 'I must own frankly that I did not mean to keep up your acquaintance, and I will tell you the reason. You promised me a good situation provided I abjured poetry, but I have found a very excellent one on condition of keeping my talents in constant play. I accepted the latter alternative, as squaring best with my own humor. A friend of mine got me an employment under Don Bertrand Gomez del Ribero, treasurer of the king's galleys. This Don Bertrand, wanting to have a wit in his pay and finding my turn for poetical composition very much in unison with his own sense of what is excellent, has chosen me in preference to five or six authors who offered themselves as candidates for the place of his private secretary.'

'I am delighted at the news, my dear Fabricio,' said I, 'for this Don Bertrand must be very rich.' 'Rich indeed!' answered he; 'they say he does not know himself how much he is worth. However that may be, my business under him is as follows. He prides himself on his turn for gallantry, at the same time wishing to pass for a man of genius; he therefore keeps up an epistolary intercourse of wit with several ladies who have an infinite deal, and borrows my brain to indite such letters as may amplify the opinion of his sprightliness and elegance. I write to one for him in verse, to another in prose, and sometimes carry the letters myself, to prove the agility of my heels as well as the ingenuity of my head.'

'But you do not tell me,' said I, 'what I most want to know. Are you well paid for your epigrammatic cards of compliment?' 'Yes, most plentifully,' answered he. 'Rich men are not always open-handed; and I know some who are down-right curmudgeons; but Don Bertrand has behaved in the most handsome manner. Beside a salary of two hundred pistoles, I receive some little occasional perquisites from him, sufficient to set me above the world and to enable me to live on an equal footing with some choice spirits of the literary circles, who are willing, like myself, to set care at defiance.' 'But then,' resumed I, 'has your treasurer critical skill enough to distinguish the beauties of a performance from its blemishes?' 'The least likely man in the world,' answered Nunez; 'a flippant-mouthed smatterer, with a miserable assortment of materials for judging. Yet he gives himself out for chief justice and lord president of Apollo's tribunal. His decisions are adventurous, if not always lucky; while his opinions are maintained in so high a tone and with so bullying a challenge of infallibility, that nine times out of ten the issue of an argument is silence, though not conviction, on the part of the opponent, as a measure of precaution against the gathering storm of foul language and contemptuous sneers.'

'You may readily suppose,' continued he, 'that I take especial care never to contradict him, though it almost exceeds human patience to forbear; for, to say nothing of the unpalatable phrases that might be hailed down on my defenseless head, I should stand a very good chance of being shoved by the shoulders out of doors. I therefore am discreet enough to approve what he praises, and to condemn without mitigation or appeal whatever he is pleased to find fault with. By this easy compliance, for poets are compelled to acquire a knack of knocking under to those by whom they live, not even excepting their booksellers, I have gained the esteem and friendship of my patron. He has employed me to write a tragedy on a plot of his own. I have executed it under his inspection: and if the piece succeeds, a percentage on the laud and honor must accrue to him.'

I asked our poet what was the title of his tragedy. He informed me that it was The Count of Saldagna, and that it would come out in two or three days. I told him that I wished it all possible success, and thought so favorably of his genius as to entertain considerable hopes. 'So do I,' said he, 'but hope never tells a more flattering tale than in the ear of a dramatic author. You might as well attempt to fix the wind by nailing the weathercock as speculate on the reception of a new piece with an audience.'

At length the day of performance arrived. I could not go to the play, being prevented by official business. The only thing to be done was to send Scipio that he might bring me back word how it went off; for I was sincerely interested in the event. After waiting impatiently for his return, in he came with a long face which boded no good. 'Well,' said I, 'how was The Count of Saldagna welcomed by the critics?' 'Very roughly,' answered he; 'never was there a play more brutally handled; I left the house in high anger at the injustice and insolence of the pit.' 'It serves him right,' rejoined I. 'Nunez is no better than a madman, to be always running his head against the stone walls of a theater. If he was in his senses, could he have preferred the hisses and catcalls of an unfeeling mob to the ease and dignity he might have commanded under my patronage?' Thus did I inveigh with friendly vehemence against the poet of the Asturias, and disturb the even tenor of my mind for an event which the sufferer hailed with joy and inserted among the well-omened particulars of his journal.

He came to see me within two days, and appeared in high spirits. 'Santillane,' cried he, 'I am come to receive your congratulations. My fortune is made, my friend, though my play is marred. You know what a mistake they made on the first and last night of The Count of Saldagna; hissed instead of applauding! You would have thought all the wild beasts of the forest had been let loose, with their ears fortified against the softening power of poetry: but the more they bellowed, the better I fared, and they have roared me into a provision for life.'

There was no knowing what to make of this incident in the drama of our poet's adventures. 'What is all this, Fabricio?' said I; 'how can theatrical damnation have conjured up such Elysian ecstasy?' 'It is exactly so,' answered he. 'I told you before that Don Bertrand had thrown in some of the circumstances; and he was fully convinced that there was no defect but in the taste of the spectators. They might be very good judges; but, if they were, he was no judge at all! "Nunez!" said he this morning: "Victrix causa Diis placuit, sed victa Catoni." [The victorious cause was approved by the Gods, but the vanquished by Cato.] Your piece has been ill-received by the public; but against that you may place my entire approbation; and thus you ought to set your heart at rest. By way of something to balance the bad taste of the age, I shall settle an annuity of two thousand crowns on you; go to my solicitor, and let him draw the deed.' We have been about it: the treasurer has signed and sealed; my first quarter was to be paid in advance.'

I wished Fabricio joy on the unhappy fate of The Count of Saldagna, and probably most authors would have envied his failure more than all the success that ever succeeded. 'You are in the right,' continued he, 'to prefer my fortune to my fame. What a lucky peal of disapprobation in double choir! If the public had chosen to ring the changes on my merits rather than my misdeeds, what would they have done for my pocket? A mere paltry nothing. The common pay of the theater might have kept me from starving; but the wind of popular malice has blown me a comfortable pension, engrossed on safe and legal parchment.'

MONTESQUIEU (1689-1755)

Charles Louis de Secondat, Baron de la Brède et de Montesquieu, was born at the Château de la Brède near Bordeaux, and after studying law became a counselor and then president of the parliament of Bordeaux. He gave up the latter post in 1726 and traveled extensively, passing eighteen months in England, for whose political institutions he conceived a warm admiration. Returning to his ancestral château, he devoted his retirement to the study of political principles and customs, of which the most important outcome was the Esprit des Lois (Principles of Legislation), published in 1748. On account of its sympathetic attitude toward constitutional government, the book was widely read in England and in the American colonies. It was quoted by Blackstone in his famous Commentaries on English law, and by John Dickinson in his 'Address of Congress to the Inhabitants of the Province of Quebec.' Washington 'made himself familiar with the reasonings of Montesquieu' before attending the Federal Convention at Philadelphia, Jefferson showed acquaintance with his ideas in the drafting of the Declaration of Independence, and Hamilton quoted him in his articles in the Federalist. The division of the functions of government into legislative, executive, and judicial, and the system of 'checks and balances' which characterizes the Constitution of the United States had their origin in Montesquieu.

THE PRINCIPLES OF GOVERNMENT

FROM BOOK II

There are three species of government: republican, monarchical, and despotic. In order to discover their nature, it is sufficient to recollect the common notion, which supposes three definitions, or rather three facts: (1) that a republican government is that in which the body, or only a part of the people, is possessed of the supreme power; (2) monarchy, that in which a single person governs by fixed and established laws; (3) a despotic government, that in which a single person directs everything by his own will and caprice.

This is what I call the nature of each government; we must now inquire into those laws which directly conform to this nature, and consequently are the fundamental institutions.

OF REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT

When the body of the people is possessed of the supreme power, it is called a democracy. When the supreme power is lodged in the hands of a part of the people, it is then an aristocracy.

In a democracy the people are in some respects the sovereign, and in others the subject.

There can be no exercise of sovereignty but by their suffrages, which are their own will; now the sovereign's will is the sovereign himself. The laws therefore which establish the right of suffrage are fundamental to this government. And indeed it is as important to regulate in a republic, in what manner, by whom, to whom, and concerning what suffrages are to be given, as it is in a monarchy to know who is the prince, and after what manner he ought to govern.

Libanius says that at Athens a stranger who intermeddled in the assemblies of the people was punished with death. This is because such a man usurped the rights of sovereignty.

It is an essential point to fix the number of citizens who are to form the public assemblies; otherwise it would be uncertain whether the whole, or only a part of the people had given their votes. At Sparta, the number was fixed at ten thousand. But Rome, designed by Providence to rise from the weakest beginnings to the highest pitch of grandeur; Rome, doomed to experience all the vicissitudes of fortune; Rome, who had sometimes all her inhabitants without her walls, and sometimes all Italy and a considerable part of the world within them; Rome, I say, never fixed the number; and this was one of the principal causes of her ruin.

The people in whom the supreme power resides ought to have the management of everything within their reach: that which exceeds their abilities must be conducted by their ministers.

But they cannot properly be said to have their ministers, without the power of nominating them: it is, therefore, a fundamental maxim in this government, that the people should choose their ministers—that is, their magistrates.

They have occasion, as well as monarchs, and even more so, to be directed by a council or senate. But to have a proper confidence in these, they should have the choosing of the members, whether the election be made by themselves, as at Athens, or by some magistrate deputed for that purpose, as on certain occasions was customary at Rome.

The people are extremely well qualified for choosing those whom they are to entrust with part of their authority. They have only to be determined by things to which they cannot be strangers, and by facts that are obvious to sense. They can tell when a person has fought many battles, and been crowned with success; they are, therefore, capable of electing a general. They can tell when a judge is assiduous in his office, gives general satisfaction, and has never been charged with bribery: this is sufficient for choosing a prætor. They are struck with the magnificence of riches of a fellow citizen; no more is requisite for electing an edile. These are facts of which they can have better information in a public forum than a monarch in his palace. But are they capable of conducting an intricate affair, of seizing and improving the opportunity and critical moment of action? No; this surpasses their abilities.

Should we doubt the people's natural capacity, in respect to the discernment of merit, we need only cast an eye on the series of surprising elections made by the Athenians and Romans, which no one surely will attribute to hazard.

We know that though the people of Rome assumed the right of raising plebeians to public offices, yet they never would exert this power; and though at Athens, the magistrates were allowed by the law of Aristides, to be elected from all the different classes of inhabitants, there never was a case, says Xenophon, when the common people petitioned for employments which could endanger either their security or their glory.

As most citizens have sufficient ability to choose, though unqualified to be chosen, so the people, though capable of calling others to an account for their administration, are incapable of conducting the administration themselves.

The public business must be carried on with a certain motion, neither too quick nor too slow. But the motion of the people is always either too remiss or too violent. Sometimes with a hundred thousand arms they overturn all before them; and sometimes with a hundred thousand feet they creep like insects.

In a popular state the inhabitants are divided into certain classes. It is in the manner of making this division that great legislators have signalized themselves; and it is on this the duration and prosperity of democracy have ever depended.

Servius Tullius followed the spirit of aristocracy in the distribution of his classes. We find, in Livy and in Dionysius Halicarnassus, in what manner he lodged the right of suffrage in the hands of the principal citizens. He had divided the people of Rome into 193 centuries, which formed six classes; and ranking the rich, who were in smaller numbers, in the first centuries, and those in middling circumstances, who were more numerous, in the next, he flung the indigent multitude into the last; and as each century had but one vote, it was property rather than numbers that decided the election.

Solon divided the people of Athens into four classes. In this he was directed by the spirit of democracy, his intention not being to fix those who were to choose, but such as were eligible. Therefore, leaving to every citizen the right of election, he made the judges eligible from each of those four classes; but the magistrates he ordered to be chosen only out of the first three, consisting of persons of easy fortunes.

As the division of those who have a right of suffrage is a fundamental law in republics, so the manner of giving this suffrage is another fundamental.

The suffrage by lot is natural to democracy, as that by choice is to aristocracy.

The suffrage by lot is a method of electing that offends no one, but animates each citizen with the pleasing hope of serving his country.

Yet as this method is in itself defective, it has been the endeavor of the most eminent legislators to regulate and amend it.

Solon made a law at Athens that military employments should be conferred by choice, but that senators and judges should be elected by lot.

The same legislator ordained that civil magistracies, attended with great expense, should be given by choice, and the others by lot.

In order, however, to amend the suffrage by lot, he made a rule that none but those who presented themselves should be elected; that the person elected should be examined by judges, and that everyone should have a right to accuse him if he were unworthy of the office; this participated at the same time of the suffrage by lot and of that by choice. When the time of their magistracy had expired, they were obliged to submit to another judgment in regard to their conduct. Persons utterly unqualified must have been extremely backward in giving in their names to be drawn by lot.

The law which determines the manner of giving suffrage is likewise fundamental in a democracy. It is a question of some importance whether the suffrages ought to be public or secret. Cicero observes that the laws which rendered them secret towards the close of the republic were the cause of its decline. But as this is differently practised in different republics, I shall offer here my thoughts concerning this subject.

The people's suffrages ought doubtless to be public, and this should be considered as a fundamental law of democracy. The lower classes ought to be directed by those of higher rank, and restrained within bounds by the gravity of eminent persons. Hence, by rendering the suffrages secret in the Roman republic, all was lost; it was no longer possible to direct a populace that sought its own destruction. But when the body of the nobles are to vote in an aristocracy, or in a democracy the senate, as the business is then only to prevent intrigues, the suffrages cannot be too secret.

Intriguing in a senate is dangerous; it is dangerous also in a body of nobles; but not so among the people, whose nature is to act through passion. In countries where they have no share in the government, we often see them as much inflamed on account of an actor as ever they could be for the welfare of the state. The misfortune of a republic is when intrigues are at an end—which happens when the people are gained by bribery and corruption; in this case they grow indifferent to public affairs, and avarice becomes their predominant passion. Unconcerned about the government and everything belonging to it, they quietly wait for their hire.

It is likewise a fundamental law in democracies that the people should have the sole power to enact laws. And yet there are a thousand occasions when it is necessary the senate should have the power of decreeing; nay, it is frequently proper to make some trial of a law before it is established. The constitutions of Rome and Athens were excellent. The decrees of the senate had the force of laws for the space of a year, but did not become perpetual till they were ratified by the consent of the people.

OF THE PRINCIPLES OF DEMOCRACY

FROM BOOK III

There is no great share of probity necessary to support a monarchical or despotic government. The force of laws in one, and the prince's arm in the other, are sufficient to direct and maintain the whole. But in a popular state, one spring more is necessary, namely, virtue.

What I have here advanced is confirmed by the unanimous testimony of historians, and is extremely agreeable to the nature of things. For it is clear that in a monarchy, where he who commands the execution of the laws generally thinks himself above them, there is less need of virtue than in a popular government, where the person entrusted with the execution of the laws is sensible of his being subject to their direction.

Clear is it also that a monarch who, through bad advice or indolence, ceases to enforce the execution of the laws, may easily repair the evil; he has only to follow other advice, or to shake off his indolence. But when, in a popular government, there is a suspension of the laws, as this can proceed only from the corruption of the republic, the state is certainly undone.

A very droll spectacle it was in the last century to behold the impotent efforts of the English toward the establishment of democracy. As they who had a share in the direction of public affairs were void of virtue; as their ambition was inflamed by the success of the most daring of their members; as the prevailing parties were successively animated by the spirit of faction, the government was continually changing: the people, amazed at so many revolutions, in vain attempted to erect a commonwealth. At length, when the country had undergone the most violent shocks, they were obliged to have recourse to the very government which they had so wantonly proscribed.

When Sylla thought of restoring to Rome her liberty, this unhappy city was incapable of receiving that blessing. She had only the feeble remains of virtue, which were constantly diminishing. Instead of being roused from her lethargy by Cæsar, Tiberius, Caius Claudius, Nero and Domitian, she riveted every day her chains; if she struck some blows, her aim was at the tyrant, not at the tyranny.

The politic Greeks, who lived under a popular government, knew no other support than virtue. The modern inhabitants of that country are entirely taken up with manufacture, commerce, finances, opulence, and luxury.

When virtue is banished, ambition invades the minds of those who are disposed to receive it, and avarice possesses the whole community. The objects of their desires are changed; what they were fond of before becomes indifferent; they were free while under the restraint of the laws, but they would fain now be free to act against the law; and as each citizen is like a slave who has run away from his master, that which was a maxim of equity he calls rigor; that which was a rule of action he styles constraint; and to precaution he gives the name of fear. Frugality, and not the thirst of gain, now passes for avarice. Formerly the wealth of individuals constituted the public treasure; but now this has become the patrimony of private persons. The members of the commonwealth riot on the public spoils, and its strength is only the power of a few and the license of many.

Athens was possessed of the same number of forces when she triumphed so gloriously as when with such infamy she was enslaved. She had twenty thousand citizens when she defended the Greeks against the Persians, when she contended for empire with Sparta and invaded Sicily. She had twenty thousand when Demetrius Phalereus numbered them, as slaves are told by the head in the market-place. When Philip attempted to lord it over Greece, and appeared at the gates of Athens, she had even then lost nothing but time. We may see in Demosthenes how difficult it was to awaken her; she dreaded Philip, not as the enemy of her liberty, but of her pleasures. This famous city, which had withstood so many defeats, and having been so often destroyed had as often risen out of her ashes, was overthrown at Chæronea, and at one blow deprived of all her hopes of resource. What does it avail her that Philip sends back her prisoners, if he does not return her men? It was ever after as easy to triumph over the forces of Athens as it had been difficult to subdue her virtue.

How was it possible for Carthage to maintain her ground? When Hannibal, upon his being made Prætor, endeavored to hinder the magistrates from plundering the republic, did not they complain of him to the Romans? Wretches, who would fain be citizens without a city, and be beholden for their riches to their very destroyers! Rome soon insisted upon having three hundred of their principal citizens as hostages; she obliged them next to surrender their arms and ships; and then she declared war. From the desperate efforts of this defenseless city, one may judge of what she might have performed in her full vigor and assisted by virtue.

DEMOCRATIC EDUCATION

FROM BOOK IV

It is in a republican government that the whole power of education is required. The fear of despotic governments naturally arises of itself amidst threats and punishments; the honor of monarchies is favored by the passions, and favors them in its turn; but virtue is a self-renunciation, which is ever arduous and painful.

This virtue may be defined as the love of the laws and of our country. As such love requires a constant preference of public to private interest, it is the source of all private virtues; for they are nothing more than this very preference itself.

This love is peculiar to democracies. In these alone the government is entrusted to private citizens. Now a government is like everything else; to preserve it, we must love it.

Has it ever been known that kings were not fond of monarchy, or that despotic princes hated arbitrary power?

Everything therefore depends on establishing this love in a republic, and to inspire it ought to be the principal business of education; but the surest way of instilling it into the children is for parents to set them an example.

People have it generally in their power to communicate their ideas to their children; but they are still better able to transfuse their passions.

If it happens otherwise, it is because the impressions made at home are effaced by those they have received abroad.

It is not the young people that degenerate; they are not spoiled till those of maturer age are already sunk into corruption.

THE LOVE OF EQUALITY

FROM BOOK V

Virtue in a republic is a most simple thing; it is a love of the republic; it is a sensation, and not a consequence of acquired knowledge—a sensation that may be felt by the meanest as well as by the highest person in the state. When the common people adopt good maxims, they adhere to them more steadily than those whom we call gentlemen. It is very rarely that corruption commences with the former; nay, they frequently derive from their imperfect light a stronger attachment to the established laws and customs.

The love of our country is conducive to a purity of morals, and the latter is again conducive to the former. The less we are able to satisfy our private passions, the more we abandon ourselves to those of a general nature. How comes it that monks are so fond of their order? It is owing to the very cause that renders the order insupportable. Their rule debars them from all those things by which the ordinary passions are fed; there remains therefore only this passion for the very rule that torments them. The more austere it is, that is, the more it curbs their inclinations, the more force it gives to the only passion left them.

A love of the republic in a democracy is a love of the democracy, as the latter is that of equality.

A love of the democracy is likewise that of frugality. Since every individual ought here to enjoy the same happiness and the same advantages, they should consequently taste the same pleasures and form the same hopes, which cannot be expected but from a general frugality.

The love of equality in a democracy limits ambition to the sole desire, to the sole happiness, of doing greater services to our country than the rest of our fellow citizens. They cannot all render her equal services, but they all ought to serve her with equal alacrity. At our coming into the world, we contract an immense debt to our country, which we can never discharge.

Hence distinctions here arise from the principle of equality, even where it seems to be removed by signal services or superior abilities.

The love of frugality limits the desire of having to the study of procuring necessities for our family, and superfluities for our country. Riches give a power which a citizen cannot use for himself, for then he would be no longer equal. They likewise procure pleasures which he ought not to enjoy, because these would be also repugnant to the equality.

Thus well-regulated democracies, by establishing domestic frugality, made way at the same time for public expenses, as was the case at Rome and Athens, when magnificence and profusion arose from the very fund of frugality. And as religion commands us to have pure and unspotted hands when we make our offerings to the gods, the law required a frugality of life to enable them to be liberal to our country.

The good sense and happiness of individuals depend greatly upon the mediocrity of their abilities and fortunes. Therefore, as a republic, where the laws have placed many in a middling station, is composed of wise men, it will be wisely governed; as it is composed of happy men, it will be extremely happy.

The love of equality and of a frugal economy is greatly excited by equality and frugality themselves, in societies where both these virtues are established by law.

In monarchies and despotic governments, nobody aims at equality; this does not so much as enter their thoughts; they all aspire to superiority. People of the very lowest condition desire to emerge from their obscurity, only to lord it over their fellow-subjects.

It is the same with respect to frugality. To love it, we must practise and enjoy it. It is not those who are enervated by pleasures that are fond of a frugal life; were this natural and common, Alcibiades would never have been the admiration of the universe. Neither is it those who envy or admire the luxury of the great; people that have present to their view none but rich men or men miserable like themselves, detest their wretched condition, without loving or knowing the real term or point of misery [i.e., frugality].

A true maxim it is, therefore, that in order to love equality and frugality in a republic, these virtues must have been previously established by law.

Some ancient legislators, as Lycurgus and Romulus, made an equal division of lands. A settlement of this kind can never take place except upon a foundation of a new republic; or when the old one is so corrupt, and the minds of the people are so disposed that the poor think themselves obliged to demand, and the rich obliged to consent to a remedy of this nature.

If the legislator, in making a division of this kind, does not enact laws at the same time to support it, he forms only a temporary constitution; inequality will break in where the laws have not precluded it, and the republic will be utterly undone.

Hence for the preservation of this equality it is absolutely necessary there should be some regulation in respect to women's dowries, donations, successions, testamentary settlements, and all other forms of contracting. For were we once allowed to dispose of our property to whom and how we pleased, the will of each individual would disturb the order of the fundamental law.

Solon, by permitting the Athenians, upon failure of issue, to leave their estates to whom they pleased, acted contrary to the ancient laws, by which the estates were ordered to continue in the family of the testator; and even contrary to his own laws, for by abolishing debts he had aimed at equality.

The law which prohibited people having two inheritances was extremely well adapted for a democracy. It derived its origin from the equal distribution of lands and portions made to each citizen. The law would not permit a single man to possess more than a single portion.

From the same source arose those laws by which the next relative was ordered to marry the heiress. This law was given to the Jews for the like distribution. Plato, who grounds his laws on this division, made the same regulation which had been received as a law by the Athenians.

It is not sufficient in a well-regulated democracy that the divisions of land be equal; they ought also to be small, as was customary among the Romans. 'God forbid,' said Curius to his soldiers, 'that a citizen should look upon that as a small piece of land which is sufficient to maintain him.'

As equality of fortunes supports frugality, so the latter maintains the former. These things, though in themselves different, are of such a nature as to be unable to subsist separately; they reciprocally act upon each other; if one withdraws itself from a democracy, the other surely follows it.

OF COMMERCIAL DEMOCRACIES

True is it that when a democracy is founded on commerce, private people may acquire vast riches without a corruption of morals. This is because the spirit of commerce is naturally attended with that of frugality, economy, moderation, labor, prudence, tranquillity, order and rule. So long as this spirit subsists, the riches it produces have no bad effect. The mischief is, when excessive wealth destroys the spirit of commerce; then it is that the inconveniences of inequality begin to be felt.

In order to support this spirit, commerce should be carried on by the principal citizens; this should be their sole aim and study; this the chief object of the laws: and these very laws, by dividing the estates of individuals in proportion to the increase of commerce, should set every poor citizen so far at his ease as to be able to work like the rest, and every wealthy citizen in such a mediocrity as to be obliged to take some pains either in preserving or acquiring a fortune.

It is an excellent law in a trading republic

lic to make an equal division of the paternal estate among the children. The consequence of this is, that how great soever a fortune the father has made, his children, being not so rich as he, are induced to avoid luxury, and to work as he has done. I speak here only of trading republics; as to those that have no commerce, the legislator must pursue quite different measures.

In Greece, there were two sorts of republics: the one military, like Sparta; the other commercial, as Athens. In the former, the citizens were obliged to be idle; in the latter, endeavors were used to inspire them with the love of industry and labor. Solon made idleness a crime, and insisted that each citizen should give an account of his manner of getting a livelihood. And, indeed, in a well-regulated democracy, where people's expenses should extend only to what is necessary, everyone ought to have it; for how should their wants be otherwise supplied?

An equal division of lands cannot be established in all democracies. There are some circumstances in which a regulation of this nature would be impracticable, dangerous, and even subversive of the constitution. We are not always obliged to proceed to extremes. If it appears that this division of lands, which was designed to preserve the people's morals, does not suit the democracy, recourse must be had to other methods.

TRADITION AND AUTHORITY

If a permanent body be established to serve as a rule and pattern of manners—a senate, to which years, virtue, gravity, and eminent services procure admittance—the senators, by being exposed to public view like the statues of the gods, must naturally inspire every family with sentiments of virtue.

Above all, this senate must steadily adhere to the ancient institutions, and mind that the people and the magistrates never swerve from them.

The preservation of ancient customs is a very considerable point in respect to manners, since a corrupt people seldom perform any memorable actions, seldom establish societies, build cities, or enact laws; since most institutions, on the contrary, are derived from people whose manners are plain and simple, to keep up the ancient customs is the way to preserve the original purity of morals.

Besides, if by some revolution, the state has happened to assume a new form, this seldom can be effected without infinite pains and labor, and hardly ever by idle and debauched persons. Even those who had been the instruments of the revolution were desirous it should be relished, which is difficult to compass without good laws. Hence it is that ancient institutions generally tend to reform the people's manners, and those of modern date to corrupt them. In the course of a long administration, the descent to vice is insensible; but there is no re-ascending to virtue without making the most generous efforts.

It has been questioned whether the members of the senate we are speaking of ought to be for life or only chosen for a time. Doubtless they ought to be for life, as was the custom at Rome, at Sparta, and even at Athens. For we must not confound the senate at Athens, which was a body that changed every three months, with the Areopagus, whose members, as standing patterns, were established for life. Let this be therefore a general maxim; that in a senate designed to be the rule and the depository, as it were, of manners, the members ought to be for life: in a senate intended for the administration of affairs, the members may be changed.

'The spirit,' says Aristotle, 'waxes old as well as the body.' This reflection holds good only in regard to a single magistrate, but cannot be applied to a senatorial assembly.

At Athens, beside the Areopagus, there were guardians of the public morals, as well as of the laws. At Sparta, all the old men were censors. At Rome, the censorship was committed to two particular magistrates. As the senate watched over the people, the censors were to have an eye over the people and the senate. Their office was to reform the corruptions of the republic, to stigmatize indolence, to censure neglects, and to correct mistakes; as to flagrant crimes, these were left to the punishment of the laws.

That Roman law which required the accusations in cases of adultery to be public was admirably well calculated for preserving the purity of morals; it intimidated married women, as well as those who were to watch over their conduct.

Nothing contributes more to the preservation of morals than an extreme subordination of the young to the old. Thus they are both restrained, the former by their respect for those of advanced age, and the latter by their regard for themselves.

Nothing gives a greater force to the laws than a perfect subordination between the citizens and the magistrate. 'The great difference which Lycurgus established between Sparta and the other cities,' says Xenophon, 'consists chiefly in the obedience the citizens show to their laws; they run when the magistrate calls them. But at Athens a rich man would be highly displeased to be thought dependent on the magistrate.'

Paternal authority is likewise of great use toward the preservation of morals. We have already observed that in a republic there is not so coercive a force as in other governments. The laws must therefore endeavor to supply this defect by some means or other; and this is done by paternal authority.

Fathers at Rome had the power of life and death over their children. At Sparta, every father had a right to correct another man's child.

Paternal authority ended at Rome together with the republic. In monarchies, where such a purity of morals is not required, they are controlled by no other authority than that of the magistrates.

The Roman laws, which accustomed young people to dependence, established a long minority. Perhaps we are mistaken in conforming to this custom; there is no necessity for so much constraint in monarchies.

This very subordination in a republic might make it necessary for the father to continue in the possession of his children's fortune during life, as was the custom at Rome. But this is not agreeable to the spirit of monarchy.

POVERTY AND RICHES

FROM BOOK XXIII

A man is not poor because he has nothing, but because he does not work. The man who without any degree of wealth has an employment is as much at his ease as he who without labor has an income of a hundred crowns a year. He who has no substance, and yet has a trade, is not poorer than he who, possessing ten acres of land, is obliged to cultivate it for his subsistence. The mechanic who gives his art as an inheritance to his children has left them a fortune, which is multiplied in proportion to their number. It is not so with him who, having ten acres of land, divides it among his children.

In trading countries, where many men have no other subsistence but from the arts, the state is frequently obliged to supply the necessities of the aged, the sick, and the orphan. A well-regulated government draws this support from the arts themselves. It gives to some such employment as they are capable of performing; others are taught to work, and this teaching of itself becomes an employment.

The alms given to a naked man in the street do not fulfil the obligations of the state, which owes to every citizen a certain subsistence, a proper nourishment, convenient clothing, and a kind of life not incompatible with health.

Aurengzebe, being asked why he did not build hospitals, said, 'I will make my empire so rich that there shall be no need of hospitals.' He ought to have said, 'I will begin by rendering my empire rich, and then I will build hospitals.'

The riches of the state suppose great industry. Amidst the numerous branches of trade it is impossible but that some must suffer, and consequently the mechanics must be in a momentary necessity.

Whenever this happens, the state is obliged to lend them a ready assistance, whether it be to prevent the sufferings of the people, or to avoid a rebellion. In this case hospitals, or some equivalent regulations, are necessary to prevent this misery.

But when the nation is poor, private poverty springs from the general calamity, and is, if I may so express myself, the general calamity itself. All the hospitals in the world cannot cure this private poverty; on the contrary, the spirit of indolence, which it constantly inspires, increases the general and consequently the private misery.

Henry VIII, resolving to reform the Church of England, ruined the monks, of themselves a lazy set of people that encouraged laziness in others, because, as they practised hospitality, an infinite number of idle persons, gentlemen and citizens, spent their lives in running from convent to convent. He demolished even the hospitals, in which the lower people found subsistence, as the gentlemen did theirs in the monasteries. Since these changes, the spirit of trade and industry has been established in England.

At Rome, the hospitals place everyone at his ease, except those who labor, except those who are industrious, except those who have land, except those who are engaged in trade.

I have observed that wealthy nations have need of hospitals, because fortune subjects them to a thousand accidents; but it is plain that transient assistances are much better than perpetual foundations.

The evil is momentary; it is necessary, therefore, that the succor should be of the same nature, and that it be applied to particular accidents.

VOLTAIRE (1694-1778)

François Marie Arouet, who adopted for literary purposes the name of Voltaire, covered a large part of the eighteenth century in his intellectual activities, and his influence extended to the limits of the Europe of his time. He wrote a great deal and his reputation was exceedingly high, but he marks the end of a dying age rather than the beginning of the modern period. He had intelligence as well as wit, and when at the end of his life he surveyed the hundred printed volumes of his work, he remarked that this was too much literary baggage to attempt to carry down to posterity. The upshot has proved that he was right, for while the hundred volumes are to be found in all of our great libraries, they are now little used. It requires more courage than is possessed by most students of French literature to tackle his long epic the Henriade, recounting the achievements of Henri IV; and his burlesque of the life of Joan of Arc (La Pucelle), although it has won readers by its scurrilous wit, is quite out of touch with any modern view of the Maid. His classical tragedies now disgust by their pompous artificialities the few readers who attempt to become acquainted with them. His discussion of Shakespeare, whom, after visiting England, he introduced to France as a barbarian of genius, is equally out of date. And yet, in his own time and in his own way, Voltaire was a great man, and exercised a mighty influence. The apostle of the open mind and the life of reason, he was twice imprisoned in the Bastille, and the battles he fought in defense of free thought, free speech, and free publication are as creditable to his courage as to his intelligence. His remark to a friend, 'I detest your ideas but will defend with my life your right to give expression to them,' is one of the watchwords of modern liberty, and his defense of the humble family of Calas, victims of religious bigotry, showed that he meant what he said. The violence of his attack on ecclesiasticism made him bitter enemies, but it seems unnecessary to perpetuate these by-gone quarrels. Voltaire's courage and quick intelligence were great qualities, and in Candide, a 'philosophic tale' he wrote toward the end of his stormy career, we have his cynical wit at its best.

CANDIDE: OR ALL FOR THE BEST

CHAPTER I

There lived in the fine castle of the Baron Thunder-ten-Tronckh, situated in Westphalia, a young man of the sweetest disposition in the world. His face was the very picture of his mind. With a good understanding, he possessed the most engaging simplicity of manners; and, in short, was of so easy a temper, that he had got the name of Candide amongst all who knew him.

The old domestics of the household had a strong suspicion that he was the son of the Baron's sister, by a very worthy gentleman in the neighborhood, whom the lady would not however condescend to marry, because he could reckon no more than seventy-one armorial quarterings in his escutcheon, the others having been lost by the injury of time.

Monsieur, the Baron, was one of the most powerful and consequential lords in all Westphalia, for his castle had a gate to it, and even windows, and his grand saloon was hung with tapestry. Mastiffs and dogs of every degree formed a pack upon occasion to hunt with. His grooms and stable boys served for huntsmen and whippers-in; the parson of the parish was his grand almoner. Everyone called him my Lord, and everyone laughed when he told his stories.

Madam, the Baroness, who weighed about three hundredweight and a half, was therefore considered as a lady of no small consequence, and gained much respect, and when she did the honors of her house, she performed the task with so much dignity that she acquired still more reverence. Mistress Cunégonde, her ladyship's daughter, was a fine rosy plump desirable girl of seventeen; as for her brother, the Baron's son and heir, he was in every respect worthy of the stock he sprang from. Pangloss was the preceptor and the oracle of the whole family, and little Candide listened to his instructions with all the simplicity natural to his age and disposition, and believed everything he said.

Master Pangloss taught the metaphysico-theologo-cosmolo-nigology. He could prove, to admiration, that there is no effect without a cause; and, that in this best of all possible worlds, the baron's castle was the most magnificent of all castles, and my lady the best of all possible baronesses.

'It is demonstrable,' said he, 'that things cannot be otherwise than they are; for as all things have been created for some end, they must necessarily be created for the best end. Observe, for instance, the nose is formed to bear spectacles, therefore we wear spectacles. The legs are visibly designed for stockings, accordingly we wear stockings. Stones were made to be hewn, and to construct castles, therefore my Lord has a magnificent castle; for the greatest baron in the province ought to be the best lodged. Swine were created to be eaten, therefore we eat pork all the year round. It is not enough therefore to say that everything is right, we should say everything is in the best state it possibly could be.'

Candide listened attentively, and believed implicitly; for he thought Mistress Cunégonde excessively handsome, though he never had the courage to tell her so. He concluded, that next to the happiness of being Baron of Thunder-ten-Tronckh, the next was that of being Mistress Cunégonde, the next that of seeing her every day, and the last that of hearing the doctrine of Master Pangloss, the greatest philosopher of the whole province, and consequently of the whole world.

CANDIDE AND HIS VALET, IN EL DORADO

CHAPTERS XVII AND XVIII

'Well,' said Cacambo to his master, when they got to the frontiers of the Oreillons, 'you see, this half of the world is no better than the other: even take my advice, and let us return to Europe the shortest way.' 'But how can we get back?' said Candide, 'or to what new place shall we go? Certainly, not to my own country? The Bulgarians and the Abares are laying that waste with fire and sword. If we go to Portugal, there I shall be burnt; and if we abide here, we are every moment in danger of being spitted. But how can I bring myself to quit that part of the world which my dear Mistress Cunégonde inhabits?'

'Let us turn towards Cayenne,' said Cacambo. 'There we shall meet with some Frenchmen; for you know those gentry ramble all over the world; perhaps, they will be of some service to us, and God will pity our distress, and send us some relief.'

It was not so easy to get to Cayenne. They knew pretty well which way to travel; but the mountains, rivers, precipices, robbers, savages, were dreadful obstacles in the road. Their horses died with fatigue, and their provisions were all consumed. They subsisted a whole month upon wild fruit, till at length they came to a little river bordered with cocoa-trees; the sight of which at once rallied their hopes, and supported their enfeebled carcasses.

Cacambo, who was always giving as good advice as the old woman herself, said to Candide, 'You see we are almost exhausted; we have traveled enough on foot. I spy an empty canoe near the river side; let us fill it with cocoa-nuts, get into it, and go down with the stream; a river always leads to some inhabited place. If we do not meet with agreeable things, we shall at least meet with something new.' 'Agreed,' replied Candide; 'let us recommend ourselves to Providence.'

They rowed a few leagues down the river, the banks of which were in some places covered with flowers; in others barren; in some parts smooth and level, and in others steep and rugged. The stream widened as they went farther on, till at length it passed under one of the frightful rocks, whose summits seemed to reach the clouds. Here our two travelers had the courage to commit themselves to the stream, which, contracting in this part, hurried them along with a dreadful noise and rapidity. At the end of four-and-twenty hours, they saw daylight again; but their canoe was dashed to pieces against the rocks. They were obliged to creep along, from rock to rock, for the space of a league, till at last they discovered an immense horizon, bounded by a chain of inaccessible mountains. The country appeared cultivated equally for pleasure, and to produce the necessaries of life. The useful and agreeable were here equally blended. The roads were covered, or rather adorned, with carriages, formed of elegant and glittering materials, in which were men and women of a surprising beauty, drawn with great rapidity by red sheep of a very large size; which far surpassed the finest coursers of Andalusia, Tetuan, or Mequinez.

'Here is a country,' said Candide, 'which exceeds even Westphalia.' He and Cacambo landed near the first village they saw, at the entrance of which they perceived some children covered with tattered garments of the richest brocade, playing at quoits. Our two inhabitants of the European world amused themselves greatly with looking at them. The quoits were large, round pieces, yellow, red, and green, which cast a most glorious luster. Our travelers picked some of them up, and they proved to be gold, emeralds, rubies, and diamonds; the least of which would have been the greatest ornament to the superb throne of the great Mogul. 'Without doubt,' said Cacambo, 'those children must be the king's sons, who are playing at quoits.' As he was uttering these words, the schoolmaster of the village appeared, who came to call them to school. 'There,' said Candide, 'is the preceptor of the royal family.'

The little rogues immediately quitted their diversion, leaving the quoits on the ground, with all their other playthings. Candide gathers them up, runs to the schoolmaster, and, with a most respectful bow, presents them to him, giving him to understand by signs, that their royal highnesses had forgot their gold and precious stones. The schoolmaster, with a smile, flung them upon the ground, then examining Candide from head to foot, with an air of wonder, he turned his back, and went on his way.

Our travelers took care, however, to gather up the gold, the rubies, and the emeralds. 'Where are we? for heaven's sake,' cried Candide. 'The king's children in this country must be very properly educated, since they are taught to show such a contempt for gold and precious stones.' Cacambo was as much surprised as his master. They then drew near the first house in the village, which was built after the manner of the palaces in Europe. There was a crowd of people about the door, and a still greater number in the house. The sound of the most delightful instruments of music was heard, and a most savory smell came from the kitchen. Cacambo went up to the door, and heard those within talking in the Peruvian language, which was his mother tongue; for everyone knows that Cacambo was born in a village of Tucuman, where no other language is spoken. 'I will be your interpreter here,' said he to Candide, 'let us go in; this is an eating-house.'

Immediately two waiters, and two servant girls, dressed in cloth of gold, and their hair braided with ribbands of tissue, accost the strangers, and invite them to sit down to the ordinary. Their dinner consisted of four dishes of different soups, each garnished with two young paroquets, a large dish of bouille, that weighed two hundredweight, two roasted monkeys of a delicious flavor, three hundred humming birds in one dish, and six hundred fly-birds in another; some excellent ragouts, delicate tarts, and the whole served up in dishes of rock-crystal. Several sorts of liquors, extracted from the sugar cane, were handed about by the servants who attended.

Most of the company were pedlars and wagoners, all extremely polite. They asked Cacambo a few questions, with the utmost discretion and politeness; and replied to his in a most obliging and satisfactory manner.

As soon as dinner was over, both Candide and Cacambo thought they should pay very handsomely for their entertainment, by laying down two of those large gold pieces, which they had picked off the ground; but the landlord and landlady burst into a fit of laughing, and held their sides for some time. At last recovering themselves, 'Gentlemen,' said the landlord, 'I plainly perceive you are strangers, and such we are not accustomed to see; pardon us, therefore, for laughing, when you offered us the common pebbles of our highways for payment of your reckoning. To be sure, you have none of the coin of this kingdom; but there is no necessity of having any money at all to dine in this house. All the inns, which are established for the convenience of those who carry on the trade of this nation, are maintained by the government. You have found but very indifferent entertainment here; because this is only a poor village; but in almost every other of these public houses, you will meet with a reception worthy of persons of your merit.'

Cacambo explained the whole of this speech of the landlord to Candide, who listened to it with the same astonishment with which his friend communicated it. 'What sort of a country is this,' said the one to the other, 'that is unknown to all the world, and in which Nature has everywhere so different an appearance to what she has in ours? Possibly this is that part of the globe where everything is right, for there must certainly be some such place; and, notwithstanding all that Dr. Pangloss could say, I often perceived that things went very ill in Westphalia.'

Cacambo, having the advantage of understanding the language of El Dorado, tried to satisfy his curiosity with his landlord by a thousand different questions: the honest man answered him plainly: 'I am very ignorant, sir, but I am content; however, we have in this neighborhood an old man retired from court, who is the best informed and most communicative person in the whole kingdom.' He then carried Cacambo to the old man; Candide acted now only an under part and attended his valet. They entered a very plain house, for the door was nothing but silver, and the ceiling was only of beaten gold, but wrought in so elegant a taste as to vie with the richest. The antechamber, indeed, was only incrustured with rubies and emeralds; but the order in which everything was disposed made amends for this great simplicity.

The old man received the strangers on his sofa, which was stuffed with humming birds' feathers; and ordered his servants to present them with liquors in golden goblets, after which he satisfied their curiosity in the following terms: 'I am now one hundred and seventy-two years old; and I learnt of my late father, who was equerry to the king, the amazing revolutions of Peru, to which he had been an eye-witness. This kingdom is the ancient patrimony of the Incas, who very imprudently quitted it to conquer another part of the world, and were at length conquered and destroyed themselves by the Spaniards. Those princes of their family, who remained in their native country, acted more wisely. They made a law, with the consent of their whole nation, that none of the inhabitants of our little kingdom should ever quit it; and to this wise ordinance we owe the preservation of our innocence and happiness. The Spaniards had some confused notion of this country, to which they gave the name of El Dorado; and Sir Walter Raleigh, an Englishman, actually came very near it, about three hundred years ago: but the inaccessible rocks and precipices, with which our country is surrounded on all sides, have hitherto secured us from the rapacious fury of the people of Europe, who have an unaccountable fondness for the pebbles and dirt of our land, for the sake of which they would murder us all to the very last man.'

The conversation lasted a considerable length of time, and turned chiefly on the form of government, their manners, their women, their public diversions, and the arts. At length, Candide, who had always had a turn for metaphysics, asked whether the people of that country had any established religion?

The old man reddened a little at this question: 'Can you doubt it?' said he; 'do you take us for wretches lost to all sense of gratitude?' Cacambo asked in a respectful manner what was the established religion of El Dorado. The old man blushed again, and said, 'Can there be two religions, then? Ours, I apprehend, is the religion of the whole world; we worship God from morning till night.' 'Do you worship but one God?' said Cacambo, who still acted as the interpreter of Candide's doubts. 'Certainly,' said the old man; 'there are not two, nor three, nor four Gods. I must confess the people of your world ask extraordinary questions.' However, Candide could not refrain from making many more enquiries of the old man; he wanted to know in what manner they prayed to God in El Dorado. 'We do not pray to him at all,' said the reverend sage; 'we have nothing to ask of him, he has given us all we want, and we give him thanks incessantly.' Candide had a curiosity to see some of their priests, and desired Cacambo to ask the old man where they were? At which he, smiling, said, 'My friends, we are all of us priests, the King and all the heads of families sing solemn hymns of thanksgiving every morning, accompanied by five or six thousand musicians.' 'What!' says Cacambo, 'have you no monks among you, to dispute, to govern, to intrigue, and to burn people who are not of the same opinion with themselves?' 'Do you take us for fools?' said the old man; 'here we are all of one opinion, and know not what you mean by your monks.' During the whole of this discourse, Candide was in raptures, and he said to himself, 'There's a prodigious difference between this place and Westphalia, and this house and the baron's castle! If our friend Pangloss had ever seen El Dorado, never would he have maintained that the castle of Thunder-ten-Tronckh was the finest of all possible edifices: there is nothing like seeing the world, that's certain.'

This long conversation being ended, the old man ordered six sheep to be harnessed, and put to the coach, and sent twelve of his servants to escort the travelers to court. 'Excuse me,' said he, 'for not waiting on you in person; my age deprives me of that honor. The king will receive you in such a manner that you will have no reason to complain; and doubtless you will make a proper allowance for the customs of the country, if they should not happen altogether to please you.'

Candide and Cacambo got into the coach, the six sheep flew, and, in less than four hours, they arrived at the king's palace, which was situated at the farther end of the capital. At the entrance was a portal two hundred and twenty feet high, and one hundred wide; but it is impossible for words to describe the materials of which it was built. The reader, however, will readily conceive, they must have a prodigious superiority over the pebbles and sand, which we call gold and precious stones.

Candide and Cacambo were received by twenty beautiful young virgins in-waiting, when they got out of the coach, who conducted them to the bath, and clad them in robes woven of the down of humming birds; after which they were introduced by the great officers of the crown of both sexes to the king's apartment, between two files of musicians, each file consisting of a thousand, agreeable to the custom of the country. When they drew near to the presence chamber, Cacambo asked one of the officers in what manner they were to pay their obeisance to his majesty: whether it was the custom to fall upon their knees, or to prostrate themselves upon the ground? whether they were to put their hands upon their heads, or behind their backs? whether they were to lick the dust of the floor? In short, what was the ceremony usual on such occasions? 'The custom,' said the great officer, 'is to embrace the king, and kiss him on each cheek.' Candide and Cacambo accordingly threw their arms round his majesty's neck, who received them in the most gracious manner imaginable, and very politely asked them to sup with him.

In the meantime, while supper was preparing, orders were given to show them the city, where they saw public buildings, whose roofs almost touched the clouds; the market places decorated with a thousand columns; fountains of spring water, besides others of rose water, and of liquors drawn from the sugar cane, incessantly flowing in the great squares; which were paved with a kind of precious stones, that emitted an odor like that of cloves and cinnamon. Candide asked to see the high court of justice, the parliament; but was answered, that they have none in that country, being utter strangers to law-suits. He then enquired, if they had any prisons; they replied, 'None.' But what gave him at once the greatest surprise and pleasure was the palace of sciences, where he saw a gallery two thousand feet long, filled with the various apparatus in mathematics and natural philosophy.

After having spent the whole afternoon in seeing only about the thousandth part of the city they were brought back to the king's palace. Candide sat down at the table with his majesty, his valet Cacambo, and several ladies of the court. Never was entertainment more excellent and complete in its kind, nor could anyone possibly show more wit than his majesty displayed while they were at supper. Cacambo explained all the king's jests and witticisms to Candide, and what was wonderful, although they were translated, they still appeared to be excellent things. Nothing surprised Candide more than this last circumstance. They spent a whole month in this hospitable place, during which time Candide was continually saying to Cacambo, 'I own, my friend, once more, that the castle where I was born is a mere nothing, in comparison of the place where we now are; but still Mistress Cunégonde is not here, and you yourself have doubtless some mistress for whom you sigh in Europe. If we remain here, we shall only be on a level with others; whereas, if we return to our own world with only a dozen of El Dorado sheep, loaded with the pebbles of this country, we shall be richer than all the kings in Europe; we shall no longer need to fear the inquisitors; and we may easily recover Mistress Cunégonde.'

This speech was perfectly agreeable to Cacambo. A fondness for roving, for making a figure in their own country, and for boasting of what they had seen in their travels was so prevalent in our two wanderers, that these two happy men resolved to be no longer happy; and demanded permission of the king to quit the country.

'You are going to do a rash and silly action,' said the king. 'I am sensible my kingdom is nothing very great; but when people are tolerably at ease in any place, I should think it would be their interest to remain there. Most assuredly I have no right to detain you or any strangers against their wills; this is an act of tyranny to which our manners and our laws are equally repugnant: all men are by nature free; you have therefore an undoubted liberty to depart whenever you please, but you will have many and great difficulties to encounter in passing the frontiers. It is impossible to ascend that rapid river which runs under high and vaulted rocks, and by which you were conveyed hither a kind of miracle. The mountains by which my kingdom is hemmed in on all sides are ten thousand feet high, and perfectly perpendicular; they are above ten leagues over each, and the descent from them is one continued precipice. However, since you are determined to leave us, I will immediately give orders to the superintendent of my machines to cause one to be made that will convey you very safe. When they have conducted you to the back of the mountains, nobody can attend you farther; for my subjects have made a vow never to quit the kingdom, and they are too prudent to break it: Ask me whatever else you please.' 'All we shall ask of your Majesty,' said Cacambo, 'is only a few sheep laden with provisions, pebbles, and the clay of your country.' The king smiled at the request, and said, 'I cannot imagine what pleasure you Europeans find in your yellow clay; but take away as much of it as you will, and much good may it do you.'

He immediately gave orders to his engineers to make a machine to hoist these two extraordinary men out of the kingdom. Three thousand good mechanics went to work, and finished it in about fifteen days; and it did not cost more than twenty millions sterling of that country's money. Candide and Cacambo were placed on this machine, and they took with them two large red sheep, bridled and saddled, to ride upon, when they got on the other side of the mountains: twenty others to serve as sumpters for carrying provisions; thirty laden with presents of whatever was most curious in the country; and fifty with gold, diamonds, and other precious stones. The king, at parting with our two adventurers, embraced them with the greatest cordiality.

It was really a fine sight to behold the manner of their setting off, and the ingenious method by which they and their sheep were hoisted to the top of the mountains. The engineers took leave of them as soon as they had conveyed them to a place of safety, and Candide was wholly occupied with the thoughts of presenting his sheep to Mistress Cunégonde.

THE VOYAGE TO FRANCE

CHAPTER XXI

At length they came within sight of the coast of France, when Candide said to Martin, 'Pray, Mr. Martin, were you ever in France?' 'Yes, sir,' said Martin, 'I have passed through several provinces of that kingdom. In some, one-half of the people are fools; in some, they are too artful; in others again, they are, in general, very simple, and very stupid; while in others, they affect to be witty, and in all, their ruling passion is love, the next is slander, and the last is to talk nonsense.' 'But pray, Mr. Martin, were you ever in Paris?' 'Yes, sir, I have been in that city, and there you find all the several species just described; it is a chaos, a crowd, where everyone seeks for pleasure, without being able to find it; at least, as far as I have observed of their conduct; I stayed there but a short time. I scarce had set my foot in the place, before I was robbed of all I had in the world by pickpockets and sharpers, at the fair of St. Germain. I was taken up myself for a robber, and confined in prison a whole week; after which, I hired myself as corrector to a press, in order to get a little money towards defraying my expenses back to Holland on foot. I knew the whole mob of scribblers, malcontents, and fanatics. It is said, the people of that city are very polite; perhaps they are so.'

'I cannot say,' said Candide, 'that I have any great curiosity to see France; you may easily conceive, my friend, that, after spending a month in El Dorado, I can desire to behold nothing upon earth but 10 Mistress Cunégonde; I am going to wait for her at Venice; I intend to pass through France, on my way to Italy; will you not go with me?' 'With all my heart,' said Martin; 'they say, that none but noble 15 Venetians pass their time agreeably at Venice; but that, nevertheless, strangers are well received there, when they have plenty of money; now I have none, but you have, therefore I will attend you whither you please.' 'Now we are upon this subject,' said Candide, 'do you think that the earth was originally sea, as we read in that great book which belongs to the captain of the ship?' 'I believe nothing of it,' replied Martin, 'any more than I do of the many other strange things which have been handed down to us for some time past.' 'But then, to what end,' said Candide, 'was the world formed?' 'To turn our 30 brains,' said Martin. 'Are you not surprised,' continued Candide, 'at the love which the two girls in the country of the Oreillons had for those two monkeys?—You know I have told you the story.' 'Sur- 35 prised!' replied Martin, 'not in the least; I see nothing strange in this passion. I have seen so many extraordinary things that there is nothing extraordinary to me now.'

'Do you think,' said Candide, 'that mankind always massacred each other as they do now? Were they always guilty of lies, fraud, treachery, ingratitude, inconstancy, envy, ambition, and cruelty? Were they always thieves, fools, cowards, gluttons, drunkards, misers, calumniators, debauchees, fanatics, and hypocrites?' 'Do you believe,' said Martin, 'that hawks have always been accustomed to eat pigeons when they came in their way?' 'Doubtless,' said Candide. 'Well then,' replied Martin, 'if hawks have always had the same nature, why should you pretend that mankind change theirs?' 'Oh!' said Can- 55 dide, 'there is a great deal of difference, for free will—' but in the midst of the argument they arrived at Bordeaux.

CANDIDE AND MARTIN IN ENGLAND

CHAPTER XXIII

5 As soon as they were safe on board the Dutch vessel, Candide could not help exclaiming, 'Ah Pangloss! Pangloss! ah Martin! Martin! ah my dear Mistress Cunégonde! what sort of a world is this?' 'Why, something very foolish, and very abominable,' said Martin. 'You know something of England,' said Candide; 'are they as great fools in that country as in France?' 'Yes, but their folly is of a 10 different cast,' answered Martin. 'You know that these two nations are at war, about a few acres of snow in the neighborhood of Canada, and that they have spent more money already in the contest 20 than the other exceeds the limits of my whether there are a greater number of people fit for Bedlam in the one country than the other, exceeds the limits of my imperfect capacity; I know, in general, 25 that the people we are going to visit are of a very serious and gloomy disposition.'

As they were chatting thus together, they arrived at Portsmouth. The shore, on each side the harbor, was lined with a multitude 30 of people, whose eyes were steadfastly fixed on a corpulent man, who was kneeling down on the deck of one of the men-of-war, with something tied before his eyes. Opposite to this personage stood 35 four soldiers, each of whom discharged three bullets into his head, with all the composure imaginable; and when it was done, the whole company went away perfectly well satisfied. 'What is all this for?' 40 said Candide; 'and what cursed devil is it which thus infests and spreads his influence over the world?' He then asked, who that fat man was who had been sent out of the world with so much ceremony? He received for answer, that it was an 45 Admiral. 'And, pray, why do you put your Admiral to death?' 'Because he did not kill men enough himself. You must know he had an engagement with a French Admiral, and it has been proved against him that he was not near enough to his antagonist.' 'But surely then,' replied Candide, 'the French Admiral must have been as far from him.' 'There is no doubt 50 of that,' said the other; 'but in this country it is found requisite, now and then, to put one Admiral to death, in order to encourage the others to fight.'

Candide was so shocked at what he saw and heard, that he would not set foot on shore, but agreed with the Dutch skipper to carry him directly to Venice.

In two days the Dutchman was ready. They sailed along the coast of France, and passed within sight of Lisbon, at which Candide trembled. From thence they entered the straits, and the Mediterranean, and at length arrived at Venice. 'God be 10 praised,' said Candide, embracing Martin, 'this is the place where I am to behold my beloved Cunégonde once again. I can depend upon Cacambo, like another self. All is well, very well; everything goes on as 15 well as possible.'

CANDIDE'S VOYAGE TO CONSTANTINOPLE

CHAPTER XXVII

The faithful Cacambo had already prevailed upon the captain of the Turkish 25 ship, that was to carry Sultan Achmet back to Constantinople, to take Candide and Martin on board. Accordingly they both embarked, after paying their obeisance to his unfortunate Highness. As they were 30 going on board, Candide said to Martin, 'You see how the world goes, we supped in company with six dethroned kings, and one of them was so poor that I gave him charity. Perhaps there may be a great 35 many other princes still more unfortunate. For my part, I have lost only a hundred sheep, and am now going to fly to the arms of my charming Mistress Cunégonde. My dear Martin, I must still insist on it, 40 that Pangloss was in the right. All is for the best.' 'I wish it may,' said Martin. 'But this was certainly a very improbable adventure, which we met with at Venice,' said Candide. 'I do not think that anyone 45 ever saw or heard of six dethroned monarchs supping together at a public inn.' 'This is not more extraordinary,' said Martin, 'than most of the things that have happened to us. It is a very common thing 50 for kings to be dethroned; and as for our having the honor to sup with six of them, it is a mere trifle, not worth remarking.'

As soon as Candide set his foot on board the vessel, he flew to his old friend and 55 valet Cacambo; and, throwing his arms about his neck, embraced him with transports of joy. 'Well,' said he, 'what news of Mistress Cunégonde? Does she still continue the paragon of beauty? Does she love me still? How does she do? You have, doubtless, purchased a palace for her 5 at Constantinople.'

'My dear master,' replied Cacambo, 'Mistress Cunégonde washes dishes on the banks of the Propontis, in the house of a prince who has very few to wash. She is at present a slave in the family of an ancient sovereign, named Ragotsky, whom the Grand Turk allows three crowns a day to maintain him in his exile; but the worst 10 part of the story is, that she is grown horribly ugly.' 'Ugly or handsome,' said Candide, 'I am a man of honor; and, as such, am obliged to love her still. But how could she possibly have been reduced to so abject a condition, when I sent five or 20 six millions to her by you?' 'Very true,' said Cacambo, 'but was not I obliged to give two millions to Seigneur Don Fernando d'Ibaraa y Figueora y Mascarenes y Lampourdos y Souza, the Governor of Buenos Ayres, for liberty to take Mistress Cunégonde away with me? And then did not a brave fellow of a pirate very gallantly strip us of all the rest? And then did not this same pirate carry us with him to Cape Matapan, to Milo, to Nicaria, to Samos, to Petra, to the Dardanelles, to Marmora, to Scutari? Mistress Cunégonde and the old woman are now servants to the Prince I have told you of; and I myself am slave to the dethroned Sultan.' 'What a chain of shocking accidents!' exclaimed Candide. 'But, after all, I have still some diamonds left, with which I can easily procure Mistress Cunégonde's liberty. It is a pity she is grown so very 40 ugly.'

Then, turning his discourse to Martin, 'What think you, friend,' said he, 'whose condition is most to be pitied, the Emperor Achmet's, the Emperor Ivan's, King Charles Edward's, or mine?' 'Faith, I cannot resolve your question,' said Martin, 'unless I had been in all your hearts, and knew all your feelings.' 'Ah!' cried Candide, 'were Pangloss here now, he would have known, and satisfied me at once.' 'I know not,' said Martin, 'in what balance your Pangloss could have weighed the misfortunes of mankind, and have set a just 55 estimation on their sufferings. All that I know is, that there are millions of men on the earth, whose conditions are a hundred times more pitiable than those of King Charles Edward, the Emperor Ivan, or Sultan Achmet.' 'Why, that may be,' answered Candide.

In a few days they reached the Black Sea; and Candide began by paying an extravagant ransom for Cacambo: then, without losing time, he and his companions went on board a galley, in order to search for his Cunégonde, on the banks of the Propontis, notwithstanding she was grown so ugly.

There were two slaves among the crew of the galley, who rowed very awkwardly, and to whose bare backs the master of the vessel frequently applied a bull's pizzle. Candide, from natural sympathy, looked at these two slaves more attentively than at any of the rest, and drew near them with an eye of pity. Their features, though greatly disfigured, appeared to him to have some resemblance with those of Pangloss and the unhappy Baron Jesuit, Mistress Cunégonde's brother. This idea affected him with grief and compassion: he examined them more attentively than before. 'In troth,' said he, turning to Cacambo, 'if I had not seen my master Pangloss fairly lianged, and had not myself been unlucky enough to run the Baron through the body, I should absolutely think those two rowers were the men.'

The names of the Baron and Pangloss were no sooner heard than the two slaves gave a great cry, ceased rowing, and let fall their oars out of their hands. The master of the vessel, seeing this, ran up to them, and redoubled the discipline of the bull's pizzle. 'Hold, hold,' cried Candide, 'I will give you what money you shall ask for these two persons.' 'Good heavens! it is Candide,' said one of the men. 'Candide!' cried the other. 'Do I dream,' said Candide, 'or am I awake? Am I actually on board this galley? Is this my Lord Baron, whom I killed? And that my master Pangloss, whom I saw hanged before my face?'

'The same, the same!' cried they both together. 'What? is this your great philosopher?' said Martin. 'My dear sir,' said Candide to the master of the galley, 'how much do you ask for the ransom of the Baron of Thunder-ten-Tronckh, who is one of the first Barons of the Empire, and of Dr. Pangloss, the most profound metaphysician in Germany?' 'Why then, Christian cur,' replied the Turkish captain, 'since these two dogs of Christian slaves are Barons and metaphysicians, who no doubt are of high rank in their own country, thou shalt give me fifty thousand sequins.' 'You shall have them, sir: carry me back as quick as thought to Constantinople, and you shall receive the money immediately. No! carry me first to Mistress Cunégonde.' The captain, upon Candide's first proposal, had already tacked about, and he made the crew apply their oars so effectually, that the vessel flew through the water quicker than a bird cleaves the air.

Candide embraced the Baron and Pangloss again and again. 'And how was it, my dear Baron, I did not kill you? And you, my dear Pangloss, how are you come to life again, after your hanging? And, how came you slaves on board a Turkish galley?' 'And is it true that my dear sister is in this country?' said the Baron. 'Yes,' said Cacambo. 'And do I once again behold my dear Candide?' said Pangloss. Candide presented Martin and Cacambo to them; they embraced each other over and over again, and all spoke together. The galley flew like lightning, and now they were got back to the port. Candide instantly sent for a Jew, to whom he sold for fifty thousand sequins a diamond richly worth one hundred thousand, though the fellow swore to him all the time, by father Abraham, that he gave him the most he could possibly afford. He paid it down instantly, for the ransom of the Baron and Pangloss. The latter flung himself at the feet of his deliverer, and bathed them with his tears. The former thanked him like a Baron of the Empire, with a gracious nod, and promised to return him the money the first opportunity. 'But is it possible,' said he, 'that my sister should be in Turkey?' 'Nothing is more possible,' answered Cacambo; 'for she scours the dishes in the house of a Transylvanian Prince.' Candide sent directly for two other Jews, and sold more diamonds to them; and then he set out with his companions in another galley, to deliver Mistress Cunégonde from slavery.

HOW PANGLOSS HAD ESCAPED DEATH

CHAPTER XXVIII

'Pardon once more,' said Candide to the Baron; 'once more let me entreat you to forgive me, Reverend Father, for running you through the body.' 'Let's forget it, and say no more about it,' replied the Baron; 'I was a little too hasty I must own; but as you seem to be desirous to know by what accident I came to be a slave on board the galley where you saw me, I will inform you. After I had been cured of the wound you gave me, by the college apothecary, I was attacked and carried off by a party of Spanish troops, who clapped me up in prison in Buenos Ayres, at the very time my sister was leaving the place. I asked leave to return to Rome, to the General of my order, who appointed me chaplain to the French Ambassador at Constantinople. I had not been a week in my new office, when I happened to meet one evening with a young Icoflan, extremely handsome and well made. The weather was very hot; the young man had an inclination to bathe. I took the opportunity to bathe likewise. I did not know it was a capital crime for a Christian to be found naked in company with a young Mussulman. A Cadi ordered me to receive a hundred blows on the soles of my feet, and sent me to the galleys. I do not believe that there was ever an act of more flagrant injustice. But I would fain know how my sister came to be a scullion to a Transylvanian Prince, who has taken refuge among the Turks?'

'But by what miracle do I behold you again, my dear Pangloss?' said Candide. 'It is true,' answered Pangloss, 'you saw me hanged, though I ought properly to have been burnt; but you may remember that it rained extremely hard when they were going to roast me. The storm was so violent, that they found it impossible to light the fire; so they even hanged me, because they could do no better. A surgeon purchased my body, carried it home, and prepared to dissect me. He began by making a crucial incision from my navel to the clavicle. It is impossible for anyone to have been more clumsily hanged than I had been. The executioner of the holy inquisition was a sub-deacon, and was an excellent hand at burning people, but as for hanging, he was not used to it; the cord being wet, and not slipping properly, the noose was not tight. In short, I still continued to breathe; the crucial incision made me roar out so loud, that my surgeon fell flat upon his back; and imagining it was the devil he was dissecting, ran away, half dead with fear, and in his fright tumbled down on the staircase.

His wife hearing the noise, flew from the next room, and seeing me stretched upon the table with my crucial incision, was still more terrified than her husband, ran away, and fell over him. When they had a little recovered themselves, I heard her say to her husband, "My dear, how could you think of dissecting an heretic? Don't you know that the devil is always in their bodies? I'll run directly to a priest to come and exorcise him." I trembled from head to foot at hearing her talk in this manner, and exerted what little strength I had left to cry out, "For God's sake take pity of me!" At length the Portuguese barber took courage, sewed up my wound, and his wife nursed me; and I was upon my legs in a fortnight's time. The barber got me a place to be a lacquey to a knight of Malta, who was going to Venice; but finding my master had no money to pay me my wages, I entered into the service of a Venetian merchant, and went with him to Constantinople.

'One day I happened to enter a mosque, where I saw no one but an old Iman and a very pretty young female devotee, who was saying her Paternoster; her neck was quite bare, and in her bosom she had a beautiful nosegay of tulips, roses, anemones, ranunculuses, hyacinths, and auriculas. She let fall her nosegay. I ran immediately to take it up, with a most respectful assiduity. But I was so long in putting it in its place, that the Iman began to be angry; and, perceiving I was a Christian, he cried out for help; they carried me before the Cadi, who ordered me to receive one hundred bastinadoes, and sent me to the galleys. I was chained in the very galley, and to the very same bench with the Baron. On board this galley there were four young men belonging to Marseilles, five Neapolitan priests, and two Monks of Corfu, who told us that the like adventures happened every day. The Baron pretended that he had been much more unjustly punished than myself; but I insisted that there was far less harm in taking up a nosegay, and putting it into a woman's bosom, than to be found stark naked with a young Icoflan. We were continually disputing this point, and received twenty lashes a day with a bull's pizzle, when the concatenation of sublunary events brought you on board our galley to ransom us from slavery.'

'Well, my dear Pangloss,' said Candide to them, 'when you were hanged, dissected, whipped, and tugging at the oar in the galley, did you continue to think, that everything in the world happens for the best?' 'I have always retained my first opinion,' answered Pangloss; 'besides, I am a philosopher; and it would not become me to retract my sentiments; especially as Leibnitz could not be in the wrong, and the doctrine of pre-established harmony is the finest thing in the world, as well as a plenum, and the materia subtilis.'

CANDIDE FINDS CUNÉGONDE

CHAPTER XXIX

While Candide, the Baron, Pangloss, Martin, and Cacambo passed away the time in relating their several adventures, and reasoning on the contingent or non-contingent events of this world; while they disputed on the cause and effects, on moral and physical evil; on free will and necessity; and on the many consolations that may be felt by a person when a slave, and chained to an oar in a Turkish galley, they arrived at the house of the Transylvanian Prince, on the coast of Propontis. The first objects they beheld there were Mistress Cunégonde and the old woman, who were hanging some tablecloths on a line to dry.

The Baron turned pale at the sight. Even Candide, that tender and affectionate lover, upon seeing his fair Cunégonde all sun-burnt, with blear eyes, a withered neck, and her arms all covered with a red scurf, started back with horror; but, recovering himself, he advanced towards her out of good manners; she embraced Candide and her brother; they embraced the old woman, and Candide ransomed them both.

There was a small farm in the neighborhood, which the old woman proposed to Candide to rent for the present, till the company should meet with a more agreeable situation. Cunégonde knew nothing of her being grown ugly, as no one had informed her of it, and therefore reminded Candide of his promise, in so peremptory a manner, that the simple lad did not dare to refuse her; he then acquainted the Baron that he was going to marry his sister. 'I will never suffer,' said the Baron, 'my sister to be guilty of such meanness on her part; nor will I bear this insolence on yours: no, I never will be reproached with such a disgrace. My sister's children could not enjoy the ecclesiastical dignities in Germany; nor shall a sister of mine ever be the wife of any person below the rank of a Baron of the Empire.' Cunégonde flung herself at her brother's feet, and bedewed them with her tears, but he still remained inflexible. 'Silly fellow,' said Candide, 'have I not delivered thee from the galleys, paid thy ransom, and thy sister's, too, who was a dish washer, and is very ugly? and yet I condescend to marry her; and shalt thou pretend to oppose the match? If I were to follow the dictates of a just resentment I should kill thee again.' 'Thou mayest kill me again,' said the Baron, 'but thou shalt not marry my sister while I am living.'

CONCLUSION

CHAPTER XXX

Candide, in the bottom of his heart, had no great stomach to the match with Mistress Cunégonde; but the extreme impertinence of the Baron determined him to have her; and Cunégonde pressed him so warmly, that he could not recant. He consulted Pangloss, Martin, and the faithful Cacambo. Pangloss drew up a fine memorial, by which he proved that the Baron had no right over his sister; and that she might, even according to all the laws of the empire, marry Candide with the left hand. Martin thought it best to throw the Baron into the sea: Cacambo decided that he must be delivered to the Turkish Captain, and sent to the galleys, after which he should be conveyed by the first ship to the Father-general at Rome. This advice was found to be very good; the old woman approved of it, but not a word of it was told to his sister; the business was executed for a little money, and they had the double pleasure of tricking a Jesuit and punishing the pride of a German Baron.

It is natural enough for the reader to imagine, that, after undergoing so many disasters, Candide, married to his mistress, and living with the philosopher Pangloss, the philosopher Martin, the prudent Cacambo, and the old woman, having besides brought home so many diamonds from the country of the ancient Incas, would lead the most agreeable life in the world. But he had been so much cheated by the Jews, that he had nothing else left but his little farm; his wife, every day growing more and more ugly, became soured in her temper and insupportable; the old woman was infirm, and still more ill-natured than Cunégonde. Cacambo, who worked in the garden, and carried the produce of it to sell at Constantinople, was past his labor, and cursed his fate. Pangloss was mortified that he made no figure in any of the German universities. And as to Martin, he was firmly persuaded, that a person is equally ill-situated everywhere. He bore all with patience. Candide, Martin, and Pangloss disputed sometimes about metaphysics and morality. Boats were often seen passing under the windows of the farm, fraught with effendis, bashaws, and cadies, that were going into banishment to Lemnos, Mitilene, and Erzerum. And other cadies, bashaws, and effendis were seen coming back to succeed the place of those who had been banished, and were banished in their turns. They saw several heads very neatly fixed upon poles, and carrying as presents to the Sublime Porte. Such sights gave occasion to frequent dissertations; and when they had nothing to dispute about, the irksomeness was so excessive that the old woman ventured one day to tell them, 'I would be glad to know, which is worst, to be ravished a hundred times by negro pirates, to have one buttock cut off, to run the gantlet among the Bulgarians, to be whipped and hanged at an Auto-da-fé, to be dissected, to be chained to an oar in a galley, and in short, to experience all the miseries through which everyone of us hath passed,—or to remain here doing nothing?' 'This,' said Candide, 'is a very deep question.'

This enquiry gave birth to new reflections, and Martin at last decided that man was not born to live in the convulsions of disquiet or in the lethargy of idleness. Though Candide was not entirely of this opinion; yet he did not determine anything on the head. Pangloss confessed that he had undergone dreadful sufferings; but having once maintained that everything was perfectly right, he still maintained it, but at the same time he believed nothing of it.

There was one thing which, more than ever, confirmed Martin in his detestable principle, made Candide hesitate, and embarrassed Pangloss—which was, the arrival of Pacquette and brother Giroflée one day at their farm, in the utmost distress; they had very speedily made away with their three thousand piastres; they had parted, been reconciled; had quarreled again, and been thrown into prison; had made their escape, and, at last, brother Giroflée turned Turk. Pacquette still continued to follow her trade wherever she came; but she got little or nothing by it. 'I foresaw very plainly,' says Martin to Candide, 'that your presents to this couple would soon be squandered, and only make them more miserable. You and Cacambo have spent millions of piastres, and yet you are not more happy than brother Giroflée and Pacquette.' 'So!' says Pangloss to Pacquette, 'Heaven has brought you here among us again, my poor child! Do you know that you have cost me the tip of my nose, one eye, and one ear? What a miserable state are you now in! and what is this world!' This new adventure engaged them more deeply than ever in philosophical disputations.

There lived in their neighborhood a very famous dervish, who passed for the best philosopher in Turkey; they wished to know his opinions; Pangloss, who was their spokesman, addressed him thus, 'Master, we come to entreat you to tell us why so strange an animal as man has been formed?'

'Why do you meddle with the subject?' said the dervish; 'is it any business of yours?' 'But, my Reverend Father,' says Candide, 'there is a horrible deal of evil on the earth.' 'What signifies it,' says the dervish, 'whether there is evil or good? When his Highness sends a ship to Egypt does he trouble his head, whether the rats in the vessel are at their ease or not?' 'What must then be done?' says Pangloss. 'Be silent'; answers the dervish. 'I flattered myself,' replied Pangloss, 'to have reasoned a little with you on the causes and effects, on the best of possible worlds, the origin of evil, the nature of the soul, and a pre-established harmony.' At these words the dervish shut the door in their faces.

During this conversation, news was spread abroad, that two Viziers of the Bench and the Musti had been just strangled at Constantinople, and several of their friends empaed. This catastrophe made a great noise for some hours. Pangloss, Candide, and Martin, as they were returning to their little farm, met with a good-looking old man, who was taking the air at his door, under an arbor formed of the boughs of orange-trees. Pangloss, who was as inquisitive as he was disputative, asked him what was the name of the Musti who was lately strangled. 'I cannot tell,' answered the good old man; 'I never knew the name of any Musti or Vizier in my life, nor do I know anything of the event you speak of; I presume that, in general, such as meddle with politics sometimes come to a miserable end; and that they deserve it: but I never enquire what is doing at Constantinople; I am contented with sending thither the fruits of my garden, which I cultivate with my own hands.' After saying these words, he invited the strangers to come into his house. His two daughters and two sons presented them with divers sorts of sherbet of their own making; besides caymac, heightened with the peels of candied citrons, oranges, lemons, pineapples, pistachio-nuts, and Mocha coffee, unadulterated with the bad coffee of Batavia, or the American islands. After which the two daughters of this good Mussulman perfumed the beards of Candide, Pangloss, and Martin.

'You must certainly have a vast estate,' said Candide to the Turk. 'I have no more than twenty acres of ground,' said he, 'the whole of which I cultivate myself with the help of my children; and by our labor we avoid three great evils, idleness, vice, and want.'

Candide, as he was returning home, made profound reflections on the Turk's discourse. 'This good old man,' said Pangloss to Martin, 'appears to me to have chosen for himself a lot much preferable to that of the six kings, with whom we had the honor to sup. Elevated stations are very dangerous, according to the testimonies of almost all philosophers; for we find Eglon, King of Moab, was assassinated by Aod; Absalom was hanged by the hair of his head, and run through with three darts; King Nadab, son of Jeroboam, was slain by Baaza; King Ela by Zimri; Okosias by Jehu; Athaliah by Jehoiada; the Kings Jehoiakim, Jeconiah, and Zedekiah were led into captivity. I need not tell you what was the fate of Cræsus, Astyages, Darius, Dionysius of Syracuse, Pyrrhus, Perseus, Hannibal, Jugurtha, Ariovistus, Cæsar, Pompey, Nero, Otho, Vitellius, Domitian, Richard II of England, Edward II, Henry VI, Richard III, Mary Stuart, Charles I, the three Henries of France, and the Emperor Henry IV; you know also——' 'I know,' said Candide, 'that we must cultivate our garden.' 'You are in the right,' said Pangloss; 'for when man was put into the garden of Eden, it was with an intent to dress it: and this proves that man was not born to be idle.' 'Let us work then without caviling,' said Martin; 'it is the only way to render life supportable.'

The little society, one and all, entered into this laudable design; and set themselves to exert their different talents. The piece of ground, though small, yielded them a plentiful crop. Cunégonde, indeed, was very ugly, but she became an excellent pastry-cook; Pacquette embroidered; the old woman had the care of the linen. There was not one, down to brother Giroflée, but was of some use; he was a very good carpenter, and became an honest man. Pangloss used now and then to say to Candide, 'There is certainly a concatenation of all events in the best of possible worlds; for, in short, had you not been kicked out of that fine castle for the love of Mistress Cunégonde; had you not been put into the Inquisition; had you not traveled over America on foot; had you not run the Baron through the body; and had you not lost all your sheep, which you brought from the good country of El Dorado, you would not have been here to eat preserved citrons and pistachio nuts.'

'All this is excellently observed,' answered Candide; 'but let us cultivate our garden.'

V

THE ROMANTIC REVIVAL

THE ROMANTIC REVIVAL

The Romantic Revival, like the Renaissance, was a literary movement extending over considerably more than a century and varying greatly in different countries both in the phases and in the periods of its development. Its predominant characteristics were a love of Nature, especially in her wilder moods, in preference to the ordered and sophisticated life of city and court, an appeal to the simple emotions instead of the intelligence, the justification of passion against the dictates of reason, the delight in marvelous adventures rather than in the familiar details of every-day life, and the substitution of a generous though sometimes sentimental humanitarianism for abstract principles and systems of philosophy; it tended to exalt the humble rather than to court the favor of the great, and in this way it stimulated the popular impulses which found political expression in modern democracy. Obviously all these tendencies could not be revealed at the same time or in the same place.

In some ways the new spirit, which was in the main a revolt and escape from the life and literature of the present, seemed to be a return to the past—a revival of the romantic age. Bishop Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry had a wide circulation on the Continent as well as in the British Isles, and led to a new appreciation of the popular ballads still to be found in every country in Europe. Macpherson's Ossian, though it had more in it of its eighteenth century author than of the Celtic folk tales he professed to be resuscitating, gave an impulse to a more enlightened study of the past. Even the 'Gothic' romances, which seem to us so absurdly artificial and insincere, stimulated the appeal to the 'instinct of wonder', characteristic of all nations in the infancy of their literature and apparently capable of making some response at a time when people might be thought to have outgrown their childhood. To nations, as to individuals, primitive impulses seem to return with renewed force after a period of repression.

This renewal of interest in a marvelous past has been defined by a modern critic as a social 'paramnesia', a revival of sub-conscious personality by the memory. When the spirit of nationalism was aroused by the military conflicts following the French Revolution, it was natural that appeal should be made to the national history and the older national literature, especially in Germany, where a long period of national depression offered peculiar opportunity for response to patriotic impulse. Moreover, as the poet's use of his imaginative and emotional faculties was more intensely personal than the earlier application of the intelligence to subjects of general, rather than of particular interest, the Romantic Revival tended to emphasize the poet's individuality and to encourage him to express it, either directly, or indirectly through the personal independence of the characters he portrayed. This phase of romanticism found its fullest expression in France, where the assertion of the ego, the moi, became a pronounced romantic characteristic.

All this analysis of romanticism came, of course, after the event. To the leaders and earlier interpreters of the movement, it appeared a much simpler matter. Madame de Staël, writing in 1810, says: 'The name romantic has been recently used in Germany to designate the poetry originating from the songs of the troubadors and Christian chivalry. . . . The distinction between classic and romantic refers also to two eras—that which preceded and that which followed the introduction of Christianity. Classical literature is for us moderns a transplanted literature; romantic literature is indigenous to us, having been produced by our own religion and our own institutions. It is the only literature capable of continuous development, of new life and increase, because it has its roots in our own soil; it sets forth our religion; it recalls our history; its origin is ancient, but for us it does not belong to antiquity.'

ROUSSEAU (1712-1770)

Jean Jacques Rousseau marks the beginning of a new epoch as distinctly as Voltaire marks the end of the previous age. Although they died in the same year, Rousseau was eighteen years younger, and he not only expresses the spirit of the newer time, he did much to create it. He may fairly be called, as G. H. D. Cole puts it, 'the parent of the romantic movement in arts, letters and life,' and 'his political influence, so far from being dead, is constantly increasing.'

Voltaire's influence, whether it is approved or condemned, is clearly defined, and the issues he dealt with belong entirely to the past, but Rousseau's name is still 'a controversial watchword and a party cry.' In Europe he is 'still revered or hated as the author who, above all others, inspired the French Revolution.' About his personality and the events of his life, as well as about his doctrines, there continues to be lively and even bitter controversy, for the interpretation of the known facts depends to a great extent upon the interpreter's sympathetic or hostile view of Rousseau's character and the effect of his teaching, which is still a living force in modern society.

How far this personal element enters into one's estimate of Rousseau's work may be illustrated from the admirable review of his philosophy in the last volume of Political Theories published by the late Professor W. A. Dunning. Rousseau's views are carefully analyzed and his relations to his predecessors accurately stated, but this critical review of his teaching is prefaced by the following characterization of Rousseau as a man:—'He was of a sensitive, emotional, self-conscious temperament, impatient of control, even of self-control, and resentful toward every institution or convention that suggested restriction or regularity. Of agreeable social relations with rational and cultivated men he was wholly incapable. Efforts of many such men, admirers of his genius and his theories, to establish and maintain cordial relations with Rousseau ended uniformly in failure, with a great access of bitterness and rancor on his part toward things in general. Only one human being seems to have possessed the power to induce more than a feeble flicker of the rudimentary social instinct in Rousseau, and this was the coarse and unlovely woman with whom for a third of a century in lived in squalid and irregular domestic relations. Practically destitute of the qualities that make human society possible, his instinct was to disparage the conspicuous features of social life. His own incapacity for orderly and useful commerce with his kind he generalized into a characteristic of the race; and the protest of his vain and sensitive spirit against the restraints of law and custom became in his writings the universal truth of human freedom. He was himself the free and noble savage whom he pictured so pleasingly in his works.'

Rousseau certainly made the task of the critical biographer more difficult by the writing of his Confessions. This is perhaps the most extraordinary book of its kind. St. Augustine, Cellini, and Pepys all tell things to their own disadvantage which men ordinarily conceal, but the impression all three make is one of remarkable sincerity; the Confessions of Rousseau arouse in many minds not only repulsion, but distrust. He confesses to the youthful vices of 'falsehood, idleness and theft,' but he makes such excuses for himself—'good sentiments, ill directed, frequently lead children into vice,' 'had I ever possessed a moderate independence, etc.,' 'this was not stealing the money, it was only stealing the use of it'—that the average reader has an uncomfortable suspicion about the writer's standards of honesty and veracity before he has come to the end of Book I, which conducts the story only to Rousseau's sixteenth year.

Born at Geneva of respectable Swiss parents and apprenticed to a watchmaker's engraver, he ran away in 1728 and fell into the hands of a Madame de Warens, an attractive grass widow of 28, who interested herself in converting him from Protestantism to Catholicism and later (in 1732) took him into her personal service and made him her lover; they lived together for some years, passing their time in the study of literature, philosophy and music and the cultivation of a small estate at Charmettes near Chambéry in Piedmont; on a journey to Montpellier for the sake of his health Rousseau fell in love with a charming traveling companion, but he was none the less shocked and mortified to find on his return to Charmettes that his place in the heart and home of Madame de Warens had been taken by another. Rousseau's filial affection for her continued (he always called her 'Mamma' and looked back to the years spent with her as the happiest and most innocent of his life) but he found the situation intolerable and in 1741 left for Paris, where, 'instead of sinking into despair, he gave himself quietly up to indolence and the care of Providence.' When his money was gone, he found employment as secretary to the French ambassador at Venice, but this engagement soon ended in a quarrel. Returning to Paris, he formed the connection with Theresa, whom long years afterwards he married, and to maintain her and her mother, having had no great success as a musical composer, he earned money as a copyist of music. He had five illegitimate children, whom he placed, unacknowledged, in the foundling hospital—this arrangement appearing to him 'so good, reasonable and lawful' that he made no secret of it to friends he could trust. At this time his chief friend was Diderot, the editor of the famous Encyclopédie which did so much in the popularization of revolutionary doctrines, and Rousseau's mind was filled with the enthusiasm for 'truth, liberty, and virtue.'

One day Rousseau read in the Mercur de France the announcement by the Academy of Dijon of the subject of a prize essay, 'Has the progress of science and art contributed to corrupt or purify morals?' Rousseau, taking the former view, wrote an essay which not only won the prize but on its publication in 1749 created a great sensation. In his own opinion he had not yet learned how to write, and did much better in the next competition (in which he was unsuccessful) with his Discourse on the Origin and Basis of Inequality among Men (1755). This contains, at any rate in germ, the ideas arising out of the principle of a 'return to nature,' which Rousseau afterwards developed as applied to human relations in general in The New Héloïse, published in 1761 under the title Letters of two Lovers, living in an Alpine Village; to education in Emile, and to politics in The Social Contract, both published in 1762. The Confessions, begun during his exile in England, were not printed until after his death. Always intensely emotional, sensitive, egotistic, suspicious, Rousseau suffered during his last years from a persecution mania which clouded his mind and made his statements exceedingly difficult to harmonize with the facts. Perhaps Professor Dowden came very near the truth when he said 'Rousseau writes with all the sincerity of one who is capable of boundless self-deception.'

Of the immense influence of his works during and since his lifetime there can be no question. The idea of a 'state of nature' was not new, as we have seen from Montaigne's essay printed earlier in this volume, but it was Rousseau who gave it significance and made it part of the common consciousness of the time. The fathers of the American Revolution were sustained by it (perhaps mainly by derivation from the English philosophers who had preceded Rousseau) in their assertion of natural rights in the Declaration of Independence. In the nineteenth century it inspired English poetry from Wordsworth to Meredith; in art it was the foundation of the teaching of Ruskin. In modern times, in spite of scientific proof that the state of nature was very different from what Rousseau and other philosophers imagined it, it lies at the basis of much thinking that is loosely termed socialistic. However one may judge Rousseau as a man, one cannot deny or escape his influence on literature, thought and life.

Rousseau's Profession of Faith of a Savoyard Vicar, at first included in Emile, has an independent interest of its own, on account of the charm of its style, as well as of its influence as a popular exposition of the Deism or 'natural religion' which counted for so much in revolutionary thought both in Europe and America. We therefore reprint a few passages from it as well as from the Discourse on Inequality.

The autobiographical passage immediately following this introduction refers to an episode in the early years of Rousseau's youth and his conversion to Catholicism. After a short residence in a Catholic institute at Confignon in Savoy, he was put under the care of Madame de Warens, herself a convert, who was at a later period to be so intimately associated with his strange history. His first stay with her was, however, short, and he was sent on to another Catholic institution at Turin—the one referred to in the first paragraph of the next page. It was after leaving this that he fell in with the Savoyard Vicar, as he himself relates.

PROFESSION OF FAITH OF A SAVOYARD VICAR

About thirty years ago, a young man, who had forsaken his own country, and rambled into Italy, found himself reduced to circumstances of great poverty and distress. He had been bred a Calvinist; but, in consequence of his misconduct, and of being unhappily a fugitive in a foreign country, without money or friends, he was induced to change his religion for the sake of subsistence. To this end he procured admittance into an house established for the reception of proselytes. Here, the instructions he received concerning some controversial points excited doubts he had not before entertained, and brought him first acquainted with the evil of the step he had taken. He was taught strange dogmas; and was eye-witness to stranger manners: and to these he saw himself a destined victim. He now attempted to make his escape, but was prevented and more closely confined; if he complained, he was punished for complaining; and, lying at the mercy of his tyrannical oppressors, found himself treated as a criminal, because he could not without reluctance submit to be so. He would doubtless have been entirely ruined, if it had not been for the good offices of an honest ecclesiastic, who came to the hospital on some business, and with whom he found an opportunity of a private conference. The good priest was himself poor, and stood in need of everyone's assistance; the oppressed proselyte, however, stood yet in greater need of him; the former did not hesitate, therefore, to favor his escape, at the risk of making himself a powerful enemy.

This good priest was naturally humane and compassionate; his own misfortunes had taught him to feel for those of others, nor had prosperity hardened his heart; in a word, the maxims of true wisdom and conscious virtue had confirmed the goodness of his natural disposition. He cordially embraced the young wanderer, provided him with a lodging, and shared with him the slender means of his own subsistence. Nor was this all; he went still farther, giving him both instruction and consolation, in order to teach him that difficult art of supporting adversity with patience. Could you believe, ye sons of prejudice! that a priest, and a priest in Italy too, could be capable of this?

This honest ecclesiastic was a poor Savoyard, who, having in his younger days incurred the displeasure of his bishop, was obliged to pass the mountains in order to seek that provision which was denied him in his own country. He was neither deficient in literature nor understanding; his talents, therefore, together with an engaging appearance, soon procured him protectors, who recommended him to be tutor to a young man of quality. He preferred poverty, however, to dependence; and, being a stranger to the manners and behavior of the great, he remained but a short time in that situation. In quitting this service, nevertheless he did not lose the esteem of his patron; and, as he behaved with great prudence, and was universally beloved, he flattered himself he should in time regain the good opinion of his bishop, and obtain some little benefice in the mountains, where he hoped to spend the rest of his days. This was the height of his ambition.

Interested by a natural propensity in favor of the young fugitive, he examined very carefully into his character and disposition. In this examination, he saw that his misfortunes had already debased his heart; that the shame and contempt to which he had been exposed, had depressed his courage, and that his disappointed pride, converted into indignation, deduced from the injustice and cruelty of mankind the depravity of human nature and the emptiness of virtue. He had seen religion made use of as a mask to self-interest and its worship as a cloak to hypocrisy. He had seen the terms heaven and hell prostituted in the subtlety of vain disputes; the joys of the one and the pains of the other being annexed to a mere repetition of words. He had seen the sublime and primitive idea of the divinity disfigured by the fantastical imaginations of men; and finding that, in order to believe in God, it was necessary to give up that understanding He has bestowed on us, he held the sacred object of our idle reveries in the same disdain as those reveries themselves. Without knowing anything of natural causes or giving himself any trouble to think about them, he had plunged himself into the most stupid ignorance, mixed with the most profound contempt for those who pretended to know more than himself.

But I will continue to speak no longer in the third person, which is indeed a superfluous caution; as you are very sensible, my dear countrymen, that the unhappy fugitive I have been speaking of is myself. I conceive myself far enough removed from the irregularities of my youth to dare to avow them; and think the hand which extricated me from them, too well deserving my gratitude, for me not to do it honor, at the expense of a little shame.

The most striking circumstance of all was to observe, in the retired life of my worthy master, virtue without hypocrisy, humanity without weakness, his conversation always honest and simple, and his conduct ever conformable to his discourse. I never found him troubling himself whether the persons he assisted went constantly to vespers; whether they went frequently to confession, or fasted on certain days of the week; nor did I ever know him impose on them any of those conditions, without which a man might perish for want and have no hopes of relief from the devout.

Encouraged by these observations, so far was I from affecting, in his presence, the forward zeal of a new proselyte, that I took no pains to conceal my thoughts, nor did I ever remark his being scandalized at this freedom. Hence have I sometimes said to myself, 'He certainly overlooks my indifference for the new mode of worship I have embraced, in consideration of the disregard which he sees I have for that in which I was educated; as he finds my indifference is not partial to either.' As I lived with him in the greatest intimacy, I learned every day to respect him more and more; and as he had entirely won my heart by so many acts of kindness, I waited with an impatient curiosity, to know the principles on which a life and conduct so singular and uniform could be founded.

It was some time, however, before this curiosity was satisfied. Before he would disclose himself to his disciple, he endeavored to cultivate those seeds of reason and goodness which he had sown in his mind.

In withdrawing the gaudy veil of external appearances, and presenting to my view the real evils it covered, he taught me to lament the failings of my fellow-creatures, to sympathize with their miseries, and to pity instead of envying them. Moved to compassion for human frailties from a deep sense of his own, he saw mankind everywhere the victims either of their own vices or of those of others; he saw the poor groan beneath the yoke of the rich, and the rich beneath that of their own prepossessions and prejudices. 'Believe me,' said he, 'our mistaken notions of things are so far from concealing our misfortunes from our view that they augment those evils, by rendering trifles of importance and making us sensible of a thousand wants, which we should never have known but from our prejudices. Peace of mind consists in a contempt for everything that may disturb it. The man who gives himself the greatest concern about life is he who enjoys it least; and he who aspires the most earnestly after happiness is always the most miserable.'

'Alas!' cried I, with all the bitterness of discontent, 'what a deplorable picture do you present of human life! If we may indulge ourselves in nothing, to what purpose are we born? If we must despise even happiness itself, who is there can know what it is to be happy?' 'I know,' replied the good priest, in a tone and manner that struck me. 'You!' said I, 'so little favored by fortune! so poor! exiled! persecuted! can you be happy? And if you are, what have you done to purchase happiness?' 'My dear child,' returned he, 'I will very readily tell you. As you have freely confessed to me, I will do the same to you. I will disclose to you all the sentiments of my heart. You shall see me, if not such as I really am, at least as I think myself to be; and when you have heard my whole profession of faith, you will know why I think myself happy; and, if you think as I do, what you have to do to become so likewise. But this profession is not to be made in a moment; it will require some time to disclose to you my thoughts on the situation of man, and the real value of human life. We will take a proper opportunity for an hour's uninterrupted conversation on this subject.'

As I expressed an earnest desire for this opportunity, it was put off only to the next morning. It was in summer-time, and we rose at break of day; when, taking me out of town, he led me to the top of a hill, at the foot of which ran the river Po, watering the fertile vales. That immense chain of mountains, the Alps, terminated the distant prospect. The rising sun had cast its orient rays over the gilded plains, and, by projecting the long shadows of the trees, the houses and the adjacent hills created the most beautiful scene ever mortal eye beheld. One might have been tempted to think that nature had at this time displayed all its magnificence as a subject for our conversation. Here it was that, after contemplating for a short time the surrounding objects in silence, my guide and benefactor thus began.

'Expect not either learned declamations or profound arguments; I am no great philosopher, and I give myself little trouble whether I ever shall be such or not. But I perceive sometimes the glimmering of good sense, and have always a regard to truth. I will not enter into any disputation or endeavor to refute you; but only lay down my own sentiments in simplicity of heart: consult your own, during this exposition; this is all I require of you. If I am mistaken, it is undesignedly, which is sufficient to clear me of all criminal error; and if you are in like manner unwittingly deceived, it is of little consequence: if I am right, reason is common to both; we are equally interested in listening to it: and why should you not think as I do?

'I was born a poor peasant, destined by my situation to the business of husbandry; it was thought, however, much more advisable for me to learn to get my bread by the profession of a priest; and means were found to give me a proper education. In this, most certainly, neither my parents nor I consulted what was really good, true, or useful for me to know, but only that I should learn what was necessary to my ordination. I learned, therefore, what was required of me to learn, I said what was required of me to say, and accordingly was made a priest. I was not long, however, before I perceived too plainly, that in laying myself under an obligation to be no longer a man, I had engaged for more than I could possibly perform.

'I was in that state of doubt and uncertainty in which Descartes requires the mind to be involved in order to enable it to investigate truth. This disposition of mind, however, is too disquieting to last long, its duration being owing only to vice or indolence. My heart was not so corrupt as to seek such indulgence; and nothing preserves so well the habit of reflection as to be more content with ourselves than with our fortune.

'I reflected, therefore, on the unhappy lot of mortals, always floating on the ocean of human opinions, without compass or rudder; left to the mercy of their tempestuous passions, with no other guide than an unexperienced pilot ignorant of his course, as well as whence he came and whither he is going. I said often to myself: I love the truth; I seek, yet cannot find it; let anyone show it me and I will readily embrace it. Why does it hide its charms from a heart formed to adore them?

'I have frequently experienced at times much greater evils; and yet no part of my life was ever so constantly disagreeable to me as that interval of scruples and anxiety. Running perpetually from one doubt and uncertainty to another, all that I could deduce from any long and painful meditation was incertitude, obscurity and contradiction, with regard to my existence as well as my duty.

'What added further to my perplexity was, that being educated in a church whose authority, being universally decisive, admits not of the least doubt, in rejecting one point, I rejected in a manner all the rest; and the impossibility of admitting so many absurd decisions set me against those which were not so. In being told I must believe all, I was prevented from believing anything, and I knew not where to stop.

'We have no standard with which to measure this immense machine. We cannot calculate its various relations; we neither know the first cause nor the final effects; we are ignorant even of ourselves; we know neither our own nature nor principle of action; nay, we hardly know whether man be a simple or a compound being; impenetrable mysteries surround us on every side; they extend beyond the region of sense: we imagine ourselves possessed of understanding to penetrate them, and we have only imagination. Everyone strikes out a way of his own across this imaginary world; but no one knows whether it will lead him to the point he aims at. We are yet desirous to penetrate, to know everything. The only thing we do not know is to remain ignorant of what it is impossible for us to know. We had much rather determine at random, and believe the thing which is not, than confess that none of us is capable of seeing the thing that is. Being ourselves but a small part of that great whole, whose limits surpass our most extensive views, and concerning which its Creator leaves us to make our idle conjectures, we are vain enough to decide what is that whole in itself, and what we are in relation to it.

'Taking a retrospect, then, of the several opinions, which had successively prevailed with me from my infancy, I found that, although none of them were so evident as to produce immediate conviction, they had nevertheless different degrees of probability, and that my innate sense of truth and falsehood leaned more or less to each. On this first observation, proceeding to compare, impartially and without prejudice, these different opinions with each other, I found that the first and most common was also the most simple and most rational; and that it wanted nothing more, to secure universal suffrage, than the circumstance of having been last proposed.

'The love of truth, therefore, being all my philosophy, and my method of philosophizing the simple and easy rule of common sense, which dispensed with the vain subtlety of argumentation, I re-examined, by this rule, all the interesting knowledge I was possessed of; resolved to admit, as evident, everything to which I could not, in the sincerity of my heart, refuse my assent; to admit also, as truth, all that appeared to have a necessary connection with the former, and to leave everything else as uncertain, without rejecting or admitting it, determined not to trouble myself about clearing up any point which did not tend to utility in practice. . . .

'You will find my exposition treat of nothing more than natural religion; it is very strange that we should stand in need of any other! By what means can I find out such necessity? In what respect can I be culpable, for serving God agreeably to the dictates of the understanding He has given me, and the sentiments He has implanted in my heart? What purity of morals, what system of faith useful to man or honorable to the Creator can I deduce from any positive doctrine that I cannot deduce as well without it, from a good use of my natural faculties? Let any one show me what can be added, either for the glory of God, the good of society, or my own advantage, to the obligations we are laid under by nature; let him show me what virtue can be produced from any new worship, which is not also the consequence of mine. The most sublime ideas of the Deity are inculcated by reason alone. Take a view of the works of nature, listen to the voice within, and then tell me what God has omitted to say to your sight, your conscience, your understanding? Where are the men who can tell us more of Him than He thus tells us of Himself? Their revelations only debase the Deity, in ascribing to Him human passions. So far from giving us enlightened notions of the Supreme Being, their particular tenets, in my opinion, give us the most obscure and confused ideas. To the inconceivable mysteries by which the Deity is hid from our view, they add the most absurd contradictions. They serve to make man proud, persecuting, and cruel; instead of establishing peace on earth, they bring fire and sword. I ask myself to what good purpose tends all this, without being able to resolve the question. Artificial religion presents to my view only the wickedness and miseries of mankind.

'I am told, indeed, that revelation is necessary to teach mankind the manner in which God would be served; as a proof of this, they bring the diversity of whimsical modes of worship which prevail in the world; and that without remarking that this very diversity arises from the whim of adopting revelations. Ever since men have taken it into their heads to make the Deity speak, every people make him speak in their own way and say what they like best. Had they listened only to what the Deity has said to their hearts, there would have been but one religion on earth.

'It is necessary that the worship of God should be uniform; I would have it so. But is this a point so very important, that the whole apparatus of divine power was necessary to establish it? Let us not confound the ceremonials of religion with religion itself. The worship of God demands that of the heart; and this, when it is sincere, is ever uniform.'

DISCOURSE ON THE ORIGIN OF INEQUALITY AMONG MEN

THE STATE OF NATURE

It appears, at first view, that men in a state of nature, having no moral relations or determinate obligations one with another, could not be either good or bad, virtuous or vicious; unless we take these terms in a physical sense, and call, in an individual, those qualities vices which may be injurious to his preservation, and those virtues which contribute to it; in which case, he would have to be accounted most virtuous who put least check on the pure impulses of nature. But without deviating from the ordinary sense of the words, it will be proper to suspend the judgment we might be led to form on such a state, and be on our guard against our prejudices, till we have weighed the matter in the scales of impartiality, and seen whether virtues or vices preponderate among civilized men; and whether their virtues do them more good than their vices do harm; till we have discovered, whether the progress of the sciences sufficiently indemnifies them for the mischiefs they do one another, in proportion as they are better informed of the good they ought to do; or whether they would not be, on the whole, in a much happier condition if they had nothing to fear or to hope from anyone, than as they are, subjected to universal dependence, and obliged to take everything from those who engage to give them nothing in return.

Above all, let us not conclude, with Hobbes, that because man has no idea of goodness, he must be naturally wicked; that he is vicious because he does not know virtue; that he always refuses to do his fellow-creatures services which he does not think they have a right to demand; or that by virtue of the right he truly claims to everything he needs, he foolishly imagines himself the sole proprietor of the whole universe. Hobbes had seen clearly the defects of all the modern definitions of natural right; but the consequences which he deduces from his own show that he understands it in an equally false sense. In reasoning on the principles he lays down, he ought to have said that the state of nature, being that in which the care for our own preservation is the least prejudicial to that of others, was consequently the best calculated to promote peace and the most suitable for mankind. He does say the exact opposite, in consequence of having improperly admitted, as a part of savage man's care for self-preservation, the gratification of a multitude of passions which are the work of society and have made laws necessary. A bad man, he says, is a robust child. But it remains to be proved whether a man in a state of nature is this robust child: and should we grant that he is, what would he infer? Why truly, that if this man, when robust and strong, were dependent on others as he is when feeble, there is no extravagance he would not be guilty of; that he would beat his mother when she was too slow in giving him her breast; that he would strangle one of his younger brothers, if he should be troublesome to him, or bite the arm of another, if he put him to any inconvenience. But that man in the state of nature is both strong and dependent involves two contrary suppositions. Man is weak when he is dependent, and is his own master before he becomes strong. Hobbes did not reflect that the same cause which prevents a savage from making use of his reason, as our jurists hold, prevents him also from abusing his faculties, as Hobbes himself allows: so that it may be justly said that savages are not bad merely because they do not know what it is to be good; for it is neither the development of the understanding nor the restraint of law that hinders them from doing ill, but the peacefulness of their passions, and their ignorance of vice: tanto plus in illis proficit vitiorum ignorantia, quam in his cognitio virtutis. [So much more does the ignorance of vice profit the one sort than the knowledge of virtue the other.—Justinian, History II, 2.]

There is another principle which has escaped Hobbes; which, having been bestowed on mankind, to moderate, on certain occasions, the impetuosity of egoism, or, before its birth, the desire of self-preservation, tempers the ardor with which he pursues his own welfare, by an innate repugnance at seeing a fellow-creature suffer.

Egoism must not be confused with self-respect; for they differ both in themselves and in their effects. Self-respect is a natural feeling which leads every animal to look to its own preservation, and which, guided in man by reason and modified by compassion, creates humanity and virtue. Egoism is a purely relative and factitious feeling, which arises in the state of society, leads each individual to make more of himself than of any other, causes all the mutual damage men inflict one on another, and is the real source of the 'sense of honor.'

This being understood, I maintain that, in our primitive condition, in the true state of nature, egoism did not exist; for as each man regarded himself as the only observer of his actions, the only being in the universe who took any interest in him, and the sole judge of his deserts, no feeling arising from comparisons he could not be led to make could take root in his soul; and for the same reason, he could know neither hatred nor the desire for revenge, since these passions can spring only from a sense of injury; and as it is the contempt or the intention to hurt, and not the harm done, which constitutes the injury, men who neither valued nor compared themselves could do one another much violence, when it suited them, without feeling any sense of injury. In a word, each man, regarding his fellows almost as he regarded animals of different species, might seize the prey of a weaker or yield up his own to a stronger, and yet consider these acts of violence as mere natural occurrences, without the slightest emotion of insolence or despite, or any other feeling than the joy or grief of success or failure.

ONE NATURAL VIRTUE

I think I need not fear contradiction in holding man to be possessed of the only natural virtue, which could not be denied him by the most violent detractor of human virtue. I am speaking of compassion, which is a disposition suitable to creatures so weak and subject to so many evils as we certainly are: by so much the more universal and useful to mankind, as it comes before any kind of reflection, and at the same time so natural, that the very brutes themselves sometimes give evident proofs of it. Not to mention the tenderness of mothers for their offspring and the perils they encounter to save them from danger, it is well known that horses show a reluctance to trample on living bodies. One animal never passes by the dead body of another of its species: there are even some which give their fellows a sort of burial; while the mournful lowings of cattle when they enter the slaughter-house show the impressions made on them by the horrible spectacle which meets them. We find, with pleasure, the author of The Fable of the Bees obliged to own that man is a compassionate and sensible being, and laying aside his cold subtlety of style, in the example he gives, to present us with the pathetic description of a man who, from a place of confinement, is compelled to behold a wild beast tear a child from the arms of its mother, grinding its tender limbs with its murderous teeth, and tearing its palpitating entrails with its claws. What horrid agitation must not the eye-witness of such a scene experience, although he would not be personally concerned! What anxiety would he not suffer at not being able to give any assistance to the fainting mother and the dying infant! Such is the pure emotion of nature, prior to all kinds of reflection! Such is the force of natural compassion, which the greatest depravity of morals has as yet hardly been able to destroy! for we daily find at our theaters men affected, nay, shedding tears at the sufferings of a wretch who, were he in the tyrant's place, would probably even add to the torments of his enemies; like the bloodthirsty Sulla, who was so sensitive to ills he had not caused, or that Alexander of Pheros who did not dare to go and see any tragedy acted, for fear of being seen weeping with Andromache and Priam, though he could listen without emotion to the cries of all the citizens who were daily strangled at his command.

Mollissima corda

*Humano generi dare se natura fatetur,
Quæ lacrimas dedit.*

[Nature avows she gave the human race the softest hearts, who gave them tears.

—Juvenal, Satire xv, 151.]

Mandeville well knew that, in spite of all their morality, men would have never been better than monsters, had not nature bestowed on them a sense of compassion, to aid their reason: but he did not see that from this quality alone flow all those social virtues, of which he denied man the possession. But what is generosity, clemency or humanity but compassion applied to the weak, to the guilty, or to mankind in general? Even benevolence and friendship are, if we judge rightly, only the effects of compassion, constantly set upon a particular object: for how is it different to wish that another person may not suffer pain and uneasiness and to wish him happy? Were it even true that pity is no more than a feeling, which puts us in the place of the sufferer, a feeling obscure yet lively in a savage, developed yet feeble in civilized man, this truth would have no other consequence than to confirm my argument. Compassion must, in fact, be the stronger, the more the animal beholding any kind of distress identifies himself with the animal that suffers.

Now it is plain that such identification must have been much more perfect in a state of nature than it is in a state of reason. It is reason that engenders self-respect, and reflection that confirms it, it is reason which turns man's mind back upon itself, and divides him from everything that could disturb or afflict him. It is philosophy that isolates him, and bids him say, at sight of the misfortunes of others: 'Perish if you will, I am secure.'

Nothing but such general evils as threaten the whole community can disturb the tranquil sleep of the philosopher or tear him from his bed. A murder may with impunity be committed under his window; he has only to put his hands to his ears and argue a little with himself to prevent nature, which is shocked within him, from identifying itself with the unfortunate sufferer. Uncivilized man has not this admirable talent; and for want of reason and wisdom is always foolishly ready to obey the first promptings of humanity. It is the populace that flocks together at riots and street-brawls, while the wise man prudently makes off. It is the mob and the marketwomen who part the combatants, and hinder gentlefolks from cutting one another's throats.

It is then certain that compassion is a natural feeling, which, by moderating the violence of love of self in each individual, contributes to the preservation of the whole species. It is this compassion that hurries us without reflection to the relief of those who are in distress; it is this which in a state of nature supplies the place of laws, morals and virtues, with the advantage that none are tempted to disobey its gentle voice; it is this which will always prevent a sturdy savage from robbing a weak child or a feeble old man of the sustenance they may have with pain and difficulty acquired, if he sees a possibility of providing for himself by other means; it is this which, instead of inculcating that sublime maxim of rational justice, Do to others as you would have them do unto you, inspires all men with that other maxim of natural goodness, much less perfect indeed, but perhaps more useful; Do good to yourself with as little evil as possible to others. In a word, it is rather in this natural feeling than in any subtle arguments that we must look for the cause of that repugnance which every man would experience in doing evil, even independently of the maxims of education. Although it might belong to Socrates and other minds of the like craft to acquire virtue by reason, the human race would long since have ceased to be, had its preservation depended only on the reasonings of the individuals composing it.

With passions so little active, and so good a curb, men, being wild rather than wicked, and more intent to guard themselves against the mischief that might be done them than to do mischief to others, were by no means subject to very perilous dissensions. They maintained no kind of intercourse with one another, and were consequently strangers to vanity, deference, esteem and contempt; they had not the least idea of meum and tuum, and no true conception of justice; they looked upon every violence to which they were subjected rather as an injury that might easily be repaired than as a crime that ought to be punished; and they never thought of taking revenge, unless perhaps mechanically and on the spot, as a dog will sometimes bite the stone which is thrown at him. Their quarrels therefore would seldom have very bloody consequences; for the subject of them would be merely the question of subsistence. But I am aware of one greater danger, which remains to be noticed.

SEXUAL PASSION

Of the passions that stir the heart of man, there is one that makes the sexes necessary to each other, and is extremely ardent and impetuous; a terrible passion that braves danger, surmounts all obstacles, and in its transports seems calculated to bring destruction on the human race which it is really destined to preserve. What must become of men who are left to this brutal and boundless rage, without modesty, without shame, and daily upholding their amours at the price of their blood?

It must, in the first place, be allowed that, the more violent the passions are, the more are laws necessary to keep them under restraint. But, setting aside the inadequacy of laws to effect this purpose, which is evident from the crimes and disorders to which these passions daily give rise among us, we should do well to inquire if these evils did not spring up with the laws themselves; for in this case, even if the laws were capable of repressing such evils, it is the least that could be expected from them, that they should check a mischief which would not have arisen without them.

Let us begin by distinguishing between the physical and moral ingredients in the feeling of love. The physical part of love is that general desire which urges the sexes to union with each other. The moral part is that which determines and fixes this desire exclusively upon one particular object; or at least gives it a greater degree of energy toward the object thus preferred. It is easy to see that the moral part of love is a factitious feeling, born of social usage, and enhanced by the women with much care and cleverness, to establish their empire, and put in power the sex which ought to obey. This feeling, being founded on certain ideas of beauty and merit which a savage is not in a position to acquire, and on comparisons which he is incapable of making, must be for him almost non-existent; for, as his mind cannot form abstract ideas of proportion and regularity, so his heart is not susceptible of the feelings of love and admiration, which are even insensibly produced by the application of these ideas. He follows solely the character nature has implanted in him, and not tastes which he could never have acquired; so that every woman equally answers his purpose.

Men in a state of nature being confined merely to what is physical in love, and fortunate enough to be ignorant of those excellences which whet the appetite while they increase the difficulty of gratifying it, must be subject to fewer and less violent fits of passion, and consequently fall into fewer and less violent disputes. The imagination, which causes such ravages among us, never speaks to the heart of savages, who quietly await the impulses of nature, yield to them involuntarily, with more pleasure than ardor, and their wants once satisfied, lose the desire. It is therefore incontestable that love, as well as all other passions, must have acquired in society that glowing impetuosity which makes it so often fatal to mankind. And it is the more absurd to represent savages as continually cutting one another's throats to indulge their brutality, because this opinion is directly contrary to experience; the Caribbeans, who have as yet least of all deviated from the state of nature, being in fact the most peaceable of people in their amours, and the least subject to jealousy, though they live in a hot climate which seems always to inflame the passions.

With regard to the inferences that might be drawn, in the case of several species of animals, the males of which fill our poultry-yards with blood and slaughter, or in spring make the forests resound with their quarrels over their females, we must begin by excluding all those species, in which nature has plainly established, in the comparative power of the sexes, relations different from those which exist among us; thus we can base no conclusion about men on the habits of fightingcocks. In those species where the proportion is better observed, these battles must be entirely due to the scarcity of females in comparison with males; or, what amounts to the same thing, to the intervals during which the female constantly refuses the advances of the male: for if each female admits the male but during two months in the year, it is the same as if the number of females were five-sixths less. Now, neither of these two cases is applicable to the human species, in which the number of females usually exceeds that of males, and among whom it has never been observed, even among savages, that the females have, like those of other animals, their stated times of passion and indifference.

Moreover, in several of these species, the individuals all take fire at once, and there comes a fearful moment of universal passion, tumult and disorder among them; a scene which is never beheld in the human species, whose love is not thus seasonal. We must not then conclude from the combats of such animals for the enjoyment of the females, that the case would be the same with mankind in a state of nature: and even if we drew such a conclusion, we see that such contests do not exterminate other kinds of animals, and we have no reason to think they would be more fatal to ours. It is indeed clear that they would do still less mischief than is the case in a state of society, especially in those countries in which, morals being still held in some repute, the jealousy of lovers and the vengeance of husbands are the daily cause of duels, murders, and even worse crimes; where the obligation of eternal fidelity only occasions adultery, and the very laws of honor and continence necessarily increase debauchery and lead to the multiplication of abortions.

PRIMITIVE MAN

Let us conclude then that man in a state of nature, wandering up and down the forests, without industry, without speech, and without home, an equal stranger to war and to all ties, neither standing in need of his fellow-creatures nor having any desire to hurt them, and perhaps even not distinguishing them one from another; let us conclude that, being self-sufficient and subject to so few passions, he could have no feelings or knowledge but such as befitted his situation; that he felt only his actual necessities, and disregarded everything he did not think himself immediately concerned to notice, and that his understanding made no greater progress than his vanity. If by accident he made any discovery, he was the less able to communicate it to others, as he did not know even his own children. Every art would necessarily perish with its inventor, where there was no kind of education among men, and generations succeeded generations without the least advance; when, all setting out from the same point, centuries must have elapsed in the barbarism of the first ages; when the race was already old, and man remained a child.

If I have expatiated at such length on this supposed primitive state, it is because I had so many ancient errors and inveterate prejudices to eradicate, and therefore thought it incumbent on me to dig down to their very root, and show, by means of a true picture of the state of nature, how far even the natural inequalities of mankind are from having that reality and influence which modern writers suppose.

It is in fact easy to see that many of the differences which distinguish men are merely the effect of habit and the different methods of life men adopt in society. Thus a robust or delicate constitution, and the strength or weakness attaching to it, are more frequently the effects of a hardy or effeminate method of education than of the original endowment of the body. It is the same with the powers of the mind; for education not only makes a difference between such as are cultured and such as are not, but even increases the differences which exist among the former, in proportion to their respective degrees of culture: as the distance between a giant and a dwarf on the same road increases with every step they take. If we compare the prodigious diversity which obtains in the education and manner of life of the various orders of men in the state of society, with the uniformity and simplicity of animal and savage life, in which everyone lives on the same kind of food and in exactly the same manner and does exactly the same things, it is easy to conceive how much less the difference between man and man must be in a state of nature than in a state of society, and how greatly the natural inequality of mankind must be increased by the inequalities of social institutions.

But even if nature really affected, in the distribution of her gifts, that partiality which is imputed to her, what advantage would the greatest of her favorites derive from it, to the detriment of others, in a state that admits of hardly any kind of relation between them? Where there is no love, of what advantage is beauty? Of what use is wit to those who do not converse, or cunning to those who have no business with others? I hear it constantly repeated that, in such a state, the strong would oppress the weak; but what is here meant by oppression? Some, it is said, would violently domineer over others, who would groan under a servile submission to their caprices. This indeed is exactly what I observe to be the case among us; but I do not see how it can be inferred of men in a state of nature, who could not easily be brought to conceive what we mean by dominion and servitude. One man, it is true, might seize the fruits which another had gathered, the game he had killed, or the cave he had chosen for shelter; but how would he ever be able to exact obedience, and what ties of dependence could there be among men without possessions? If, for instance, I am driven from one tree, I can go to the next; if I am disturbed in one place, what hinders me from going to another? Again, should I happen to meet with a man so much stronger than myself, and at the same time so depraved, so indolent, and so barbarous, as to compel me to provide for his sustenance, while he himself remains idle; he must take care not to have his eyes off me for a single moment; he must bind me fast before he goes to sleep, or I shall certainly either knock him on the head or make my escape. That is to say, he must in such a case expose himself voluntarily to much greater trouble than he seeks to avoid, or can give me. After all this, let him be off his guard ever so little; let him 10 but turn his head aside at any sudden noise, and I shall be instantly twenty paces off, lost in the forest, and, my fetters burst asunder, he would never see me again.

Without my expatiating thus uselessly on 15 these details, everyone must see that as the bonds of servitude are formed merely by the mutual dependence of men on one another and the reciprocal needs that unite them, it is impossible to make any man a 20 slave, unless he be first reduced to a situation in which he cannot do without the help of others: and, since such a situation does not exist in a state of nature, everyone is there his own master, and the law of 25 the strongest is of no effect.

Having proved that the inequality of mankind is hardly felt and that its influence is next to nothing in a state of nature, I must next show its origin and trace its 30 progress in the successive developments of the human mind. Having shown that human perfectibility, the social virtues, and the other faculties which natural man potentially possessed could never develop of themselves, but must require the fortuitous concurrence of many foreign causes that might never arise, and without which he would have remained forever in his primitive condition, I must now collect and 40 consider the different accidents which may have improved the human understanding while depraving the species, and made man wicked while making him sociable; so as to bring him and the world from that distant 45 period to the point at which we now behold them.

I confess that, as the events I am going to describe might have happened in various ways, I have nothing to determine my 50 choice but conjectures: but such conjectures become reasons, when they are the most probable that can be drawn from the nature of things, and the only means of discovering the truth. The consequences, however, which I mean to deduce will not be barely conjectural; as on the principles just laid down, it would be impossible to form any other theory that would not furnish the same results, and from which I could not draw the same conclusions.

5 This will be a sufficient apology for my not dwelling on the manner in which the lapse of time compensates for the little probability in the events; on the surprising power of trivial causes, when their action is constant; on the impossibility, on the 10 one hand, of destroying certain hypotheses, though on the other we cannot give them the certainty of known matters of fact; on its being within the province of history, when two facts are given as real, and have 15 to be connected by a series of intermediate facts, which are unknown or supposed to be so, to supply such facts as may connect them; and on its being in the province of 20 philosophy when history is silent, to determine similar facts to serve the same end; and lastly, on the influence of similarity, which in the case of events reduces the facts to a much smaller number of 25 different classes than is commonly imagined. It is enough for me to offer these hints to the consideration of my judges, and to have so arranged that the general reader has no need to consider 30 them at all.

THE BEGINNING OF SOCIETY

The first man who, having enclosed a 35 piece of ground, bethought himself of saying 'This is mine,' and found people simple enough to believe him, was the real founder of civil society. From how many crimes, wars and murders, from how many horrors 40 and misfortunes might not anyone have saved mankind, by pulling up the stakes, or filling up the ditch, and crying to his fellows, 'Beware of listening to this impostor; you are undone if you once forget 45 that the fruits of the earth belong to us, all, and the earth itself to nobody.' But there is great probability that things had then already come to such a pitch that they could no longer continue as they were; for the idea of property depends on many prior 50 ideas, which could only be acquired successively, and cannot have been formed all at once in the human mind. Mankind must have made very considerable progress, and acquired considerable knowledge and industry, which they must have also transmitted and increased from age to age, before they arrived at this last point of the state of nature. Let us then go further back and endeavor to unify under a single point of view that slow succession of events and discoveries in the most natural order.

Man's first feeling was that of his own existence, and his first care that of self-preservation. The produce of the earth furnished him with all he needed, and instinct told him how to use it. Hunger and other appetites made him at various times experience various modes of existence; and among these was one which urged him to propagate his species—a blind propensity that, having nothing to do with the heart, produced a merely animal act. The want once gratified, the two sexes knew each other no more; and even the offspring was nothing to its mother, as soon as it could do without her.

Such was the condition of infant man; the life of an animal limited at first to mere sensations, and hardly profiting by the gifts nature bestowed on him, much less capable of entertaining a thought of forcing anything from her. But difficulties soon presented themselves, and it became necessary to learn how to surmount them: the height of the trees, which prevented him from gathering their fruits, the competition of other animals desirous of the same fruits, and the ferocity of those who needed them for their own preservation, all obliged him to apply himself to bodily exercises. He had to be active, swift of foot, and vigorous in fight. Natural weapons, stones and sticks, were easily found: he learned to surmount the obstacles of nature, to contend in case of necessity with other animals, and to dispute for the means of subsistence even with other men, or to indemnify himself for what he was forced to give up to a stronger.

In proportion as the human race grew more numerous, men's cares increased. The difference of soils, climates and seasons must have introduced some differences into their manner of living. Barren years, long and sharp winters, scorching summers which parched the fruits of the earth must have demanded a new industry. On the seashore and the banks of the rivers, they invented the hook and line, and became fishermen and eaters of fish. In the forests they made bows and arrows, and became huntsmen and warriors. In cold countries they clothed themselves with the skins of the beasts they had slain.

The lightning, a volcano, or some lucky chance acquainted them with fire, a new resource against the rigors of winter: they next learned how to preserve this element, then how to reproduce it, and finally how to prepare with it the flesh of animals which before they had eaten raw.

The repeated relevance of various beings to himself and to one another would naturally give rise in the human mind to the perceptions of certain relations between them. Thus the relations which we denote by the terms, great, small, strong, weak, swift, slow, fearful, bold, and the like, almost insensibly compared at need, must have at length produced in him a kind of reflection, or rather a mechanical prudence, which would indicate to him the precautions most necessary to his security.

The new intelligence which resulted from this development increased his superiority over other animals, by making him sensible of it. He would now endeavor, therefore, to ensnare them, would play them a thousand tricks, and though many of them might surpass him in swiftness or in strength, would in time become the master of some and the scourge of others. Thus, the first time he looked into himself, he felt the first emotion of pride; and, at a time when he scarce knew how to distinguish the different orders of beings, by looking upon his species as of the highest order, he prepared the way for assuming pre-eminence as an individual.

Other men, it is true, were not then to him what they now are to us, and he had no greater intercourse with them than with other animals; yet they were not neglected in his observations. The conformities, which he would in time discover between them, and between himself and his female, led him to judge of others which were not then perceptible; and finding that they all behaved as he himself would in like circumstances, he naturally inferred that their manner of thinking and acting was altogether in conformity with his own. This important truth once deeply impressed on his mind, must have induced him, from an intuitive feeling more certain and much more rapid than any kind of reasoning, to pursue the rules of conduct, which he had best observe towards them, for his own security and advantage.

Taught by experience that the love of well-being is the sole motive of human actions, he found himself in a position to distinguish the few cases, in which mutual interest might justify him in relying upon the assistance of his fellows; and also the still fewer cases in which a conflict of interests might give cause to suspect them. In the former case, he joined in the same herd with them, or at most in some kind of loose association, that laid no restraint on its members, and lasted no longer than the transitory occasion that formed it. In the latter case, everyone sought his own private advantage, either by open force, if he thought himself strong enough, or by address and cunning, if he felt himself the weaker.

In this manner, men may have insensibly acquired some gross ideas of mutual undertakings, and of the advantages of fulfilling them: that is, just so far as their present and apparent interest was concerned; for they were perfect strangers to foresight, and were so far from troubling themselves about the distant future, that they hardly thought of the morrow. If a deer was to be taken, everyone saw, that in order to succeed, he must abide faithfully by his post: but if a hare happened to come within the reach of any one of them, it is not to be doubted that he pursued it without scruple, and having seized his prey, cared very little, if by so doing he caused his companions to miss theirs.

It is easy to understand that such intercourse would not require a language much more refined than that of rooks or monkeys, who associate together for much the same purpose. Inarticulate cries, plenty of gestures and some imitative sounds, must have been for a long time the universal language; and by the addition, in every country, of some conventional articulate sounds (of which, as I have already intimated, the first institution is not too easy to explain) particular languages were produced; but these were rude and imperfect, and nearly such as are now to be found among some savage nations.

Hurried on by the rapidity of time, by the abundance of things I have to say, and by the almost insensible progress of things in their beginnings, I pass over in an instant a multitude of ages; for the slower the events were in their succession, the more rapidly they may be described.

These first advances enabled men to make others with greater rapidity. In proportion as they grew enlightened, they grew industrious. They ceased to fall asleep under the first tree, or in the first cave that afforded them shelter; they invented several kinds of implements of hard and sharp stones, which they used to dig up the earth and to cut wood; they then made huts of branches, and afterwards learned to plaster them over with mud and clay. This was the epoch of a first evolution, which established and distinguished families, and introduced a kind of property, in itself the source of a thousand quarrels and conflicts. As, however, the strongest were probably the first to build themselves huts which they felt themselves able to defend, it may be concluded that the weak found it much easier and safer to imitate than to attempt to dislodge them; and of those who were once provided with huts, none could have any inducement to appropriate that of his neighbor; not indeed so much because it did not belong to him, as because it could be of no use, and he could not make himself master of it without exposing himself to a desperate battle with the family which occupied it.

FOUNDATION OF THE FAMILY

The first expansions of the human heart were the effects of a novel situation, which united husbands and wives, fathers and children, under one roof. The habit of living together soon gave rise to the finest feelings known to humanity, conjugal love and paternal affection. Every family became a little society, the more united because liberty and reciprocal attachment were the only bonds of its union. The sexes, whose manner of life had been hitherto the same, began now to adopt different ways of living. The women became more sedentary, and accustomed themselves to mind the hut and their children, while the men went abroad in search of their common subsistence. From living a softer life, both sexes also began to lose something of their strength and ferocity: but, if individuals became to some extent less able to encounter wild beasts separately, they found it, on the other hand, easier to assemble and resist in common.

The simplicity and solitude of a man's life in this new condition, the paucity of his wants and the implements he had invented to satisfy them, left him a great deal of leisure, which he employed to furnish himself with many conveniences unknown to his fathers: and this was the first yoke he inadvertently imposed on himself, and the first source of the evils he prepared for his descendants. For, beside continuing thus to enervate both body and mind, these conveniences lost with use almost all their power to please, and even degenerated into real needs, till the want of them became far more disagreeable than the possession of them had been pleasant.¹⁰ Men would have been unhappy at the loss of them, though the possession did not make them happy.

We can here see a little better how the use of speech became established and insensibly improved in each family, and we may form a conjecture also concerning the manner in which various causes may have extended and accelerated the progress of language, by making it more and more necessary. Floods or earthquakes surrounded inhabited districts with precipices or waters: revolutions of the globe tore off portions from the continent and made them islands. It is readily seen that among men thus collected and compelled to live together, a common idiom must have arisen much more easily than among those who still wandered through the forests of the continent. Thus it is very possible that after their first essays in navigation the islanders brought over the use of speech to the continent: and it is at least very probable that communities and languages were first established in islands, and even came to perfection there before they were known to the mainland.³⁵

Everything now begins to change its aspect. Men, who have up to now been roving in the woods, by taking to a more settled manner of life, come gradually together, form separate bodies, and at length in every country arises a distinct nation, united in character and manners, not by regulations or laws, but by uniformity of life and food and the common influence of climate. Permanent neighborhood could not fail to produce, in time, some connection between different families. Among young people of opposite sexes, living in neighboring huts, the transient commerce required by nature soon led, through mutual intercourse, to another kind not less agreeable, and more permanent. Men began now to take the difference between objects into account, and to make comparisons; they acquired imperceptibly the ideas of beauty and merit, which soon gave rise to feelings of preference. In consequence of seeing each other often, they could not do without seeing each other constantly. A tender and pleasant feeling insinuated itself into their souls, and the least opposition turned it into an impetuous fury; with love arose jealousy, discord triumphed, and human blood was sacrificed to the gentlest of all passions.

BIRTH OF THE ARTS

As ideas and feelings succeeded one another and heart and head were brought into play, men continued to lay aside their original wildness; their private connections became every day more intimate as their limits extended. They accustomed themselves to assemble before their huts round a large tree; singing and dancing, the true offspring of love and leisure, became the amusement, or rather the occupation, of men and women thus assembled together with nothing else to do. Each one began to consider the rest and to wish to be considered in turn; and thus a value came to be attached to public esteem. Whoever sang or danced best, whoever was the handsomest, the strongest, the most dexterous, or the most eloquent, came to be of most consideration; and this was the first step towards inequality, and at the same time towards vice. From these first distinctions arose on the one side vanity and contempt and on the other shame and envy; and the fermentation caused by these new leavens ended by producing combinations fatal to innocence and happiness.

As soon as men began to value one another, and the idea of consideration had got a footing in their mind, everyone put in his claim to it, and it became impossible to refuse it to any with impunity. Hence arose the first obligations of civility even among savages; and every intended injury became an affront; because, besides the hurt which might result from it, the party injured was certain to find in it a contempt for his person, which was often more insupportable than the hurt itself.

Thus, as every man punished the contempt shown him by others, in proportion to his opinion of himself, revenge became terrible, and men bloody and cruel. This is precisely the state reached by most of the savage nations known to us: and it is for want of having made a proper disinction in our ideas, and seen how very far they already are from the state of nature, that so many writers have hastily concluded that man is naturally cruel, and requires civil institutions to make him more mild; whereas nothing is more gentle than man in his primitive state, as he is placed by nature at an equal distance from the stupidity of brutes, and the fatal ingenuity of civilized man. Equally confined by instinct and reason to the sole care of guarding himself against the mischiefs which threaten him, he is restrained by natural compassion from doing any injury to others, and is not led to do such a thing even in return for injuries received. For, according to the axiom of the wise Locke, there can be no injury where there is no property.

APPEARANCE OF MORALITY AND LAW

But it must be remarked that the society thus formed, and the relations thus established among men, required of them qualities different from those which they possessed from their primitive constitution. Morality began to appear in human actions, and everyone, before the institution of law, was the only judge and avenger of the injuries done him, so that the goodness which was suitable in the pure state of nature was no longer proper in the newborn state of society. Punishments had to be made more severe, as opportunities of offending became more frequent, and the dread of vengeance had to take the place of the rigor of the law. Thus, though men had become less patient, and their natural compassion had already suffered some diminution, this period of expansion of the human faculties, keeping a just mean between the indolence of the primitive state and the petulant activity of our egoism, must have been the happiest and most stable of epochs. The more we reflect on it, the more we shall find that this state was the least subject to revolutions, and altogether the very best man could experience; so that he can have departed from it only through some fatal accident, which, for the public good, should never have happened. The example of savages, most of whom have been found in this state, seems to prove that men were meant to remain in it, that it is the real youth of the world, and that all subsequent advances have been apparently so many steps towards the perfection of the individual, but in reality towards the decrepitude of the species.

So long as men remained content with their rustic huts, so long as they were satisfied with clothes made of the skins of animals and sewn together with thorns and fishbones, adorned themselves only with feathers and shells, and continued to paint their bodies different colors, to improve and beautify their bows and arrows and to make with sharp-edged stones fishing boats or clumsy musical instruments; in a word, so long as they undertook only what a single person could accomplish, and confined themselves to such arts as did not require the joint labor of several hands, they lived free, healthy, honest and happy lives, so long as their nature allowed, and as they continued to enjoy the pleasures of mutual and independent intercourse. But from the moment one man began to stand in need of the help of another; from the moment it appeared advantageous to any one man to have enough provisions for two, equality disappeared, property was introduced, work became indispensable, and vast forests became smiling fields, which man had to water with the sweat of his brow, and where slavery and misery were soon seen to germinate and grow up with the crops.

THE USE OF IRON

Metallurgy and agriculture were the two arts which produced this great revolution. The poets tell us it was gold and silver, but for the philosophers it was iron and corn which first civilized men and ruined humanity. Thus both were unknown to the savages of America, who for that reason are still savage: the other nations also seem to have continued in a state of barbarism while they practised one of these arts. One of the best reasons, perhaps why Europe has been, if not longer, at least more constantly and highly civilized than the rest of the world, is that it is at once the most abundant in iron and the most fertile in corn.

It is difficult to conjecture how men first came to know and use iron; for it is impossible to suppose they would of themselves think of digging the ore out of the mine, and preparing it for smelting, before they knew what would be the result. On the other hand, we have the less reason to suppose this discovery the effect of any accidental fire, as mines are formed in barren places, bare of trees and plants; so that it looks as if nature had taken pains to keep the fatal secret from us. There remains, therefore, only the extraordinary accident of some volcano which, by ejecting metallic substances already in fusion, suggested to the spectators the idea of imitating the natural operation. And we must further conceive them as possessed of uncommon courage and foresight, to undertake so laborious a work, with so distant a prospect of drawing advantage from it; yet these qualities are united only in minds more advanced than we can suppose those of these first discoverers to have been.

AGRICULTURE

With regard to agriculture, the principles of it were known long before they were put in practise; and it is indeed hardly possible that men, constantly employed in drawing their subsistence from plants and trees, should not readily acquire a knowledge of the means made use of by nature for the propagation of vegetables. It was in all probability very long, however, before their industry took that turn, either because trees, which together with hunting and fishing afforded them food, did not require their attention; or because they were ignorant of the use of corn or without instruments to cultivate it; or because they lacked foresight to future needs; or lastly, because they were without means of preventing others from robbing them of the fruit of their labor.

When they grew more industrious, it is natural to believe that they began, with the help of sharp stones and pointed sticks, to cultivate a few vegetables or roots around their huts; though it was long before they knew how to prepare corn, or were provided with the implements necessary for raising it in any large quantity; not to mention how essential it is, for husbandry, to consent to immediate loss, in order to reap a future gain—a precaution very foreign to the turn of a savage's mind; for, as I have said, he hardly foresees in the morning what he will need at night.

The invention of the other arts must therefore have been necessary to compel mankind to apply themselves to agriculture. No sooner were artificers wanted to smelt and forge iron, than others were required to maintain them; the more hands that were employed in manufacture, the fewer were left to provide for the common subsistence, though the number of mouths to be furnished with food remained the same: and as some required commodities in exchange for their iron, the rest at length discovered the method of making iron serve for the multiplication of commodities. By this means the arts of husbandry and agriculture were established on the one hand, and the art of working metals and multiplying their uses on the other.

PROPERTY AND JUSTICE

20 The cultivation of the earth necessarily brought about its distribution; and property, once recognized, gave rise to the first rules of justice; for, to secure each man his own, it had to be possible for each to have something. Besides, as men began to look forward to the future, and all had something to lose, everyone had reason to apprehend that reprisals would follow any injury he might do to another. This origin is so much the more natural, as it is impossible to conceive how property can come from anything but manual labor: for what else can a man add to things which he does not originally create, so as to make them his own property? It is the husbandman's labor alone that, giving him a title to the produce of the ground he has tilled, gives him a claim also to the land itself, at least till harvest; and so from year to year, a constant possession which is easily transformed into property. When the ancients, says Grotius, gave to Ceres the title of Legislatrix, and to a festival celebrated in her honor the name of Thesmophoria, they meant by that that the distribution of lands had produced a new kind of right: that is to say, the right of property, which is different from the right deductible from the law of nature.

In this state of affairs, equality might have been sustained, had the talents of individuals been equal, and had, for example, the use of iron and the consumption of commodities always exactly balanced each other; but, as there was nothing to preserve this balance, it was soon disturbed; the strongest did most work; the most skilful turned his labor to best account; the most ingenious devised methods of diminishing his labor: the husbandman wanted more iron, or the smith more corn, and while both labored equally, the one gained a great deal by his work, while the other could hardly support himself. Thus natural inequality unfolds itself insensibly with that of combination, and the difference between men, developed by their different circumstances, becomes more sensible and permanent in its effects, and begins to have an influence in the same proportion, over the lot of individuals.

Matters once at this pitch, it is easy to imagine the rest. I shall not detain the reader with a description of the successive invention of other arts, the development of language, the trial and utilization of talents, the inequality of fortunes, the use and abuse of riches, and all the details connected with them which the reader can easily supply for himself. I shall confine myself to a glance at mankind in this new situation.

Behold then all human faculties developed, memory and imagination in full play, egoism interested, reason active, and the mind almost at the highest point of its perfection. Behold all the natural qualities in action, the rank and condition of every man assigned him; not merely his share of property and his power to serve or injure others, but also his wit, beauty, strength or skill, merit or talents: and these being the only qualities capable of commanding respect, it soon became necessary to possess or to affect them.

EVILS OF PROPERTY

It now became the interest of men to appear what they really were not. To be and to seem became two totally different things; and from this distinction sprang insolent pomp and cheating trickery, with all the numerous vices that go in their train. On the other hand, free and independent as men were before, they were now, in consequence of a multiplicity of new wants, brought into subjection, as it were, to all nature, and particularly to one another; and each became in some degree a slave even in becoming the master of other men: if rich, they stood in need of the services of others; if poor, of their assistance; and even a middle condition did not enable them to do without one another.

Man must now, therefore, have been perpetually employed in getting others to interest themselves in his lot, and in making them apparently at least, if not really, find their advantage in promoting his own. Thus he must have been sly and artful in his behavior to some, and imperious and cruel to others; being under a kind of necessity to ill-use all the persons of whom he stood in need, when he could not frighten them into compliance, and did not judge it his interest to be useful to them. Insatiable ambition, the thirst of raising their respective fortunes, not so much from real want as from the desire to surpass others, inspired all men with a vile propensity to injure one another, and with a secret jealousy, which is the more dangerous, as it puts on the mask of benevolence, to carry its point with greater security. In a word, there arose rivalry and competition on the one hand, and conflicting interests on the other, together with a secret desire on both of profiting at the expense of others. All these evils were the first effects of property, and the inseparable attendants of growing inequality.

Before the invention of signs to represent riches, wealth could hardly consist in anything but lands and cattle, the only real possessions men can have. But, when inheritances so increased in number and extent as to occupy the whole of the land, and to border on one another, one man could aggrandize himself only at the expense of another; at the same time the supernumeraries, who had been too weak or too indolent to make such acquisitions, and had grown poor without sustaining any loss, because, while they saw everything change around them, they remained still the same, were obliged to receive their subsistence, or steal it, from the rich; and this soon bred, according to their different characters, dominion and slavery or violence and rapine. The wealthy, on their part, had no sooner begun to taste the pleasure of command, than they disdained all others, and, using their old slaves to acquire new, thought of nothing but subduing and enslaving their neighbors; like ravenous wolves, which having once tasted human flesh, despise every other food and thenceforth seek only men to devour.

Thus, as the most powerful or the most miserable considered their might or misery as a kind of right to the possessions of others, equivalent, in their opinion, to that of property, the destruction of equality was attended by the most terrible disorders. Usurpations by the rich, robbery by the poor, and the unbridled passions of both suppressed the cries of natural compassion, and the still feeble voice of justice, and filled men with avarice, ambition and vice. Between the title of the strongest and that of the first occupier, there arose perpetual conflicts, which never ended but in battles and bloodshed. The new-born state of society thus gave rise to a horrible state of war; men thus harassed and depraved were no longer capable of retracing their steps or renouncing the fatal acquisitions they had made, but, laboring by the abuse of the faculties which do them honor, merely to their own confusion, brought themselves to the brink of ruin.

Attonitus novitate mali, divesque miserque, Effugere optat opes; et quæ modo voverat odit.

[Both rich and poor, shocked at their new-found ills,
Would fly from wealth, and lose what they had sought.

—Ovid, Metamorphoses XI, 127.]

It is impossible that men should not at length have reflected on so wretched a situation and on the calamities that overwhelmed them. The rich, in particular, must have felt how much they suffered by a constant state of war; of which they bore all the expense; and in which, though all risked their lives, they alone risked their property. Besides, however speciously they might disguise their usurpations, they knew that they were founded on precarious and false titles; so that, if others took from them by force what they themselves had gained by force, they would have no reason to complain. Even those who had been enriched by their own industry could hardly base their proprietorship on better claims. It was in vain to repeat, 'I built this well; I gained this spot by my industry.' 'Who gave you your standing?' it might be answered, 'and what right have you to demand payment of us for doing what we never asked you to do? Do you not know that numbers of your fellow-creatures are starving, for want of what you have too much of? You ought to have had the express and universal consent of mankind before appropriating more of the common subsistence than you needed for your own maintenance.' Destitute of valid reasons to justify and sufficient strength to defend himself, able to crush individuals with ease, but easily crushed himself by a troop of bandits, one against all, and incapable, on account of mutual jealousy, of joining with his equals against numerous enemies united by the common hope of plunder, the rich man, thus urged by necessity, conceived at length the profoundest plan that ever entered in the mind of man: this was to employ in his favor the forces of those who attacked him, to make allies of his adversaries, to inspire them with different maxims, and to give them other institutions as favorable to himself as the law of nature was unfavorable.

With this view, after having represented to his neighbors the horror of a situation which armed every man against the rest, and made their possessions as burdensome to them as their wants, and in which no safety could be expected either in riches or in poverty, he readily devised plausible arguments to make them close with his design. 'Let us join,' said he, 'to guard the weak from oppression, to restrain the ambitious, and secure to every man the possession of what belongs to him: let us institute rules of justice and peace, to which all without exception may be obliged to conform; rules that may in some measure make amends for the caprices of fortune, by subjecting equally the powerful and the weak to the observance of reciprocal obligations. Let us, in a word, instead of turning our forces against ourselves, collect them in a supreme power which may govern us by wise laws, protect and defend all the members of the association, repulse their common enemies, and maintain eternal harmony among us.'

Fewer words to this purpose would have been enough to impose on men so barbarous and easily seduced; especially as they had too many disputes among themselves to do without arbitrators, and too much ambition and avarice to go long without masters. All ran headlong to their chains, in hopes of securing their liberty; for they had just wit enough to perceive the advantages of political institutions, without experience enough to enable them to foresee the dangers. The most capable of foreseeing the dangers were the very persons who expected to benefit by them; and even the most prudent judged it not inexpedient to sacrifice one part of their freedom to ensure the rest; as a wounded man has his arm cut off to save the rest of his body.

Such was, or may well have been, the origin of society and law, which bound new fetters on the poor, and gave new powers to the rich; which irretrievably destroyed natural liberty, eternally fixed the law of property and inequality, converted clever usurpation into unalterable right, and for the advantage of a few ambitious individuals subjected all mankind to perpetual labor, slavery and wretchedness. It is easy to see how the establishment of one community made that of all the rest necessary, and how, in order to make head against united forces, the rest of mankind had to unite in turn. Societies soon multiplied and spread over the face of the earth, till hardly a corner of the world was left in which a man could escape the yoke; and withdraw his head from beneath the sword which he saw perpetually hanging over him by a thread. Civil right having thus become the common rule among the members of each community, the law of nature maintained its place only between different communities, where, under the name of the right of nations, it was qualified by certain tacit conventions, in order to make commerce practicable, and serve as a substitute for natural compassion, which lost, when applied to societies, almost all the influence it had over individuals, and survived no longer except in some great cosmopolitan spirits, who, breaking down the imaginary barriers that separate different peoples, follow the example of our Sovereign Creator, and include the whole human race in their benevolence.

WARS

But bodies politic, remaining thus in a state of nature among themselves, presently experienced the inconveniences which had obliged individuals to forsake it; for this state became still more fatal to these great bodies than it had been to the individuals of whom they were composed. Hence arose national wars, battles, murders, and reprisals, which shock nature and outrage reason, together with all those horrible prejudices which class among the virtues the honor of shedding human blood. The most distinguished men hence learned to consider cutting each other's throats a duty; at length men massacred their fellow creatures by thousands without so much as knowing why, and committed more murders in a single day's fighting, and more violent outrages in the sack of a single town, than were committed in the state of nature during whole ages over the whole earth. Such were the first effects which we can see to have followed the division of mankind into different communities. But let us return to their institutions.

I know that some writers have given other explanations of the origin of political societies, such as the conquest of the powerful, or the association of the weak. It is, indeed, indifferent to my argument which of these causes we choose. That which I have just laid down, however, appears to me the most natural for the following reasons. First: because, in the first case, the right of conquest, being no right in itself, could not serve as a foundation on which to build any other; the victor and the vanquished people still remained with respect to each other in the state of war, unless the vanquished, restored to the full possession of their liberty, voluntarily made choice of the victor for their chief. For till then, whatever capitulation might have been made being founded on violence, and therefore ipso facto void, there could not have been on this hypothesis either a real society or body politic, or any law other than that of the strongest. Secondly: because the words strong and weak are, in the second case, ambiguous; for during the interval between the establishment of a right of property or prior occupancy, and that of political government, the meaning of these words is better expressed by the terms rich and poor: because, in fact, before the institution of laws, men had no other way of reducing their equals to submission, than by attacking their goods, or making some of their own over to them. Thirdly: because, as the poor had nothing but their freedom to lose, it would have been in the highest degree absurd for them to resign voluntarily the only good they still enjoyed, without getting anything in exchange: whereas the rich having feelings, if I may so express myself, in every part of their possessions, it was much easier to harm them, and therefore more necessary for them to take precautions against it; and, in short, because it is more reasonable to suppose a thing to have been invented by those to whom it would be of service, than by those whom it must have harmed.

ORIGIN OF GOVERNMENT

Government had, in its infancy, no regular and constant form. The want of experience and philosophy prevented men from seeing any but present inconveniences, and they thought of providing against others only as they presented themselves. In spite of the endeavors of the wisest legislators, the political state remained imperfect, because it was little more than the work of chance; and, as it had begun ill, though time revealed its defects and suggested remedies, the original faults were never repaired. It was continually being patched up, when the first task should have been to get the site cleared and all the old materials removed, as was done by Lycurgus at Sparta, if a stable and lasting edifice was to be erected. Society consisted at first merely of a few general conventions, which every member bound himself to observe; and for the performance of covenants the whole body went security to each individual. Experience only could show the weakness of such a constitution, and how easily it might be infringed with impunity, from the difficulty of convicting men of faults, where the public alone was to be witness and judge: the laws could not but be eluded in many ways; disorders and inconveniences could not but multiply continually, till it became necessary to commit the dangerous trust of public authority to private persons, and the care of enforcing obedience to the deliberations of the people to the magistrate. For to say that chiefs were chosen before the confederacy was formed, and that the administrators of the laws were there before the laws themselves, is too absurd a supposition to consider seriously.

It would be as unreasonable to suppose that men at first threw themselves irretrievably and unconditionally into the arms of an absolute master, and that the first expedient which proud and unsubdued men upon for their common security was to run headlong into slavery. For what reason, in fact, did they take to themselves superiors, if it was not in order that they might be defended from oppression, and have protection for their lives, liberties, and properties, which are, so to speak, the constituent elements of their being? Now, in the relations between man and man, the worst that can happen is for one to find himself at the mercy of another, and it would have been inconsistent with common sense to begin by bestowing on a chief the only things they wanted his help to preserve. What equivalent could he offer them for so great a right? And if he had presumed to exact it under pretext of defending them, would he not have received the answer recorded in the fable: 'What more can the enemy do to us?' It is therefore beyond dispute, and indeed the fundamental maxim of all political right, that people have set up chiefs to protect their liberty, and not to enslave them. 'If we have a prince,' said Pliny to Trajan, 'it is to save ourselves from having a master.'

Politicians indulge in the same sophistry about the love of liberty as philosophers about the state of nature. They judge, by what they see, of very different things, which they have not seen; and attribute to man a natural propensity to servitude, because the slaves within their observation are seen to bear the yoke with patience; they fail to reflect that it is with liberty as with innocence and virtue; the value is known only to those who possess them, and the taste for them is forfeited when they are forfeited themselves. 'I know the charms of your country,' said Brasidas to a Satrap, who was comparing the life at Sparta with that at Persepolis, 'but you cannot know the pleasures of mine.'

An unbroken horse erects his mane, paws the ground and starts back impetuously at the sight of the bridle; while one which is properly trained suffers patiently even whip and spur: so savage man will not bend his neck to the yoke to which civilized man submits without a murmur, but prefers the most turbulent state of liberty to the most peaceful slavery. We cannot therefore, from the servility of nations already enslaved, judge of the natural disposition of mankind for or against slavery; we should go by the prodigious efforts of every free people to save itself from oppression. I know that the former are forever holding forth in praise of the tranquillity they enjoy in their chains, and that they call a state of wretched servitude a state of peace: miserrimam servitutem pacem appellant. ['The most wretched slavery they call peace.' Tacitus, History iv, 17.] But when I observe the latter sacrificing pleasure, peace, wealth, power and life itself to the preservation of that one treasure, which is so disdained by those who have lost it; when I see free-born animals dash their brains out against the bars of their cage, from an innate impatience of captivity; when I behold numbers of naked savages, that despise European pleasures, braving hunger, fire, the sword and death, to preserve nothing but their independence, I feel that it is not for slaves to argue about liberty.

PATERNAL AUTHORITY

With regard to paternal authority, from which some writers have derived absolute government and all society, it is enough without going back to the contrary arguments of Locke and Sidney, to remark that nothing on earth can be further from the ferocious spirit of despotism than the mildness of that authority which looks more to the advantage of him who obeys than to that of him who commands; that, by the law of nature, the father is the child's master no longer than his help is necessary; that from that time they are both equal, the son being perfectly independent of the father, and owing him only respect and not obedience. For gratitude is a duty which ought to be paid, but not a right to be exacted: instead of saying that civil society is derived from paternal authority, we ought to say rather that the latter derives its principal force from the former. No individual was ever acknowledged as the father of many, till his sons and daughters remained settled around him. The goods of the father, of which he is really the master, are the ties which keep his children in dependence, and he may bestow on them, if he pleases, no share of his property, unless they merit it by constant deference to his will. But the subjects of an arbitrary despot are so far from having the like favor to expect from their chief, that they themselves, and everything they possess are his property, or at least are considered by him as such; so that they are forced to receive, as a favor, the little of their own he is pleased to leave them. When he despoils them, he does but justice, and mercy in that he permits them to live.

By proceeding thus to test fact by right, we should discover as little reason as truth in the voluntary establishment of tyranny. It would also be no easy matter to prove the validity of a contract binding on only one of the parties, where all the risk is on one side and none on the other; so that no one could suffer but he who bound himself. This hateful system is indeed, even in modern times, very far from being that of wise and good monarchs, and especially of the kings of France; as may be seen from several passages in their edicts; particularly from the following passage in a celebrated edict published in 1667 in the name and by order of Louis XIV:—"Let it not, therefore, be said that the Sovereign is not subject to the laws of his State; since the contrary is a true proposition of the right of nations, which flattery has sometimes attacked but good princes have always defended as the tutelary divinity of their dominions. How much more legitimate is it to say with the wise Plato, that the perfect felicity of a kingdom consists in the obedience of subjects to their prince, and of the prince to the laws, and in the laws being just and constantly directed to the public good!" (Of the rights of the Most Christian Queen over various States of the Monarchy of Spain. 1667.)

THE RIGHT TO LIBERTY

I shall not stay here to inquire whether, as liberty is the noblest faculty of man, it is not degrading our very nature, reducing ourselves to the level of the brutes, which are mere slaves of instinct, and even an affront to the Author of our being, to renounce without reserve the most precious of all His gifts, and to bow to the necessity of committing all the crimes He has forbidden, merely to gratify a mad or a cruel master; or if this sublime craftsman ought not to be less angered at seeing His workmanship entirely destroyed than thus dishonored. I will waive (if my opponents please) the authority of Barbeyrac, who, following Locke, roundly declares that no man can so far sell his liberty as to submit to an arbitrary power which may use him as it likes. For, he adds, this would be to sell his own life, of which he is not master. I shall ask only what right those who were not afraid thus to debase themselves could have to subject their posterity to the same ignominy, and to renounce for them those blessings which they do not owe to the liberality of their progenitors, and without which life itself must be a burden to all who are worthy of it.

Puffendorf says that we may divest ourselves of our liberty in favor of other men, just as we transfer our property from one to another by contracts and agreements. But this seems a very weak argument. For in the first place, the property I alienate becomes quite foreign to me, nor can I suffer from the abuse of it; but it very nearly concerns me that my liberty should not be abused, and I cannot, without incurring the guilt of the crimes I may be compelled to commit, expose myself to become an instrument of crime. Besides the right of property being only a convention of human institution, men may dispose of what they possess as they please: but this is not the case with the essential gifts of nature, such as life and liberty, which every man is permitted to enjoy, and of which it is at least doubtful whether any have a right to divest themselves. By giving up the one, we degrade our being; by giving up the other, we do our best to annul it; and, as no temporal good can indemnify us for the loss of either, it would be an offense against both reason and nature to renounce them at any price whatsoever. But, even if we could transfer our liberty, as we do our property, there would be a great difference with regard to the children, who enjoy the father's substance only by the transmission of his right; whereas, liberty being a gift which they hold from nature as being men, their parents have no right whatever to deprive them of it. As then, to establish slavery, it was necessary to do violence to nature, so, in order to perpetuate such a right, nature would have to be changed. Jurists, who have gravely determined that the child of a slave comes into the world a slave, have decided in other words, that a man shall come into the world not a man.

I regard it then as certain, that government did not begin with arbitrary power, but that this is the depravation, the extreme term, of government, and brings it back, finally, to just the law of the strongest, which it was originally designed to remedy. Supposing, however, it had begun in this manner, such power, being in itself illegitimate, could not have served as a basis for the laws of society, nor, consequently, for the inequality they instituted.

THE SOCIAL CONTRACT

Without entering at present upon the investigations which still remain to be made into the nature of the fundamental compact underlying all government, I content myself with adopting the common opinion concerning it, and regard the establishment of the political body as a real contract between the people and the chiefs chosen by them: a contract by which both parties bind themselves to observe the laws therein expressed, which form the ties of their union. The people having in respect of their social relations concentrated all their wills in one, the several articles, concerning which this will is explained, become so many fundamental laws, obligatory on all the members of the State without exception, and one of these articles regulates the choice and power of the magistrates appointed to watch over the execution of the rest. This power extends to everything which may maintain the constitution, without going so far as to alter it. It is accompanied by honors, in order to bring the laws and their administrators into respect. The ministers are also distinguished by personal prerogatives, in order to recompense them for the cares and labor which good administration involves. The magistrate, on his side, binds himself to use the power he is entrusted with only in conformity with the intention of his constituents, to maintain them all in the peaceable possession of what belongs to them, and to prefer on every occasion the public interest to his own.

Before experience had shown, or knowledge of the human heart enabled men to foresee, the unavoidable abuses of such a constitution, it must have appeared so much the more excellent, as those who were charged with the care of its preservation had themselves most interest in it; for magistracy and the rights attaching to it being based solely on the fundamental laws, the magistrates would soon cease to be legitimate as soon as these ceased to exist; the people would no longer owe them obedience; and as not the magistrates, but the laws, are essential to the being of a State,

If we reflect with ever so little attention on this subject, we shall find new arguments to confirm this truth, and be convinced from the very nature of the contract that it cannot be irrevocable: for, if there were no superior power capable of ensuring the fidelity of the contracting parties, or compelling them to perform their reciprocal engagements, the parties would be sole judges in their own cause, and each would always have a right to renounce the contract, as soon as he found that the other had violated its terms, or that they no longer suited his convenience. It is upon this principle that the right of abdication may possibly be founded. Now, if, as here, we consider only what is human in this institution, it is certain that, if the magistrate, who has all the power in his own hands, and appropriates to himself all the advantages of the contract, has none the less a right to renounce his authority, the people, who suffer for all the faults of their chief must have a much better right to renounce their dependence. But the terrible and innumerable quarrels and disorders that would necessarily arise from so dangerous a privilege show, more than anything else, how much human governments stood in need of a more solid basis than mere reason, and how expedient it was for the public tranquillity that the divine will should interpose to invest the sovereign authority with a sacred and inviolable character, which might deprive subjects of the fatal right of disposing of it. If the world had received no other advantages from religion, this would be enough to impose on men the duty of adopting and cultivating it, abuses and all, since it has been the means of saving more blood than fanaticism has ever spilt. But let us follow the thread of our hypothesis.

FORMS OF GOVERNMENT

The different forms of government owe their origin to the differing degrees of inequality which existed between individuals at the time of their institution. If there happened to be any one man among them preëminent in power, virtue, riches or personal influence, he became sole magistrate, and the State assumed the form of monarchy. If several, nearly equal in point of eminence, stood above the rest, they were elected jointly, and formed an aristocracy. Again, among a people who had deviated less from a state of nature, and between whose fortune or talents there was less disproportion, the supreme administration was retained in common, and a democracy was formed. It was discovered in process of time which of these forms suited men the best. Some peoples remained altogether subject to the laws; others soon came to obey their magistrates. The citizens labored to preserve their liberty; the subjects, irritated at seeing others enjoying a blessing they had lost, thought only of making slaves of their neighbors. In a word, on the one side arose riches and conquests, and on the other happiness and virtue.

In these different governments, all the offices were at first elective; and when the influence of wealth was out of the question, the preference was given to merit, which gives a natural ascendancy, and to age, which is experienced in business and deliberate in council. The Elders of the Hebrews, the Gerontes at Sparta, the Senate at Rome, and the very etymology of our word Seigneur, show how old age was once held in veneration. But the more often the choice fell on old men, the more often elections had to be repeated, and the more they became a nuisance; intrigues set in, factions were formed, party feeling grew bitter, civil wars broke out; the lives of individuals were sacrificed to the pretended happiness of the State; and at length men were on the point of relapsing into their primitive anarchy. Ambitious chiefs profited by these circumstances to perpetuate their offices in their own families: at the same time the people already used to dependence, ease, and the conveniences of life, and already incapable of breaking its fetters, agreed to an increase of its slavery, in order to secure its tranquillity. Thus magistrates, having become hereditary, contracted the habit of considering their offices as a family estate, and themselves as proprietors of the communities of which they were at first only the officers, of regarding their fellow-citizens as their slaves, and numbering them, like cattle, among their belongings, and of calling themselves the equals of the gods and king of kings.

If we follow the progress of inequality in these various revolutions, we shall find that the establishment of laws and of the right of property was its first term, the institution of magistracy the second, and the conversion of legitimate into arbitrary power the third and last; so that the condition of rich and poor was authorized by the first period; that of powerful and weak by the second; and only by the third that of master and slave, which is the last degree of inequality, and the term at which all the rest remain, when they have got so far, till the government is either entirely dissolved by new revolutions, or brought back again to legitimacy.

To understand this progress as necessary we must consider not so much the motives for the establishment of the body politic, as the forms it assumes in actuality, and the faults that necessarily attend it: for the flaws which make social institutions necessary are the same as make the abuse of them unavoidable. If we except Sparta, where the laws were mainly concerned with the education of children, and where Lycurgus established such morality as practically made laws needless—for laws as a rule being weaker than the passions, restrain men without altering them—it would not be difficult to prove that every government, which scrupulously complied with the ends for which it was instituted, and guarded carefully against change and corruption, was set up unnecessarily. For a country, in which no one either evaded the laws or made a bad use of magisterial power, could require neither laws nor magistrates.

ESTABLISHMENT OF AN ARISTOCRACY

Political distinctions necessarily produce civil distinctions. The growing inequality between the chiefs and the people is soon felt by individuals, and modified in a thousand ways according to passions, talents and circumstances. The magistrate could not usurp any illegitimate power, without giving distinction to the creatures with whom he must share it. Besides, individuals only allow themselves to be oppressed so far as they are hurried on by blind ambition, and looking rather below than above them, come to love authority more than independence, and submit to slavery, that they may in turn enslave others. It is no easy matter to reduce to obedience a man who has no ambition to command; nor would the most adroit politician find it possible to enslave a people whose only desire was to be independent. But inequality easily makes its way among cowardly and ambitious minds, which are ever ready to run the risks of fortune, and almost indifferent whether they command or obey, as it is favorable or adverse. Thus, there must have been a time, when the eyes of the people were so fascinated that their rulers had only to say to the least of men, 'Be great, you and all your posterity,' to make him immediately appear great in the eyes of everyone as well as in his own. His descendants took still more upon them, in proportion to their distance from him; the more obscure and uncertain the cause, the greater the effect: the greater the number of idlers one could count in a family, the more illustrious it was held to be.

If this were the place to go into details, I could readily explain how, even without the intervention of the government, inequality of credit and authority became unavoidable among private persons, as soon as their union in a single society made them compare themselves one with another, and take into account the differences which they found out from the continual intercourse every man had to have with his neighbors.

Distributive justice would oppose this rigorous equality of the state of nature, even were it practicable in civil society; as all the members of the State owe it their services in proportion to their talents and abilities, they ought, on their side, to be distinguished and favored in proportion to the services they have actually rendered. It is in this sense we must understand that passage of Isocrates, in which he extols the primitive Athenians, for having determined which of the two kinds of equality was the most useful, viz., that which consists in dividing the same advantages indiscriminately among all the citizens, or that which consists in distributing them to each according to his deserts. These able politicians, adds the orator, banishing that unjust inequality which makes no distinction between good and bad men, adhered inviolably to that which rewards and punishes every man according to his deserts.

But, in the first place, there never existed a society, however corrupt some may have become, where no difference was made between the good and the bad; and with regard to morality, where no measures can be prescribed by law exact enough to serve as a practical rule for a magistrate, it is with great prudence that, in order not to leave the fortune or quality of the citizens to his discretion, it prohibits him from passing judgment on persons and confines his judgment to actions. Only morals such as those of the ancient Romans can bear censors, and such a tribunal among us would throw everything into confusion. The difference between good and bad men is determined by public esteem; the magistrate being strictly a judge of right alone; whereas the public is the truest judge of morals, and is of such integrity and penetration on this head, that although it may be sometimes deceived, it can never be corrupted. The rank of citizens ought, therefore, to be regulated, not according to their personal merit—for this would put in the power of the magistrate to apply the law almost arbitrarily—but according to the actual services done to the State, which are capable of being more exactly estimated.

THE DESIRE FOR DISTINCTION

These differences are of several kinds; but riches, nobility, or rank, power and personal merit being the principal distinctions by which men form an estimate of each other in society, I could prove that the harmony or conflict of these different forces is the surest indication of the good or bad constitution of a State. I could show that among these four kinds of inequality, personal qualities being the origin of all the others, wealth is the one to which they are all reduced in the end; for, as riches tend most immediately to the prosperity of individuals, and are easiest to communicate, they are used to purchase every other distinction. By this observation we are enabled to judge pretty exactly how far a people has departed from its primitive constitution, and of its progress towards the extreme term of corruption. I could explain how much this universal desire for reputation, honors, and advancement, which inflames us all, exercises and holds up to comparison our faculties and powers; how it excites and multiplies our passions, and, by creating universal competition and rivalry, or rather enmity, among men, occasions numberless failures, successes and disturbances of all kinds by making so many aspirants run the same course. I could show that it is to this desire of being talked about, and this unremitting rage of distinguishing ourselves, that we owe the best and the worst things we possess, both our virtues and our vices, our science and our errors, our conquerors and our philosophers; that is to say, a great many bad things, and a very few good ones. In a word, I could prove that, if we have a few rich and powerful men on the pinnacle of fortune and grandeur, while the crowd grovels in want and obscurity, it is because the former prize what they enjoy only in so far as others are destitute of it; and because, without changing their condition, they would cease to be happy the moment the people ceased to be wretched.

These details alone, however, would furnish matter for a considerable work, in which the advantages and disadvantages of every kind of government might be weighed, as they are related to man in the state of nature, and at the same time all the different aspects, under which inequality has up to the present appeared, or may appear in ages yet to come, according to the nature of the several governments, and the alterations which time must unavoidably occasion in them, might be demonstrated. We should then see the multitude oppressed from within, in consequence of the very precautions it had taken to guard against foreign tyranny. We should see oppression continually gain ground without it being possible for the oppressed to know where it would stop, or what legitimate means was left them of checking its progress. We should see the rights of citizens, and the freedom of nations slowly extinguished, and the complaints, protests and appeals of the weak treated as seditious murmurings. We should see the honor of defending the common cause confined by statecraft to a mercenary part of the people. We should see taxes made necessary by such means, and the disheartened husbandman deserting his fields even in the midst of peace, and leaving the plough to gird on the sword. We should see fatal and capricious codes of honor established; and the champions of their country sooner or later becoming its enemies, and for ever holding their daggers to the breasts of their fellow-citizens. The time would come when they would be heard saying to the oppressor of their country—

*Pectore si fratris gladium juguloque
parentis
Condere me jubeas, gravidæque in viscera
partu
Conjugis, invitâ peragam tamen omnia dextrâ.*

[If you bid me bury my sword in my brother's heart or my father's neck, or in the womb of my pregnant wife, all these things my right hand will perform against my will.—Lucan, I, 376.]

RESULTS OF INEQUALITY

From great inequality of fortunes and 20 conditions, from the vast variety of passions and of talents, useless and pernicious arts, of vain sciences, would arise a multitude of prejudices equally contrary to reason, happiness and virtue. We should 25 see the magistrates fomenting everything that might weaken men united in society, by promoting dissension among them; everything that might sow in it the seeds of actual division, while it gave society 30 the air of harmony; everything that might inspire the different ranks of people with mutual hatred and distrust, by setting the rights and interests of one against those of another, and so strengthen the power 35 which comprehended them all.

It is from the midst of this disorder and these revolutions, that despotism, gradually raising up its hideous head, and devouring everything that remained sound and un- 40 tainted in any part of the State, would at length trample on both the laws and the people, and establish itself on the ruins of the republic. The times which immediately preceded this last change would be times 45 of trouble and calamity; but at length the monster would swallow up everything, and the people would no longer have either chiefs or laws, but only tyrants. From this moment there would be no question of 50 virtue or morality; for despotism cui ex honesto nulla est spes, wherever it prevails, admits no other master; it no sooner speaks than probity and duty lose their weight and blind obedience is the only 55 virtue which slaves can still practise.

This is the last term of inequality, the extreme point that closes the circle, and meets that from which we set out. Here all private persons return to their first equality, because they are nothing; and, subjects having no law but the will of their 5 master, and their master no restraint but his passions, all notions of good and all principles of equity again vanish. There is here a complete return to the law of the strongest, and so to a new state of nature, 10 differing from that we set out from; for the one was a state of nature in its first purity, while this is the consequence of excessive corruption. There is so little difference between the two states in other 15 respects, and the contract of government is so completely dissolved by despotism, that the despot is master only so long as he remains the strongest; as soon as he can be expelled, he has no right to complain of violence. The popular insurrection that ends in the death or deposition of a Sultan is as lawful an act as those by which he 20 disposed, the day before, of the lives and fortunes of his subjects. As he was maintained by force alone, it is force that over- 25 throws him. Thus everything takes place according to the natural order; and, whatever may be the result of such frequent and precipitate revolutions, no man has 30 reason to complain of the injustice of another, but only of his own ill-fortune or indiscretion.

If the reader thus discovers and retraces the lost and forgotten road, by which man must have passed from the state of nature to the state of society; if he carefully re- 35 stores, along with the intermediate situations which I have just described, those which want of time has compelled me to 40 suppress, or my imagination has failed to suggest, he cannot fail to be struck by the vast distance which separates the two states. It is in tracing this slow suc- 45 cession that he will find the solution of a number of problems of politics and morals, which philosophers cannot settle. He will feel that, men being different in different ages, the reason why Diogenes could not find a man was that he sought among his 50 contemporaries a man of an earlier period. He will see that Cato died with Rome and liberty, because he did not fit the age in which he lived; the greatest of men served only to astonish a world which he would 55 certainly have ruled, had he lived five hundred years sooner. In a word, he will explain how the soul and the passions of men insensibly change their very nature;

why our wants and pleasures in the end seek new objects; and why, the original man having vanished by degrees, society offers to us only an assembly of artificial men and factitious passions, which are the work of all these new relations, and without any real foundation in nature. We are taught nothing on this subject, by reflection, that is not entirely confirmed by observation. The savage and the civilized man differ so much in the bottom of their hearts and in their inclinations, that what constitutes the supreme happiness of one would reduce the other to despair. The former breathes only peace and liberty; he desires only to live and be free from labor; even the ataraxia of the Stoic falls far short of his profound indifference to every other object. Civilized man, on the other hand, is always moving, sweating, toiling and racking his brains to find still more laborious occupations: he goes on in drudgery to his last moment and even seeks death to put himself in a position to live or renounces life to acquire immortality. He pays his court to men in power, whom he hates, and to the wealthy, whom he despises; he stops at nothing to have the honor of serving them; he is not ashamed to value himself on his own meanness and their protection; and, proud of his slavery, he speaks with disdain of those who have not the honor of sharing it. What a sight would the perplexing and envied labors of a European minister of State present to the eyes of a Caribbean! How many cruel deaths would not this indolent savage prefer to the horrors of such a life, which is seldom even sweetened by the pleasures of doing good! But, for him to see into the motives of all this solicitude, the words power and reputation would have to bear some meaning in his mind; he would have to know that there are men who set a value on the opinion of the rest of the world; who can be made happy and satisfied with themselves rather on the testimony of other people than on their own. In reality, the source of all these differences is, that the savage lives within himself, while the social man lives constantly outside himself, and only knows how to live in the opinion of others, so that he seems to receive the consciousness of his own existence merely from the judgment of others concerning him. It is not to my present purpose to insist on the indifference to good and evil which arises from this disposition, in spite of our many fine works on morality, or to show how, everything being reduced to appearances, there is but art and mummery in even honor, friendship, virtue and often vice itself, of which we at length learn the secret of boasting; to show in short, how, always asking others what we are, and never daring to ask ourselves, in the midst of so much philosophy, humanity and civilization, and of such sublime codes of morality, we have nothing to show for ourselves but a frivolous and deceitful appearance, honor without virtue, reason without wisdom, and pleasure without happiness. It is sufficient that I have proved that this is not by any means the original state of man, but that it is merely the spirit of society, and the inequality which society produces, that thus transform and alter all our natural inclinations.

CONCLUSION

I have endeavored to trace the origin and progress of inequality, and the institution and abuse of political societies as far as these are capable of being deduced from the nature of man merely by the light of reason, and independently of those sacred dogmas which give the sanction of divine right to sovereign authority. It follows from this survey, that, as there is hardly any inequality in the state of nature, all the inequality which now prevails owes its strength and growth to the development of our faculties and the advance of the human mind, and becomes at last permanent and legitimate by the establishment of property and laws. Secondly, it follows that moral inequality, authorized by positive right alone, clashes with natural right, whenever it is not proportionate to physical inequality; a distinction which sufficiently determines what we ought to think of that species of inequality, which prevails in all civilized countries, since it is plainly contrary to the law of nature, however defined, that children should command old men, fools wise men, and that the privileged few should gorge themselves with superfluities while the starving multitude are in want of the bare necessities of life.

LESSING (1729-1781)

Gotthold Ephraim Lessing, though later in date than Rousseau, belongs in spirit to an earlier time. German literature had suffered a terrible setback through the consequences of the Thirty Years War (1618-48), which devastated the country and reduced the population by more than a half. The seventeenth century was almost a blank in German literature, and recovery in the eighteenth century was slow. French classical influence was predominant, and Frederick the Great in 1750 brought Voltaire from Paris to Berlin to adorn the Prussian Court. The reaction from this influence may be said to have begun with the prose versions of Shakespeare's plays by Wieland (1762-66), later superseded by the admirable verse translations of A. W. Schlegel (1797-1801). Schlegel's lectures on Dramatic Art and Literature (1809-11) gave the romantic movement in drama philosophical justification against the French classical rules and the French classical spirit, but the pioneer work in the destruction of French classical authority was done by Lessing's Letters on Modern Literature (1759) and the series of newspaper criticisms he wrote at Hamburg in 1767-69, afterwards published in a volume known as the Hamburgische Dramaturgie.

Lessing was familiar with the classics and with English literature, and he was able to show that French classical tragedy was an artificial product based upon a mistaken application of critical theories rather than upon the great classical tragedians, to whom he did not hesitate to compare Shakespeare as containing more of the true classical spirit and of truth to nature than Corneille and Voltaire. 'After the Ædipus of Sophocles, no piece in the world can have more power over our passions than Othello, King Lear, and Hamlet.' This is now familiar doctrine, but when Lessing said it, in February, 1759, it was a new heresy, only later to be established as romantic orthodoxy. His view of Shakespeare was a message of redemption to German drama and opened the way to free artistic activity afterwards taken by Schiller and Goethe. Carlyle speaks of Lessing as a man 'standing on the confines of Light and Darkness, like Day on the misty mountain tops,' and in a more careful estimate of his genius says:—'Among all the writers of the eighteenth century, there is not one of a more compact and rigid intellectual structure; who more distinctly knows what he is aiming at, or with more gracefulness, vigor and precision sets it forth to his readers. He thinks with the clearness and piercing sharpness of the most expert logician; but a genial fire pervades him, a wit, a heartiness, a general richness and fineness of nature, to which most logicians are strangers. He is a sceptic in many things, but the noblest of sceptics; a mild, manly, half-careless enthusiasm struggles through his indignant unbelief: he stands before us like a toilworn but unwearied and heroic champion, earning not the conquest but the battle; as indeed himself admits to us, that "it is not the finding the truth, but the honest search for it, that profits." We confess, we should be entirely at a loss for the literary creed of that man who reckoned Lessing other than a thoroughly cultivated writer; nay, entitled to rank, in this particular, with the most distinguished writers of any existing nation. As a poet, as a critic, philosopher, or controversialist, his style will be found precisely such as we of England are accustomed to admire most; brief, nervous, vivid; yet quiet, without glitter or antithesis; idiomatic, pure without purism; transparent, yet full of character and reflex hues of meaning.'

VOLTAIRE AND SHAKESPEARE

Hamburgische Dramaturgie Nos. 10, 11, 12

On the sixth evening was performed Semiramis, by M. de Voltaire.

This tragedy was first brought out on the French stage in 1748, was greatly applauded, and in a measure formed an epoch in the history of this stage. After M. de Voltaire had produced his Zaire and Alzire, his Brutus and Cæsar, he was confirmed in his opinion that the tragic poets of his nation had in many points outstripped the Greeks. 'From us French,' he said, 'the Greeks might have learned a more graceful exposition and the great art how to combine the scenes one with another in such a mode that the stage never remains empty and no personage enters or leaves without a reason. From us,' he said, 'they might have learned how rivals speak to each other in witty antitheses, and how the poet can dazzle and astonish by a wealth of sparkling elevated thoughts.' From us they could have learned—oh, yes, what cannot be learned from the French! Here and there, it is true, a foreigner who has also read the classics a little would like humbly to beg permission to differ from them. He would perhaps object that all these prerogatives of the French have no great influence on the essential element of tragedy; that they are beauties which the unaffected grandeur of the ancients despised. But what does it avail to raise objections against M. de Voltaire? He speaks and the world believes. There was only one thing he missed in the French theater: that its masterpieces should be brought upon the stage with all the splendor that the Greeks accorded to the trifling attempts of their young art. He was very properly offended at the theater of Paris, an old ball-room, decorated in the worst taste, where the people pushed and jostled in a dirty pit. Especially was he offended at the barbarous custom of tolerating spectators on the stage, leaving the actors barely room enough for their most necessary movements. He was convinced that this bad practise alone had deprived France of much that would have been attempted under freer conditions and in a theater better adapted to comfort and action. To prove by example he wrote his Semiramis. A queen who assembles her parliament to announce to them her marriage; a ghost who rises from his grave to hinder incest and to revenge himself on his murderer; the grave into which a fool steps to issue as a criminal; all this was indeed something quite new for the French. It created as much noise on the stage, it demanded as much pomp and transformation as had been known only in opera. The poet believed he had given the model for a special genus, and though he had made it for the French stage not such as it was, but such as he wished to see it, nevertheless it was played there for the present as well as circumstances would permit. At the first representation the spectators still sat on the stage; and I should like much to have seen a ghost of old appear in this gallant circle. Only after the first performances was this blemish in artistic fitness removed. The actors cleared the stage and what was then an exception for the benefit of an extraordinary play became in time the constant practise. But only for the Parisian stage, for which, as we have said, Semiramis formed an epoch. The provincials love to retain old fashions and would rather be deprived of all illusions than renounce their privilege of treading on the long trains of Zaires and Meropees.

The appearance of a ghost was so bold a novelty on the French stage, and the poet who ventured upon it justified it by such curious reasons, that it really repays the trouble of investigating them a little. 'They cry and write on all sides,' says M. de Voltaire, 'that we no longer believe in ghosts and that the apparition of a ghost is held childish in the eyes of an enlightened nation. But how,' he replies to this, 'should all antiquity have believed in such miracles and should we not be permitted to adapt ourselves to antiquity? How? Our own religion has hallowed the belief in such extraordinary dispensations of Providence and it should be held ridiculous to revive them!'

These exclamations appear to me to be more rhetorical than philosophical. Above all things I should wish religion to be left out of the question. In matters of taste and criticism, reasons extorted from religion are all very well to silence an opponent, but not well suited to convince him. Religion as religion has nothing to decide here, and regarded as a form of ancient tradition her testimony has neither more nor less value than all other testimonies of antiquity. Consequently, in this instance we have only to deal with antiquity.

Very good then; all antiquity believed in ghosts. Therefore the poets of antiquity were quite right to avail themselves of this belief. If we encounter ghosts among them, it would be unreasonable to object to them according to our better knowledge. But does this accord the same permission to our modern poets who share our better knowledge? Certainly not. But suppose he transfer his story into these more credulous times? Not even then. For the dramatic poet is no historian, he does not relate to us what was once believed to have happened, but he really produces it again before our eyes, and produces it again not on account of mere historical truth but for a totally different and a nobler aim. Historical accuracy is not his aim, but only the means by which he hopes to attain his aim; he wishes to delude us and touch our hearts through this delusion. If it be true therefore that we no longer believe in ghosts; and if this unbelief must of necessity prevent this delusion, if without this delusion we cannot possibly sympathize, then our modern dramatist injures himself when he nevertheless dresses up such incredible fables, and all the art he has lavished upon them is vain.

Consequently? It is consequently never to be allowed to bring ghosts and apparitions on the stage? Consequently this source of terrible or pathetic emotions is exhausted for us? No, this would be too great a loss to poetry. Besides, does she not own examples enough where genius confutes all our philosophy, rendering things that seem ludicrous to our cooler reason most terrible to our imagination? The consequence must therefore be different and the hypotheses whence we started false. We no longer believe in ghosts? Who says so? Or rather, what does that mean? Does it mean: we are at last so far advanced in comprehension that we can prove their impossibility; that certain incontestable truths that contradict a belief in ghosts are now so universally known, are so constantly present even to the minds of the most vulgar, that everything that is not in accordance with these truths seems to them ridiculous and absurd? It cannot mean this. 'We no longer believe in ghosts' can therefore only mean this: in this matter, concerning which so much may be argued for or against, that is not decided and never can be decided, the prevailing tendency of the age is to incline toward the preponderance of reasons brought to bear against this belief. Some few hold this opinion from conviction, and many others wish to appear to hold it, and it is these who raise the outcry and set the fashion. Meanwhile the mass is silent, and remains indifferent, and thinks now with one side, now with the other, delights in hearing jokes about ghosts recounted in broad daylight and shivers with horror at night when they are talked of.

Now a disbelief in ghosts in this sense cannot and should not hinder the dramatic poet from making use of them. The seeds of possible belief in them are sown in all of us and most frequently in those persons for whom he chiefly writes. It depends solely on the degree of his art whether he can force these seeds to germinate, whether he possesses certain dexterous means to summon up rapidly and forcibly arguments in favor of the existence of such ghosts. If he has them in his power, no matter what we may believe in ordinary life, in the theater we must believe as the poet wills.

Such a poet is Shakespeare and Shakespeare only and alone. His ghost in Hamlet makes our hair stand on end, whether they cover a believing or an unbelieving brain. M. de Voltaire did not do well when he referred to this ghost, he only made himself and his ghost of Ninus ridiculous by so doing.

Shakespeare's ghost appears really to come from another world. For it comes at the solemn hour, in the dread stillness of night, accompanied by all the gloomy, mysterious accessories wherewith we have been told by our nurses that ghosts appear. Now Voltaire's ghost is not even fit for a bugbear wherewith to frighten children. It is only a disguised actor, who has nothing, says nothing, does nothing that makes it probable that he is that which he pretends to be. All the circumstances moreover, under which he appears, disturb the illusion and betray the creation of a cold poet who would like to deceive and terrify us without knowing how to set about it. Let us only consider this one thing. Voltaire's ghost steps out of his grave in broad daylight, in the midst of an assembly of the royal parliament, preceded by a thunder-clap. Now where did M. de Voltaire learn that ghosts are thus bold? What old woman could not have told him that ghosts avoid sunshine and do not willingly visit large assemblies? No doubt Voltaire knew this also, but he was too timid, too delicate to make use of these vulgar conditions; he wanted to show us a ghost, but it should be of a higher type, and just this original type marred everything. A ghost that takes liberties which are contrary to all tradition, to all spectral good manners, does not seem to me a right sort of ghost, and everything that does not in such cases strengthen the illusion seems to weaken it.

If Voltaire had paid some attention to mimetic action he would for other reasons have felt the impropriety of allowing a ghost to appear before a large assembly. All present are forced at once to exhibit signs of fear and horror, and they must all exhibit it in various ways if the spectacle is not to resemble the chilly symmetry of a ballet. Now suppose a troupe of stupid walking gentlemen and ladies have been duly trained to this end, and even assuming that they have been successfully trained, consider how all the various expressions of the same emotion must divide the attention of the spectator and withdraw it from the principal characters. For if these are to make their due impression on us, it is not only needful we should see them, but it is well we should see nothing but them. Shakespeare let only Hamlet see the ghost, and in the scene where his mother is present, she neither sees nor hears it. All our attention is therefore fixed on him, and the more evidence of terror and horror we discover in this fear-stricken soul, the more ready are we to hold the apparition that has awakened such agitation as that for which he holds it. The specter operates on us, but through him rather than by itself. The impression it makes on him passes on to us, and the effect is too vivid and apparent for us to doubt its supernatural cause. How little has Voltaire understood this artistic touch! At his ghost many are frightened but not much. Semiramis exclaims once, 'Heaven! I die,' while the rest make no more ado about him than we might make about a friend whom we deemed far away and who suddenly walks into the room.

I must note another difference that exists between the ghosts of the English and French poets. Voltaire's ghost is nothing else but a poetical machine that is only employed to help the unraveling of the plot; it does not interest us in the very least on its own account. Shakespeare's ghost, on the contrary, is a real active personage, in whose fate we take an interest, who excites not only our fear but our pity.

This difference arose beyond question out of the different points of view from which the two poets regarded ghosts. Voltaire looked upon the reappearance of a dead man as a miracle; Shakespeare as quite a natural occurrence. Which of the two thought the more philosophically cannot be questioned, but Shakespeare thought the more poetically. Voltaire's ghost presents no claims to be regarded as a being who even beyond the grave is capable of pleasant and unpleasant sensations. He only wishes to instruct us how divine power would occasionally make an exception to its eternal laws in order to discover and punish secret crimes.

I will not say that it is a fault when the dramatic poet arranges his fable in such a manner that it serves for the exposition or confirmation of some great moral truth. But I may say that this arrangement of the fable is anything but needful; that there are very instructive and perfect plays that do not aim at such a single maxim, and that we err when we regard the moral sentences that are found at the close of many ancient tragedies as the keynote for the existence of the entire play.

If therefore the Semiramis of M. de Voltaire had no further merit but this on which he so greatly prides himself, namely that we can therefrom learn to reverence almighty justice that selects extraordinary means to punish extraordinary crimes, then I say Semiramis would seem to me a very indifferent play, especially as its moral is by no means the most edifying. For it is incontestably more becoming to assume that Providence does not need to employ such extraordinary means, and to suppose that the punishment of the bad and the reward of the good follow in the ordinary chain of events.

THE CRITIC'S DEFENSE OF HIMSELF

Hamburgische Dramaturgie, Nos. 101-104

First a word concerning myself. For why should not an after-play have a prologue, beginning with a Poeta cum primum animum ad scribendum appulit? [When the poet first set his mind to write.] When a year and a day ago some good folk in this place conceived the idea of trying whether something more could not be done for the German theater than could be done under the management of a so-called director, I do not know how it was that they thought of me and dreamed that I could be useful to such an undertaking. I was just standing idly in the market-place, no one wanted to hire me, beyond doubt because no one knew how to use me until these friends came. Until now all occupations of my life have been very indifferent to me; I have never pushed myself into any or offered myself, but neither have I ever refused even the most insignificant to which I felt myself drawn by any kind of predilection.

'Whether I would concur in the foundation of the local theater?' To this I could reply easily. My only reasons for hesitation were these, whether I could, and how I could best do so?

I am neither actor nor poet.

It is true that I have sometimes had the honor of being taken for the latter, but only because I have been misunderstood. It is not right to draw such liberal inferences from the few dramatic attempts I have ventured. Not every one who takes up a brush and lays on colors is a painter. The earliest of my attempts were made at that time of life when we are but too apt to regard inclination and facility as genius. What is tolerable in my later attempts is due, as I am well aware, simply and solely to criticism. I do not feel within myself the living spring that works itself out of its native strength and breaks forth out of its own strength into such rich, fresh, clear streams. I must force everything out of myself by pressure and pipes. I should be poor, cold, shortsighted if I had not learned in a measure to borrow foreign treasures, to warm myself at foreign fires, and to strengthen my eyes by the glasses of art. I am therefore always ashamed or annoyed when I hear or read anything in disparagement of criticism. It is said to suppress genius, and I flattered myself that I had gained from it something very nearly approaching to genius. I am a lame man who cannot possibly be edified by abuse of his crutch.

But certainly like the crutch which helps the lame man to move from one place to another and yet cannot make him a runner, so it is with criticism. If by its aid I can produce something which is better than another who has my talents would make without it, yet it costs me much time, I must be free from all other occupations, must not be interrupted by arbitrary distractions, I must have all my learning at hand, I must be able calmly to recollect at every point all the observations I have ever made regarding customs and passions.

Hence for a workman who is to furnish a theater with novelties, no one could be worse suited than I.

Consequently, I shall take care to refrain from doing for the German theater what Goldoni did for the Italian, to enrich it in one year with thirteen new plays. Yes, I should leave that alone even if I could do it. I am more suspicious of first thoughts than even John de la Casa or old Shandy could be. For even if I do not hold them to be temptations of the evil one, either of the real or the allegorical devil, I still think that first thoughts are the first and that the best does not even in all soups swim on the top. My first thoughts are certainly not better by a hair's-breadth than anybody's first thoughts and anybody's first thoughts had best be kept in the back-ground.

At last they hit upon the plan to use that in me which makes me such a slow, or as my more energetic friends deem, such a lazy workman: criticism. And thus arose the idea of these papers.

It pleased me, this idea. It reminded me of the Didaskalia of the Greeks, i.e. of the short notices of the kind which even Aristotle thought it worth while to write on the plays of the Greek stage. It reminded me how, a long time ago, I had laughed over the highly learned Casaubon who, from sheer reverence for the solid in scholarship, conceived that Aristotle's chief aim in these Didaskalia had been the rectification of chronology. For in very truth it would have been an everlasting disgrace to Aristotle if he had concerned himself more with the poetical value of plays, with the influence of customs, with the education of taste, than with the Olympiads, than with the years of the Olympiads, and with the names of the archons under which they were first performed.

I had had the intention of calling my journal the Hamburg Didaskalia. But the title sounded too foreign and now I am very glad I preferred the present one. What I chose to bring or not to bring into a Dramaturgy rested with me; at least Lione Allacci could not prescribe to me.

But the learned think they know what a Didaskalia should be like, if only from the extant Didaskalia of Terence which this same Casaubon calls breviter et eleganter scriptas. I had no inclination to write my Didaskalia either so briefly or so elegantly, and our contemporaneous Casaubons would have excellently shaken their heads when they found how rarely I touched upon any chronological circumstance that could at some future period throw light on a historical fact when millions of other books should be lost. They would have searched and to their astonishment not found, in my pages, what year of Louis XIV or XV first saw such or such a French masterpiece performed, whether at 10 Paris or Versailles, in presence of princes of the blood or not in the presence of princes of the blood.

What else these papers were to have been, concerning this I explained myself 15 in my preface; what they have really become, this my readers know. Not wholly that which I promised to make them, something different, and yet I think nothing worse.

They were to accompany every step which the art of the poet as well as the actor should take here.

Of the second half I was very soon weary. We have actors but no mimetic 25 art. If in past times there was such an art, we have it no longer; it is lost, it must be discovered anew. There is enough superficial chatter on the subject in various languages, but special rules, known to everyone, pronounced with distinctness and precision, according to which the blame or the praise of an actor can be defined in a particular case, of such I scarcely know two or three. Thence it arises that all our reasoning about this subject always seems so vacillating and dubious, and that it is small wonder if the actor who possesses nothing but a happy routine feels himself offended by it in all ways. He 40 will never think himself praised enough and will always believe himself blamed too much; ay, he will often not even know whether he has been praised or blamed. Indeed, the observation was made long ago 45 that the sensitiveness of artists, with regard to criticism, rises just in that ratio in which the certainty, precision, and number of their principles regarding their art decline. This much in my own defense and 50 in defense of those without whom I should not need to excuse myself.

But how about the first half of my promise? With this here has certainly up to now been very little taken into consideration; and how could it be? The barriers are scarcely opened yet, and it was desired to see the competitors already at the goal; at a goal that every moment was placed further and further away from them. If the public asks, 'What has been done?' and answers itself with a sarcastic, 5 'Nothing,' then I ask on my part, 'What has the public done in order that something might be achieved?' Nothing also, ay and something worse than nothing. Not enough that it did not help on the work, it did not even permit to it its natural life-course. Out on the good-natured idea to procure for the Germans a national theater, when we Germans are not yet a nation! I do not speak of our political constitution, but only of our social character. It might almost be said that this consists in not desiring to have an individual one. We are still the sworn copy- 20 ists of all that is foreign, especially are we still the obedient admirers of the never sufficiently admired French. All that comes to us from beyond the Rhine is beautiful, charming, exquisite, divine. We would rather belie our sight and hearing than find it otherwise. We would rather let ourselves be persuaded that clumsiness is unconstraint; impudence, grace; grimace, expression; a jingle of rhymes, poetry; howling, music; than in the least 30 doubt the superiority in all that is good, beautiful, elevated and correct which this amiable people, this first people in the world, as they are in the habit of modestly calling themselves, have received from just 35 fate as their portion.

But this locus communis [commonplace] is so stale, and its nearer application might easily grow so bitter, that I will rather break off from it.

Instead of following the steps which the art of the dramatic poet might have taken here, I was consequently obliged to linger over those that it would have previously had to take in order afterwards to run its 40 course with larger and more rapid strides. They were the steps that one who has lost his way must retrace in order to get back to the right path and keep his goal straight before him.

Everyone may boast of his industry. I believe I have studied the art of dramatic writing, and studied it more than twenty who practise it. I have also practised it 55 so far as it is needful in order to be able to speak my say; for I know well that as the painter does not like to be blamed by one who does not know how to hold a brush, so it is with the poet. I have at least attempted what he must achieve, and can judge whether that can be done though I cannot effect it myself. . . .

But it is possible to study until one has studied one-self deep into error. What therefore assures me that this has not happened to me, that I do not mistake the essence of dramatic art is this, that I acknowledge it exactly as Aristotle deduced it from the countless masterpieces of the Greek stage. I have my own thoughts about the origin and foundation of this philosopher's poetics which I could not bring forward here without prolixity. I do not, however, hesitate to acknowledge (even if I therefore be laughed to scorn in these enlightened times) that I consider the work as infallible as the Elements of Euclid. Its foundations are as clear and definite, only certainly not as comprehensible and therefore more exposed to misconstruction. Especially in respect to tragedy, as that concerning which time would pretty well permit everything to us, I would venture to prove incontrovertibly, that it cannot depart a step from the plumbline of Aristotle, without departing so far from its own perfection.

In this conviction I set myself the task of judging in detail some of the most celebrated models of the French stage. For this stage is said to be formed quite in accordance with the rules of Aristotle, and it has been particularly attempted to persuade us Germans that only by these rules have the French attained to the degree of perfection from which they can look down on all the stages of modern peoples. We have long so firmly believed this, that with our poets, to imitate the French was regarded as much as to work according to the rules of the ancients.

Nevertheless, this prejudice could not eternally stand against our feelings. These were fortunately roused from their slumbers by some English plays, and we at last experienced that tragedy was capable of another quite different effect from that accorded by Corneille and Racine. But, dazzled by this sudden ray of truth, we rebounded to the edge of another prejudice.

Certain rules with which the French had made us acquainted were too obviously lacking to the English plays. What did we conclude thence? This, that without these rules the aim of tragedy could be attained, ay, that these rules were even at fault if this aim were less attained.

Now even this deduction might have passed. But with these rules we began to confound all rules, and to pronounce it generally as pedantry to prescribe to genius what it must do or leave alone. In short, we were on the point of wantonly throwing away the experience of all past times and rather demanding from the poet that each one should discover the art anew.

I should be vain enough to deem I had done something meritorious for our theater, if I might believe that I have discovered the only means of checking this fermentation of taste. I may at least flatter myself that I have worked hard against it, since I have had nothing more at heart than to combat the delusion concerning the regularity of the French stage. No nation has more misapprehended the rules of ancient drama than the French. They have adopted as the essential some incidental remarks made by Aristotle about the most fitting external division of drama, and have so enfeebled the essential by all manner of limitations and interpretations, that nothing else could necessarily arise therefrom but works that remained far below the highest effect on which the philosopher had reckoned in his rules.

SCHILLER (1759-1805)

Johann Christoph Friedrich Schiller's enthusiastic sensibility, personal charm and courageous uprightness of character made him often during his life-time more highly esteemed than his great contemporary, Goethe, and posterity has redressed the balance by unduly depreciating or forgetting the smaller genius. Born and educated in the little duchy of Würtemberg, he published in 1781 his first romantic drama, The Robbers, which was speedily translated into other languages and became one of the landmarks in the romantic movement. 'The publication of The Robbers,' says Carlyle, 'forms an era not only in Schiller's history, but in the literature of the world.' But its revolutionary sentiments did not commend themselves to the reigning duke, and Schiller had to give up his position as a regimental surgeon and seek fortune elsewhere. After a wandering life in which he earned a difficult livelihood as journalist, theater-poet and historian, the friendly interposition of Goethe won him a professorship of history at Jena, and he settled down there in 1789 to write his History of the Thirty Years War, which soon became a German classic. From the same historical period he took the subject of his great drama Wallenstein, followed in the early years of the nineteenth century by Mary Stuart, The Maid of Orleans, and William Tell. The first of these is a remarkable character-study, brought to the notice of the English public by Coleridge's translation; the later plays appealed to popular sympathies either through the romantic charms of the heroine or the plea for national liberty, and were enthusiastically received. Schiller is now, however, better known by his prose writings on history and æsthetics and by his lyrical poems, from which selections are printed below, as translated by Edgar A. Bowring.

THE STAGE AS A MORAL INSTITUTION

Sulzer has remarked that the stage has arisen from an irresistible longing for the new and extraordinary. Man, oppressed by divided cares, and satiated with sensual pleasure, felt an emptiness or want. Man, neither altogether satisfied with the senses, nor for ever capable of thought, wanted a middle state, a bridge between the two states, bringing them into harmony. Beauty and æsthetics supplied that for him. But a good lawgiver is not satisfied with discovering the bent of his people—he turns it to account as an instrument for higher use; and hence he chose the stage, as giving nourishment to the whole soul, without straining it, and uniting the noblest education of the head and heart.

The man who first pronounced religion to be the strongest pillar of the state, unconsciously defended the stage when he said so, in its noblest aspect. The uncertain nature of political events, rendering religion a necessity, also demands the stage as a moral force. Laws only prevent disturbances of social life; religion prescribes positive orders sustaining social order. Law only governs actions; religion controls the heart and follows through to the source.

5 Laws are flexible and capricious; religion binds forever. If religion has this great sway over man's heart, can it also complete his culture? Separating the political from the divine element in it, religion acts mostly on the senses; she loses her sway if the senses are gone. By what channel does the stage operate? To most men religion vanishes with the loss of her symbols, images, and problems; and yet they are only pictures of the imagination and insoluble problems. Both laws and religion are strengthened by a union with the stage, where virtue and vice, joy and sorrow are thoroughly displayed in a truthful and popular way; where a variety of providential problems are solved; where all secrets are unmasked, all artifice ends, and Truth alone is the judge, as incorruptible as Rhadamanthus.

20 Where the influence of civil laws ends, that of the stage begins. Where venality and corruption blind and bias justice and judgment, and intimidation perverts its ends, the stage seizes the sword and scales, and pronounces a terrible verdict on vice. The fields of fancy and of history are open to the stage; great criminals of the past live over again in the drama, and thus benefit an indignant posterity. They pass before us as empty shadows of their age, and we heap curses on their memory while we enjoy on the stage the very horror of their crimes. When morality is no more taught, religion no longer received, or laws exist, Medea would still terrify us with her infanticide. The sight of Lady Macbeth, while it makes us shudder, will also make us rejoice in a good conscience, when we see her, the sleep-walker washing her hands and seeking to destroy the awful smell of murder. Sight is always more powerful to man than description; hence the stage acts more powerfully than morality or law.

But in this the stage only aids justice. A far wider field is really open to it. There are a thousand vices unnoticed by human justice, but condemned by the stage; so also, a thousand virtues overlooked by man's laws are honored on the stage. It is thus the handmaid of religion and philosophy. From these pure sources it draws its high principles and exalted teachings, and presents them in a lovely form. The soul swells with noblest emotions when a divine ideal is placed before it—when Augustus offers his forgiving hand to Cinna, the conspirator, and says to him,—‘Let us be friends, Cinna!’ What man at the moment does not feel that he could do the same. Again, when Francis von Sickingen, proceeding to punish a prince and redress a stranger, on turning sees the house, where his wife and children are, in flames, and yet goes on for the sake of his word—how great humanity appears, how small the stern power of fate!

Vice is portrayed on the stage in an equally telling manner. Thus, when old Lear, blind, helpless, childless, is seen knocking in vain at his daughters' doors, and in tempest and night he recounts his woes to the elements, and ends by saying, ‘I have given you all,’—how strongly impressed we feel at the value of filial piety, and how hateful ingratitude seems to us!

The stage does even more than this. It cultivates the ground where religion and law do not think it dignified to dwell. Folly often troubles the world as much as crime; and it has been justly said that the heaviest loads often hang suspended by the slightest threads. Tracing actions to their sources, the list of criminals diminishes, and we laugh at the long catalogue of fools. In our sex all forms of evil emanate almost entirely from one source, and all our excesses are only varied and higher forms of one quality and that a quality which in the end we smile at and love; and why should not nature have followed this course in the opposite sex too? In man there is only one secret to guard against depravity; that is, to protect his heart against weaknesses.

Much of all this is shown up on the stage. It is a mirror to reflect fools and their thousand forms of folly, which are there turned to ridicule. It curbs vice by terror, and folly still more effectually by satire and jest. If a comparison be made between tragedy and comedy, guided by experience, we should probably give the palm to the latter as to effects produced. Hatred does not wound the conscience so much as mockery does the pride of man. We are exposed specially to the sting of satire by the very cowardice that shuns terrors. From sins we are guarded by law and conscience, but the ludicrous is specially punished on the stage. When we allow a friend to correct our morals, we rarely forgive a laugh. We may bear heavy judgment on our transgressions, but our weaknesses and vulgarities must not be criticized by a witness.

The stage alone can do this with impunity, chastizing us as the anonymous fool. We can bear this rebuke without a blush and even gratefully.

But the stage does even more than this. It is a great school of practical wisdom, a guide for civil life, and a key to the mind in all its sinuosities. It does not, of course, remove egoism and stubbornness in evil ways; for a thousand vices hold up their heads in spite of the stage, and a thousand virtues make no impression on cold-hearted spectators. Thus probably Molière's Harpagon never altered a usurer's heart, nor did the suicide in Bev'erley save anyone from the gaming table. Nor, again, is it likely that the high roads will be safer through Karl Moor's untimely end. But admitting this, and more than this, still how great is the influence of the stage! It has shown us the vices and virtues of men with whom we have to live. We are not surprised at their weaknesses, we are prepared for them. The stage points them out to us, and their remedy. It drags off the mask from the hypocrite, and betrays the meshes of intrigue. Duplicity and cunning have been forced by it to show their hideous features in the light of day. Perhaps the dying Sarah may not deter a single debauchee, nor all the pictures of avenged seduction stop the evil; yet unguarded innocence has been shown in the snares of the corrupter, and taught to distrust his oaths.

The stage also teaches men to bear the strokes of fortune. Chance and design have equal sway over life. We have to bow to the former, but we control the latter. It is a great advantage if inexorable facts do not find us unprepared and unexercised, and if our breast has been steelled to bear adversity. Much human woe is placed before us on the stage. It gives us momentary pain in the tears we shed for strangers' troubles, but as a compensation it fills us with a grand new stock of courage and endurance. We are led by it, with the abandoned Ariadne, through the Isle of Naxos, and we descend the Tower of Starvation in Ugolino; we ascend the terrible scaffold, and we are present at the awful moment of execution. Things remotely present in thought become palpable realities now. We see the deceived favorite abandoned by the queen. When about to die, the perfidious Moor is abandoned by his own sophistry. Eternity reveals the secrets of the unknown through the dead, and the hateful wretch loses all screen of guilt when the tomb opens to condemn him.

Then the stage teaches us to be more considerate to the unfortunate, and to judge gently. We can only pronounce on a man when we know his whole being and circumstances. Theft is a base crime, but tears mingle with our condemnation, when we read what obliged Edward Ruhberg to do the horrid deed. Suicide is shocking; but the condemnation of an enraged father, her love, and the fear of a convent, lead Marianne to drink the cup, and few would dare to condemn the victim of a dreadful tyranny. Humanity and tolerance have begun to prevail in our time at courts of princes and in courts of law. A large share of this may be due to the influence of the stage in showing man and his secret motives.

The great of the world ought to be especially grateful to the stage, for it is here alone that they hear the truth.

Not only man's mind, but also his intellectual culture has been promoted by the higher drama. The lofty mind and the ardent patriot have often used the stage to spread enlightenment.

Considering nations and ages, the thinker sees the masses enchained by opinion and cut off by adversity from happiness; truth only lights up a few minds, who perhaps have to acquire it by the trials of a lifetime. How can the wise ruler put these within the reach of his nation?

The thoughtful and the worthier section of the people diffuse the light of wisdom over the masses through the stage. Purer and better principles and motives issue from the stage and circulate through society: the night of barbarism and superstition vanishes. I would mention two glorious fruits of the higher class of dramas. Religious toleration has latterly become universal. Before Nathan the Jew and Saladin the Saracen put us to shame, and showed that resignation to God's will did not depend on a fancied belief of His nature—even before Joseph II contended with the hatred of a narrow piety—the stage had sown seeds of humanity and gentleness: pictures of fanaticism had taught a hatred of intolerance, and Christianity, seeing itself in this awful mirror, washed off its stains. It is to be hoped that the stage will equally combat mistaken systems of education. This is a subject of the first political importance, and yet none is so left to private whims and caprice.

The stage might give stirring examples of mistaken education, and lead parents to juster, better views of the subject. Many teachers are led astray by false views, and methods are often artificial and fatal.

Opinions about governments and classes might be reformed by the stage. Legislation could thus justify itself by foreign symbols, and silence doubtful aspersions without offense.

Now, if poets would be patriotic, they could do much on the stage to forward invention and industry. A standing theater would be a material advantage to a nation. It would have a great influence on the national temper and mind by helping the nation to agree in opinions and inclinations. The stage alone can do this, because it commands all human knowledge, exhausts all positions, illumines all hearts, unites all classes, and makes its way to the heart and understanding by the most popular channels.

If one feature characterized all dramas; if the poets were allied in aim—that is, if they selected well and from national topics—there would be a national stage, and we should become a nation. It was this that knit the Greeks so strongly together, and this gave to them the all-absorbing interest in the republic and the advancement of humanity.

Another advantage belongs to the stage; one which seems to have become acknowledged even by its censurers. Its influence on intellectual and moral culture, which we have till now been advocating, may be doubted; but its very enemies have admitted that it has gained the palm over all other means of amusement. It has been of much higher service here than people are often ready to allow.

Human nature cannot bear to be always on the rack of business, and the charms of sense die out with their gratification. Man, oppressed by appetites, weary of long exertion, thirsts for refined pleasure, or rushes into dissipations that hasten his fall and ruin, and disturb social order. Bacchanal joys, gambling, follies of all sorts, to distract ennui, are unavoidable if the lawgiver provides nothing better. A man of public business, who has made noble sacrifices to the state, is apt to pay for them with melancholy, the scholar to become a pedant, and the people brutish, without the stage. The stage is an institution combining amusement with instruction, rest with exertion, where no faculty of the mind is overstrained, no pleasure enjoyed at the cost of the whole. When melancholy gnaws the heart, when trouble poisons our solitude, when we are disgusted with the world, and a thousand worries oppress us, or when our energies are destroyed by over-exercise, the stage revives us, we dream of another sphere, we recover ourselves, our torpid nature is roused by noble passions, our blood circulates more healthily. The unhappy man forgets his tears in weeping for another. The happy man is calmed, the secure made provident. Effeminate natures are steeled, savages made men, and, as the supreme triumph of nature, men of all ranks, zones, and conditions, emancipated from the chains of conventionality and fashion, fraternize here in a universal sympathy, forget the world, and come nearer to their heavenly destination. The individual shares in the general ecstasy, and his breast has now only space for one emotion: he is a man.

GERMAN FAITH

Once for the scepter of Germany, fought with Bavarian Louis
Frederick of Hapsburg descent, both being called to the throne.
But the envious fortune of war delivered the Austrian
Into the hands of the foe, who overcame him in fight.

With the throne he purchased his freedom, pledging his honor
For the victor to draw 'gainst his own people his sword;
But what he vowed when in chains, when free he could not accomplish,
So, of his own free accord, put on his fetters again.

Deeply moved, his foe embraced him,—and from thenceforward
As a friend with a friend, pledged they the cup at the feast;
Arm-in-arm, the princes on one couch slumbered together,
While a still bloodier hate severed the nations apart.

'Gainst the army of Frederick, Louis now went, and behind him
Left the foe he had fought, over Bavaria to watch.

'Ay, it is true! 'Tis really true! I have it in writing!
Thus did the Pontifex cry, when he first heard of the news.

COLUMBUS

On, thou sailor undaunted! Though shallow witlings deride thee,
 And though the steersman his hand carelessly drops from the helm.
 On, still on, toward the West! 'Tis there that the coast will first greet thee,
 For to thy reason it lies clear and distinct even now.
 Trust to the guiding God, and follow the world's silent ocean! 5
 And though as yet never seen, lo! it ascends from the flood!
 With the intellect Nature standeth in union eternal:
 And what is promised by one, that will the other fulfil.

THE NEW CENTURY

Where will a place of refuge, noble friend,
 For peace and freedom ever open lie?
 The century in tempests had its end,
 The new one now begins with murder's cry.

Each land-connecting bond is torn away, 5
 Each ancient custom hastens to decline;
 Not e'en the ocean can war's tumult stay,
 Not e'en the Nile-god, not the hoary Rhine.

Two mighty nations strive, with hostile power,
 For undivided mastery of the world; 10
 And, by them, each land's freedom to devour,
 The trident brandished is—the lightning hurled.

Each country must to them its gold afford,
 And, Brennus-like, upon the fatal day,
 The Frank now throws his heavy iron sword, 15
 The even scales of justice to o'erweigh.

His merchant-fleets the Briton greedily
 Extends, like Polyp-limbs, on every side;
 And the domain of Amphitrité free
 As if his home it were, would fain bestride. 20

E'en to the south pole's dim, remotest star,
 His restless course moves onward, unrestrained
 Each isle he tracks,—each coast, however far,
 But Paradise alone he ne'er has gained!

Although thine eye may every map explore, 25
 Vainly thou'lt seek to find that blissful place,
 Where freedom's garden smiles for evermore,
 And where in youth still blooms the human race.

Before thy gaze the world extended lies, 30
 The very shipping it can scarce embrace;
 And yet upon her back, of boundless size,
 E'en for ten happy men there is not space!

Into thy bosom's holy, silent cells,
 Thou needs must fly from life's tumultuous throng! 35
 Freedom but in the realm of vision dwells,
 And beauty bears no blossoms but in song.

SONGS FROM WILLIAM TELL

FISHER-BOY (sings in his boat)

Bright smiles the lake, as it woos to its deep,—
 A boy on its margin of green lies asleep;
 Then hears he a strain,
 Like the flute's gentle note,
 Sweet as voices of angels 5
 In Eden that float.
 And when he awakens, with ecstacy blest,
 The waters are playing all over his breast.
 From the depths calls a voice:
 'Dearest child, with me go! 10
 I lure down the sleeper,
 I draw him below.'

HERDSMAN (on the mountain)

Ye meadows, farewell!
 Ye pastures so glowing!
 The herdsman is going, 15
 For summer has fled!
 We depart to the mountain; we'll come back again,
 When the cuckoo is calling,—when wakens the strain,—
 When the earth is tricked out with her flowers so gay,
 When the stream sparkles bright in the sweet month of May. 20
 Ye meadows, farewell!
 Ye pastures so glowing!
 The herdsman is going,
 For summer has fled!

CHAMOIS-HUNTER (appearing on the top of a rock)

O'er the heights growls the thunder, while quivers the bridge, 25
 Yet no fear feels the hunter, though dizzy the ridge;
 He strides on undaunted,
 O'er plains icy-bound,
 Where spring never blossoms,
 Nor verdure is found; 30
 And, a broad sea of mist lying under his feet,
 Man's dwellings his vision no longer can greet;
 The world he but views
 When the clouds broken are—
 With its pastures so green, 35
 Through the vapor afar.

JOAN OF ARC'S SOLILOQUIES

Farewell, ye mountains, and ye pastures dear,
 Ye still and happy valleys, fare ye well!
 No longer may Joan's footsteps linger here,
 Joan bids ye now a long, a last farewell!

Ye meadows that I watered, and each bush
 Set by my hands, ne'er may your verdure fail!
 Farewell, ye grots, ye springs that cooling gush!
 Thou echo, blissful voice of this sweet vale,
 So wout to give me back an answering strain,—
 Joan must depart, and ne'er return again!

Ye haunts of all my silent joys of old,
 I leave ye now behind for evermore!
 Disperse, ye lambs, far o'er the trackless wold!
 She now hath gone who tended you of yore!
 I must away to guard another fold,
 On yonder field of danger, stained with gore.
 Thus am I bidden by a spirit's tone:
 'Tis no vain earthly longing drives me on.

For He who erst to Moses on the height
 Of Horeb, in the fiery bush came down,
 And bade him stand in haughty Pharaoh's sight,—
 He who made choice of Jesse's pious son,
 The shepherd, as His champion in the fight,—
 He who to shepherds grace hath ever shown,—
 He thus addressed me from this lofty tree:
 'Go hence! On earth my witness thou shalt be!

'In rugged brass, then, clothe thy members now,
 In steel thy gentle bosom must be dressed!
 No mortal love thy heart must e'er allow,
 With earthly passion's sinful flame possessed.
 Ne'er will the bridal wreath adorn thy brow,
 No darling infant blossom on thy breast;
 Yet thou with warlike honors shalt be laden,
 Raising thee high above each earthly maiden.

'For when the bravest in the fight despair,
 When France appears to wait her final blow,
 Then thou my holy Oriflamme must bear;
 And, as the ripened corn the reapers mow,
 Hew down the conqueror as he triumphs there;
 His fortune's wheel thou thus wilt overthrow,
 To France's hero-sons salvation bring,
 Deliver Rheims once more, and crown thy king!

The Lord hath promised to send down a sign:
 A helmet He hath sent, it comes from Him,—
 His sword endows mine arm with strength divine,
 I feel the courage of the cherubim;
 To join the battle-turmoil how I pine!
 A raging tempest thrills through every limb;
 The summons to the field bursts on mine ear,
 My charger paws the ground, the trump rings clear.

FROM ACT IV, I

Each weapon rests, war's tumults cease to sound,
 While dance and song succeed the bloody fray;
 Through every street the merry footsteps bound,
 Altar and church are clad in bright array,

And gates of branches green arise around, 55
 Over the columns twine the garlands gay:
 Rheims cannot hold the ever-swelling train
 That seeks the nation-festival to gain.

All with one joyous feeling are elate,
 One single thought is thrilling every breast; 60
 What, until now, was severed by fierce hate,
 Is by the general rapture truly blessed.
 By each who called this land his parent-state,
 The name of Frenchman proudly is confessed;
 The glory is revived of olden days, 65
 And to her regal son France homage pays.

Yet I who have achieved this work of pride,
 I cannot share the rapture felt by all;
 My heart is changed, my heart is turned aside,
 It shuns the splendor of this festival; 70
 'Tis in the British camp it seeks to hide,—
 'Tis on the foe my yearning glances fall;
 And from the joyous circle I must steal,
 My bosom's crime o'erpowering to conceal.

Who? I? What! in my bosom chaste 75
 Can mortal's image have a seat?
 This heart, by heavenly glory graced,—
 Dares it with earthly love to beat?
 The savior of my country, I,—
 The champion of the Lord Most High, 80
 Own for my country's foe a flame—
 To the chaste sun my guilt proclaim,
 And not be crushed beneath my shame?

(The music behind the scene changes into a soft, melting melody.)

Woe! oh woe! what strains enthralling!
 How bewildering to mine ear! 85
 Each his voice beloved recalling,
 Charming up his image dear!
 Would that battle-tempests bound me!
 Would that spears were whizzing round me
 In the hotly-raging strife! 90
 Could my courage find fresh life!

How those tones, those voices blest
 Coil around my bosom burning!
 All the strength within my breast
 Melting into tender yearning, 95
 Into tears of sadness turning! . . .

(The flutes are again heard—she falls into a silent melancholy.)

Gentle crook! oh that I never
 For the sword had bartered thee!
 Sacred oak! why didst thou ever
 From thy branches speak to me? 100
 Would that Thou to me in splendor,
 Queen of heaven, hadst ne'er come down!

Take—all claim I must surrender,—
Take, oh take away thy crown!

Ah, I open saw yon heaven,
Saw the features of the blest! 105
Yet to earth my hopes are riven,
In the skies they ne'er can rest!
Wherefore make me ply with ardor
This vocation, terror-fraught? 110
Would this heart were rendered harder
That by heaven to feel was taught!

To proclaim Thy might sublime
Those select, who, free from crime,
In Thy lasting mansions stand; 115
Send Thou forth Thy spirit-band,
The Immortal, and the Pure,
Feelingless, from tears secure!
Never choose a maiden fair,
Shepherdess' weak spirit ne'er! 120

Kings' dissensions wherefore dread I,
Why the fortune of the fight?
Guilelessly my lambs once fed I
On the silent mountain-height. 125
Yet Thou into life didst bear me,
To the halls where monarchs throne,
In the toils of guilt to snare me—
Ah, the choice was not mine own!

GOETHE (1749-1832)

Johann Wolfgang Goethe was born at Frankfort-on-Main ten years before Schiller, but he was slower in ripening, and the greater universality of his appeal, as well as his longer life, gave him a continuing influence while the reputation of the younger man was declining. Carlyle's prophetic exhortations to his generation to 'lay down thy Byron, take up thy Goethe' maintained the appreciation of German literature and of Goethe as its leading representative in the minds of the English-speaking peoples, until about the end of the nineteenth century the success of German competition in trade and the aggressive attitude of William II began to make the British public uneasy. There was a natural reaction during and after the Great War, but Goethe's genius was independent of the historical accidents of his own era and will prevail over any considerations extraneous to his power as a thinker and skill as an artist.

Goethe began his literary career in 1773 with a violent romantic drama Götz von Berlichingen, which is less a copy of the Shakespearean manner than a travesty of it. He then yielded to the sentimental impulse made fashionable by Rousseau in a semi-autobiographical story, The Sorrows of Werther, written in charming style but with an exaggerated pathos which bathed Europe in tears until the cynical began to make fun of it. These were, however, only juvenile efforts, interesting rather as examples of prevailing literary tendencies than for their intrinsic merit.

In 1775 Goethe accepted the invitation of the young Duke of Weimar to make his home in the little capital; he became President of the Council and Director of the Theater, and found inspiration in his passionate admiration for one of the court ladies, Charlotte von Stein; she was married and much older than he was, but she was a woman of culture and refinement, and Goethe, who had constant need of feminine companionship, found full satisfaction in her friendship. It was not until 1806 that he married a woman of much lower social status and limited intelligence, Christiana Vulpius. In the meantime his mind had been developed by a prolonged visit to Italy (1786-88) and a close and enriching friendship with Schiller. The first of these important experiences profoundly affected Goethe's appreciation of classical art and enabled him to clear his mind of the extravagances of romanticism. Goethe had passed through his literary apprenticeship and had become a master of his art. In the peaceful seclusion of Weimar, he was comparatively untroubled by the political convulsions of the earlier nineteenth century, and was able to give his undivided attention to the study of science and philosophy.

To this period of his master-works belongs his novel Wilhelm Meister, the first part of which was completed in 1796, after nearly twenty years' labor, while the second part did not appear until 1821; it is well known to English readers through Carlyle's remarkable translation. Another novel, Elective Affinities, belongs also to this later period, as does also Dichtung und Wahrheit (Poetry and Truth), an imaginative autobiography which is more fully dealt with below. The great work which occupied Goethe's constant attention for over half a century was Faust. He began working on it as a college student, and published his first sketch (begun in 1772) as A Fragment in 1790, but Part I did not appear till 1808 and the entire work not until 1832, after his death. Goethe spiritualized the old German legend (which had already been used by Christopher Marlowe in the brilliant beginnings of the Elizabethan drama), and poured into it the spiritual aspirations of the time as well as the experiences of his own soul and his lifelong meditations on philosophy and art. The Second Part, largely philosophical and symbolic in intention, is not always easy to understand, but Part I, with its popular love story and the sinister figure of Mephistopheles, caught hold of the popular imagination. The poetry and wisdom with which Goethe enveloped the theme made the drama as a whole the greatest achievement of the European literature over which he reigned supreme in art and thought. In Bayard Taylor's excellent translation it has long been recognized as an American classic.

Carlyle, who has been the chief exponent and interpreter of Goethe to the English-speaking world, thus sums up his qualities: 'Goethe appears to us as a person of that deep endowment, and gifted vision, of that experience also and sympathy in the ways of all men, which qualify him to stand forth, not only as the literary ornament, but in many respects too as the Teacher and exemplar of his age. For, to say nothing of his natural gifts, he has cultivated himself and his art, he has studied how to live and to write, with a fidelity, an unwearied earnestness, of which there is no other living instance; of which, among British poets especially, Wordsworth alone offers any resemblance. And this in our view is the result: To our minds, in these soft, melodious imaginations of his, there is embodied the Wisdom which is proper to this time; the beautiful, the religious Wisdom, which may still, with something of its old impressiveness, speak to the whole soul; still, in these hard, unbelieving utilitarian days, reveal to us glimpses of the Unseen but not unreal World, that so the Actual and Ideal may again meet together, and clear Knowledge be again wedded to Religion, in the life and business of men.'

As early as 1808 Goethe conceived the idea of writing his autobiography or 'Confessions,' and by 1814 the first fifteen Books had been published, with the title, Aus meinem Leben: Dichtung und Wahrheit (Scenes from my Life: Poetry and Truth). The last five books were not completed till just before his death, and were published soon after. Goethe had intended to bring the story down to his sixtieth year, but he only arrived at the point of his decision to go to Weimar, which was in his twenty-sixth year. It is well to remember that these are recollections of childhood, youth and early manhood written in maturity, and including some of Goethe's most serious reflections upon his past life. Some of the more salient passages follow.

A MEMORY OF CHILDHOOD

From Book II (1757-8)

The name of Klopstock already exercised a great influence upon us, even at a distance. At the outset, people wondered how so excellent a man came by so odd a name; but they soon got accustomed to it, and thought no more of the meaning of the syllables. I had hitherto found only the earlier poets in my father's library, especially those who had appeared in his day from time to time and acquired fame. All these had written in rhyme, and my father considered rhyme indispensable to poetical works. Canitz, Hagedorn, Drolling, Gellert, Creuz, Haller, stood in a row, in handsome calf bindings. Then came Neukirch's Telemachus, Kopp's Jerusalem Delivered, and other translations. From childhood I had diligently read through all these volumes, and committed portions to memory, and hence I was often called upon to entertain visitors. A period of annoyance, on the other hand, opened for my father on the appearance of Klopstock's Messiah, when verses, which did not seem to him verses at all, became the object of general admiration. He had taken good care not to buy this book; but our family friend, Councillor Schneider, smuggled it in and slipped it into the hands of my mother and her children.

This active business-man, who read but little, had been greatly impressed by the Messiah, as soon as it appeared. The pious sentiments, so natural in their expression and yet so beautiful in their elevation, the graceful language, even if considered merely as harmonious prose, had so captivated the dry man of business that he regarded the first ten cantos—for it is with these that we are now concerned—as the sublimest book of devotion, and he was wont once a year in Passion week, when he withdrew from business, to read it through in private, and draw refreshment from it for the whole year. At first he had thoughts of communicating his impressions to his old friend; but he was much shocked to find an incurable dislike to a book of such glorious contents on account of its external form, which to him seemed a matter of indifference. As may be supposed, their conversation often reverted to this topic; but both disputants differed more and more from each other, violent scenes ensued, and the compliant Councillor had at last to make up his mind to say nothing about his favorite work, in order not to lose a friend of his youth and at the same time a good Sunday meal.

It is the most natural wish of everyone to make proselytes, and how well repaid did our friend secretly find himself, when he discovered, in the rest of the family, hearts so favorably disposed to his saint. The copy which he used only one week during the year was placed at our disposal for the rest of the time. My mother kept it secretly, and we children took possession of it when we could, so that in our leisure hours, hidden away in some corner, we might learn the most striking passages by heart, and, in particular, might memorize the most tender as well as the most impassioned parts as quickly as possible.

We vied with one another in reciting Portia's dream, and divided between us the wild dialogue of despair between Satan and Adrammelech who had been cast into the Red Sea. The first part, as being the most forcible, had been assigned to me, and the second, as being slightly more pathetic, was undertaken by my sister. These reciprocated curses, horrible it is true, but at the same time well-sounding, fell lightly from our lips, and we seized every opportunity to accost each other with these infernal phrases.

It was a Saturday evening, in winter—my father always had himself shaved over night, so that on Sunday morning he might dress himself for church at his ease—we were sitting on a footstool behind the stove, and muttering our customary imprecations in fairly low voices, while the barber was applying his lather. But now came the moment for Adrammelech to seize Satan with iron hands; my sister gripped me violently, and recited, softly enough, but with rising passion:—

Lend me thine aid, I implore, I will worship thee,
if thou demand it,
Thee, thou monster abandoned, yea thee, thou
swart evildoer;
Aid me, I suffer the tortures of death, which is vengeful, eternal,
Once, in the times gone by, with a hot fierce hate
I could hate thee,
Now I can hate thee no more! E'en this is the sharpest of tortures.

So far all had gone well; but loudly, with a dreadful voice, she cried the following words:—'O, how am I crushed!' The good surgeon was startled, and emptied the basin of soap-suds into my father's bosom. There was a great uproar, and a strict investigation was held, especially in view of the disaster which might have occurred if the shaving had been actually in process. In order to prove that we had meant no harm, we confessed our Satanic characters, and the mischief done by the hexameters was so apparent, that, naturally, they were again condemned and banished.

Thus children and common people are accustomed to transform the great and sublime into a sport, and even a jest; and how else indeed could they endure it?

THE FRENCH OCCUPATION OF FRANKFORT

From Book III

From the first day of the occupation of our city, incessant diversion might be had, especially for children and young people. Plays and balls, parades, and the marching through of troops drew our attention hither and thither. The numbers passing through were always on the increase, and the soldiers' life seemed to us a merry and attractive one.

The residence of the King's Lieutenant in our house procured us the advantage of gradually seeing all the distinguished members of the French army, and especially of inspecting at close quarters the commanders, whose names were already known to us by reputation. It was quite easy for us to look down from staircases and landings, as though they had been galleries, upon the generals who passed by. In particular I remember the Prince Soubise as a handsome, affable gentleman, but most distinctly of all the Maréchal de Broglio, who was a younger man, not tall, but well-built, lively, and quick, with intelligent eyes for what was passing around him.

He came frequently to the King's Lieutenant, and it was obvious that weighty matters were discussed. By the end of the first three months we were just beginning to get accustomed to having strangers quartered upon us, when a vague rumor was circulated that the Allies were on the march, and that Duke Ferdinand of Brunswick was coming to drive the French from the Main. A poor opinion was held of the latter, as they had not been particularly successful in the war, and after the battle of Rossbach there seemed reason for despising them. Duke Ferdinand enjoyed the greatest confidence and all who were Prussian in their sympathies awaited with eagerness their deliverance from the yoke hitherto borne. My father was in somewhat better spirits—my mother was apprehensive. She was wise enough to see that a slight present discomfort might easily be exchanged for a great disaster; for it was but too plain that the French would not advance to meet the Duke, but would wait to be attacked in the neighborhood of the city. A defeat of the French, their flight, the defense of the city, if it were only to cover their retreat and to hold the bridge, a bombardment, a general pillage—all these possibilities presented themselves to the excited imagination, and were cause of anxiety to both parties. My mother, who could bear everything but suspense, imparted her fears to the Count through the interpreter. She received the usual answer in such cases: she might be quite easy, for there was nothing to fear, and should keep quiet and mention the matter to no one.

Many troops passed through the city; we learned that they had halted at Bergen. The coming and going, the riding and running constantly increased, and our house was in an uproar day and night. At this time I often saw Maréchal de Broglio, always cheerful, always the same in look and manner, and I was afterwards pleased to find the man, whose appearance had made such a good and lasting impression upon me, honorably mentioned in history.

Thus, after an unquiet Passion week, the Good Friday of 1759 arrived. A profound stillness announced the approaching storm. We children were forbidden to quit the house: my father could not rest and went out. The battle began: I went up into the garret, where, though I could not see the country round, I could plainly hear the thunder of cannons and the volleying of musketry. After some hours we saw the first evidences of the battle in a line of wagons, in which the wounded, sadly mutilated, and groaning with pain, were slowly driven past us to be taken to the convent of St. Mary, now transformed into a hospital. The compassion of the citizens was instantly called forth. Beer, wine, bread, and money were distributed to such as were in a condition to receive them. But when shortly afterwards wounded and captive Germans were seen in the train, pity knew no limits, and it seemed as if everyone were anxious to divest himself of all his goods and chattels to assist his suffering countrymen.

The prisoners, however, were an indication that the battle was going against the Allies. My father, whose party feelings made him quite certain that they would come off victorious, had the reckless temerity to go forth to meet the expected victors, without thinking that the defeated party must run over him in their flight. He first repaired to his garden outside the Friedberg Gate, where he found everything quiet and deserted; then he ventured on to the Bornheim Heath, where he soon descried various stragglers and camp followers, amusing themselves by shooting at the boundary-stones, so that the rebounding bullets whizzed about the head of the inquisitive wanderer. He therefore considered it more prudent to go back, and learned on inquiry—as the sound of firing might have convinced him—that all stood well for the French, and that there was no thought of retreating. Reaching home out of temper, the sight of his wounded and captured countrymen made him altogether lose his usual self-control. He, too, caused various donations to be given to the passers-by, but only Germans were to have them, which was not always practicable, as fate had packed together friend and foe in the same wagon.

My mother and we children, who had relied on the Count's word before this happened, and had therefore passed a tolerably quiet day, were highly rejoiced and my mother was doubly reassured, for in the morning, when she consulted the oracle of her Golden Treasury, by sticking a pin between the leaves, she had received a very consoling answer, both as regards the present and the future. We wished our father a similar faith and frame of mind; we flattered him as much as we could; we entreated him to have something to eat, as he had taken nothing all day; but he repulsed our caresses and all food, and betook himself to his chamber. Our joy, meanwhile, was untroubled; the encounter was at an end; the King's Lieutenant, who, contrary to his wont, had been on horseback today, at last returned home, where his presence was more necessary than ever. We sprang to meet him, kissed his hands, and testified our delight. This seemed to please him greatly. 'Well,' said he, more kindly than usual, 'I am glad also for your sakes, my dear children.' He immediately ordered sweetmeats, sweet wine, in short the best of everything to be given us, and went to his room already surrounded by a crowd of persons, importuning him with demands and petitions.

We now enjoyed a delicious feast, pitied our poor father, who would not partake of it, and pressed our mother to go and call him; but she, wiser than we, well knew how distasteful such gifts would be to him. In the meantime she had prepared supper, and would have liked to send some up to his room, but he never permitted such irregularities even in the most extreme cases; and after the sweet things were removed, we endeavored to persuade him to come down into the ordinary dining-room. At last he unwillingly allowed himself to be persuaded, and we had no notion of the mischief which we were preparing for him and ourselves. The staircase ran through the whole house, past all the corridors. My father on his way down had to go directly past the Count's apartment. The hall outside his room was so full of people, that the Count, with a view to transacting various businesses at once, resolved to come out, and unfortunately this happened at the moment when my father was coming downstairs. The Count went up to him cheerfully, greeted him, and remarked, 'You must congratulate yourselves and us that this dangerous affair has terminated so happily.' 'By no means!' replied my father in great wrath; 'I wish they had driven you to the devil, even if I had had to go too.' The Count paused for a moment, and then broke out in a rage. 'You shall suffer for this,' cried he; 'you will find that you have not insulted the good cause and myself in this way for nothing!'

GOETHE AT FIFTEEN

From Book V

I should certainly have passed a tedious evening, if an unexpected arrival had not revived me. On our entrance the table was already neatly and tidily set, and sufficient wine had been served; so we sat down, and were left to ourselves, without requiring any attendance. However, as the wine ran short at last, one of them called for the maid; but instead of the maid there came in a girl of uncommon, and, when contrasted with her surroundings, of astonishing beauty. 'What is it you want?' she asked, after a friendly greeting; 'the maid is ill in bed. Can I serve you?' 'The wine has run short,' said one; 'if you would fetch us a few bottles, it would be very kind of you.' 'Do, Gretchen,' said another, 'it is only a step or two.' 'Why not?' she answered, and, taking a few empty bottles from the table, she hastened out. Her appearance as she turned her back on us was even more attractive. The little cap sat so neatly upon her little head, poised gracefully in its turn upon a slender throat. Her whole person breathed a peculiar charm which could be more fully appreciated when one's attention was no longer exclusively attracted and fettered by the clear, calm eyes and lovely mouth. I reproved my comrades for sending the girl out alone at night, but they only laughed at me, and I was soon consoled by her return, as the publican lived only just across the way. 'Sit down with us, as a reward,' said one. She did so; but, alas, she did not come near me. She drank a glass to our health, and left us, advising us not to carry on our revels too late into the night, and not to be so noisy, as her mother was just going to bed. It was not, however, her own mother, but the mother of our hosts. This girl's image never left me from that moment; it was the first durable impression made upon me by any woman; and as I could find no pretext to see her at home, and would not seek one, I went to church for love of her, and soon discovered where she sat. Thus, during the long Protestant service, I gazed my fill at her. When the congregation left the church I did not venture to accost her, much less to accompany her, and was perfectly delighted if she seemed to observe me and to return my greeting with a nod. Yet I was not long denied the happiness of approaching her. . . .

In such talk we forgot to think about the time; it was already past midnight; and I found that unfortunately I had not the house-key with me; so that I should not be able to get into the house without making a great disturbance. I told her of my difficulty. 'After all,' said she, 'it will be best not to break up the party.' The cousins had already had the same idea, because they did not know where to put up their visitors for the night. So the matter was soon settled; Gretchen brought in and lighted a large brass lamp, well supplied with oil and wick, because the candles threatened to burn out, and then went to make some coffee.

This helped to keep our spirits up for several hours, but the game gradually slackened; conversation died away; the mother went to sleep in the armchair; the strangers, tired out with traveling, nodded, and Pylades and his sweetheart sat together in a corner. She had laid her head on his shoulder and had gone to sleep, and he soon followed her example. The younger cousin sitting opposite to us by the slate, had crossed his arms before him on the table, rested his head on them and gone to sleep. I sat in the window-corner, behind the table, and Gretchen by me. We talked in a low voice: but at last sleep overcame her also, she leaned her head on my shoulder, and sank at once to slumber. Thus I was left in this strange position, the only one awake, but death's kind brother soon closed my eyelids too. I went to sleep, and when I awoke it was already bright daylight. Gretchen was standing before the mirror arranging her little cap; she looked more lovely than ever, and gave me a cordial handshake as I left. I crept home by a roundabout way; for, on the side of the house which looked on the little Hirschgraben, my father had opened a sort of peep-hole in the wall, not without opposition from his neighbor. So we took care to avoid this side if we wanted not to be seen by him as we came home. My mother, who had always interceded on our behalf, had tried to excuse my absence in the morning at breakfast, by suggesting that I had gone out early, and I was able to escape any disagreeable consequences from the innocent pleasures of the night.

Taken as a whole, this infinitely varied life which surrounded me produced on me but a very simple impression. I had no other interest but to closely observe outward events, no other business but that laid upon me by my father and Herr von Königsthal, which, indeed, did help me to some knowledge of the hidden causes of events. I had no liking but for Gretchen and no other object than to see and understand everything properly, that I might be able to repeat it and explain it to her. Often when a procession was going by, I described it to myself in an undertone, to make sure of all the particulars, so that I might win the praise of my lady-love by this care and accuracy; the applause and acknowledgments of others were comparatively unimportant to me.

I had certainly been introduced to many great and distinguished persons; but no one had then time to trouble about others, and besides, older people do not at once know how to talk to a young man and draw him out. Nor was I, on my side, particularly skilful in adapting myself in society. As a rule, I acquired their liking, but not their approval. My occupation for the moment always engrossed me completely; but I did not trouble to ask whether others would find it equally to their taste. I was for the most part too lively or too quiet, seeming either importunate or sullen, according to the degree in which persons attracted or repelled me; so they considered me to be indeed full of promise, but at the same time most eccentric.

GOETHE AT LEIPZIG—GERMAN LITERATURE

From Book VII (1765-68)

The literary epoch in which I was born developed out of the preceding one by opposition. Germany, so long inundated by foreign people, pervaded by other nations, employing foreign languages in learned and diplomatic transactions, could not possibly cultivate her own. Together with so many new ideas, innumerable strange words were obtruded necessarily and unnecessarily upon her, and even for objects already known people were induced to make use of foreign expressions and turns of language. The Germans, brutalized by nearly two centuries of misery and confusion, took lessons from the French in manners and from the Latins in the art of expression. This art ought to have been cultivated in German, since the use of French and Latin idioms, and their partial translation into German, made both their social and business style ridiculous. Beside this, they recklessly adopted figures of speech belonging to the southern languages, and employed them most extravagantly. In the same way the stately ceremoniousness of prince-like Roman citizens had been transferred to the educated circles in German provincial towns. As a result, they nowhere felt themselves at home, least of all in their own houses.

But in this epoch works of genius had already appeared, and the German independence of mind and enjoyment of life began to assert themselves. This cheerful spirit, combined with an honest sincerity, led to the demand for purity and naturalness in writing, without the intermixture of foreign words, and in accordance with the dictates of plain common sense. By these praiseworthy endeavors, however, the flood-gates were thrown open to a prolix national insipidity, nay, the dam was broken down, and an inundation was bound to follow. Meanwhile, a stiff pedantry continued for some time to hold sway in the four learned professions, and eventually, at a much later date, fled for refuge first to one and then to another.

Men of parts, children of nature looking freely about them, had therefore two objects on which they could exercise their faculties, against which they could direct their energies, and, as the matter was of no great importance, vent their mischievousness; these were, on the one hand, a language disfigured by foreign words, forms, and turns of speech; and on the other, the worthlessness of such writings as had been careful to avoid those faults; but it never occurred to anyone that each evil was being combated by fostering the other. . . .

With conscientious industry I had worked my way through the period of proximity in which my youth had fallen, in company with many worthy men. The numerous quarto volumes of manuscript which I left behind with my father might serve as sufficient witness; and what a mass of attempts, rough draughts, and half executed designs had, more from despondency than conviction, ended in smoke! Now, through conversation in general, through instruction, through so many conflicting opinions, but especially through my fellow-boarder, Hofrat Pfeil, I learned to value more and more the importance of the subject-matter, and the conciseness of the treatment, without, however, being able to make clear to myself where the former was to be sought, or how the latter was to be attained. For, what with the limitations of my life, what with the indifference of my companions, the reserve of the professors, the exclusiveness of the educated inhabitants, and what with the complete insignificance of external nature, it was vain to look for any inspiration from without. If, therefore, I desired a true basis in feeling or reflection for my poems, I was forced to seek it in my own heart; if I required for my poetic representation a first-hand impression of an object or an event, I must necessarily remain within the circle from which an appeal to my feelings, an awakening of my interest was likely to come. With these convictions I first wrote certain little poems, in the form of songs or in a less regular measure; they are founded on reflection, treat of the past, and for the most part take an epigrammatic turn.

And thus began that habit from which I could not break away my whole life through—the habit of turning into an image, into a poem, whatever delighted or troubled, or otherwise occupied me, and thus of coming to some definite conclusion with regard to it, so that I might both rectify my conceptions of external things and satisfy my inner cravings. To no one was the faculty for so doing more necessary than to me, for by nature I was constantly carried from one extreme to the other. Whatever, therefore, of mine has become public, are but fragments of a great confession, and this little book is a bold attempt to render it complete.

My early affection for Gretchen I had now transferred to a certain Ännchen, of whom I can only say that she was young, pretty, sprightly, loving, and so attractive that she well deserved to be set up for a time in the shrine of the heart as a little saint, that she might receive all that reverence which it often causes more pleasure to bestow than to receive. I saw her daily without hindrance; she helped to prepare the meals which I enjoyed, she brought, in the evening at least, the wine which I drank, and indeed our select circle of noon-day boarders was a warrant that the little house, which was visited by few guests, except during the fair, well merited its good reputation. Opportunity and inclination were found for various kinds of amusement. But as she neither might nor could leave the house often, our pleasures were somewhat sparse. We sang the songs of Zachariä, acted Krüger's Duke Michael, in which a knotted handkerchief had to take the place of the nightingale; and so, for a while, the time fled pleasantly enough. But since such connections are in the long run lacking in variety in proportion to their innocence, I was seized with that base craving which tempts us to derive amusement by tormenting the girl we love, and to domineer over her devotion with wanton and tyrannical caprice. I thought I might vent on her my ill-humor at the failure of my poetical attempts, at the apparent impossibility of coming to a clear understanding about them, and at whatever else went wrong with me, because she really loved me with all her heart, and did whatever she could to please me. By unfounded and absurd fits of jealousy, I spoiled our most delightful days both for myself and her. She endured it for a time with incredible patience, which I was cruel enough to try to the uttermost. But to my shame and despair, I was at last forced to remark that her heart was alienated from me, and that I might now have good ground for the madness in which I had indulged without necessity and without cause. There were also terrible scenes between us, from which I gained nothing: and now for the first time I felt that I really loved her, and could not bear to lose her. My passion grew, and assumed all the forms of which it is capable under such circumstances; nay, at last I even took up the rôle which the girl had hitherto played. I devised all possible means of making myself agreeable to her, even of procuring her pleasure by means of others; for I could not renounce the hope of winning her again. But it was too late! I had lost her really, and the frenzy with which I revenged my wrong-doing upon myself, by frantic attempts to injure my physical self, in order to inflict pain on my moral self, contributed very much to the maladies which spoiled some of the best years of my life; indeed, I should perhaps have been completely ruined by this loss, had not my poetic talent shown itself particularly helpful with its healing power.

GOETHE AT STRASBOURG

From Book XI (1770-71)

Thus, on the very borders of France, we had at one blow got rid of everything French about us. The French way of life was too definite and too genteel for us, their poetry cold, their criticism annihilating, their philosophy abstruse, and yet unsatisfying, so that we were on the point of resigning ourselves to material nature, at least by way of experiment, if another influence had not been long preparing us for higher and broader views of the world, and for intellectual enjoyments as true as they were imaginative—an influence which drew us, first slowly and in secret, but by degrees more and more openly and forcibly.

It is almost superfluous to say that Shakespeare was this new inspiration; and having once said this, no more need be added. The greatness of Shakespeare has been acknowledged by the Germans more than by other nations, perhaps even more than by his own. We have lavished on him all that justice, fairness, and forbearance which we refuse to ourselves. Distinguished men have labored to show his talents in the most favorable light; and I have always readily subscribed to what has been said in his honor and favor, or even in his excuse. The influence of this extraordinary mind upon me has been already shown; an attempt has been made to touch upon his works, which has met with approval; and therefore this general statement may suffice for the present, until I am in a position to share with such friends as care to hear me, gleanings from those reflections on his great excellences which I was tempted to insert in this context.

ON THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE

From Book XII (1771-73)

But though now, partly from inclination, partly for literary and other purposes, I eagerly studied the antiquities of my country, and tried to render them present to my imagination, I was from time to time distracted from this subject by biblical studies and religious sympathies, since Luther's life and deeds, which shine out so gloriously in the sixteenth century, always brought me back to the Holy Scriptures, and to the consideration of religious feelings and opinions. To look upon the Bible as a compilation, dating from various periods, and having undergone revision at different times, was flattering to my small-minded vanity, since this view was then by no means predominant, much less received in the circle in which I lived. With regard to the main interpretation, I adhered to Luther's rendering; in matters of detail, I referred to Schmidt's literal translation, and made the best use I could of my smattering of Hebrew. That there are contradictions in the Bible, no one will now deny. These interpreters sought to reconcile by laying down the clearest passage as a foundation, and endeavoring to conform to its meaning those that were contradictory and less clear. I, on the contrary, wished to find out, by examination, which passage best expressed the real sense. To this I adhered, and rejected the rest as interpolated.

For a fundamental opinion had already formed definitely in my mind, without my being able to say whether it had been suggested, or inspired, or had arisen from my own reflection. It was this,—that in anything which is handed down to us, especially in writing, the real point is the groundwork, the inner meaning, the sense, the tendency of the work; that here lies all that makes it original, divine, effective, unassailable and indestructible; and that neither time, nor outward influences or vicissitudes, can in any degree affect this inner primitive nature, at least no more than sickness of the body affects a healthy soul. Thus, according to my view, the language, the dialect, the characteristics, the style, and finally the writing, were to be regarded as the mere body of every creation of the mind; this body, although nearly akin to the inner spirit, was yet exposed to deterioration and corruption; as, indeed, no tradition can be handed down in its original purity; nor, indeed, if so delivered, could it be perfectly intelligible in every succeeding epoch,—the former on account of the imperfection of those organs through which the tradition is delivered,—the latter on account of the differences of time and place, but especially the diversity of human capacities and modes of thought; for which reason the interpreters will never be able to agree.

Hence it is everyone's duty to try to discover the inner, essential nature of a book which particularly interests us, and at the same time, above all things, to consider in what relation it stands to our own inner nature, and how far, by its vitality, our own is stirred and rendered fruitful. On the other hand, everything external that exercises no influence on us, or is subject to doubt, is to be handed over to criticism, which, even if able to disintegrate and dismember the whole, would never succeed in depriving us of the essential foundation to which we cling, nor even in shaking us for a moment in the confidence we have once felt.

This conviction, born of faith and sight, which is applicable and strengthening in all those cases which we recognize as most vital, underlay the moral as well as the literary structure of my life, and may be regarded as a well-invested and richly productive capital, although in particular instances we may be led astray into making erroneous applications. It was by such an attitude of mind that the Bible first became really accessible to me. As is usually the case in a Protestant up-bringing, I had run through it many times, and by reading separate portions here and there I was perfectly familiar with it from beginning to end. The blunt realism of the Old Testament, and the tender simplicity of the New, had attracted me in many parts; it is true it never presented itself to me as a whole; but now the diversity of character of the different books no longer perplexed me; I knew how to grasp their significance correctly and in due order, and had expended too much feeling upon the book to be ever able to do without it. This emotional aspect was of itself sufficient to protect me against scoffing spirits, because I saw their dishonesty at once. I not only detested them, but they even prompted me to rage; and I still perfectly remember that in my childish fanatical zeal I could have throttled Voltaire, for his Saul, if I could only have got at him. On the other hand, every kind of honest investigation pleased me; I was delighted to gather any information as to the localities and costumes of the East, and so to gain more light on these subjects, and I continued to exercise all my powers of discrimination in the study of such valuable traditions.

BACK TO FRANKFORT

From Book XII

In what can young people take the highest interest, and how are they to excite interest among those of their own age, if they are not animated by love, are not stirred by the vicissitudes of passion under one form or another? I mourned in secret for a lost love; this made me mild and tolerant, and a more pleasant member of society than in those bright days when nothing reminded me of any deficiency or fault, and I sped recklessly on my way, heedless of all restraints.

My heart was torn by Frederica's answer to my written farewell. It was the same hand, the same thought, the same feeling, which had developed in her for me and through me. Now, for the first time, I felt the loss which she suffered and saw no means of compensating her for it, or even of alleviating the pain. She was ever present with me; I always felt the lack of her, and, what was worst of all, I could not forgive myself for my own unhappiness. Gretchen had been taken from me; Annette had left me; now, for the first time, I was to blame, I had wounded the loveliest heart to its very depths; and this period of gloomy repentance, in the absence of that refreshing love which I had been wont to enjoy, was agonizing, nay unbearable. But man must live; hence I took a genuine interest in others; I sought to unravel their difficulties, and to keep together those who were about to part, that they might not suffer the same lot as myself. I was known, in consequence, as the 'confidant,' or, because of my wanderings about the district, as the 'wanderer.' The situation of Frankfort was well adapted to give me that calm of mind, which I only felt under the open sky, in valleys, on heights, in fields and in woods, lying as it did between Darmstadt and Homburg, two pleasant townships, which were on good terms with one another on account of the relationship existing between their courts. I accustomed myself to live on the road, and to wander like a messenger between the mountains and the plain. I often went through my native city, alone or in company, as if it were strange to me, dined at one of the great inns in the Fahrgasse, and after dinner continued my way. The free and open world of nature attracted me more and more. On my way I would sing to myself strange hymns and dithyrambs, of which one entitled The Wanderer's Storm Song is still preserved. I composed those incoherent verses, and sang them passionately to myself once when I found myself in a terrific storm which I was obliged to meet.

My heart was untouched and empty; I conscientiously avoided all intimacy with ladies, and so remained unconscious of the fact, that, heedless and unconscious as I was, a good and friendly genius was in secret hovering round me. A gentle loveable woman cherished a secret affection for me, of which I was ignorant, and was therefore all the more cheerful and animated in her kindly presence. Many years afterwards, when she was dead, I heard of her secret and devoted love, in a manner that could not fail to shock me. But I was innocent, and could truly and honestly pity an innocent being; and that all the more sincerely, as the discovery occurred at a time when, free from all passion, I was fortunate enough to be living for myself and my intellectual tastes.

At the time when I was troubled by my grief at Frederica's sad position, I again, as had ever been my wont, sought the aid of poetry. I continued that confession in verse which I had already begun, so that by this self-tormenting penance I might be worthy of inner absolution. The two Marys in Götz von Berlichingen and Clavigo, and the two bad characters who play the part of lovers to them, may have been the results of such penitent reflections.

But as youth easily recovers from injuries and diseases, because a healthy system of organic life can take the place of a sick one, and allow the latter time to grow healthy again, so now physical exercises came to my help most advantageously at different times; and I was stirred in many ways to pluck up heart again, and to seek new pleasures and enjoyments in life. Riding gradually took the place of those strolling, melancholy, toilsome, as well as tedious and aimless rambles on foot; for in this way the goal was reached more quickly, merrily and easily. My younger companions reintroduced fencing, but it was especially when winter set in that a new world was revealed to us. I suddenly determined to skate,—an exercise which I had never attempted,—and, in a short time, by practise, thought, and perseverance, got on well enough to enjoy mingling with the gay and animated crowd on the ice, with no wish to distinguish myself further.

SPINOZA AND POETRY

From Book XVI (1775)

Our physical as well as our social life, manners, customs, worldly wisdom, philosophy, religion, and many accidental happenings, all call upon us to deny ourselves. Much within us that is peculiarly our own, we are not allowed to develop in outward acts; much that we need from without for the perfecting of our character is withheld; while, on the other hand, much is forced upon us which is as alien to us as it is burdensome. We are robbed of all that we have laboriously acquired for ourselves, or friendly circumstances have bestowed upon us; and before we can see clearly what this means, we find ourselves compelled to part with our personality, piece by piece, till at last it is gone altogether. But at the same time it seems a law of society to despise a man who shows he resents the process. On the contrary, the bitterer the cup we have to drink, the pleasanter our face should be, in order that the indifferent onlooker may not be offended by the least grinace.

To solve this painful problem, however, nature has endowed man with ample power, activity and endurance. But what is of the greatest aid to him is his volatile temperament, a boon to man, which nothing can take from him. By this means he is able to renounce the cherished object of the moment, provided that the next presents him with something new to reach after; and thus he goes on unconsciously remodeling his whole life. We are continually putting one passion in the place of another; pursuits, inclinations, tastes, hobbies—we try them all, only to exclaim at last, All is vanity. No one is shocked at this false and blasphemous speech; nay, everyone thinks, as he says it, that he is uttering a wise and indisputable maxim. A few men there are, and only a few, who anticipate such an unbearable experience, and avoid all calls to such partial resignation by one grand act of total self-renunciation.

Such men are convinced of the existence of the Eternal, of the Inevitable, and of Immutable Law, and seek to form for themselves ideas which are imperishable, and which contemplation of the changing world cannot shake, but rather confirms. But since in this there is something superhuman, such persons are commonly esteemed in-human, deniers of God and of the World. Imagination can hardly give them enough horns and claws.

My confidence in Spinoza rested on the sense of serenity he wrought in me, and it only increased when I found my worthy friends, the mystics, were accused of Spinozism, and learned that even Leibnitz himself could not escape the charge; and that Boerhaave, suspected of similar sentiments, had to abandon theology for medicine.

But let no one think that I would have subscribed to his writings, and assented to them verbatim et literatim. For I had long seen but too plainly that no man really understands another; that no one attaches the same idea to the same word that another does; that a conversation, a book, excites in different persons different trains of thought:—and the reader will trust the assertion of the author of Faust and Werther, that deeply versed as he was in such misunderstandings, he was never so presumptuous as to think that he could perfectly understand a man, who, as a disciple of Descartes, had risen, through mathematical and rabbinical studies, to the loftiest heights of thought, and whose name even to this day seems to mark the limit of all speculative efforts.

How much I imbibed from Spinoza would be shown distinctly enough if I had ever carried out my plan of inserting a visit paid to Spinoza by the Wandering Jew, as an important incident in my poem. But this conception pleased me so much and I took such delight in meditating on it in secret that I never could bring myself to the point of setting it down in writing; till finally the idea which would have been well enough as a passing whim, expanded to such an extent that it lost its charm, and I banished the troublesome notion altogether from my mind. But I will now dwell as briefly and succinctly as possible on the main conceptions which I owed to my study of Spinoza, in so far as they have remained indelibly impressed on my mind, having exercised a great influence on the subsequent course of my life.

Nature works after such eternal, necessary, divine laws, that the Deity Himself could alter nothing in them. In this belief, all men are unconsciously agreed. It is enough to think how astonished and terrified we are at any natural phenomenon which seems to imply any degree of understanding, reason or even of caprice.

If anything like reason shows itself in the brute creation, it is long before we can recover from our amazement; for, although the animals stand so near to us, they yet seem to be divided from us by an infinite gulf, and to be entirely subject to the rule of necessity. It is therefore hardly reasonable to blame those thinkers who have pronounced the infinitely ingenious, but strictly limited, organization of those creatures to be entirely mechanical.

If we turn to plants, our contention is still more strikingly confirmed. How unaccountable is the feeling which seizes us when we watch the mimosa, as soon as it is touched, fold up its pinnate leaves in pairs, and finally bend down its little stalk as if upon a hinge. And this feeling, to which I will give no name, increases in intensity at the sight of the Hedysarum Gyrens, which without any apparent outward cause moves its little leaves up and down, and seems to play with itself as well 10 as with our thoughts of it. Let us imagine a plantain tree suddenly endowed with similar capacity so that it could of itself alternately let down and raise its huge leafy canopy; who would not start back in terror 15 at the first sight of it? So rooted within us is the idea of our own superiority that we absolutely refuse to concede to the outward world any participation in it; nay, if we could, we would too often deny such 20 advantages to our fellow beings.

On the other hand, a similar horror seizes upon us when we see a man unreasonably opposing universally recognized moral laws or acting unwisely to his own 25 detriment and that of others. To rid ourselves of the repugnance which we feel at such times, we convert it at once into censure or detestation, and we seek either in reality or in thought to free ourselves 30 from such a man.

This distinction which Spinoza draws and throws into such strong relief, I, strangely enough, applied to my own being; and what has been said so far is, properly 35 speaking, only for the purpose of rendering intelligible what is to follow.

I had come to look upon my indwelling poetic talent altogether as a force of Nature; the more so, as I had always been impelled to regard outward nature as its proper object. The exercise of this poetic faculty might indeed be excited and de- 5 termined by circumstances; but its most joyful and richest action was spontaneous—even involuntary.

Through field and forest roaming,
My little song still humming,
Thus went the livelong day.

In my nightly vigils the same thing happened; so that I often wished, like one of my predecessors, to have a leathern jerkin 10 made, and to get accustomed to writing in the dark, so as to be able at once to fix on paper all such unpremeditated effusions. It had so often happened to me that after composing some snatch of poetry in my head I could not recall it, that I would now hurry 15 to my desk and, without once breaking off, write off the poem from beginning to end, not even taking the time to straighten the paper, if it lay cross-wise, so that the verses 20 often slanted across the page. In such a mood I preferred to get hold of a lead pencil, because I could write most readily with it; whereas the scratching and spluttering of a pen would sometimes wake me 25 from my poetic dream, confuse me, and so stifle some trifling production in its birth. For poems thus created I had a particular reverence; for I felt towards them much as the hen does towards the chickens she has 30 hatched when she sees them chirping about her. My old whim of making these poems known only by private readings now returned to me: to barter them for money was abhorrent to me.

DEDICATION OF FAUST

Translated by Sir Theodore Martin

Ye come, dim forms, as in youth's early day
Ye blessed these eyes, which now so lonely grieve!
Still, still, to hold ye fast shall I essay,
Still let my heart to that delusion cleave!
Ye throng me round! Well! lord it how ye may, 5
As from the mists ye rise that round me weave,
Ye waft a magic air, that shakes my breast
With youth's tumultuous, yet divine, unrest.

Visions ye bring with you of happy days,
And many a dear, dear, shade ascends to view;
Like some faint haunting chime of ancient lays,
Come love, first love, and friendship back with you; 10

The heart runs back o'er life's bewildered maze,
 And pangs, long laid to sleep, awake anew,
 And named the loved ones lost,—before their day
 Swept, whilst life yet was beautiful, away.

15

Alas, alas! These strains they cannot hear,
 The souls to whom my earliest lays I sang;
 Gone is that loving band of friends so dear,
 The echoes hushed, that once responsive rang;
 My numbers fall upon the stranger's ear,
 Whose very praise is to my heart a pang,
 And all, who in my lays took pride of yore,
 Are lost in other lands, or else no more.

20

And yearnings fill my soul, unwonted long,
 To yonder still, sad, spirit-world to go;
 Now, like Æolian harp, my faltering song
 Rises and falls in fitful cadence low;
 A shudder thrills me, as old memories throng,
 The strong heart melts, tears fast on tear-drops flow;
 What still is mine seems far, far off to be,
 And what has flown becomes reality for me.

PROLOGUE IN HEAVEN

Translated by Shelley

THE LORD AND THE HOST OF HEAVEN

Enter three Archangels; later Mephistopheles.

Raphael. The sun makes music as of old
 Amid the rival spheres of Heaven,
 On its predestined circle rolled,
 With thunder speed: the Angels even
 Draw strength from gazing on its glance,
 Though none its meaning fathom may:—
 The world's unwithered countenance
 Is bright as at Creation's day.

5

Gabriel. And swift and swift, with rapid lightness,
 The adorned Earth spins silently,
 Alternating Elysian brightness
 With deep and dreadful night; the sea
 Foams in broad billows from the deep
 Up to the rocks, and rocks and ocean,
 Onward, with spheres which never sleep,
 Are hurried in eternal motion.

10

15

Michael. And tempests in contention roar
 From land to sea, from sea to land;
 And, raging, weave a chain of power,
 Which girds the earth, as with a band.
 A flashing desolation there,
 Flames before the thunder's way;
 But Thy servants, Lord, revere
 The gentle changes of Thy day.

20

Chorus of the Three. The Angels draw strength from Thy glance, 25
 Though no one comprehend Thee may;—
 Thy world's unwithered countenance
 Is bright as on Creation's day.

Mephistopheles. As thou, O Lord, once more art kind enough
 To interest Thyself in our affairs, 30
 And ask, 'How goes it with you there below?'
 And as indulgently at other times
 Thou tookest not my visits in ill part,
 Thou seest me here once more among Thy household.
 Though I should scandalize this company, 35
 You will excuse me if I do not talk
 In the high style which they think fashionable;
 My pathos certainly would make You laugh too,
 Had You not long since given over laughing.
 Nothing know I to say of suns and worlds; 40
 I observe only how men plague themselves;
 The little god o' the world keeps the same stamp,
 As wonderful as on creation's day:
 A little better would he live, hadst Thou
 Not given him a glimpse of Heaven's light 45
 Which he calls reason, and employs it only
 To live more beastlily than any beast.
 With reverence to Your Lordship be it spoken,
 He's like one of those long-legged grasshoppers,
 Who flits and jumps about and sings for ever 50
 The same old song i' the grass. There let him lie,
 Burying his nose in every heap of dung.

The Lord. Have you no more to say? Do you come here
 Always to scold, and cavil and complain?
 Seems nothing ever right to you on earth? 55

M. No, Lord! I find all there, as ever, bad at best.
 Even I am sorry for man's days of sorrow;
 I could myself almost give up the pleasure
 Of plaguing the poor things.

L. Knowest thou Faust? 60

M. The Doctor?

L. Ay; My servant Faust.

M. In truth

He serves You in a fashion quite his own;
 And the fool's meat and drink are not of earth. 65
 His aspirations bear him on so far
 That he is half aware of his own folly,
 For he demands from Heaven its fairest star,
 And from the earth the highest joy it bears,
 Yet all things far, and all things near, are vain 70
 To calm the deep emotions of his breast.

L. Though he now serves Me in a cloud of error,
 I will soon lead him forth to the clear day.
 When trees look green, full well the gardener knows
 That fruits and blooms will deck the coming year. 75

M. What will You bet?—now I am sure of winning—
 Only, observe You give me full permission
 To lead him softly on my path.

L. As long
 As he shall live upon the earth, so long 80

Is nothing unto thee forbidden—Man
Must err till he has ceased to struggle.

M. Thanks.

And that is all I ask; for willingly
I never make acquaintance with the dead. 85
The full fresh cheeks of youth are food for me,
And if a corpse knocks, I am not at home.
For I am like a cat—I like to play
A little with the mouse before I eat it.

L. Well, well! it is permitted thee. Draw thou 90
His spirit from its springs; as thou find'st power,
Seize him and lead him on thy downward path;
And stand ashamed when failure teaches thee
That a good man, even in his darkest longings.
Is well aware of the right way. 95

M. Well and good.

I am not in much doubt about my bet
And if I lose, then 'tis Your turn to crow;
Enjoy Your triumph then with a full breast.
Ay; dust shall he devour, and that with pleasure, 100
Like my old paramour, the famous Snake.

L. Pray come here when it suits you; for I never Had much dislike for people of your sort.
And, among all the Spirits who rebelled,
The knave was ever the least tedious to Me 105
The active spirit of man soon sleeps, and soon
He seeks unbroken quiet; therefore I
Have given him the Devil for a companion,
Who may provoke him to some sort of work,
And must create forever.—But ye, pure 110
Children of God, enjoy eternal beauty;
Let that which ever operates and lives
Clasp you within the limits of its love;
And seize with sweet and melancholy thoughts
The floating phantoms of its loveliness. 115

[Heaven closes; the Archangels exeunt.]

M. From time to time I visit the old fellow,
And I take care to keep on good terms with Him.
Civil enough is the same God Almighty,
To talk so freely with the Devil himself.

THE OPENING SCENE

[Translated by Sir Theodore Martin]

Night. A lofty, vaulted, narrow, Gothic chamber. Faust seated at his desk.

Faust. All that philosophy can teach,
The craft of lawyer and of leech, 120
I've mastered, ah! and sweated through Theology's dreary deserts, too,
Yet here, poor fool! for all my lore,
I stand no wiser than before. 125
They call me magister, save the mark!
Doctor, withal! and these ten years I
Have been leading my pupils a dance in the dark,
Up hill, down dale, through wet and through dry—

- And yet, that nothing can ever be
By mortals known, too well I see!
This is burning the heart clean out of me.
More brains have I than all the tribe
Of doctor, magister, parson, and scribe;
From doubts and scruples my soul is free;
Nor hell nor devil has terrors for me:
But just for this I am dispossessed
Of all that gives pleasure to life and zest.
I can't even juggle myself to own
There is any one thing to be truly known,
Or ought to be taught in science or arts,
To better mankind and to turn their hearts.
Besides, I have neither land nor pence,
Nor worldly honor nor influence.
A dog in my case would scorn to live!
So myself to magic I've vowed to give,
And see, if through spirit's might and tongue
The heart from some mysteries cannot be wrung;
If I cannot escape from the bitter woe
Of babbling of things that I do not know,
And get to the root of those secret powers,
Which hold together this world of ours,
The sources and centers of force explore,
And chaffer and dabble in words no more.
- Oh, broad bright moon, if this might be
The last of the nights of agony,
The countless midnights, these weary eyes
Have from this desk here watched thee rise!
Then, sad-eyed friend, thy wistful looks
Shone in upon me o'er paper and books;
But oh! might I wander, in thy dear light,
O'er the trackless slopes of some mountain height,
Round mountain caverns with spirits sail,
Or float o'er the meads in thy hazes pale;
And, freed from the fumes of a fruitless lore,
Bathe in thy dews, and be whole once more!
- Ah me! am I penned in this dungeon still?
Accurséd doghole, clammy and chill!
Where heaven's own blessed light must pass,
Shorn of its rays, through the painted glass,
Narrowed and cumbered by piles of books,
That are gnawed by worms and grimed with dust,
And which, with its smoke-stained paper, looks
Swathed to the roof in a dingy rust;
Stuck round with phials, and chests untold,
With instruments littered, and lumbered with old
Crazy, ancestral, household ware—
This is your world! A world most rare!
- And yet can you wonder, why your soul
Is numbed within your breast, and why
A dead, dull, anguish makes your whole
Life's pulses falter, and ebb, and die?
How should it be but so? Instead
Of the living nature, whereinto

God has created man, things dead
 And drear alone encompass you—
 Smoke, litter, dust, the skeletons
 Of birds and beasts and dead men's bones!

185

Up, up! Away to the champaign free!
 And this mysterious volume, writ
 By Nostradamus' self, is it
 Not guide and counsel enough for thee?
 Then wilt thou learn, by what control
 The stars within their orbits roll,
 And if thou wilt let boon Nature be
 The guide and monitress to thee,
 Thy soul shall expand with tenfold force,
 As spirit with spirit holds discourse.
 Dull poring, think not, that can here
 Expound these holy signs to thee!
 Ye spirits, ye are hovering near,
 If ye can hear me, answer me!

190

195

200

[Throws open the book, and discovers the sign of the Macrocosm.]

Ha! as it meets my gaze, what rapture, gushing
 Through all my senses, mounts into my brain!
 Youth's ecstasy divine, I feel it rushing,
 Like quickening fire, through every nerve and vein!
 Was it a god who chronicled these signs,
 Which all the war within me still,
 The aching heart with sweetness fill,
 And to mine eyes, in clearest lines,
 Unveil all Nature's powers as with a mystic thrill?
 Am I a god? All grows so bright.
 In these pure outlines I behold
 Nature at work before my soul unrolled.
 Now can I read the sage's saw aright:
 'Not barred to man the world of spirits is;
 Thy sense is shut, thy heart is dead!
 Up, student, lave,—nor dread the bliss,—
 Thy earthly breast in the morning-red!

205

215

[Gazes intently at the sign.]

Into one whole how all things blend,
 One in the other working, living!
 What powers celestial, lo! ascend, descend,
 Each unto each the golden pitchers giving!
 And, wafting blessings from their wings,
 From heaven through farthest earth career,
 While through the universal sphere
 One universal concord rings!

220

225

Oh, what a show! yet but a show! Ah me!
 Where, boundless nature, shall I clutch at thee?
 Ye breasts, where are ye? Ye perennial springs
 Of life, whereon hang heaven and earth,
 Whereto the blighted bosom clings,
 Ye gush, ye slake all thirst, yet I pine on in dearth!

230

[Turns the leaves of the book angrily, and sees the sign of the Earth Spirit.]

How differently I feel before this sign!
 Earth Spirit, thou to me art nearer;
 My faculties grow loftier, clearer,
 Even now I glow as with new wine.
 Courage I feel, into the world to roam,
 To bid earth's joys and sorrows hail,
 'Mid storm and struggle to make my home,
 And in the crash of shipwreck not to quail.
 Clouds gather o'er my head;
 The moon conceals her light,
 The lamp's gone out. The air
 Grows thick and close! Red flashes play Around me. From the vaulted roof
 A shuddering horror creeps
 And on me lays its gripe!
 Spirit by me invoked, I feel
 Thou'rt hovering near,—thou art, thou art!
 Unveil thyself!
 Ha! What a tugging at my heart!
 Stirred through their depths, my senses reel
 With passions new and strange! I feel,
 My heart is thine, thine wholly! Hear!
 Thou must! ay, though it cost my life, thou must appear!
[Seizes the book, and utters the sign of the Spirit mysteriously. A red light flashes, in which the Spirit appears.]

Spirit. Who calls on me?

F. [turning away] Dread vision gaunt!

S. By potent art thou'st dragged me here;
 Thou'st long been sucking at my sphere,
 And now—

F. I loathe thee. Hence, avaunt!

S. To view me were thy prayer and choice,
 To see my face, to hear my voice.
 Well, by thy potent prayer won o'er,
 I come. And thou, that wouldst be more
 Than mortal, having thy behest,
 Art with a craven fear possessed!
 Where is thy pride of soul? Where now the breast,
 Which in itself a universe created,
 Sustained and fostered,—which dilated
 With giant throes of rapture, in the hope
 As peer with spirits such as me to cope?
 Where art thou, Faust, whose summons rang so wide,
 Who stormed my haunts, and would not be denied?
 Is this thing thou? This, my mere breath doth make Through every nerve and fiber quake?
 A crawling, cowering, timorous worm?

F. Thou film of flame, art thou a thing to fear?
 I am, I am that Faust! I am thy peer!

S. In the currents of Life, in Action's storm,
 I wander and I wave,

Everywhere I be!
 Birth and the grave,
 An infinite sea,
 A web ever growing,
 A life ever glowing,
 Thus at Time's whizzing loom I spin,
 And weave the living vesture, that God is mantled in!

285

F. Thou busy Spirit, who dost sweep,
 From sphere to sphere, from deep to deep,
 Ranging the world from end to end,
 How near akin I feel to thee!

290

S. Thou'rt like the Spirit, thou dost comprehend,
 But not like me!

295

[Vanishes.]

F. But not like thee!
 Whom, then? What! I,
 The image of the Deity!
 Yet not to be compared to thee?

[A knock.]

300

O death! My famulus! At time like this
 To drag me from the top of bliss!
 That such a soulless drivel should Disturb this vision's full beatitude!

Enter Wagner, in his dressing-gown and night-cap, with a lamp in his hand. Faust turns away impatiently.

Wagner. I heard you, did I not, declaim?
 From one, no doubt, of the old Greek plays?
 So in the art to take a hint I came;
 For it is much in favor nowadays.
 Many a time I've heard it said, at least,
 An actor might give lessons to a priest.

310

F. Yes, if the priest an actor be,
 As now and then will happen, certainly.

W. Ah! when one's in his study pent, like me,
 And sees the world but on a rare occasion,
 And then far off, on some chance holiday,
 And through a telescope, as one may say,
 How can one ever hope to sway,
 Or govern it by eloquent persuasion?

315

F. That is a power, which is not to be taught.
 It must be felt, must gush forth from within,
 And, rising to the lips in words unsought,
 The hearts of all to deep emotion win.
 Sit on for ever! Till you ache,
 Your patchwork and mosaics make;
 With scraps at others' banquets found
 A ragout of your own compound,
 And, blowing at your ash-heap, fan
 What miserable flame you can!
 Children and apes may praise your art—
 A noble triumph, you must own—
 But you will never make heart throb with heart,
 Unless your own heart first has struck the tone.

320

330

W. Delivery makes the orator's success.
In that I'm far behind, I must confess.

F. Scorn such success! Play thou an honest game! 335
Be no mere empty tinkling fool!
True sense and reason reach their aim,
With little help from art or rule.
Be earnest! Then what need, to seek
The words that best your meaning speak? 340
Oh, your orations, garnished, trimmed, refined,
Tickling men's fancies where they're chiefly weak,
Are unrefreshing as the drizzling wind,
That through the autumn's sere leaves whistles bleak.

W. Ah me! art is so long, and life so brief! 345
Oft in my labors critical, a load
Seems weighing on my brain and heart, like lead.
How hard it is, almost beyond belief,
To get at knowledge in its fountain-head!
And ere a man is half way on the road, 350
He's very sure, poor devil, to be dead.

F. Is parchment, then, the sacred fount, can give
The stream that shall allay thy thirst for ever?
Man never quaffed a draught restorative,
That from his own soul welled not—never, never! 355

W. Excuse me, surely 'tis a joy sublime,
To realize the spirit of a time,
To see how sages long ago have thought,
And the high pass to which things nowadays are brought.

F. High pass! Oh yes! As the welkin high! 360
My friend, to us they are, these times gone by,
A book with seven seals, and what you call
The spirit of the times, I've long suspected,
Is but the spirit of the men—that's all—
In which the times they prate of are reflected. 365
And that's a sight, God wot, so poor, so mean,
We run away from it, as soon as seen;
Mere scraps of odds and ends, old crazy lumber,
In dust-bins only fit to rot and slumber;
At best a play on stilts, all strut and glare, 370
Gewgaws and glitter, fustian and pretense,
With maxims strewn of sage pragmatic air,
That, mouthed by puppets, pass with fools for sense.

W. Ay, but the world! The heart and soul of man,
Something of these may, sure, be learned by all. 375

F. As men call learning, yes, no doubt, it can!
But who the child by its right name will call?
The few, who something of that knowledge learned,
And were not wise enough a guard to keep 380
On their full hearts, but to the people showed
The reaches of their soaring thoughts, the deep Emotions that within them glowed,
Men at all times have crucified and burned.

I prithee, friend, 'tis far into the night,
And for the present we must say adieu! 385

W. I'd gladly watch till dawn, for the delight
Of such most edifying talk with you.
Tomorrow, being Easter-day,
Good sir, if I so far might task you,
Some things there are which I should like to say, 390
Some further questions I should like to ask you;
My zeal has in my studies not been small;
Much, it is true, I know, but I would fain know all. [Exit.]

F. Strange, that all hope has not long since been blighted
In one content on such mere chaff to feed, 395
Who digs for treasure with a miser's greed,
And, if he finds a muck-worm, is delighted!

Dare such a thing as this to babble now,
When all around with spirit-life is teeming?
Yet ah, I thank thee, though the sorriest thou 400
Of all that tread the earth in mortal seeming.
Thou rescuedst me from the despair, that fast
Was wildering my brain with mad surmise.
Ah, yonder vision was so giant-vast,
I shrank before it to a pigmy's size. 405

I, God's own image, I, who deemed I stood
With truth eternal full within my gaze,
And, of this earthly husk divested, viewed
In deep contentment heaven's effulgent blaze;
I, more than cherub, whose free powers, methought, 410
Did all the veins of nature permeate,
I, who—so potently my fancy wrought—
Conceived that, like a god, I could create,
And in creating taste a bliss supreme,
How must I expiate my frenzied dream? 415
One word, that smote like thunder on my brain,
Swept me away to nothingness again.

I dared not deem myself for thee a peer;
Though to evoke thee I the power possessed,
Yet was I impotent to keep thee here. 420
Oh, in the rapture of that moment blest
I felt myself so little, yet so great!
But thou didst thrust me back, with cruel scorn,
Upon the sad uncertainties forlorn
Of man's mere mortal state. 425
Who is to teach me? What shall I Recoil from? What go widely by?
Yon impulse, passionate, profound,
Shall I obey it, or forswear?
Alas! our way of life is cramped and bound 430
By what we do, no less than what we're doomed to bear!

Around our spirit's dreams, our noblest, best,
Some base alloy forever clings and grows;
Once of the good things of this world possessed,
We call a better wealth but lying shows. 435

The glorious feelings, those that most we prized,
That made indeed our very life of life,
In the world's turmoil and ignoble strife
Are seared and paralyzed.

If fancy, for a season flushed with hope, 440
Through boundless ether soars with wing unchecked,
A little space for her is ample scope.
When in Time's quicksands joy on joy lies wrecked,
Anon creeps care into our nether heart,
And there of secret sorrows breeds great store; 445
Uneasily she sits, and mopes apart,
Marring our joy and peace; and evermore
Fresh masks she dons, to work us bitter dole.
Turn where we will, she haunts our life,
As house and land, as child and wife, 450
As fire and flood, as knife and poisoned bowl.

I am not like the gods, too well I feel!
No! Like the worm, that writhes in dust, am I,
Which, as it feeds on dust, the passer-by Stamps into nothingness beneath his heel. 455

For what but dust, mere dust, is all,
Which, piled in endless shelf and press,
From floor to roof, contracts this lofty wall?
The trash, all frippery and emptiness,
Which here, in this moth-swarming hole, 460
Cramps, cabins, and confines my soul?
How shall I e'er discover here
The light and lore for which I yearn?
Is all my poring, year by year,
On books by thousands but to learn 465
That mortals have been wretched everywhere,
And only one been happy here and there?
What, hollow skull, what means that grin of thine?
But that thy brain was once, like mine, distraught,
Did after truth with rapturous passion pine, 470
And, while the radiance of the day it sought,
Grew at each step less certain of its way,
And in the twilight went disastrously astray?

Ye instruments, at me ye surely mock,
With cog and wheel and coil and cylinder! 475
I at the door of knowledge stood, ye were
The key which should that door for me unlock;
Your wards, I ween, have many a cunning maze,
But yet the bolts ye cannot, cannot raise.
Inscrutable in noonday's blaze, 480
Nature lets no one tear the veil away,
And what herself she does not choose
Unasked before your soul to lay,
You shall not wrest from her by levers or by screws.

Old lumber, that hast ne'er been used by me, 485
The reason, and the only, thou art here,

Is that my father worked of yore with thee!
 And thou, old roll, hast rotted here and moldered,
 Smeared with the fumes of smoke year after year,
 Since first upon this desk the dull lamp smoldered. 490
 Oh, better far, had I with hand profuse
 Squandered the little I can call my own
 Than with that little here to sweat and groan!
 Would you possess, enjoy and turn to use
 What from your sires you have inherited? 495
 What a man owns, but knows not to employ,
 A burden is, that weighs on him like lead;
 Nought can avail him, nought can he enjoy,
 Save what is by the passing moment bred.

Why is my gaze on yonder corner glued?
 Yon flask, is it a magnet to my sight?
 Why, why is all at once as lovely, bright,
 As sudden moonshine in a midnight wood? 500

All hail, thou priceless phial, which I here
 Take from thy shelf with reverential hand! 505
 In thee man's skill and wisdom I revere.
 Thou quintessence of all the juices bland
 That drowse the brain with slumber,—abstract thou
 Of all most subtle deadly agencies,
 Bestow thy grace upon thy master now! 510
 I see thee and my anguish finds a balm,
 I touch thee and the turmoil turns to calm;
 My soul's flood-tide is ebbing by degrees.
 A viewless finger beckons me to fleet
 To shoreless seas, where never tempest roars, 515
 The glassy flood is shining at my feet,
 Another day invites to other shores.

A car of fire, by airy pinions driven,
 Flits o'er me: and I stand prepared to flee,
 By tracks untrodden, through the wastes of heaven, 520
 Up to new spheres of pure activity.
 This life sublime, this godlike rapturous thrill,
 Can these by thee, a worm but now, be won?
 Yes, so thou turn with a resolvéd will
 Thy back on earth and on its kindly sun! 525
 The gates, most men would slink like cravens by,
 Dare thou to burst asunder! Lo, the hour
 Is here at hand by deeds to testify,
 Man's worth can front the gods in all their power;
 To gaze unblenching on that murky pit, 530
 Where fancy weaves herself an endless doom,
 To storm that pass, whose narrow gorge is lit
 By hell-fires flickering through the ghastly gloom;
 Serene, although the risk before thee lay,
 Into blank nothingness to melt away! 535

Then come thou down, pure goblet crystalline,
 Out from that time-stained covering of thine,
 Where I unmarked for years have let thee rest.
 Thou sparkled'st, when my grandsire's feasts were crowned,

Lit'st up the smiles of many a sad-browed guest, 540
 As each man to his neighbor passed thee round.
 Thy figures, marvels of the artist's craft,
 The drinker's task, to tell their tale in rhyme,
 And drain thy huge circumference at a draught,
 Bring many a night back of my youthful prime. 545
 I shall not pass thee now to comrade boon,
 Nor torture my invention to explain
 The quaint devices of thy graver's brain.
 Here is a juice intoxicates full soon;
 Its current brown brims up thy ample bowl. 550
 Now do I pledge this draught my last best care,
 In festive greeting, and with all my soul,
 To the day-dawn, shall hale me elsewhere!

CONVERSATIONS OF GOETHE WITH ECKERMAN

Translated by John Oxenford

January 2, 1824

Dined at Goethe's, and enjoyed some cheerful conversation. Mention was made of a young beauty belonging to the Weimar society, when one of the guests remarked that he was on the point of falling in love with her, although her understanding could not exactly be called brilliant.

'Pshaw,' said Goethe, laughing, 'as if love had anything to do with the understanding. The things that we love in a young lady are something very different from the understanding. We love in her beauty, youthfulness, playfulness, trustiness, her character, her faults, her caprices, 15 and God knows what "je ne sais quoi," besides; but we do not love her understanding. We respect her understanding when it is brilliant, and by it the worth of a girl can be infinitely enhanced in our eyes. 20 Understanding may also serve to fix our affections when we already love; but the understanding is not that which is capable of firing our hearts, and awakening a passion.'

SHAKESPEARE AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES

We found much that was true and convincing in Goethe's words, and were very willing to consider the subject in that light. After dinner, and when the rest of the party had departed, I remained sitting with Goethe, and conversed with him on various interesting topics.

We discoursed on English literature, on the greatness of Shakespeare; and on the unfavorable position held by all English dramatic authors who had appeared after 5 that poetical giant.

'A dramatic talent of any importance,' said Goethe, 'could not forbear to notice Shakespeare's works, nay, could not forbear to study them. Having studied them, he must be aware that Shakespeare has already exhausted the whole of human nature in all its tendencies, in all its heights and depths, and that, in fact, there remains for him, the aftercomer, nothing more to do. And how could one get courage only to put pen to paper, if one were conscious in an earnest, appreciating spirit, that such unfathomable and unattainable excellences were already in existence!

'It fared better with me fifty years ago in my own dear Germany. I could soon come to an end with all that then existed; it could not long awe me, or occupy my attention. I soon left behind me German 25 literature, and the study of it, and turned my thoughts to life and to production. So on and on I went in my own natural development, and on and on I fashioned the productions of epoch after epoch. And at 30 every step of life and development, my standard of excellence was not much higher than what at such step I was able to attain. But had I been born an Englishman, and had all those numerous masterpieces been brought before me in all their power, at my first dawn of youthful consciousness, they would have overpowered me, and I should not have known what to do. I could not have gone on with such fresh light-heartedness, but should have had to bethink myself, and look about for a long time, to find some new outlet.'

I turned the conversation back to Shakespeare. 'When one, to some degree, disengages him from English literature,' said I, 'and considers him transformed into a German, one cannot fail to look upon his gigantic greatness as a miracle. But if one seeks him in his home, transplants one's self to the soil of his country, and to the atmosphere of the century in which he lived; further, if one studies his contemporaries, and his immediate successors, and inhales the force wafted to us from Ben Jonson, Massinger, Marlowe and Beaumont and Fletcher, Shakespeare still, indeed, appears a being of the most exalted magnitude; but still, one arrives at the conviction that many of the wonders of his genius are, in some measure, accessible, and that much is due to the powerfully productive atmosphere of his age and time.' 'You are perfectly right,' returned Goethe. 'It is with Shakespeare as with the mountains of Switzerland. Transplant Mont Blanc at once into the large plain of Lüneburg Heath, and we should find no words to express our wonder at its magnitude. Seek it, however, in its gigantic home, go to it over its immense neighbors, the Jungfrau, the Finsteraarhorn, the Eiger, the Wetterhorn, St. Gothard, and Monte Rosa; Mont Blanc will, indeed, still remain a giant, but it will no longer produce in us such amazement.'

'Besides, let him who will not believe,' continued Goethe, 'that much of Shakespeare's greatness appertains to his great vigorous time, only ask himself the question, whether a phenomenon so astounding would be possible in the present England of 1824, in these evil days of criticizing and hair-splitting journals?'

'That undisturbed, innocent, somnambulatory production, by which alone anything great can thrive, is no longer possible. Our talents at present lie before the public. The daily criticisms which appear in fifty different places, and the gossip that is caused by them amongst the public prevent the appearance of any sound production. In the present day, he who does not keep aloof from all this, and isolate himself by main force, is lost. Through the bad, chiefly negative, æsthetical and critical tone of the journals, a sort of half culture finds its way into the masses; but to the productive talent it is a noxious mist, a dropping poison, which destroys the tree of creative power, from the ornamental green leaves to the deepest pith and the most hidden fibers.

'And then how tame and weak has life itself become during the last two shabby centuries. Where do we now meet an original nature? And where is the man who has the strength to be true, and to show himself as he is? This, however, affects the poet, who must find all within himself, while he is left in the lurch by all without.'

WORLD LITERATURE

January 31, 1827

Dined with Goethe. 'Within the last few days, since I saw you,' said he, 'I have ready many and various things; especially a Chinese novel, which occupies me still, and seems to me very remarkable.'

'Chinese novel!' said I; 'that must look strange enough.'

'Not so much as you might think,' said Goethe; 'the Chinamen think, act, and feel almost exactly like us; and we soon find that we are perfectly like them, excepting that all they do is more clear, more pure, and decorous than with us.'

'I am more and more convinced,' he continued, 'that poetry is the universal possession of mankind, revealing itself everywhere, and at all times, in hundreds and hundreds of men. One makes it a little better than another, and swims on the surface a little longer than another—that is all. Herr von Matthiisson must not think he is the man, nor must I think that I am the man; but each must say to himself, that the gift of poetry is by no means so very rare, and that nobody need think very much of himself because he has written a good poem.'

'But, really, we Germans are very likely to fall too easily into this pedantic conceit, when we do not look beyond the narrow circle which surrounds us. I therefore like to look about me in foreign nations, and advise everyone to do the same. National literature is now rather an unmeaning term; the epoch of World literature is at hand, and everyone must strive to hasten its approach. But while we thus value what is foreign, we must not bind ourselves to anything in particular, and regard it as a model. We must not give this value to the Chinese, or the Servian, or Calderon, or the Nibelungen; but if we really want a pattern, we must always return to the ancient Greeks, in whose works the beauty of mankind is constantly represented. All the rest we must look at only historically, appropriating to ourselves what is good, so far as it goes.'

THE PANAMA CANAL

February 21, 1827

Dined with Goethe. He spoke much, and with admiration of Alexander von Humboldt, whose work on Cuba and Colombia he had begun to read, and whose views as to the project for making a passage through the Isthmus of Panama appeared to have a peculiar interest for him. 'Humboldt,' said Goethe, 'has, with a great knowledge of his subject, given other points where, by making use of some streams which flow into the Gulf of Mexico, the end may be perhaps better attained than at Panama. All this is reserved for the future, and for an enterprising spirit. So much, however, is certain, that, if they succeed in cutting such a canal that ships of any burden and size can be navigated through it from the Mexican Gulf to the Pacific Ocean, innumerable benefits would result to the whole human race, civilized and uncivilized. But I should wonder if the United States were to let an opportunity escape of getting such work into their own hands. It may be foreseen that this young state, with its decided predilection to the West, will, in thirty or forty years, have occupied and peopled the large tract of land beyond the Rocky Mountains. It may, furthermore, be foreseen that along the whole coast of the Pacific Ocean, where nature has already formed the most capacious and secure harbors; important commercial towns will gradually arise, for the furtherance of a great intercourse between China and the East Indies and the United States. In such a case, it would not only be desirable, but almost necessary, that a more rapid communication should be maintained between the eastern and western shores of North America, both by merchant-ships and men-of-war, than has hitherto been possible with the tedious, disagreeable, and expensive voyage around Cape Horn. I therefore repeat that it is absolutely indispensable for the United States to effect a passage from the Mexican Gulf to the Pacific Ocean; and I am certain that they will do it.

'Would that I might live to see it!—but I shall not. I should like to see another thing—a junction of the Danube and the Rhine. But this undertaking is so gigantic that I have doubts of its completion, particularly when I consider our German resources. And thirdly and lastly, I should like to see England in possession of a canal through the Isthmus of Suez. Would I could live to see these three great works! It would be well worth the trouble to last some fifty years more for the very purpose.'

BEAUTY IN TREES AND WOMEN

April 18, 1827

Before dinner, I took a ride with Goethe some distance along the road to Erfurt.

We were met by all sorts of vehicles laden with wares for the fair at Leipsic; also a string of horses, amongst which were some very fine animals.

'I cannot help laughing at the æsthetical folks,' said Goethe, 'who torment themselves in endeavoring, by some abstract words, to reduce to a conception that inexpressible thing to which we give the name of beauty. Beauty is a primeval phenomenon, which itself never makes its appearance, but the reflection of which is visible in a thousand different utterances of the creative mind, and is as various as nature herself.'

'I have often heard it said that nature is always beautiful,' said I; 'that she causes the artists to despair, because they are seldom capable of reaching her completely.'

'I know well,' returned Goethe, 'that nature often reveals an unattainable charm; but I am by no means of the opinion that she is beautiful in all her aspects. Her intentions are, indeed, always good; but not so the conditions which are required to make her manifest herself completely.'

'Thus, the oak is a tree which may be very beautiful; but how many favorable circumstances must concur before nature can succeed in producing one truly beautiful! If an oak grow in the midst of a forest, encompassed with large neighboring trunks, its tendency will always be upward toward free air and light; only small weak branches will grow on its sides; and these will in the course of a century decay and fall off. But if it has at last succeeded in reaching the free air with its summit, it will then rest in its upward tendency, and begin to spread itself from its sides and form a crown. But it is by this time already past its middle age: its many years of upward striving have consumed its freshest powers, and its present endeavor to put forth its strength by increasing in breadth will not now have the proper results. When full grown, it will be high, strong and slender-stemmed, but still without such a proportion between its crown and its stem as would render it beautiful.

'Again: if the oak grow in a moist, marshy place, and the earth is too nourishing, it will, with proper space, prematurely shoot forth many branches and twigs on all sides: but it will still want the opposing, retarding influences; it will not show itself gnarled, stubborn and indented, and seen from a distance, it will have the appearance of a weak tree of the lime species; and it will not be beautiful—at least, not as an oak.

'If, lastly, it grow upon mountainous slopes, upon poor, stony soil, it will become excessively gnarled and knotty; but it will lack free development; it will become prematurely stunted, and will never attain such perfection that one can say of it, "there is in that oak something which creates astonishment."

I rejoiced at these words. 'I saw very beautiful oaks,' said I, 'when some years ago, I made short tours from Göttingen into the valley of the Weser. I found them particularly magnificent in the neighborhood of Hörter.'

'A sandy soil, or one mixed with sand,' continued Goethe, 'where the oak is able to spread its strong roots in every direction, appears to be most favorable; and then it needs a situation where it has the necessary space to feel the effects on all sides of light, sun, rain and wind. If it grows up snugly sheltered from wind and weather, it becomes nothing; but a century's struggle with the elements makes it strong and powerful, so that, at its full growth, its presence inspires us with astonishment and admiration.'

'Cannot one, from these remarks of yours,' returned I, 'draw a conclusion and say, "a creature is beautiful when it has attained the summit of its natural development?"'

5 'Certainly,' returned Goethe; 'but still one must first explain what one means by the summit of its natural development.'

10 'I would by that,' returned I, 'signify the period of growth in which the character peculiar to any creature appears perfectly impressed on it.'

'In that sense,' said Goethe, 'there would be nothing to object, especially if we add that, for such a perfect development of character, it is likewise requisite that the build of the different members of a creature should be conformable to its natural destination.'

20 'In that case, a marriageable girl, whose natural destiny is to bear and suckle children, will not be beautiful without the proper breadth of the pelvis and the necessary fullness of the breasts. Still, an excess in these respects would not be beautiful, for that would go beyond conformity to an end.'

30 'On this account, we might call some of the saddle horses which we met a little time ago beautiful, even according to the fitness of their build. It is not merely the elegance, lightness, and gracefulness of their movements, but something more, of which a good horseman and judge of horses alone can speak, and of which we others merely receive the general impression.'

40 'Might we not, on the other hand,' said I, 'call a cart-horse beautiful, like those strong specimens which we met a little time ago drawing the wagons of the Brabant carriers?'

'Certainly,' said Goethe; 'and why not? A painter would probably find a more varied display of all kinds of beauties in the strongly marked character and powerful development of bone, sinew, and muscle, in such an animal, than in the softer and more equal character of an elegant saddle-horse.'

50 'The main point is,' continued Goethe, 'that the race is pure, and that man has not applied his mutilating hand. A horse with his mane and tail cut, a hound with cropped ears, a tree from which the strongest branches have been lopped and the rest cut into a spherical form, and, above all, a young girl whose youthful form has been spoiled and deformed by corsets, are things from which good taste revolts, and which merely occupy a place in the Philistine's catechism of beauty.'

During this and similar conversations, we had returned. We walked about a little in the garden of the house before dinner. The weather was very beautiful; the spring sun had begun to grow powerful, and to bring out all sorts of leaves and blossoms on bushes and hedges. Goethe was full of thought and hopes of a delightful summer.

CHARACTERISTICS OF GENIUS

March 11, 1828

For several weeks I have not been quite well. I sleep badly, and have the most harassing dreams from night to morning, in which I see myself in the most various states, carry on all sorts of conversation with known and unknown persons, get into disputes and quarrels, and all this in such a vivid manner, that I am perfectly conscious of every particular next morning. But this dreamy life consumes the powers of my brain, so that I feel weak and unnerved in the daytime, and without thought or pleasure for any intellectual activity.

I had frequently complained of my condition to Goethe, and he had repeatedly urged me to consult my physician. 'Your malady,' said he, 'is certainly not very serious; it is probably nothing but a little stagnation, which a glass or two of mineral water or a little salts would remove. But do not let it linger any longer; attack it at once.'

Goethe may have been right, and I said to myself that he was right; but my indecision and disinclination operated in this case, so that I again allowed many restless nights and wretched days to pass, without making the least effort to remove the indisposition.

As I did not appear to Goethe very gay and cheerful today after dinner, he lost his patience, and could not refrain from smiling at me ironically, and bantering me a little.

'You are a second Shandy,' said he, 'the father of that renowned Tristram, who was annoyed half his life by a creaking door, and who could not come to the resolution of removing the daily annoyance with a few drops of oil.'

'But so it is with us all! The darkness and enlightenment of man make his destiny. The daemon ought to lead us every day in leading strings, and tell us and direct us what we ought to do on every occasion. But the good spirit leaves us in the lurch, and we grope about in the dark.

'Napoleon was the man! Always enlightened, always clear and decided, and endowed at every hour with sufficient energy to carry into effect whatever he considered advantageous and necessary. His life was the stride of a demi-god, from battle to battle, and from victory to victory. It might well be said of him that he was found in a state of continual enlightenment. On this account, his destiny was more brilliant than any the world had seen before him, or perhaps will ever see after him.

'Yes, yes, my good friend, that was a fellow whom we cannot imitate.'

Goethe paced up and down the room. I had placed myself at the table which had been already cleared, but upon which there was left some wine with some biscuits and fruit. Goethe filled for me, and compelled me to partake of both. 'You have indeed,' said he, 'not condescended to be our guest at dinner today, but still a glass of this present from good friends ought to do you good.'

I did not refuse these good things, and Goethe continued to walk up and down the room, murmuring to himself in an excited state of mind, and from time to time uttering unintelligible words.

What he had just said about Napoleon was in my mind, and I endeavored to lead the conversation back to that subject. 'Still it appears to me,' I began, 'that Napoleon was especially in that state of continued enlightenment when he was young, and his powers were yet on the increase,—when, indeed, we see at his side divine protection and a constant fortune. In later years, on the contrary, this enlightenment appears to have forsaken him, as well as his good fortune and his good star.'

'What would you have?' returned Goethe. 'I did not write my Love Songs or my Werther a second time. That divine enlightenment, whence everything proceeds, we shall always find in connection with youth and productiveness, as in the case of Napoleon, who was one of the most productive men that ever lived.'

'Yes, yes, my good friend, one need not write poems and plays to be productive; there is also a productiveness of deeds, which in many cases stands an important degree higher. The physician himself must be productive, if he really intends to heal; if he is not so, he will only succeed now and then, as if by chance; but, on the whole, he will be only a bungler.'

'You appear,' added I, 'in this case, to call productivity that which is usually called genius.'

'One lies very near the other,' returned Goethe. 'For what is genius but that productive power by which deeds arise that can display themselves before God and nature, and are therefore permanent, and produce results. All Mozart's works are of this kind; there lies in them a productive power which operates upon generation after generation, and still is not wasted or consumed.'

'It is the same with other great composers and artists. What an influence have Phidias and Raphael had upon succeeding centuries; and Dürer and Holbein also. He who first invented the forms and proportions of the old German architecture, so that in the course of time a Strasburg minster and a cathedral of Cologne were possible, was also a genius; for his thoughts have a power continually productive, and operate even to the present hour. Luther was a genius of a very important kind; he has already gone on with influence for many a long day, and we cannot count the days when he will cease to be productive in future ages. Lessing would not allow himself the lofty title of a genius, but his permanent influence bears witness against him.' On the other hand, we have in literature other names and those of importance, the possessors of which, whilst they lived, were deemed great geniuses, but whose influence ended with their life, and who were therefore less than they and others thought. For, as I said before, there is no genius without a productive power of permanent influence; and furthermore, genius does not depend upon the business, the art, or the trade which one follows, but may be alike in all. Whether one shows one's self a man of genius in science, like Oken and Humboldt, or in war and statesmanship, like Frederick, Peter the Great, and Napoleon, or whether one composes a song like Béranger, it all comes to the same thing; the only point is, whether the thought, the discovery, the deed is living and can live on.

'Then I must add, it is not the mass of creations and deeds which proceed from a person, that indicates the productive man. We have, in literature, poets who are considered very productive, because volume after volume of their poems has appeared. But, in my opinion, these people ought to be called thoroughly unproductive; for what they have written is without life and durability. Goldsmith, on the contrary, has written so few poems that their number is not worth mentioning; but, nevertheless, I must pronounce him to be a thoroughly productive poet, and, indeed, even on that account, because the little that he has written has an inherent life which can sustain itself.'

A pause ensued, during which Goethe continued to pace up and down the room. In the meantime I was desirous of hearing something more on this weighty point, and therefore endeavored to arouse Goethe once more.

'Does this productiveness of genius,' said I, 'lie merely in the mind of an important man, or does it also lie in the body?'

'The body has, at least,' said Goethe, 'the greatest influence upon it. There was indeed a time when, in Germany, a genius was always thought of as short, weak, or hunch-backed; but commend me to a genius who has a well-proportioned body.'

'When it was said of Napoleon that he was a man of granite, this applied particularly to his body. What was it then which he could not and did not venture? From the burning sands of the Syrian deserts, to the snowy plains of Moscow, what an incalculable amount of marches, battles, and nightly bivouacs did he go through? And what fatigues and bodily privations was he forced to endure? Little sleep, little nourishment, and yet always in the highest mental activity. After the awful exertion and excitement of the eighteenth Brumaire, it was midnight, and he had not tasted anything during the whole day, and yet, without thinking of strengthening his body, he felt power enough in the depth of the night to draw up the well-known proclamation to the French people. When one considers what he accomplished and endured, one might imagine that when he was in his fortieth year not a sound particle was left in him; but even at that age he still occupied the position of a perfect hero.'

'But you are right; the real focus of his luster belongs to his youth. And it is something to say that one of obscure origin, and at a time which set all capacities in motion, so distinguished himself as to become, in his seven-and-twentieth year, the idol of a nation of thirty millions! Yes, yes, my good friend, one must be young to do great things. And Napoleon is not the only one.'

'His brother Lucien,' remarked I, 'also did a great deal at an early age. We see him as president of the five hundred and afterwards as minister of the interior, when he had scarcely completed his five-and-twentieth year.'

'Why name Lucien?' interposed Goethe. 'History presents to us hundreds of clever people, who, whilst still young, have both in the cabinet and in the field superintended the most important matters with great renown.'

'If I were a prince,' he continued with animation, 'I would never place in the highest offices people who have gradually risen by mere birth and seniority, and who in their old age move on leisurely in their accustomed track, for in this way but little talent is brought to light. I would have young men; but they must have capacities, and be endowed with clearness and energy, and also with the best will and the noblest character. Then there would be pleasure in governing and improving one's people. But where is there a prince who would like this, and who would be so well served?'

'I have great hopes of the present Crown Prince of Prussia. From all that I hear and know of him, he is a very distinguished man; and this is essential to recognize and choose qualified and clever people. For, say what we will, like can only be recognized by like; and only a prince who himself possesses great abilities can properly acknowledge and value great abilities in his subjects and servants. "Let the path be open to talent," was the well-known maxim of Napoleon, who really had a particular tact in the choice of his people, who really knew how to place every important power where it appeared in its proper sphere, and who, therefore, during his lifetime, was served in all his great undertakings as scarcely anyone was served before him.'

Goethe delighted me particularly this evening. The noblest part of his nature appeared alive in him, while the sound of his voice and the fire of his eyes were of such power as if he were inspired by a fresh gleam of the best days of his youth.

It was remarkable to me that he, who at so great an age himself superintended an important post, should speak so decidedly in favor of youth, and should desire the first offices in the state to be filled, if not by youths, at least by men still young. I could not forbear mentioning some Germans of high standing, who at an advanced age did not appear to want the necessary energy and youthful activity for the direction of the most important and most various affairs.

'Such men are natural geniuses,' returned Goethe, 'whose case is peculiar; they experience a renewed puberty, whilst other people are young but once.'

'Every Entelechia is a piece of eternity, and the few years during which it is bound to the earthly body does not make it old. If this Entelechia is of a trivial kind, it will exercise but little sway during its bodily confinement; on the contrary, the body will predominate, and when this grows old the Entelechia will not hold and restrain it. But if the Entelechia is of a powerful kind, as is the case with all men of natural genius, then with its animating penetration of the body, it will not only act with strengthening and ennobling power upon the organization, but it will also endeavor with its spiritual superiority to confer the privilege of perpetual youth. Thence it comes that in men of superior endowments, even during their old age we constantly perceive fresh epochs of singular productiveness; they seem constantly to grow young again for a time and this is what I call a repeated puberty. Still youth is youth, and however powerful an Entelechia may prove, it will never become quite master of the corporeal, and it makes a wonderful difference whether it finds in the body an ally or an adversary.'

ENGLISH AND GERMAN EDUCATION

March 12, 1828

'There is something more or less wrong among us old Europeans; our relations are far too artificial and complicated, our nutriment and mode of life are without their proper nature, and our social intercourse is without proper love and good will. Everyone is polished and courteous; but no one has the courage to be hearty and true, so that an honest man, with natural views and feelings, stands in a very bad position. Often one cannot help wishing that one had been born upon one of the South Sea Islands, a so-called savage, so as to have thoroughly enjoyed human existence in all its purity, without any adulteration.

'If in a depressed mood one reflects deeply upon the wretchedness of our age, it often occurs to one that the world is gradually approaching the last day. And the evil accumulates from generation to generation! For it is not enough that we have to suffer for the sins of our fathers, but we hand down to posterity these inherited vices increased by our own.'

'Similar thoughts often occur to me,' answered I; 'but if at such a time, I see a regiment of German dragoons ride by me, and observe the beauty and power of these young people; I again derive some consolation, and say to myself, that the durability of mankind is after all not in such a desperate plight.'

'Our country people,' returned Goethe, 'have certainly kept up their strength and will, I hope, long be able not only to furnish us with good horsemen, but also to secure us from total decay and destruction. The rural population may be regarded as a magazine from which the forces of declining mankind are always recruited and refreshed. But just go into our great towns, and you will feel quite differently. Just take a turn by the side of a second diable boiteux, or a physician with a large practise, and he will whisper to you tales which will horrify you at the misery, and astonish you at the vice with which human nature is visited and from which society suffers.'

'But let us banish these hypochondriacal thoughts. How are you going on? What are you doing? What else have you seen today? Tell me, and inspire me with good thoughts.'

'I have been reading Sterne,' returned I, 'where Yorick is sauntering about the streets of Paris, and makes the remark that every tenth man is a dwarf. I thought of that when you mentioned the vices of great towns. I also remember to have seen, in Napoleon's time, among the French infantry, one battalion which consisted entirely of Parisians, who were all such puny, diminutive people, that one could not comprehend what could be done with them in battle.'

'The Scotch Highlanders under the Duke of Wellington,' returned Goethe, 'were doubtless heroes of another description.'

'I saw them in Brussels a year before the battle of Waterloo,' returned I. 'They were, indeed, fine men; all strong, fresh, and active, as if just from the hand of their Maker. They all carried their heads so freely and gallantly and stepped so lightly along with their strong, bare legs, that it seemed as if there were no original sin, and no ancestral failing so far as they were concerned.'

'There is something peculiar in this,' said Goethe. 'Whether it lies in the race, in the soil, in the free political constitution, or in the healthy tone of education,—certainly the English in general appear to have certain advantages over many others. Here in Weimar, we see only a few of them, and, probably, by no means the best; but what fine, handsome people they are. And however young they come here, they feel themselves by no means strange or embarrassed in this foreign atmosphere; on the contrary, their deportment in society is as full of confidence, and as easy as if they were lords everywhere, and the whole world belonged to them. This it is, which pleases our women, and by which they make such havoc in the hearts of our young ladies. As a German father of a family, who is concerned for the tranquillity of his household, I often feel a slight shudder, when my daughter-in-law announces to me the expected arrival of some fresh, young islander. I already see, in my mind's eye, the tears which will one day flow when he takes his departure. They are dangerous young people; but this very quality of being dangerous is their virtue.'

'Still, I would not assert,' answered I, 'that the young Englishmen in Weimar are more clever, more intelligent, better informed, or more excellent at heart than other people.'

'The secret does not lie in these things, my good friend,' returned Goethe. 'Neither does it lie in birth and riches; it lies in the courage which they have to be that for which nature has made them. There is nothing vitiated or spoiled about them, there is nothing halfway or crooked; but such as they are, they are thoroughly complete men. That they are also sometimes complete fools, I allow with all my heart;

but that is still something, and has still always some weight in the scale of nature.

'The happiness of personal freedom, the consciousness of an English name, and of the importance attached to it by other nations, is an advantage even to the children; for in their own family, as well as in scholastic establishments, they are treated with far more respect, and enjoy a far freer development, than is the case with us Germans.

'In our own dear Weimar, I need only look out of the window to discover how matters stand with us. Lately, when the snow was lying upon the ground, and my neighbor's children were trying their little sledges in the street, the policeman was immediately at hand, and I saw the poor little things fly as quickly as they could. Now, when the spring sun tempts them from the houses, and they would like to play with their companions before the door, I see them always constrained, as if they were not safe, and feared the approach of some despot of the police. Not a boy may crack a whip, or sing or shout; the policeman is immediately at hand to forbid it. This has the effect with us all of taming youth prematurely, and of driving out all originality and all wildness, so that in the end nothing remains but the Philistine.

'You know that scarcely a day passes in which I am not visited by some traveling foreigner. But if I were to say that I took great pleasure in the personal appearance, especially of young, learned Germans from a certain northeastern quarter, I should tell a falsehood.

'Short-sighted, pale, narrow-chested, young without youth; that is a picture of most of them as they appear to me. And if I enter into a conversation with any of them, I immediately observe that the things in which one of us takes pleasure seem to them vain and trivial, that they are entirely absorbed in the idea, and that only the highest problems of speculation are fitted to interest them. Of sound senses or delight in the sensual, there is no trace; all youthful feeling and all youthful pleasures are driven out of them, and that irrecoverably; for if a man is not young in his twentieth year, how can he be so in his fortieth?

Goethe sighed and was silent.

I thought of the happy time of last century, in which Goethe's youth fell; the summer air of Sesenheim passed before my soul, and I reminded him of the verses—

In the afternoon we sat,
Young people, in the cool.

'Ah,' sighed Goethe, 'those were, indeed, happy times. But we will drive them from our minds, that the dark, foggy days of the present may not become quite insupportable.'

'A second Redeemer,' said I, 'would be required to remove from us the seriousness, the discomfort, and the monstrous oppressiveness of the present state of things.'

'If he came,' answered Goethe, 'he would be crucified a second time. Still, we by no means need anything so great. If we could only alter the Germans after the model of the English, if we could only have less philosophy and more power of action, less theory and more practise, we might obtain a good share of redemption, without waiting for the personal majesty of a second Christ. Much may be done from below by the people by means of schools and domestic education; much from above by the rulers and those in immediate connection with them.

'Thus, for instance, I cannot approve the requisition, in the studies of future statesmen, of so much theoretically-learned knowledge, by which young people are ruined before their time, both in mind and body. When they enter into practical service, they possess, indeed, an immense stock of philosophical and learned matters; but in the narrow circle of their calling, this cannot be practically applied, and must therefore be forgotten as useless. On the other hand, what they most needed they have lost; they are deficient in the necessary mental and bodily energy, which is quite indispensable when one would enter properly into practical life.

'And then, are not love and benevolence also needed in the life of a statesman,—in the management of men? And how can anyone feel and exercise benevolence toward another, when he is ill at ease with himself?

'But all these people are in a dreadfully bad case. The third part of learned men and statesmen, shackled to the desk, are ruined in body, and consigned to the demon of hypochondria. Here there should be action from above, that future generations may at least be preserved from a like destruction.

In the meantime,' continued Goethe, smiling, 'let us remain in a state of hopeful expectation as to the condition of us Germans a century hence, and whether we shall then have advanced so far as to be no longer savants and philosophers, but men.'

NATIONALISM AND POETRY

March 14, 1830

Answering a common reproach that during the struggle with France he had written no German war-songs, Goethe said:

'I have never affected anything in my poetry. I have never uttered anything which I have not experienced, and which has not urged me to production. I have composed love-songs only when I have loved. How could I write songs of hatred without hating! And, between ourselves, I did not hate the French, although I thanked God that we were free from them. How could I, to whom culture and barbarism are alone of importance, hate a nation which is among the most cultivated of the earth, and to which I owe so great a part of my own cultivation?'

'Altogether,' continued Goethe, 'national hatred is something peculiar. You will always find it strongest and most violent where there is the lowest degree of culture. But there is a degree where it vanishes altogether, and where one stands to a certain extent above nations, and feels the weal or woe of a neighboring people as if it had happened to one's own. This degree of culture was conformable to my nature, and I had become strengthened in it long before I had reached my sixtieth year.'

RELIGIOUS IDEAS

March 11, 1832

This evening for an hour with Goethe, talking of various interesting subjects. I had bought an English Bible, in which I found, to my great regret, that the apocryphal books were not contained. They had been rejected, because they were not considered genuine and of divine origin. I greatly missed the noble Tobias, that model of a pious life, the Wisdom of Solomon, and Jesus Sirach,—all writings of such high mental and moral elevation, that few others equal them. I spoke to Goethe of my regret at the very narrow view by which some of the writings of the Old Testament are looked upon as immediately proceeding from God; while others, equally excellent, are not so. As if there could be anything noble and great which did not proceed from God, and which was not a fruit of His influence.

'I am thoroughly of your opinion,' returned Goethe. 'Still there are two points of view from which biblical subjects may be contemplated. There is the point of view of a sort of primitive religion, of pure nature and reason, which is of divine origin. This will always be the same, and will last and prevail as long as divinely endowed beings exist. It is, however, only for the elect, and is far too high and noble to become universal. Then there is the point of view of the Church, which is of a more human nature. This is defective and subject to change; but it will last, in a state of perpetual change, as long as there are weak human beings. The light of unclouded divine revelation is far too pure and brilliant to be suitable and supportable to poor, weak man. But the Church steps in as a useful mediator, to soften and to moderate, by which all are helped, and many are benefited. Through the belief that the Christian Church, as the successor of Christ, can remove the burden of human sin, it is a very great power. To maintain themselves in this power and in this importance, and thus to secure the ecclesiastical edifice, is the chief aim of the Christian priesthood.'

'This priesthood, therefore, does not so much as ask whether this or that book in the Bible greatly enlightens the mind, and contains doctrines of high morality and noble human nature. It rather looks upon the books of Moses with reference to the fall of man and the origin of a necessity for a Redeemer; it searches the prophets for repeated allusion to Him, the Expected One, and regards, in the Gospels, His actual earthly appearance, and His death upon the cross, as the atonement for our human sins. You see, therefore, that for such purposes, and weighed in such a balance, neither the noble Tobias, nor the Wisdom of Solomon, nor the sayings of Sirach, can have much weight. Still, with reference to things in the Bible, the question whether they are genuine or spurious is odd enough. What is genuine but that which is truly excellent, which stands in harmony with the purest nature and reason, and which even now ministers to our highest development! What is spurious but the absurd and the hollow, which brings no fruit—at least no good fruit! If the authenticity of a biblical book is to be decided by the question,—whether something true throughout has been handed down to us, we might on some points doubt the authenticity of the Gospels, since those of Mark and Luke were not written from immediate presence and experience, but according to oral tradition, long afterwards; and the last, by the disciple John, was not written till he was of a very advanced age. Nevertheless, I look upon all four Gospels as thoroughly genuine; for there is in them the reflection of a greatness which emanated from the person of Jesus, and which was of as divine a kind as ever was seen upon earth. If I am asked whether it is in my nature to pay Him devout reverence, I say—certainly! I bow before Him as the divine manifestation of the highest principle of morality. If I am asked whether it is in my nature to revere the Sun, I again say—certainly! For he is likewise a manifestation of the highest Being, and indeed the most powerful which we children of earth are allowed to behold. I adore in him the light and the productive power of God; by which we all live, move, and have our being—we, and all the plants and animals with us. But if I am asked—whether I am inclined to bow before a thumb-bone of the apostle Peter or Paul, I say—"Spare me, and stand off with your absurdities!"

"Quench not the spirit," says the apostle. There are many absurdities in the propositions of the Church; nevertheless, rule it will, and so it must have a narrow-minded multitude which bows its head and likes to be ruled. The high and richly-endowed clergy dread nothing more than the enlightenment of the lower orders. They withheld the Bible from them as long as it was possible. Besides, what can a poor member of the Christian Church think of the princely magnificence of a richly-endowed bishop, when he sees in the Gospels the poverty and indigence of Christ, who, with his disciples, traveled humbly on foot, whilst the princely bishop rattles along in his carriage drawn by six horses!

"We scarcely know," continued Goethe, "what we owe to Luther, and the Reformation in general. We are freed from the fetters of spiritual narrow-mindedness; we have, in consequence of our increasing culture, become capable of turning back to the fountain head, and of comprehending Christianity in its purity. We have, again, the courage to stand with firm feet upon God's earth, and to feel ourselves in our divinely-endowed human nature. Let mental culture go on advancing, let the natural sciences go on gaining in depth and breadth, and the human mind expand as it may, it will never go beyond the elevation and moral culture of Christianity as it glitens and shines forth in the gospel!"

"But the better we Protestants advance in our noble development, so much the more rapidly will the Catholics follow us. As soon as they feel themselves caught up by the ever-extending enlightenment of the time, they must go on, do what they will, till at last the point is reached where all is but one."

"The mischievous sectarianism of the Protestants will also cease, and with it the hatred and hostile feeling between father and son, sister and brother; for as soon as the pure doctrine and love of Christ are comprehended in their true nature, and have become a vital principle, we shall feel ourselves as human beings, great and free, and not attach especial importance to a degree more or less in the outward forms of religion. Besides, we shall all gradually advance from a Christianity of words and faith to a Christianity of feeling and action."

The conversation turned upon the great men who had lived before Christ, among the Chinese, the Indians, the Persians, and the Greeks; and it was remarked that the divine power had been as operative in them as in some of the great Jews of the Old Testament. We then came to the question how far God influenced the great natures of the present world in which we live?

"To hear people speak," said Goethe, "one would almost believe that they were of the opinion that God had withdrawn into silence since those old times, and that man was now placed quite upon his own feet, and had to see how he could get on without God, and his daily invisible breath. In religious and moral matters a divine influence is still allowed, but in matters of science and art it is believed that they are merely earthly, and nothing but the product of human powers.

'Let anyone only try, with human will and human power, to produce something which may be compared with the creations that bear the names of Mozart, Raphael, or Shakespeare. I know very well that these three noble beings are not the only ones, and that in every province of art innumerable excellent geniuses have operated, who have produced things as perfectly good as those just mentioned. But if they were as great as those, they rose above ordinary human nature, and in the same proportion were as divinely endowed as they. 15

'And after all what does it all come to? God did not retire to rest after the well-known six days of creation, but, on the contrary, is constantly active as on the first. It would have been for Him a poor occupation to compose this heavy world out of simple elements, and to keep it rolling in the sunbeams from year to year, if He had not had the plan of founding a nursery for a world of spirits upon this material basis. So He is now constantly active in higher natures to attract the lower ones.'

Goethe was silent. But I cherished his great and good words in my heart.

MADAME DE STAËL (1766-1817)

Anne Louise Germaine Necker, the daughter of the most famous of pre-revolutionary finance ministers of France, succeeded by right of intelligence as well as birth and wealth to an important social and literary position in the troublous times following the French Revolution. She attracted attention by her determined opposition to Napoleon, and Napoleon in 1810 retaliated by confiscating the first edition of her most important work, On Germany, which was, however, published three years later in England. It was noteworthy, first of all, for its cosmopolitan spirit, which was confounded by some contemporary critics with a lack of patriotism; its importance as a contribution to the French romantic movement through the contact it established with German romanticism has long been acknowledged. Its interest for us today lies in its lively and sympathetic account of a Germany which has passed away. The following passages are from the English translation published in London the year after the French edition appeared there, with some revision by a later editor, O. W. Wight.

GERMANY AT THE OPENING OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

The number and extent of forests indicate a civilization yet recent: the ancient soil of the South is almost cleared of its trees, and the sun darts its perpendicular rays on the earth which has been laid bare by man. Germany still affords some traces of uninhabited nature. From the Alps to the sea, 10 between the Rhine and the Danube, you behold a land covered with oaks and firs, intersected by rivers of an imposing beauty, and by mountains of a most picturesque aspect; but vast heaths and sands, roads 15 often neglected, a severe climate, at first fill the mind with gloom; nor is it till after some time that it discovers what may attach us to such a country.

The South of Germany is highly cultivated; yet in the most delightful districts of this country there is always something of seriousness, which calls the imagination rather to thoughts of labor than of pleasure, rather to the virtues of the inhabitants than to the charms of nature.

The ruins of castles which are seen on the heights of the mountains, houses built of mud, narrow windows, the snows which during winter cover the plains as far as the eye can reach, make a painful impression on the mind. An indescribable silence, in nature and in the people, at first oppresses the heart. It seems as if time moved more slowly there than elsewhere, as if vegetation made not a more rapid progress in the earth than ideas in the heads of men, and as if the regular furrows of the laborer 5 were there traced upon a dull soil.

Nevertheless, when we have overcome these first unreflecting sensations, the country and its inhabitants offer to the observation something at once interesting and 10 poetical; we feel that gentle souls and tender imaginations have embellished these fields. The high roads are planted with fruit-trees for the refreshment of the traveler. The landscapes which surround the Rhine are everywhere magnificent; this river may be called the tutelary genius of Germany; his waves are pure, rapid and majestic, like the life of a hero of antiquity. The Danube is divided into many branches; 20 the streams of the Elbe and Spree are disturbed too easily by the tempest; the Rhine alone is unchangeable. The countries through which it flows appear at once of a character so grave and so diversified, so 25 fruitful and so solitary, that one would be tempted to believe that they owe their cultivation to the genius of the river, and that man is as nothing to them. Its tide, as it flows along, relates the high deeds of the days of old, and the shade of Arminius seems still to wander on its precipitous banks.

The monuments of Gothic antiquity only are remarkable in Germany; these monuments recall the ages of chivalry; in almost every town a public museum preserves the relics of those days. One would say that the inhabitants of the North, conquerors of the world, when they quitted Germany, left behind memorials of themselves under different forms, and that the whole land resembles the residence of some great people long since left vacant by its possessors. In most of the arsenals of German towns, we meet with figures of knights in painted wood, clad in their armor; the helmet, the buckler, the cuisses, the spurs,—all is according to ancient custom; and we walk among these standing dead, whose uplifted arms seem ready to strike their adversaries, who also hold their lances in rest. This motionless image of actions, formerly so lively, causes a painful impression. It is thus that, long after earthquakes, the bodies of men have been discovered still fixed in the same attitudes, in the action of the same thoughts that occupied them at the instant when they were swallowed up.

Modern architecture in Germany offers nothing to our contemplation worthy of being recorded; but the towns are in general well built, and are embellished by the proprietors with a sort of good-natured care. In many towns, the houses are painted on the outside with various colors; one sees upon them the figures of saints, and ornaments of every description, which, though assuredly not the most correct in taste, yet cause a cheerful variety, and seem to indicate a benevolent desire to please both their fellow countrymen and strangers. The dazzling splendor of a palace gratifies the self-love of its possessors; but the well-designed and carefully-finished decorations, which set off these little dwellings, have something in them kind and hospitable.

The gardens are almost as beautiful in some parts of Germany as in England: the luxury of gardens always implies a love of the country. In England, simple mansions are often built in the middle of the most magnificent parks; the proprietor neglects his dwelling to attend to the ornaments of nature. This magnificence and simplicity united do not, it is true, exist in the same degree in Germany; yet, in spite of the want of wealth and the pride of feudal dignity, there is everywhere to be remarked a certain love of the beautiful, which, sooner or later, must be followed by taste and elegance, of which it is the only real source. Often, in the midst of the superb gardens of the German princes, are placed Æolian harps close by grottoes encircled with flowers, that the wind may waft the sound and the perfume together. The imagination of the northern people thus endeavors to create for itself a sort of Italy; and, during the brilliant days of a short-lived summer, it sometimes attains the deception it seeks.

Only a few general features are applicable to the whole German nation; for the diversities of this country are such, that it is difficult to bring together under one point of view religions, governments, climates, and even peoples so different. Southern Germany is, in very many respects, quite distinct from Northern; the commercial cities are altogether unlike those which are the seats of universities; the small States differ sensibly from the two great monarchies of Prussia and Austria. Germany was formerly an aristocratic confederation, an empire without one common center of intelligence and of public spirit; it did not form a compact nation, and the bond of union was wanting to its separate members. This division of Germany, fatal to her political force, was nevertheless very favorable to all the efforts of genius and imagination. In matters of literary and metaphysical opinion, there was a sort of gentle and peaceful anarchy, which allowed to every man the complete development of his own individual manner of perception.

As there is no capital city in which all the good company of Germany finds itself united, the spirit of society exerts but little power; and the empire of taste and the arms of ridicule are equally without influence. Most writers and reasoners sit down to work in solitude, or surrounded only by a little circle over which they reign. They abandon themselves, each separately, to all the impulses of an unrestrained imagination; and if any traces are to be found throughout Germany of the ascendancy of fashion, it is in the desire evinced by every man to show himself in all respects different from the rest. In France, on the contrary, every man aspires to deserve what Montesquieu said of Voltaire: Il a plus que personne l'esprit que tout le monde a. [He has more than anyone the wit that everyone has.] The German writers would yet more willingly imitate foreigners than their own countrymen.

In literature, as in politics, the Germans have too much respect for foreigners, and not enough of national prejudices. In individuals it is a virtue, this denial of self, and this esteem of others; but the patriotism of nations ought to be selfish. The pride of the English serves powerfully their political existence; the good opinion which the French entertain of themselves has always contributed greatly to their ascendancy over Europe; the noble pride of the Spaniards formerly rendered them sovereigns of one entire portion of the world. The Germans are Saxons, Prussians, Bavarians, Austrians; but the Germanic character, on which the strength of all should be founded, is like the land itself, parceled out among so many different masters.

I shall separately examine Northern and Southern Germany; but will for the present confine myself to those reflections which equally suit the whole nation. The Germans are, generally speaking, both sincere and faithful; they seldom forfeit their word, and deceit is foreign to them. If this fault should ever introduce itself into Germany, it could only be through the ambition of imitating foreigners, of evincing an equal dexterity, and, above all, of not being duped by them; but good sense and goodness of heart would soon bring the Germans back to perceive that their strength consists in their own nature, and that the habit of rectitude renders us incapable, even where we are willing, of employing artifice. In order to reap the fruits of immorality, it is necessary to be entirely light-armed, and not to carry about you a conscience and scruples which arrest you midway, and make you feel, so much the more poignantly, the regret of having left the old road, as it is impossible for you to advance boldly in the new.

It is, I believe, easy to show that, without morality, all is danger and darkness. Nevertheless, there has often been observed among the Latin nations a singularly dexterous policy in the art of emancipating themselves from every duty; but, it may be said, to the glory of the German nation, that she is almost incapable of that practised suppleness which makes all truths bend to all interests, and sacrifices every engagement to every calculation. Her defects, as well as her good qualities, subject her to the honorable necessity of justice.

The power of labor and reflection is also one of the distinctive traits of the people of Germany. They are naturally a literary and philosophical people; yet the separation into classes, which is more distinct in Germany than anywhere else, because society does not soften its gradations, is in some respects injurious to the understanding properly so called. The nobles have too few ideas, the men of letters too little practise in business. Understanding is a combination of the knowledge of men and things; and society, in which men act without object, and yet with interest, is precisely that which best develops the most opposite faculties. It is imagination more than understanding that characterizes the Germans. Jean Paul Richter, one of their most distinguished writers, has said that the empire of the seas belonged to the English, that of the land to the French, and that of the air to the Germans; in fact, we discover in Germany the necessity of a center and bounds to this eminent faculty of thought, which rises and loses itself in vacuum, which penetrates and vanishes in obscurity, which perishes by its impartiality, confounds itself by the force of analysis, and stands in need of certain faults to circumscribe its virtues.

In leaving France, it is difficult to grow accustomed to the slowness and inertness of the German people; they never hasten to any object; they find obstacles to all; you hear 'it is impossible' repeated a hundred times in Germany for once in France. When action is necessary, the Germans know not how to struggle with difficulties, and their respect for power is more owing to the resemblance between power and destiny than to any interested motive. The lower classes are sufficiently coarse in their forms of proceeding, above all, when any shock is intended to their favorite habits; they would naturally feel much more than the nobles that holy antipathy for foreign manners and languages, which in all countries seems to strengthen the national bond of union. The offer of money does not alter their plan of conduct; fear does not turn them aside from it; they are, in short, very capable of that fixedness in all things, which is an excellent pledge for morality; for he who is continually actuated by fear, and still more by hope, passes easily from one opinion to another, whenever his interest requires it.

As we rise a little above the lower class, we easily perceive that internal vivacity, that poetry of the soul, which characterizes the Germans. The inhabitants of town and country, the soldiers and laborers, are all acquainted with music. It has happened to me to enter small cottages, blackened by the smoke of tobacco, and immediately to hear not only the mistress but the master of the house improvising on the harpsichord, as the Italians improvise in verse. Almost everywhere, on market-days, they have players on wind-instruments placed in the balcony of the town-house, which overlooks the public square; the peasants of the neighborhood are thus made partakers in the soft enjoyment of that first of arts. The scholars walk through the streets, on Sunday, singing psalms in chorus. They say that Luther often took a part in these choruses in early life. I was at Eisenach, a little town in Saxony, one winter day, when it was so cold that the very streets were blocked up with snow. I saw a long procession of young people in black cloaks, walking through the town, and celebrating the praises of God. They were the only persons out of doors, for the severity of the frost had driven all the rest of the world to their firesides; and these voices, almost equally harmonious with those of the South, heard amid all this rigor of the season, excited so much the livelier emotion. The inhabitants of the town dared not, in the intense cold, to open their windows; but we could perceive behind the glasses countenances, sad or serene, young or old, all receiving with joy the religious consolations which this sweet melody inspired.

The poor Bohemians, as they wander, followed by their wives and children, carry on their backs a bad harp, made of common wood, from which they draw harmonious music. They play upon it while they rest at the foot of a tree on the high road or near the post-houses, trying to awaken the attention of travelers to the ambulatory concert of their little wandering family. In Austria the flocks are kept by shepherds, who play charming airs on instruments at once simple and sonorous. These airs agree perfectly well with the soft and pensive impression produced by the aspect of the country.

Instrumental music is as generally cultivated throughout Germany as vocal music in Italy. Nature has done more in this respect, as in so many others, for Italy, than for Germany; for instrumental music labor is necessary, while a southern sky is enough to create a beautiful voice: nevertheless, the men of the working classes would never be able to afford to music the time which is necessary for learning it, if they were not endowed with an organization peculiarly adapted to the acquirement. Those people, who are musicians by nature, receive through the medium of harmony, sensations and ideas which their confined situations and vulgar occupations could never procure for them from any other source.

The female peasants and servants, who have not money enough to spend in dress, ornament their heads and arms with a few flowers, that imagination may at least have some part in their attire; those who are a little more rich, wear on holidays a cap of gold stuff, in sufficiently bad taste, which affords a strange contrast to the simplicity of the rest of their costume; but this cap, which their mothers also wore before them, recalls ancient manners; and the dress of ceremony, with which the lower classes of women pay respect to the Sunday, has something solemn in it which interests one in their favor.

We must also like the Germans for the good will manifested in their respectful deference and formal politeness, which foreigners have so often turned into ridicule. They might easily have substituted a cold and indifferent deportment for that grace and elegance which they are accused of being unable to reach; disdain always silences ridicule, for it is principally upon useless efforts that ridicule attaches itself; but benevolent characters choose rather to expose themselves to pleasantry than to preserve themselves from it by that haughty and restrained air, which it is so easy for any person to assume.

In Germany, we are continually struck by the contrast which exists between sentiments and habits, talents and tastes: civilization and nature seem to be not yet sufficiently amalgamated together. Sometimes the most ingenuous of men are very affected in their expressions and countenance, as if they had something to conceal; sometimes, on the other hand, gentleness of soul does not prevent rudeness in manners; frequently even this contradiction goes still further, and weakness of character shows itself through the veil of harshness in language and demeanor. Enthusiasm for the arts and poetry is joined to habits even low and vulgar in social life. There is no country where men of letters and young men studying at the universities are better acquainted with the ancient languages and with antiquity; yet there is none in which superannuated customs more generally exist even at the present day. The recollections of Greece, the taste for the fine arts, seem to have reached them through the medium of correspondence; but feudal institutions and the ancient customs of the German nation are always held in honor among them, even though, unhappily for the military power of the country, they no longer possess the same strength.

There is no assemblage more whimsical than that displayed in the military aspect of Germany: soldiers at every step, and all leading a sort of domestic life. They are as much afraid of fatigue and of the inclemency of the air, as if the whole nation were composed of merchants and men of letters; and yet all their institutions tend, and must necessarily tend, to inspire the people with military habits. When the inhabitants of the North brave the inconveniences of their climate, they harden themselves in a wonderful manner against all sorts of evil; the Russian soldier is a proof of this. But where the climate is only half rigorous, where it is still possible to guard against the severity of the heavens by domestic precautions, these very precautions render them more alive to the physical sufferings of war.

Stoves, beer, and the smoke of tobacco surround all the common people of Germany with a thick and hot atmosphere, from which they are never inclined to escape. This atmosphere is injurious to activity, which is of no less importance in war than courage itself; resolutions are slow, discouragement is easy, because an existence, void of pleasure in general, inspires no great confidence in the gifts of fortune. The habit of a peaceable and regular mode of life is so bad a preparation for the multiplied chances of hazard, that even death, coming in a regular way, appears preferable to a life of adventure.

The demarcation of classes, much more positive in Germany than it used to be in France, naturally produced the annihilation of military spirit among the lower orders; this demarcation has in fact nothing offensive in it; for I repeat, a sort of natural goodness mixes itself with everything in Germany, even with aristocratic pride; and the differences of rank are reduced to some court privileges, to some assemblies which do not afford sufficient pleasure to deserve envy; nothing is bitter, under whatever aspect contemplated, when society, and ridicule, which is the offspring of society, is without influence. Men cannot really wound their very souls, except by falsehood or mockery; in a country of seriousness and truth, justice and happiness will always be met with. But the barrier which separated, in Germany, the nobles from the citizens, necessarily rendered the whole nation less warlike.

Imagination, which is the ruling quality of the world of arts and letters in Germany, inspires the fear of danger, if this natural emotion is not combated by the ascendancy of opinion and the exaltation of honor. In France, even in its ancient state, the taste for war was universal; and the common people willingly risked life, as a means of agitating it and diminishing the sense of its weight. It is a question of importance to know whether the domestic affections, the habit of reflection, the very gentleness of soul, do not conduce to the fear of death; but if the whole strength of a state consists in its military spirit, it is of consequence to examine what are the causes that have weakened this spirit in the German nation.

Three leading motives usually incite men to fight,—the patriotic love of liberty, the enthusiasm of glory, and religious fanaticism. There can be no great patriotism in an empire divided for so many ages, where Germans fought against Germans, almost always instigated by some foreign impulse; the love of glory is scarcely awake where there is no center, no society. That species of impartiality, the very excess of justice, which characterizes the Germans, renders them much more susceptible of being inflamed with abstract sentiments than of the real interests of life; the general who loses a battle is more sure of indulgence than he who gains one is of applause; there is not enough difference between success and reverse, in the opinions of such a people, to excite any very lively ambition.

Religion, in Germany, exists at the very bottom of the heart; but it possesses there a character of meditation and independence, which breathes nothing of the energy necessary to exclusive sentiments. The same independence of opinions, individuals, and States, so prejudicial to the strength of the Germanic empire, is to be found also in their religion: a great number of different sects divide Germany between them; and the Catholic religion itself, which, in its very nature, exercises a uniform and strict discipline, is nevertheless interpreted by every man after his own fashion. The political and social bond of the people, a general government, a general worship, the same laws, the same interests, a classical literature, a ruling opinion, nothing of all this exists among the Germans; each individual State is the more independent, each individual science the better cultivated; but the whole nation is so subdivided that one cannot tell to what part of the empire this very name of nation ought to be granted.

The love of liberty is not developed among the Germans; they have not learned, either by enjoyment or by privation, the value which may be attached to it. There are many examples of federative governments, which give to the public spirit as much force as even a united administration, but these are the associations of equal States and free citizens. The German confederacy was composed of strong and weak, citizen and serf, of rivals, and even of enemies; they were old existing elements, combined by circumstances and respected by men.

The nation is persevering and just; and its equity and loyalty secure it against injury from any institution, however vicious. Louis of Bavaria, when he took the command of the army, entrusted to Frederic the Fair, his rival and at that time his prisoner, the administration of his States; and he had not to repent of this confidence, which in those days caused no astonishment. With such virtues, they never found the ill consequences of the weakness, or even the complication of the laws; the probity of individuals supplied their defects.

The very independence which the Germans enjoyed in almost all respects rendered them indifferent to liberty; independence is a possession, liberty its security; and on this very account nobody in Germany was molested either in his rights or his enjoyments: they could not feel the want of such an order of things as might secure them in the possession of this happiness. The imperial tribunals promised a sure though slow redress of every act of arbitrary power; the moderation of the sovereigns and the wisdom of the governed seldom gave room for any appeals to their interference: people, therefore, could not imagine that they stood in need of constitutional fortifications, when they saw no aggressors.

One has reason to be astonished that the feudal code should have subsisted almost unaltered among a people so enlightened; but as, in the execution of these laws, so defective in themselves, there was never any injustice, the equality with which they were applied made amends for their inequality in principle. Old charters, the ancient privileges of every city—all that family history, which constitutes the charm and glory of little States, were singularly dear to the Germans; but they neglected that great national might, which it was so important to have founded among the colossal states of Europe.

The Germans, with some few exceptions, are hardly capable of succeeding in anything which requires address and dexterity; everything molests and embarrasses them, and they have as much need of method in action as of independence in ideas. The French, on the contrary, consider actions with all the freedom of art, and ideas with all the bondage of custom. The Germans, who cannot endure the yoke of rules in literature, require everything to be traced out before them in the line of their conduct. They know not how to treat with men; and the less occasion is given them in this respect to decide for themselves, the better they are satisfied.

Political institutions can alone form the character of a nation; the nature of the government of Germany was almost in opposition to the philosophical illumination of the Germans. From thence it follows, that they join the greatest boldness of thought to the most obedient character. The pre-eminence of the military States, and the distinctions of rank, have accustomed them to the most exact submission in the relations of social life. Obedience, with them, is regularity, not servility; they are as scrupulous in the execution of the orders they receive, as if every order became a duty.

The enlightened men of Germany dispute vehemently among themselves the dominion of speculations, and will suffer no shackles in this department; but they give up, without difficulty, all that is real in life to the powerful of the earth. This reality, which they so much despise, finds purchasers, however, who in the end avail themselves of their acquisition to carry trouble and constraint into the empire of the imagination itself.' The understanding and the character of the Germans appear to have no communication together: the one cannot suffer any limits, the other is subject to every yoke; the one is very enterprising, the other very timid; in short, the illumination of the one seldom gives strength to the other, and this is easily explained. The extension of knowledge in modern times only serves to weaken the character, when it is not strengthened by the habit of business and the exercise of the will. To see all and comprehend all is a great cause of uncertainty; and the energy of action develops itself only in those free and powerful countries where patriotic sentiments are to the soul like blood to the veins, and grow cold only with the extinction of life itself.

GERMAN WOMEN

Nature and society give to women a habit of endurance; and I think it can hardly be denied that, in our days, they are generally worthier of moral esteem than the men. At an epoch when selfishness is the prevailing evil, the men, to whom all positive interests are related, must necessarily have less generosity, less sensibility, than the women. These last are attached to life only by the ties of the heart; and even when they lose themselves, it is by sentiment that they are led away: their selfishness is extended to a double object, while that of man has himself only for its end. Homage is rendered to them according to the affections which they inspire; but those which they bestow are almost always sacrifices. The most beautiful of virtues, self-devotion, is their enjoyment and their destiny; no happiness can exist for them but by the reflection of another's glory and prosperity; in short, to live independently of self, whether by ideas or by sentiments, or, above all, by virtues, gives to the soul a habitual feeling of elevation.

In those countries where men are called upon by political institutions to the exercise of all the military and civil virtues which are inspired by patriotism, they recover the superiority which belongs to them; they reassume with dignity their rights, as masters of the world; but when they are condemned, in whatever measure, to idleness or to slavery, they fall so much the lower as they ought to rise more high. The destiny of women always remains the same; it is their soul alone which creates it; political circumstances have no influence upon it. When men are ignorant or unable to employ their lives worthily and nobly, Nature revenges herself upon them for the very gifts which they have received from her; the activity of the body contributes only to the sloth of the mind; the strength of soul degenerates into coarseness; the day is consumed in vulgar sports and exercises, horses, the chase, or entertainments which might be suitable enough in the way of relaxation, but brutalize the occupations. Women, the while, cultivate their understanding; and sentiment and reflection preserve in their souls the image of all that is noble and beautiful.

The German women have a charm exclusively their own—a touching voice, fair hair, a dazzling complexion; they are modest, but less timid than Englishwomen; one sees that they have been less accustomed to meet with their superiors among men, and that they have besides less to apprehend from the severe censures of the public. They endeavor to please by their sensibility, to interest by their imagination; the language of poetry and the fine arts are familiar to them; they coquet with enthusiasm, as they do in France with wit and pleasantry. That perfect loyalty, which distinguishes the German character, renders love less dangerous for the happiness of women; and, perhaps, they admit the advances of this sentiment with the more confidence, because it is invested with romantic colors, and disdain and infidelity are less to be dreaded there than elsewhere.

Love is a religion in Germany, but a poetical religion, which tolerates too easily all that sensibility can excuse. It cannot be denied, that the facility of divorce in the Protestant States is prejudicial to the sacredness of marriage. They change husbands with as little difficulty as if they were arranging the incidents of a drama; the good-nature common both to men and women is the reason that so little bitterness of spirit ever accompanies these easy ruptures; and, as the Germans are endowed with more imagination than real passion, the most extravagant events take place with singular tranquillity; nevertheless, it is thus that manners and character lose everything like consistency; the spirit of paradox shakes the most sacred institutions, and there are no fixed rules upon any subject.

One may fairly laugh at the ridiculous airs of some German women, who are continually exalting themselves even to a pitch of affectation, and who sacrifice to their pretty softnesses of expression, all that is marked and striking in mind and character; they are not open, even though they are not false; they only see and judge of nothing correctly, and real events pass like a phantasmagoria before their eyes. Even when they take it into their heads to be light and capricious, they still retain a tincture of that sentimentality which is held in so high honor in their country. A German woman said one day, with a melancholy expression, 'I know not wherefore, but those who are absent pass away from my soul.' A French woman would have rendered this idea with more gaiety, but it would have been fundamentally the same.

Notwithstanding these affectations, which form only the exception, there are among the women of Germany numbers whose sentiments are true and manners simple. Their careful education and the purity of soul which is natural to them render the dominion which they exercise gentle and abiding; they inspire you from day to day with a stronger interest for all that is great and generous, with more of confidence in all noble hopes, and they know how to repel that desolating irony which breathes a death-chill over all the enjoyments of the heart. Nevertheless, we seldom find among them that quickness of apprehension, which animates conversation, and sets every idea in motion; this sort of pleasure is scarcely to be met with anywhere out of the most lively and the most witty societies of Paris. The chosen company of a French metropolis can alone confer this rare delight; elsewhere, we generally find only eloquence in public, or tranquil pleasure in familiar life. Conversation, as a talent, exists in France alone; in all other countries it answers the purposes of politeness, of argument, or of friendly intercourse. In France, it is an art to which the imagination and the soul are no doubt very necessary, but which possesses, besides these, certain secrets, whereby the absence of both may be supplied.

CHATEAUBRIAND (1768-1848)

François René Auguste de Chateaubriand is often regarded by literary critics as the father of the romantic revival in France, for while the political influence of Rousseau reverberated through the commotions preceding and resulting from the French Revolution, in French fiction and poetry the effects were less immediate and less impressive than in English and German literature. Chateaubriand re-acted strongly against the political doctrines of Rousseau, but adopted his method of sentimental self-revelation in Mémoires d'Outre-Tombe (Memoirs from Beyond the Grave), published after his death. In his glorification of 'the state of nature' in Atala, René, and Les Natchez, Chateaubriand combined sentimental egotism with a romantic study of the American Indian, in which he professed to make use of his own experiences during a visit to America at the time of the French Revolution, though he relied mainly upon the stories of previous travelers and his own imagination. 'Chateaubriand's Indians,' says Emma K. Armstrong, who has made a careful investigation of the novels and their sources, 'are blood relations of Richardson's heroines. No other beings ever possessed so much sensibility, such delicate nerves. Enough tears are shed in his romances to irrigate the desert lands of Arizona and to make the barren plains of New Mexico blossom like the rose. Young men and maidens, old men and lusty warriors all dissolve in tears. Once they flowed in such torrents that they could be heard. His Indian maidens blush and turn pale and faint exactly as if their names were Clarissa and Pamela instead of Atala and Céluta. Adario, the stern chief of the Natchez, pressed his daughter and niece to his heart; Céluta sang the song of welcome for René, and "all the family wept for regret, love, and virtue;" Outougamiz, having adopted René as his foster brother, made a speech and "tears fell from his eyelids;" when René and Outougamiz returned from the country of the Illinois, there was a "general effusion of hearts."'

Chateaubriand also used the new romantic method in defense of Catholicism in Le Génie du Christianisme (The Genius of Christianity) and The Martyrs, in both of which primitive Christianity is treated with the same freedom of fancy as the American Indian in his romantic tales. Chateaubriand could never keep his own moody egotism out of his work, and when melancholy went out of fashion, his romances underwent a decline in popular esteem, though he is still read on account of the magnificence of his style. During his lifetime, he was regarded, at least in France, as the leading literary figure of his time. This impression was encouraged by his vigorous, if rather showy personality, and a variegated political career. A Breton by birth and descent, he was destined for the Church, but imbibed the scepticism of the day, and did not revert to Catholicism until the death of his mother in 1798. In the meantime he had espoused the Royalist cause, and after his youthful visit to America, he spent eight years in England as an emigré, earning a scanty living as a teacher and translator. Returning to France, he made an immediate literary reputation with Atala and The Genius of Christianity, and entered the diplomatic service under Napoleon, resigning on the occasion of the execution of the Duc d'Enghien in 1804. He returned to his ambassadorial career with the Bourbons, but retired again on the accession of Louis Philippe in 1830. His last years were devoted to his friendship with Madame Récamier and the composition of his Mémoires, from which an extract is given below as translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos, by the courtesy of G. P. Putnam's Sons, publishers, New York and London.

A VISIT TO NIAGARA

I took my departure for the country of the savages in a packet boat, which was to convey me from New York to Albany by Hudson's river. The passengers were numerous and agreeable, consisting of several women and some American officers. A fresh breeze conducted us gently toward our destination. Toward the evening of the first day, we assembled upon deck, to partake of a collation of fruit and milk.

The women seated themselves upon the benches, and the men were stationed at their feet. The conversation was not long kept up. I have always remarked that when nature exhibits a sublime or beautiful prospect, the spectators involuntarily become silent. Suddenly one of the company exclaimed: 'Near that place Major André was executed.' My ideas instantly took another turn. A very pretty American lady was entreated to sing the ballad which describes the story of that unfortunate young man. She yielded to our solicitation; her voice evidently betrayed her timidity, but it was exceedingly replete with sweet and tender sensibility. The sun now set, and we were in the midst of lofty mountains. Here and there huts were seen, suspended over the abysses, but they soon disappeared among the clouds of mingled white and rosy hue, which horizontally flitted past these dwellings. When the summits of the rocks and firs were discovered above these clouds, one might have fancied them to be islands floating in the air. The majestic river, the tides of which run North and South, lay outstretched before us in a straight line, enclosed between two exactly parallel banks. Suddenly it took a turn to the West, winding its golden waves around a mountain which overlooked the river with all its plants, and had the appearance of a large bouquet, tied at its base with azure ribbon. We preserved a profound silence; for my own part, I hardly ventured to breathe. Nothing interrupted the plaintive song of the fair passenger, except the sound (of which we were hardly sensible) made by the vessel, as it glided before a light breeze through the water. Sometimes the voice acquired an additional swell when we steered near the bank, and in two or three places it was repeated by a slight echo. The ancients would have imagined that the soul of André, attracted by this impressive melody, felt a pleasure in murmuring its last notes among the mountains. The idea of this brave and unfortunate man, who was a lover and a poet, who died for his country in the flower of his age, regretted by his fellow citizens and honored by the tears of Washington, spread over this romantic scene a softer tint. The American officers and I had tears in our eyes—I from the effect of the delicious state of mind into which I was plunged—they no doubt from the recollection of their country's past troubles, which doubled the calmness of the present moment. They could not, without a sort of ecstasy, contemplate a district, lately covered with battalions in glittering arms and resounding with the noise of war, now buried in profound tranquillity, lighted by the last fires of day, decorated with all the pomp of nature, animated by the soft whistle of Virginian nightingales and the cooing of wild pigeons; while the simple inhabitants were seated on the point of rock, at some distance from their cottages, and quietly observed our vessel as it passed along the river beneath them.

As to the perils of the journey, they were undoubtedly great, and those who make nice calculations on this subject will probably not be disposed to travel among savage nations. People alarm themselves, however, too much in this respect. When I was exposed to any danger in America, it was always local and caused by my own imprudence, not by the inhabitants. For instance, when I was at the cataract of Niagara, the Indian ladder being broken which had formerly been there, I wished, in spite of my guide's representations, to descend to the bottom of the fall by means of a rock, the craggy points of which projected. It was about two hundred feet high, and I made the attempt. In spite of the roaring cataract and frightful abyss which gaped beneath me, my head did not swim, and I descended about forty feet, but here the rock became smooth and vertical; nor were there any longer roots or fissures for my feet to rest upon. I remained hanging all my length by my hands, neither being able to reascend nor proceed, feeling my fingers open by degrees from the weight of my body, and considering death inevitable. There are few men, who have, in the course of their lives, passed two such minutes as I experienced over the yawning horrors of Niagara. My hands at length opened and I fell. By most extraordinary good fortune I alighted on the naked rock. It was hard enough to have dashed me in pieces, and yet I did not feel much injured. I was within half an inch of the abyss, yet had not rolled into it; but when the cold water began to penetrate to my skin, I perceived that I had not escaped so easily as I at first imagined. I felt insupportable pain in my left arm; I had broken it above the elbow. My guide, who observed me from above, and to whom I made signs, ran to look for some savages, who with much trouble drew me up by birch cords and carried me to their habitations.

This was not the only risk I ran at Niagara. On arriving at the cataract, I alighted and fastened my horse's bridle around my arm. As I leaned forward to look down, a rattlesnake moved in the neighboring bushes. The horse took fright, reared on his hind legs and approached the edge of the precipice. I could not disengage my arm from the bridle, and the animal, with increasing alarm, drew me after him. His feet were already on the point of slipping over the brink of the gulf, and he was kept from destruction by nothing but the reins. My doom seemed to be fixed, when the animal, astonished at the new danger which he all at once perceived, made a final effort, and sprang ten feet from the edge of the precipice.

A NIGHT AMONG THE SAVAGES

It is a feeling, natural on the part of the unfortunate, to aim at the illusions of happiness by the recollection of past pleasures. When I feel weary of existence, when I feel my heart torn by the effects of a commerce with mankind, I involuntarily turn aside, and cast a look of regret. Enchanting meditations! Secret and ineffable charms of a soul which enjoys itself, it was amidst the immense deserts of America that I completely tasted you! Everyone boasts of loving liberty, and hardly anyone has a just idea of it. When I traveled among the Indian tribes of Canada—when I quitted the habitations of Europeans, and found myself, for the first time, alone, amidst boundless forests, having all nature, as it were, prostrate at my feet, a strange revolution took place in my sensations. I was seized with a sort of delirium, and followed no track, but went from tree to tree, and indifferently to the right or left, saying to myself: 'Here there is no multiplicity of roads, no towns, no confined houses, no Presidents, Republics and Kings, no laws and no human beings. Human beings! Yes—some worthy savages who care nothing about me, nor I about them; who, like myself, wander wherever inclination leads them, eat when they wish it and sleep where they please. To ascertain whether I was really in possession of my original rights, I put in practise a thousand acts of human will, as fancy suggested them. These proceedings highly enraged the great Dutchman who accompanied me as a guide and who in his soul believed me to be a madman.

Released from the tyrannical yoke of society, I comprehended the charms of that natural independence, far surpassing all the pleasures of which civilized man can have an idea. I comprehended why a savage was unwilling to become a European, why several Europeans had become savages, and why the sublime discussion on the inequality of conditions was so little understood by most of our philosophers. It is incredible to what a state of littleness nations and their highly boasted institutions were reduced in my eyes. It appeared to me that I was looking at the kingdoms of the earth with an inverted telescope, or rather that I myself was enlarged, exalted, and contemplating, with the eyes of a giant, the remains of my degenerate fellow creatures.

You, who wish to write of mankind, transport yourselves into the deserts. Become for an instant children of nature—then and not till then take the pen.

Among the innumerable enjoyments, which I experienced during these travels, one in particular made a lively impression upon my heart.

I was going to see the celebrated cataract of Niagara and had taken my road through the Indian nations which inhabit the wilds west of the American plantations. My guides were the sun, a pocket compass, and the Dutchman whom I have mentioned. This man perfectly understood five dialects of the Huron language. Our equipage consisted of two horses, to the necks of which we fastened a bell at night and then allowed them to go at large in the forest. At first I was rather afraid of losing them, but my guide removed this apprehension by pointing out the admirable instinct which causes these sagacious animals never to wander out of sight of our fire.

One evening, when we conceived that we had proceeded so far as to be only about eight or nine leagues from the cataract, we were just about to alight from our horses that we might prepare our hovel and light our fire according to the Indian custom. At this moment we perceived a blaze in the woods and soon afterwards espied some savages seated on the bank of the same stream which flowed past us. We approached them, and the Dutchman having, by my order, asked permission to pass the night with them, it was granted on the spot. Accordingly, we all began our labors together. After having cut branches from the trees, fixed stakes in the ground, stripped off bark to cover our palace, and performed some other general services, each of us turned his attention to his own affairs. I fetched my saddle, which faithfully served as my pillow during the whole journey. The guide attended to our horses and with regard to his preparations for the night, he was not so delicate as myself, and generally availed himself of some old trunk of a tree for his bed. Our work being finished, we seated ourselves in a circle, with our legs crossed like tailors. In the center of us was an immense fire, at which we prepared our maize for supper. I had a bottle of brandy too, which not a little increased the gay spirits of the savages. They produced in return some legs of bear, and we made a royal repast.

The party was composed of two women with infants at the breast, and three warriors. Two of the latter might be about forty-two to forty-five years of age, though they appeared to be much older; the third was a young man.

The conversation soon became general, that is to say by some broken expressions on my part, and by many gestures, an expressive kind of language, which the Indian tribes comprehend with astonishing readiness, and which I learned among them. The young man alone preserved an obstinate silence, keeping his eyes steadfastly fixed on me. In spite of the black, red, and blue streaks, with which he was disfigured, and the further mutilation of having no ears, it was easy to perceive the noble and sensible expression which animated his countenance. How favorably did I think of him for not liking me! He appeared to be mentally reading the history of all the calamities, with which Europeans had overburdened his country.

The two little children, which were entirely naked, had fallen asleep at our feet, before the fire. The women took them gently in their arms, and laid them upon skins, with that maternal care which it was delicious to observe among these pretended savages. The conversation at length died away by degrees, and each person sank to rest in the place which he had hitherto occupied.

I was, however, an exception, being unable to close my eyes. Hearing the deep breathing of my companions on all sides, I raised my head, and resting on my elbow, contemplated, by the red light of the expiring fire, the sleeping Indians stretched around me. I acknowledge that I found it difficult to refrain from tears. Good young man! How affecting did thy repose appear to me! Thou, who didst seem so feelingly alive to the misfortunes of thy country, wert of too lofty and superior a disposition to suspect a stranger of evil intentions. Europeans, what a lesson is this for us! These savages, whom we have pursued with fire and sword, whom our avarice has not even left in possession of a shovelful of earth to cover their dead bodies on all this vast continent heretofore their patrimony—these very savages received their enemy in their hospitable huts, shared with him their miserable repast, and their couch to which remorse was a stranger, enjoying, close to him, the sleep of the virtuous. Such virtues are as much above our conventional ones, as the souls of these uncultivated people are superior to those of man in a state of society.

The moon was bright: Heated by my ideas I rose and took a seat at some distance, upon the root of a tree which crept along the side of the rivulet. It was one of those American nights, which the pencil of man never will be able to portray, and which I have remembered a hundred times with delight.

The moon had reached the highest point of the Heavens, and a thousand stars glittered in the great clear expanse. At one time the queen of the night reposed upon a group of clouds, which resembled the summit of lofty mountains crowned with snow. By slow degrees these clouds stretched themselves out, assuming the appearance of waving transparent zones of white satin, or transforming themselves into light frothy flakes, of which countless numbers wandered through the blue plains of the firmament. At another time the aerial vault appeared as if transformed into the sea shore, where horizontal beds and parallel ridges might be discovered, apparently formed by the regular flux and reflux of the tide. A gust of wind then dispersed the clouds, and they formed themselves into large masses of dazzling whiteness, so soft to the eye that one almost seemed to feel their delicate elasticity. The landscape around me was not less enchanting. The cerulean velvety light of the moon silently spread over the forest and at intervals descended among the trees, irradiating in some degree even the deepest thickets. The brook, which flowed at my feet, hiding itself now and then under the umbrageous oaks, sallows and sugar-trees, and reappearing a little further off, all brilliant from the constellations of the night, resembled an azure ribbon studded with diamonds, and transversely marked with black lines. On the other side of the stream, in a large natural meadow, the clear light of the moon shone without motion on the turf, extending like a curtain over it. At one moment the birch-trees, which were scattered here and there through the savanna, were, by the caprice of the breeze, confounded with the soil on which they grew, and enveloped in a sort of grey gauze; at another they ceased to retain this chalky appearance, and buried themselves in obscurity, forming, as it were, islands of floating shade upon a motionless sea of light. Silence and repose prevailed throughout the scene, except when a few leaves fell here and there, or a sudden gust of wind swept past, accompanied occasionally by the dismal note of the owl. At a distance and at intervals too I heard the solemn sound of the cataract at Niagara, which, in the calmness of night, was lengthened out from one desert to another, and expired among the solitary forests.

The astonishing grandeur of this picture and the melancholy which it inspired are not to be expressed by human language. The most beautiful nights in Europe can convey no idea of it. In vain does the imagination try to roam at large amidst our cultivated plains, for everywhere the habitations of mankind oppose its wish; but in this deserted region the soul delights to bury and lose itself amidst boundless forests—it loves to wander, by the light of the stars, on the borders of immense lakes, to hover on the roaring gulf of terrific cataracts, to fall with the mighty mass of waters, to mix and confound itself, as it were, with the wild sublimities of Nature.

These enjoyments are too exquisite. Such is our weakness that excess of pleasure becomes painful, as if Nature were afraid of our forgetting that we are men. Absorbed in my existence, or rather wandering entirely from myself, having no distinct sentiment or idea, but an ineffable indescribable sensation, resembling the mental happiness which we are told that we shall feel in another world, I was suddenly recalled to the one which I inhabit. I felt ill, and was convinced that I must indulge my reverie no further. I now returned to our Ajouppa, and lying down near the savages, soon sank into profound sleep.

On awaking in the morning, I found my companions ready for departure. My guide had saddled our horses; the warriors were armed, and the women busy in collecting their baggage, which consisted of skins, maize, and smoked bear. I arose, and taking from my portmanteau some powder and ball, and a box made of red wood, distributed these among my associates of the night, who appeared to be pleased with my generosity. We then separated, not without signs of mutual regard and regret, each touching his forehead and breast, according to the custom of these children of nature, which appeared to me very superior to the ceremonies practised by us. Even to the young Indian, who cordially took the hand which I offered, we all parted with hearts full of each other. Our friends pursued their way to the North, being directed by the mosses, and we to the West under the guidance of my compass. The warriors departed first, the women followed, carrying the baggage and infants on their backs, suspended in furs. The little creatures looked back at us and smiled. My eyes for a long time followed this affecting and maternal spectacle, till at length the group entirely disappeared among the thickets.

Benevolent savages, who so hospitably entertained me, and whom I doubtless shall never again behold, let me be here permitted to pay the tribute of my gratitude. May you long enjoy your precious independence in those delightful solitudes, where my wishes for your happiness will ever follow you. What corner, my friends, of your immense deserts, do you at present inhabit? Are you still together, and always happy? Do you sometimes talk about the stranger of the forest? Do you picture to yourselves the kind of country which he inhabits? Do you utter wishes for his happiness, while you recline upon the banks of your solitary rivers? Generous family! His lot is much changed since the night he passed with you; but it is at least a consolation to him, while persecuted by his countrymen beyond the seas, that his name is, in some unknown wilderness at the other extremity of the world, still pronounced with tender recollection by the poor Indians.

A LOVE ADVENTURE IN FLORIDA

From MEMOIRS, Vol. I.

The savages of Florida tell of an island in the middle of a lake where live the most beautiful women in the world. The Muskogulges have repeatedly attempted its conquest; but this Eden flees before the canoes, a natural image of the chimeras which retreat before our desires. The country also contained a fountain of youth: who would wish to rise from the dead?

But little was wanting to make these fables assume a semblance of reality in my eyes. At a moment when we least expected it, we saw a flotilla of canoes come out of a bay, some with oars, others with sails. They landed at our island. They were two families of Creeks, of which one consisted of Seminoles, the other of Muskogulges, including some Cherokees and Burnt-woods. I was struck with the grace of these savages, who in no respect resemble those of Canada.

The Seminoles and Muskogulges are fairly tall, and, by an unusual contrast, their mothers, wives, and daughters are the smallest race of women known in America. The Indian women who landed near us, born of mixed Cherokee and Castilian blood, were tall in stature. Two of them were like the creoles of San Domingo and Mauritius, but yellow and delicate as the women of the Ganges. These two Floridan women, cousins on the father's side, served as my models, one for Atala, the other for Céluta: they excelled the portraits I drew of them only by that variable and fugitive truth of nature, that physiognomy of race and climate which I was not able to express. There was something indefinable in that oval visage, in that shaded complexion, which one seemed to see through a light, orange-tinted smoke, in that hair so black and soft, those eyes so long, half-hidden beneath the veil of two satiny eyelids that opened indolently; in short, in the two-fold seduction of the Indian and the Spanish woman.

The meeting with our hosts occasioned a certain alteration in our movements: our trading agents began to inquire about horses; it was decided that we should go to fix ourselves in the neighborhood of the studs. The plain in which our camp stood was covered with bulls, cows, horses, 10 bisons, buffaloes, cranes, turkeys, pelicans: these birds mottled the green background of our savanna with white, black, and pink stains.

Our traders and hunters were stirred by many passions: not passions of race, education or prejudice, but natural passions full and absolute, making straight for their object, having for witnesses a tree fallen in the depths of an unknown forest, a nameless stream. The relations between the Spaniards and the Creek women formed the ground-work of the adventures; the 'Burnt-woods' played the principal part in those romances. One story was famous: 20 that of a trader in strong waters seduced and ruined by a 'painted woman' or courtesan. This story, put into Seminole verse with the title of Tabamica, was sung in passing through the woods. Carried off in their turn by the colonists, the Indian women soon died forsaken at Pensacola: their misfortunes went to swell the Romanceros and to be numbered among the ballads of Ximenes.

The earth is a charming mother; we 35 issue from her womb: in childhood, she holds us to her breasts swollen with milk and honey; in youth and old age, she lavishes upon us her refreshing waters, her harvests and her fruits; she offers us, 40 wherever we may go, a shade, a bath, a table and a bed; she opens her entrails again to receive us after death, and throws a coverlet of herbs and flowers over our remains, while she secretly transforms us into her own substance, to reproduce us under some graceful shape. That is what I said to myself on waking, when my first look fell upon the sky, the canopy of 50 my bed.

The hunters had set out for the work of the day; I remained behind with the women and children. I never left the side of my two sylvan goddesses: one was proud, the other sad. I did not understand a word of what they said to me, and they did not understand me; but I went to fetch water for their cup, shoots for their fire, mosses for their bed. They wore the petticoat and the wide, slashed sleeves of the Spanish women, the body and cloak of the Indian women. Their bare legs were cross-gartered with a lacework of birch. They plaited their hair with posies or filaments of rushes; they mailed themselves in chains and necklaces of glass beads. From their ears hung purple berries; they had a fine talking parrot: the bird of Armida; they fastened it on their shoulder like an emerald, or carried it hooded on their hand, as the great ladies of the tenth century carried their hawks. To harden their breasts and arms, they rubbed themselves with the apoya, or American gallingale. In Bengal the nautch-girls chew the betel-nut, and in the Levant the almehs suck the mastic of Chio: the Floridan maidens pounded, between their teeth of a bluey whiteness, tears of liquid-amber and roots of libanus, which blended the fragrance of angelica, cedrat, and vanilla. They lived in an atmosphere of perfumes emanating from themselves, like orange-trees and flowers living in the pure exhalations from their leaves and chalices. I amused myself by placing a little ornament upon their heads: they submitted, gently dismayed; witches themselves, they thought I was working a charm upon them. One of them, the 'proud' one, often prayed; she seemed to me half a Christian. The other sang in a voice of velvet, uttering at the end of each phrase a note that troubled one. Sometimes they spoke hastily to each other: I thought I could recognize the accents of jealousy, but the 'sad' one wept, and silence was restored.

Weak as I was, I sought examples of weakness, in order to encourage myself. Had not Camoëns in the Indies loved a black Barbary slave, and might not I in America do homage to two young jonquil sultanas? Had Camoëns not addressed endechas, or stanzas, to his Barbaru escrava?

A fishing-party was arranged. The sun was nearing its setting. In the foreground appeared sassafras, tulip-trees, catalpas, and oaks, from whose boughs hung skeins of white moss. Behind this foreground rose the most charming of trees, the papaw, which might have been taken for a chased silver style, surmounted by a Corinthian urn. In the background reigned balsam-trees, magnolias, and liquid-ambers.

The sun dropped behind that curtain: a ray piercing through the crown of a thicket sparkled like a carbuncle set in the somber foliage; the light diverging between the trunks and branches projected heightening columns and mobile arabesques upon the sward. Below were lilacs, azaleas, annulated creepers with gigantic sheaves; above, the clouds, some fixed, like promontories or old towers, others fleeting, like rosy vapors or carded silk. By means of successive transformations, one saw the mouths of furnaces opening up in those clouds, heaps of embers piling themselves up, streams of lava flowing: all was dazzling, radiant, gilded, opulent, saturated with light.

After the Morean insurrection in 1770, some Greek families took refuge in Florida; they could still believe themselves in that Ionian climate which seems to have relented, together with men's passions: at Smyrna, in the evening, nature sleeps like a courtesan wearied with love.

On our right were ruins belonging to the great fortifications that were found on the Ohio, on our left an old savage camp. The island on which we were, pictured in the water and reproduced by a mirage, poised its double perspective before us. In the east, the moon rested upon distant hills; in the west, the vault of the sky was melted into a sea of diamonds and sapphires, in which the sun, half-immersed, appeared to be dissolving. The animals of creation were keeping watch; the earth, in adoration, seemed to offer incense to the sky, and the amber exhaled from its bosom fell back upon it in the form of dew, as prayers fall back upon those who pray.

Abandoned by my companions, I lay resting by the edge of a clump of trees: its darkness, glazed with light, formed the penumbra in which I sat. Fire-flies gleamed among the crape-covered shrubs and became obscured when they passed through the irradiations of the moon. I heard the sounds made by the rise and fall of the lake, the leap of the gold-fish, and the rare cry of the diver. My eyes were fixed upon the water; I gradually lapsed into a state of drowsiness known to men who travel the world's highways: I lost all clearness of recollection; I felt myself living and vegetating with nature in a kind of pantheism. I leaned back against the trunk of a magnolia-tree and fell asleep; my slumbers floated upon a vague surface of hope.

When I emerged from this Lethe, I found myself between two women: the cidalisks had returned; they did not wish to arouse me; they had sat down silently by my side; whether they had feigned sleep or had really slumbered, their heads had fallen on my shoulders.

A breeze blew through the grove and deluged us in a shower of rose-leaves from the magnolia. Then the younger of the Seminoles began to sing: let whosoever is not sure of his life beware of ever thus exposing himself! No one knows the strength of the passion that glides with melody into a man's breast. A rude and jealous voice replied: a 'Burnt-wood' was calling the two cousins; they started and rose: the dawn was beginning to break.

In the absence of Aspasia alone, I have since repeated this scene on the shores of Greece: ascending to the columns of the Parthenon with the dawn, I saw the Cithæron, Mount Hymettus, the Acropolis of Corinth, the tombs, the ruins, bathed in a dew of golden, transparent, shimmering light, reflected by the seas and wafted like a perfume by the zephyrs from Salamis and Delos.

We finished on the bank our voyage without words. At noon, we broke up the camp to inspect the horses which the Creeks wished to sell and the traders to buy. Women and children, all were summoned as witnesses, according to the custom in solemn bargains. Stallions of every age and color, foals and mares, with bulls, cows and heifers, began to scamper and gallop around us. Amid this confusion, I became separated from the Creeks. A thick group of men and horses gathered on the skirt of a wood. Suddenly, in the distance, I perceived my two fair Floridans; vigorous hands seated them upon the cruppers of two barbs ridden bare-backed by a 'Burnt-wood' and a Seminole. O Cid, why had not I thy swift Babieça that I might overtake them! The mares galloped off, the immense squadron followed them. The horses rushed, jumped, bounded, neighed, amid the horns of the bulls and buffaloes, their hoofs clashed in mid-air, their tails and manes flew blood-stained. A whirlwind of voracious insects swarmed about this wild cavalry. My Floridans disappeared from sight like Ceres' daughter, snatched by the god of the nether world.

Thus does everything prove abortive in my life, thus is nought left me save pictures of what has passed so quickly: I shall descend to the Elysian Fields with more shades than mortal man has ever taken with him. The fault lies with my organization: I am never able to take advantage of any piece of good fortune; I can never take an interest in anything whatever that interests others. Putting religion aside, I have no beliefs. Shepherd or king, what should I have done with my scepter or my crook? I should have wearied equally of glory or genius, work or leisure, prosperity or misfortune. Everything tires me: laboriously I tow my weariness after my days, and, wherever I go, I yawn away my life.

BÉRANGER (1780-1857)

Jean-Pierre Béranger has come to be regarded as 'the idle singer of an empty day,' for both his matter and his manner have gone out of fashion; but in the earlier half of the nineteenth century, he was immensely popular and was profusely translated by Thackeray and others. His simple pathos passes easily into English, and his obvious sentimentality is not without an element of natural charm.

MY OLD COAT

Translated by J. Price

- Still to my back, old trusty coat, be true!
Dear to my heart, for both are growing old;
Ten years have flown since, fresh in cut and hue,
I brushed thee first, and still the brush I hold.
What though thy threadbare texture suffers wrong 5
From the rude insults of the time and weather,
Be thou like me,—we'll calmly go along—
Mine ancient friend, we still will stick together.
- Now busy Memory brings again the time
When in thy glossy brightness first I wore thee; 10
It was my birthday morn,—in joyous rhyme
My merry comrades sung their praises o'er thee.
Their hearts are still as warm, their hands as true
(Though thou art rusty now and out of feather)
As on that festal morn, when thou wert new,— 15
Mine ancient friend, oh, let us stick together.
- I smile whene'er thy patched-up skirt I view;
A sweet remembrance to my soul it brings,— Romping with Lise, I sipped her lips of dew,
And feigned to fly; she fondly to thee clings, 20
And thou art torn; but Lise with ready wit
The rent repairs, while I, like lamb to tether,
Two days beside the ingenious seamstress sit,—
Mine ancient friend, for that we'll stick together.
- Thou ne'er hast known of costly musk or amber 25
Which fops exhale while, peacock-like, they strut;
Ne'er wert thou seen in noble's antechamber;
For courtiers' jests thou hast not been a butt.
While France for ribbons fought,—a tyrant's dole—
A modest flower, the pride of summer weather, — 30
Bloomed at thy unpretending button-hole,—
Mine ancient friend, so let us stick together.
- Still let us life's weak vanities disdain,
Those gaudy days which both of us enjoyed;
Days whose fair sunshine clouded was by rain, 35
Whose rapturous zest by sorrow was alloyed.

Soon will the time arrive when we must part,
 When I must silent sleep beneath the heather;
 But while life's current flows within my heart,
 Mine ancient friend, oh, we will stick together!

THE KING OF YVETOT

Translated by W. M. Thackeray

There was a King of Yvetot,
 Of whom renown hath little said,
 Who let all thoughts of glory go,
 And dawdled half his days a-bed;
 And every night as night came round,
 By Jenny, with a nightcap crowned,
 Slept very sound:
 Sing ho, ho, ho! and he, he, he!
 That's the kind of king for me.

5

And every day it came to pass
 That four lusty meals made he;
 And step by step, upon an ass,
 Rode abroad, his realms to see;
 And wherever he did stir,
 What think you was his escort, sir?
 Why, an old cur.
 Sing ho, ho, ho! and he, he, he!
 That's the kind of king for me.

10

25

If e'er he went into excess,
 'Twas from a somewhat lively thirst;
 But he who would his subjects bless,
 Odd's fish!—must whet his whistle first;
 And so from every cask they got
 Our king did to himself allot
 At least a pot.
 Sing ho, ho, ho! and he, he, he!
 That's the kind of king for me.

20

To all the ladies of the land
 A courteous king, and kind, was he;
 The reason why you'll understand,
 They named him Pater Patriæ.
 Each year he called his fighting men,
 And marched a league from home, and then Marched back again.
 Sing ho, ho, ho! and he, he, he!
 That's the kind of king for me.

30

35

Neither by force nor false pretense
 He sought to make his country great,
 And made (O princes, learn from hence)
 'Live and let live' his rule of state.
 'Twas only when he came to die
 That his people, who stood by,
 Were known to cry.
 Sing ho, ho, ho! and he, he, he!
 That's the kind of king for me.

40

45

The portrait of this best of kings
 Is extant still, upon a sign
 That on a village tavern swings,
 Famed in the country for good wine.
 The people in their Sunday trim,
 Filling their glasses to the brim,
 Look up to him.
 Singing ho, ho, ho! and he, he, he!
 That's the sort of king for me.

GRANNY'S REMINISCENCES OF NAPOLEON

Translated by William Young

Ay, many a day the straw-thatched cot
 Shall echo with his glory!
 The humblest shed, these fifty years,
 Shall know no other story.
 There shall the idle villagers
 To some old dame resort,
 And beg her with those good old tales
 To make their evenings short.
 'What though they say he did us harm,
 Our love this cannot dim;
 Come, Granny, talk of him to us;
 Come, Granny, talk of him.'

'Well, children,—with a train of kings
 Once he passed by this spot;
 'Twas long ago; I had but just Begun to boil the pot.
 On foot he climbed the hill, whereon
 I watched him on his way:
 He wore a small three-cornered hat;
 His overcoat was gray.
 I was half frightened till he spoke;
 "My dear," says he, "how do?"'
 'Granny, Granny, did he speak?
 What, Granny, speak to you?'

'Next year as I, poor soul, by chance,
 Through Paris strolled one day,
 I saw him taking, with his court,
 To Notre Dame his way.
 The crowd were charmed with such a show;
 Their hearts were filled with pride:
 "What splendid weather for the fête!
 Heaven favors him!" they cried.
 Softly he smiled, for God had given
 To his fond arms a boy.'
 'Oh, how much joy you must have felt!
 Oh, Granny, how much joy!'

'But at length our poor Champagne
 By foes was overrun;
 He seemed alone to hold his ground,
 Nor dangers would he shun.

- One night—as might be now—I heard
 A knock,—the door unbarred,—
 And saw, good God! 'twas he, himself,
 With but a scanty guard.
 "Oh, what a war is this!" he cried,
 Taking this very chair.' 45
 'What! Granny, Granny, there he sat?
 What! Granny, he sat there?'
- 'I'm hungry," said he: quick I served
 Thin wine and hard brown bread; 50
 He dried his clothes, and by the fire
 In sleep drooped down his head.
 Waking, he saw my tears,—“Cheer up,
 Good dame!" says he, "I go
 'Neath Paris' walls to strike for France 55
 One last avenging blow."
 He went; but on the cup he used
 Such value did I set,—
 It has been treasured.' 'What! till now?
 You have it, Granny, yet?" 60
- 'Here 'tis: but 'twas the hero's fate
 To ruin to be led;
 He, whom a Pope had crowned, alas!
 In a lone isle lies dead.
 'Twas long denied: "No, no," said they, 65
 "Soon shall he reappear;
 O'er ocean comes he, and the foe
 Shall find his master here."
 Ah, what a bitter pang I felt
 When forced to own 'twas true!' 70
 'Poor Granny! Heaven for this will look,
 Will kindly look on you.'

THE MARQUIS OF CARABAS

Translated by Robert Brough

- Lo! the old Marquis proud,
 Treating us like a vanquished crowd;
 Perched on his spavined steed,
 Of scanty flesh but faultless breed,
 Towards his old chateau 5
 In triumph see him go,
 Brandishing in the air
 A sword,—whose work stops there.
 Hats off! let his lordship pass.
 Hail to the Marquis of Carabas! 10
- 'Castellans! almoners!
 Serfs! vassals! yeomen! foresters!
 'Twas I,' he cries, 'alone,
 Who for my king won back his throne.
 But let him yield my dues,
 Or—if he should refuse— 15

There'll be 'twixt him and me—
Well, never mind,—you'll see.'

Hats off! let his lordship pass.
Hail to the Marquis of Carabas!

20

'Though Slander's venom'd tongue
Hints that we from a miller sprung,
We date from Pepin's son
(I don't know which of them,—but one),
My coat-of-arms to trust
(And that knows best,—it must),
In blood and quartering
We're nobler than the king.'

25

Hats off! let his lordship pass.
Hail to the Marquis of Carabas!

30

'Who can resist my might?
The footstool is my lady's right.
A bishop soon to grow,
My youngest son to court shall go;
My eldest, fresh from school,
The baron (though a fool),
Decked with a cross shall be;
With two,—nay, damme, three!'

35

Hats off! let his lordship pass.
Hail to the Marquis of Carabas!

40

'So, let us quiet seek.
Who dares to me of taxes speak?
Think you the lords of earth
Owe tribute for their right of birth?
Thanks to my titles sound,
My arsenals renowned,
The Prefect soon shall find
That I—well, never mind!'

45

Hats off! let his lordship pass.
Hail to the Marquis of Carabas!

50

'Priests, rescued from the raff,
Collect your tithes and give us half.
You earthworms vile prepare
Again the feudal brand to bear.
Ours is the right of chase;
The wenches of your race
Honored once more shall be
By droit de seigneurie.'

55

Hats off! let his lordship pass.
Hail to the Marquis of Carabas!

60

'Here, parson, do your task;
In incense-odors let me bask.
Varlets and pages small,
War to the serfs,—and thrash them all!
May all the rights I hold
From my forefathers bold
Pass in unblemished state
To my descendants great.'

65

Hats off! let his lordship pass.
Hail to the Marquis of Carabas!

THE BLIND MOTHER

Daughter, while you turn your wheel,
 Listen to the words I say:
 Colin has contrived to steal
 Your unthinking heart away.
 Of his fawning voice beware,
 You are all the Blind One's care,
 And I mark your sighs, whene'er
 Our young neighbor's name is heard.
 Colin's tongue is false, though winning;
 Hist! the window is unbarred!
 Ah! Lisette, you are not spinning!

The room is close and warm, you say,
 But, my daughter, do not peep
 Through the casement,—night and day
 Colin there his watch doth keep.
 Think not mine a grumbling tongue:
 Ah! here at my breast you hung,
 I, like you, was fair and young,
 And I know how apt is love
 To lead the youthful heart to sinning,
 Hist!—the door,—I heard it move!
 Ah, Lisette, you are not spinning!

It is a gust of wind, you say,
 That has made the hinges grate;
 And my poor, old, growling Tray,
 Must you break for that his pate?
 Ah, my child, put faith in me:
 Age permits me to foresee
 Colin soon will faithless be,
 And your love to an abyss
 Of grief will be the sad beginning,—
 Bless me! sure I heard a kiss!
 Ah! Lisette, you are not spinning!

'Twas your little bird, you say,
 Gave that tender kiss just now;
 Make him cease his trifling, pray;
 He will rue it else, I vow!
 Love, my girl, oft bringeth pain,
 Shame and sorrow in its train,
 While the false, successful swain
 Scorns the heart he hath beguiled
 From true virtue's path to sinning,—
 Hist! I hear you move, my child!
 Ah! Lisette, you are not spinning!

You wish to take the air, you say;
 Think you, daughter, I believe you?
 Bid young Colin go his way,
 Or, at once, as bride receive you!
 Let him go to church, and there
 Show his purpose to be fair;
 But, till then, beside my chair
 You must work, my girl, nor heed
 All his vows, so fond and winning.
 Tangled in love's web, indeed!—
 Lisette, my daughter, mind your spinning!

HEINE (1799-1856)

'Place and time,' says Heinrich Heine, 'are things of great moment. I was born at the end of the sceptical eighteenth century, and in a town where not only the French, but also the genius of the French, ruled during my childhood: Düsseldorf on the Rhine.' It is of no less moment that he was born of Jewish parents, and that the tongue of his childhood was German. His ambitious mother apprenticed him to a merchant at Frankfort that he might become another Rothschild, but this scheme failed on account of his lack of business ability. His mother's next plan was that he should become a great lawyer, and with this purpose in view he professed himself a Lutheran and took his doctor's degree at the University of Göttingen in 1825, but long before this he had given ample proof of his unique power as a writer of German lyrics. The Grenadiers, perhaps the best known of his songs, was written when he was sixteen, and the charming incidental poems which adorn his prose account of his student tour through the Harz Mountains in 1824; Die Harzreise was published in 1826, and his Book of Songs in 1827. Both became immediately popular and established his position as the successor of Goethe as a lyricist, but Heine could not settle down to enjoy his fame in Germany, partly because his advanced political opinions made him obnoxious to the authorities. After many wanderings he found a permanent home in Paris in 1831, married a French Catholic, became an active journalist and man of letters, and made a gallant fight against want and disease, his last years being overclouded by financial worries and intense physical suffering. A Jew by race, a German by citizenship and education, a Protestant for convenience, a Parisian by choice, more than any of these an ancient Athenian, like Aristophanes at once a supreme lyricist and a supreme satirist, adding to all these an irrepressible enthusiasm for liberty, Heine was not made for happiness in his own time or perhaps in any time. He kept his high spirit almost to the end of his heroic life, and his story is best told in his own works, which are largely autobiographical in character. The following readings are taken partly from his books and partly from the Memoirs put together after his death by Gustav Karpeles and translated by Gilbert Cannan; they are so arranged as to give at the same time some impression of Heine's genius and his own account of his life. The earlier lyrics are from the translation by John E. Wallis; the later ones from the Memoirs.

CHILDHOOD AND EDUCATION

The town of Düsseldorf is very beautiful, and those who think of it when far away, and chance to have been born there, are filled with wondrous thoughts. I was born there, and I feel as though I must go home at once. And when I say 'Home,' I mean the Bolkerstrasse and the house where I was born. This house will some day be famous, and I have told the old woman who owns it, for goodness' sake not to sell it. She would at present hardly get as much for the whole house as the fees alone will amount to which some day green-veiled stately Englishwomen will give the waiting-maid, when she shows them the room where I first saw the light; the garret in which my father generally locked me when I had been stealing the grapes, and the brown door, too, on which my mother taught me to write my letters with chalk. Ay me, my mother will have had a deal of trouble to make a celebrated author of me, fair lady!

But at present my fame is still buried in the marble quarries of Carrara; the waste-paper crown of laurel, with which they will have crowned me, does not yet spread its scent over the whole world; and when the green-veiled proud Englishwomen come to Düsseldorf, they do not come to visit that celebrated house, but go straight to the market place to look at the enormous black equestrian statue in the center. This represents the Archduke Jan Wilhelm. He is clothed in black armor, and wears a bag-wig. As a boy I have heard it said that the artist who cast this statue had suddenly noticed to his alarm, during the process, that he had not sufficient metal, and so the townsmen had to come to his aid with their silver spoons, in order that he might finish the casting; and I used to stand before it for hours, wondering how many silver spoons it contained, and how many apple tarts might have been bought with all this silver? I had then a perfect passion for apple tarts,—now my passion is for love, truth, freedom, and crab soup—and usually, not far from the Archduke's statue, might be seen a droll bow-legged fellow with a white apron and a basket filled with the most deliciously hot apple tarts, which he praised in an irresistible treble-voice, calling out: 'Fresh apple tarts, just out of the oven! How nice they smell!' In truth, when in later years the tempter tried to assail me, he spoke to me in the same insinuating treble-voice; and I should not have remained twelve hours in Signora Giulietta's company, had her voice not been pitched in the same sweet-scented apple tart key. And indeed apple tartlets would never have had such charms for me, had not crooked Herman covered them so mysteriously with his white apron—and it is these aprons which . . . but this is a digression, for was I not talking about the statue, containing so many silver spoons and no soup, which represents the Archduke Jan Wilhelm?

He seems to have been an estimable gentleman, a patron of the arts, and himself very talented. He founded the picture-gallery at Düsseldorf, and in the Observatory there they show a very artistic wooden goblet, which he had carved in his leisure hours, of which he had twenty-four every day of the year.

At that period rulers were not so beset with cares as now, their crowns being grown more firmly to their heads, and at night they even covered these with a night-cap, and slept peacefully. The nations slept quietly at their feet, and greeted them in the morning with a 'Good morning, father!' to which they gave answer, 'Good morning, my dear children!'

But suddenly all this was changed. One morning when we awoke at Düsseldorf, and were about to say 'Good morning, father,' lo! he had taken his departure. Everywhere there was heaviness of heart, a funereal air pervaded everything, the people crept silently to the market to read the long paper placard on the door of the town-hall. The weather was dull; nevertheless, spare tailor Kilian stood looking at the placard mumbling to himself with thin trembling lips, in his nankeen jacket which was only meant for home wear, and with his blue woollen stockings so carelessly put on that they showed his puny bare legs. An old pensioner from the Palatinate read it in a higher key, and at many of the words a bright tear trickled down his honest white beard. I stood by him and wept, and asked him why we wept. He answered, 'The Archduke desires to express his thanks'—and after a pause he continued, weeping still more bitterly—'for the long-tried fidelity of his subjects, and releases them of their allegiance.' To see an old soldier in an old uniform and with a scarred face suddenly burst into tears is indeed a strange sight. Whilst we were reading, the archducal arms were taken down from the town-hall. A dullness hung over everything, and people seemed as if they were expecting an eclipse. The Town-council went about at a slow pace, as though their day were over. Even the all-powerful watchman looked as though he had no further orders to give, and stood there with quiet nonchalance, although crazy Aloysius hopped about, crying out the French generals' names with absurd grimaces, whilst the crooked drunken Gumpertz was rolling in the gutter singing out 'ça ira, ça ira.'

I, however, went home weeping and mourning over the Archduke's proclamation. My mother was in despair; I knew what I knew, and would not be convinced to the contrary. I went to bed in tears and dreamt that the world was coming to an end;—beautiful gardens and green fields were taken up and rolled together like carpets; the watchman climbed up a high ladder and took the sun down from the sky; tailor Kilian kept on saying to himself, 'I must go home and dress in my best clothes, for I am dead and am to be buried today.' And it became darker and darker, a few stars shone dimly in the heavens, and even these fell down like yellow leaves in autumn; the people gradually disappeared, and I, poor child, wandered about in my fear and suddenly found myself before some willow-tufts, close to an untidy farm, where I saw a man digging up the ground, and beside him an ugly malicious-looking woman, who held something like a decapitated head in her apron, and that was the moon which she placed carefully in the open grave. And behind me stood the old pensioner from the Palatinate sobbing and spelling out the words: 'The Archduke desires to express his thanks.'

When I awoke the sun was shining through my windows as usual. I heard the sound of drums in the street, and when I entered our sitting room and said good morning to my father, who was in his white dressing-gown, I heard that the nimble hairdresser, whilst doing his hair, had told him to a hair every particular of the coronation of Archduke Joachim which was to take place that day in the town-hall; how the new Archduke came of one of the best families, was married to the Emperor Napoleon's sister, was a perfect gentleman, wore his black hair in long locks, and how he would soon enter the town in state, and was certain to gain every woman's heart. Meanwhile, I heard the beating drums in the street. I went to the front door and saw the French entering the town,—this nation rejoicing in glory, marching through the world to the sound of the tabor and the lute, the serio-comic faces of the grenadiers, the bearskin caps, the tri-colored cockades, the glittering bayonets, the merry knights full of 'point d'honneur' and the great powerful drum-major dressed in silver lace, who could throw his gold-knobbed stick up to the first story of the house, and his eyes as high as the second story, where pretty girls were sitting at the windows. I was glad at the thought of having soldiers quartered upon us—much more so than my mother—and I rushed to the market place. There all was changed; the world looked as if freshly painted; a new coat of arms hung over the town-hall, the iron balcony was covered with embroidered velvet, French grenadiers were on guard, the old town-councillors had put on fresh faces as well as their Sunday suits, and looked at each other as though they were Frenchmen and said 'bon jour.' Ladies peered out of all the windows, inquisitive townsmen and gay soldiers filled the square, and I with other boys climbed up on to the great archducal horse, and looked at the motley crowd assembled in the market-place beneath us.

Neighbor Pitter's son and long-limbed Kunz nearly broke their necks on this occasion, though that would have been no misfortune; for the one afterwards ran away from his parents, enlisted, deserted, and was shot at Mayence, whilst the other went on voyages of discovery into other people's pockets, became by this means an active member of a public oakum-picking company, broke the iron fetters which bound him to this occupation and to his fatherland, safely crossed the Channel, and died in London of a too narrow cravat, which tied of itself, just as a state-servant pulled a board from underneath his feet.

Long-limbed Kunz told us we might have a holiday as it was coronation-day. We had a long time to wait for the ceremony to begin. At last the balcony of the town-hall filled with gay gentlemen, flags and trumpets, and the mayor of the town in his famous red coat made a long speech which seemed to get drawn out like India-rubber or like a knitted night-cap which has had a stone thrown into it—only not the philosopher's stone. I could plainly hear many parts of the speech, as for instance, that we were to be made happy;—and at the end of his speech the trumpets were blown, the flags waved, the drums beaten, and there were cries of 'Vivat'; and whilst I joined in myself, I held on to the old Archduke. This was quite necessary, for I had become perfectly giddy, and I thought the people were standing on their heads, because the world had turned round; the head of the Archduke with its long wig nodded and whispered: 'Hold on to me'—and it was not until I heard the sound of cannons from the ramparts that I gave in and slowly descended from the archducal horse.

On my way home, I again saw crazy Aloysius hopping about on one leg, and screaming out the names of the French generals, and the deformed drunken Gumpertz rolling in the gutter, roaring out 'Ça ira, ça ira,'—and I said to my mother: 'They intend to make us happy, and that is why we have holiday.'

The world appeared all right again next day, school went on as before, and we again prepared our lessons. Roman history, dates, nouns ending in 'im,' irregular verbs, Greek, Hebrew, geography, German, arithmetic—heavens! the thought of it all makes me giddy—everything had to be learnt by heart. Much of this was of use to me afterwards. For supposing I had not known the names of the Roman kings off by heart, it would have been all the same to me later on, whether Niebuhr had proved or not that they never really existed. And had I not learned dates, how could I have hoped to find my way about that great Berlin where one house is as like another as two drops of water, or as two grenadier guards, and where it is impossible to find one's friends, unless one knows the numbers of their houses. At that period I thought of each of my friends in connection with some historical event, the date of which put me in mind of the number of his house, so that I could easily remember the latter when thinking of the former, and by this same means I was always reminded of some historical event whenever I caught sight of a friend. In this way, for example, when I saw my tailor I immediately thought of the battle of Marathon; when I met the well-dressed banker Christian Gumpel I at once thought of the destruction of Jerusalem; if I saw a Portuguese friend up to the ears in debt, I thought of the flight of Mahomed; if I saw the Proctor of the University, a man whose strict sense of justice is well known, I thought of the death of Haman; no sooner did I see Wadzeck that I thought of Cleopatra—ah, good heavens! the poor beast is now dead, her tears are dried, and one may exclaim with Hamlet: 'She was a hag take her for all in all, we shall oft look upon her like again!' As I said, dates are quite necessary. I know people who had nothing in their heads but a few dates, and who knew how to find the right houses in Berlin by the help of them, and who have now reached the position of respectable professors. While at school these numbers caused me endless anguish! But arithmetic proper was worse still. I understood subtraction best, and there we have a very useful rule: 'We can't take four from three, therefore we have to borrow one';—but I advise everybody in such cases to borrow a few pence more, for one can never know.

But as to Latin, fair lady, you have no idea how complicated that is! The Romans would certainly not have had time to conquer the world, if they had first had to learn Latin. These happy people knew while yet in their cradles which nouns take 'im' in the accusative. But I had to learn this by heart in the sweat of my brow; still it is well that I know it. For, if on the occasion of my public Latin speech on the rostrum at Göttingen on the 20th of July 1825,—fair lady, I was worth listening to—I had said sinapem instead of sinapim, possibly the freshmen present might have noticed it, and this would have been an everlasting disgrace to me. Vis, buris, sitis, tussis, cucumis, amussis, canabis, sinapis—these words have made much noise in the world, simply because they form a definite class and yet remain exceptions. For this reason I hold them in great honor. Besides, they are always at hand if I should ever suddenly want to make use of them, and this gives me much inward peace and comfort in many a dark hour of my life. But, fair lady, the irregular verbs—the difference between them and the regular verbs is that the former are the cause of more floggings—the irregular verbs are most terribly difficult. In the dark cloisters of the Franciscan Convent, not far from the schoolroom, there used to hang a great grey crucifix, a terrible picture which even now sometimes haunts my dreams and looks at me mournfully with fixed and bleeding eyes;—I often stood before this picture and prayed: 'O thou poor Divinity, equally tortured with myself, if it be possible, let me keep the irregular verbs in my head.'

Of Greek I will not even speak, or I shall grow too angry. The monks of the Middle Ages were not altogether mistaken when they declared Greek to be an invention of the devil. God knows the sufferings to which it subjected me. With Hebrew I fared better, for I always had a great predilection for the Jews, although they crucify my good name down to this hour. But I could not get on in Hebrew as well as my watch did, which was on intimate terms with money-lenders, and thus learned many a Jewish habit—for example, not to go on a Saturday, and to speak the sacred language which it afterwards studied grammatically, as I often heard to my astonishment in sleepless nights when it ticked to itself in these words: 'Katal, katalta, katalti-kittel, kittalta, kittalti-pokat, pokadeti-pikat, pik-pik . . .'

However, I understood German better, and that is not so very easy. For we poor Germans, who are already sufficiently burdened with having soldiers quartered upon us, with military duties, taxes, and a thousand other expenses, have saddled ourselves into the bargain with a nobility, and torment one another with dative and accusative cases. A great part of the German language I learnt from old Rector Schallmeyer, a good clergyman who had been interested in me from my childhood. But I also learnt some of it from Professor Schramm, who had written a book on everlasting peace, and in whose class my schoolfellows used to quarrel more than in any other class.

Whilst writing on in this strain and thinking of many things, I have imperceptibly got on the subject of old school stories, and I will avail myself of this opportunity, fair lady, to show you that it was not my fault that I learnt so little geography as not to be afterwards able to find my way about the world. At that time the French had altered all the frontiers. Every day some country or other was newly illuminated; those formerly blue suddenly became green, many even became as red as blood, the populations given in our school-books got so mixed up that no one could make head or tail of them. The products of the countries too were changed; onions and beet-roots now grew where formerly there had been only hares and sportive young noblemen. Even the characters of the peoples changed; the Germans became agile, the French ceased paying compliments, the English left off throwing their money away right and left, and the Venetians were no longer sly enough. Among the princes there was much promotion; old kings received new uniforms, new kingdoms were baked and sold off like hot rolls, whilst many potentates were sent about their business and had to earn their bread in another manner; some therefore learned a trade when young, made sealing-wax or . . . Fair lady, at last my sentence must come to an end, as I am out of breath: the long and the short of it is, that at such times one cannot learn much geography.

In this respect natural history is better, for here there cannot be many changes, and we get distinct engravings of monkeys, kangaroos, zebras, rhinoceros, etc. As these pictures were firmly impressed upon my memory, it afterwards often happened that many people at first sight seemed to me like old friends.

In mythology also things went well. My chief delight was in that crew of gods who ruled the world in their frank nudity. I do not think that any schoolboy in old Rome ever got his chief articles of faith, viz., the love episodes of Venus, better by heart than I did. Honestly speaking, as we had to learn all the gods off by heart we ought to have remembered them, and perhaps we are not much better off with our modern doctrine of the Romish Trinity or even of the Jewish Unity. Perhaps this mythology was really not so immoral as it has been called, and Homer showed a strong sense of propriety in giving that much-wooed Venus a husband.

But I fared best of all in the French class of the Abbé d'Aulnois, a French émigré, who had written many grammars, wore a red wig, and jumped about merrily when he recited his Art Poétique and his Histoire Allemande. He was the only person in the whole school who taught German history. However, French, too, has its difficulties, and in order to learn it we require to have soldiers quartered upon us and much drumming through the streets; there must be much apprendre par cœur and above all one must not be a bête allemande. I had to learn many a hard word. I remember well, as though it had only happened yesterday, that I experienced much discomfort owing to the word religion. Full six times I was asked: 'Henry, what is faith in French?' And six times, each time in a more melancholy voice than before, I replied: Le crédit. And the seventh time the enraged examiner cried out with a very red face: 'It is la religion;'—and I got a sound whipping to the amusement of all my comrades. Fair lady, since then I never hear the word religion without feeling my back pale with fright and my cheeks redden with shame. And honestly speaking, I have found le crédit more useful to me in life than la religion:—I have just remembered that I still owe the landlord of the Lion at Bologna five dollars. And I would promise to owe him another five dollars, if I only need never hear again in this life that miserable word la religion.

Parbleu, Madame! I have learned a great deal of French! Not only do I understand Patois, but even the polite French of nursemaids. Not long ago, at a fashionable party, I could understand nearly half the conversation of two German countesses, each of whom was over sixty-four years of age, and counted as many ancestors. What is more, at the Café Royal in Berlin I heard Monsieur Hans Michel Martens talk French, and could understand every word, though there was an utter want of sense in all he said. One must know the genius of a language, and that can best be learned by means of drums. Parbleu! How much I owe that French drummer who was quartered upon us for such a long time, and who looked like a devil, while at heart he was of an angelic disposition and drummed most excellently.

His figure was small and lithe, and he had a heavy black moustache, and very protruding lips; and his fiery eyes rolled about restlessly.

As a small boy I stuck to him like a burr, and helped him to polish up his buttons and to pipe clay his waistcoat—for Monsieur Le Grand was somewhat vain—and I followed him on guard, to the roll-call and on parade, where there was nothing but merriment and glittering arms; 'Les jours de fête sont passés!' Monsieur Le Grand only knew a little broken German, only the most essential words like—bread, kiss, honor—and yet on the drum he could easily make himself understood. For example, when I did not know the meaning of liberté he beat the Marseillaise, and I understood the meaning of égalité; he beat the march, Ça ira, ça ira—les aristocrates à la lanterne—and I understood him. When I did not understand bétise, he beat the Dessauer March, to which we Germans, according to Goethe, had marched in Champagne—and I understood him. Once he wanted to explain to me the word l'Allemagne, and he played that ancient and ridiculously simple melody which is often played on market days for dancing dogs, namely Dum-Dum-Dum; I was vexed, but I understood him.

In a similar manner he taught me modern history. To be sure I did not understand his spoken words, but as he always beat his drum during our conversation, I knew what he wanted to say. This is really the best method of teaching. One fully comprehends the story of the storming of the Bastille, of the Tuileries, etc., only when one knows what they beat on their drums on those occasions. In our school compendiums we read merely—"Their Excellencies the Barons and Lords and their worthy wives were beheaded; their highnesses the dukes and princes and their very worthy spouses were beheaded; his majesty the king and his most worthy consort were beheaded;"—but when one hears the bloody guillotine march, then one understands thoroughly all this and gets to know the

Why and the Wherefore of it. Fair lady, it is a wonderful march! The first time I heard it, it seemed to pierce the marrow of my bones, and I was glad to forget it. One forgets such things when one is older: a young man has to keep so much other knowledge in his head nowadays—Whist, Boston, Genealogical tables, Parliamentary decrees, Dramaturgy, the Liturgy, Carving—and really, in spite of cudgeling my brain for a long while, I could not remember that stirring melody. But only think, fair lady, not long ago I was dining with a whole menagerie of dukes, princes, princesses, chamberlains, ladies in waiting, cupbearers, ladies of the bed-chamber, ladies of the plate, ladies of the chase, and by whatever other titles these distinguished servants may be called, and their subordinates ran behind their chairs, putting filled plates in front of them; but I, who had been passed by and forgotten, sat idle without even stroking my beard; I rolled bread-crumbs together, and drummed my fingers to while away the time, and to my despair, suddenly found myself drumming the bloody, long-forgotten guillotine march.

'And what happened?' Fair lady, these people never allow themselves to be disturbed at meals, and do not know that other people, when they have nothing to eat, suddenly begin to beat their drums, and to play very curious marches, supposed to have been long forgotten.

Whether the art of drumming is inborn with me, or whether I cultivated it at an early age, it matters not; but it seems to have taken possession of all my limbs, of hands and feet, and shows itself sometimes quite spontaneously. At Berlin I once attended the lectures of Geheimrath Schmalz, a man who saved the State by his book on the dangers of the Reds and the Black Coats. You will remember, fair lady, that according to Pausanias, a conspiracy equally dangerous was discovered through the braying of an ass; and you also know from Livy, or from Becher's Universal History, that the Capitol was saved by geese, and from Sallust that owing to a gossiping hussey, Lady Fulvia, the dreadful conspiracy of Catiline was discovered. But to return to our 'sheep.' I was following Geheimrath Schmalz's lectures on the rights of nations one weary summer afternoon, and sat on my form, hearing less and less, and nodding my head, when suddenly I was awakened by the sound of my own feet which had remained awake, and which had probably heard that the exact opposite of the rights of nations was being propounded, and that constitutionalism was being condemned; and my feet with their poor little corns, which can see through human life better than the Geheimrath with his great Juno eyes,—these poor dumb feet, unable to give voice to their opinion, tried to make themselves understood by drumming on the floor. But they drummed so loudly that I almost came to grief.

D—d thoughtless feet! They once played me a similar trick at Göttingen, when I was Professor Saalfeld's guest, who jumped up from his lecturer's chair, violently though clumsily gesticulating, and worked himself into a passion the better to abuse the Emperor. No, poor feet, it is not to be wondered at that you drummed on the floor, and I should not have thought it strange if you had expressed yourselves still more forcibly in your dumb simplicity. How can I, a pupil of Le Grand, hear the Emperor abused? The Emperor, the Emperor, the great Emperor!

When I think of the great Emperor, it brings back a vision of golden summer. A long avenue of flowering lindens rises up before me; nightingales sit singing on the richly laden branches; the waterfall roars; the flowers on the round flowerbeds dreamily wave their graceful heads. We held wondrous communion together; painted tulips greeted me condescendingly with proud humility; delicate lilies nodded with sad tenderness; blood-red roses smiled at me from afar; night-stocks sighed. I had not as yet any acquaintance with myrtles and laurels, for they had no bright blossoms to attract me, but I was on specially intimate terms with mignonette, with which at present I have fallen out. I am talking of the palace-garden at Düsseldorf, where I often used to lie on the grass, listening attentively while Monsieur Le Grand was telling us of the Emperor's campaigns, at the same time beating the marches which were used at that period, so that I saw the army marching across the Simplon—the Emperor leading the way and the brave grenadiers climbing up behind, whilst the startled birds of prey screamed harshly, and the glaciers thundered in the distance. I saw the Emperor clasp the standard on the bridge of Lodi—I saw the Emperor in his gay cloak at Marengo—I saw the Emperor on horseback at the battle of the Pyramids—nothing but smoke and mamelukes—I saw the Emperor at the battle of Austerlitz—brr! how the balls whizzed over the slippery ice—I saw, I heard the battle of Jena—dum, dum, dum—I saw, I heard the battle of Eilau, of Wagram . . . ah, I could hardly bear it! Monsieur Le Grand beat his drum till the drum of my ear was nearly cracked.

But what were my feelings when my eyes were first blessed by the sight of him, of the Emperor himself. Hosannah!

It was in the avenue of the Palace gardens at Düsseldorf. As I pressed through the staring crowd, I thought of the deeds and battles which Monsieur Le Grand had described to me on his drum; my heart beat the great march—and yet, I thought at the same time of the police regulation which prohibited any one riding down the avenue under a penalty of five dollars. But the Emperor with his retinue rode down the avenue, and as he passed the shuddering trees bent before him; sunbeams quivered inquisitively and timidly through the green foliage, and up in the blue heavens could be seen a golden star. The Emperor wore his plain green uniform and his small historic hat. He rode a little white horse, which stepped with proud dignity, safely and daintily. Had I been the Crown Prince of Prussia at that time, I should have been jealous of the tiny steed. The Emperor sat his horse carelessly, almost bent double, holding the reins with one hand, and with the other patting his horse's neck good-naturedly. It was a gleaming, marble hand, a mighty hand, one of those hands which had tamed the hydra-headed monster anarchy, and which had settled the quarrels between nation and nation—and it patted the horse's neck good-humoredly. Even his face was of the same color as the ancient Greek and Roman busts; its features were nobly formed and on it was written: 'Thou shalt have none other Gods but me.' A smile, cheering and comforting to every heart, played about his lips—and yet one knew these lips need only whistle—et la Prusse n'existait plus—only whistle—and down went the clergy—only whistle—and the Holy Roman Empire was in commotion. There was a smile on his lips and in his eyes. His glance was clear as the sky; he could read men's hearts; with one glance he embraced all earthly things, whilst other mortals could only see them one by one and even then not clearly. His brow was less clear; on it sat the ghosts of future battles, and sometimes it throbbed with the creative thoughts, those great seven-league-boot thoughts, with which his spirit stalked invisibly through the world. And I think each one of these thoughts would have furnished a German writer of that period sufficient material to write upon for the whole of his life.

The Emperor rode quietly down the avenue; no policeman stood there to prevent him from going that way; behind him rode his train of servants, proudly seated on snorting steeds covered with golden trappings. The drums beat, the trumpets sounded; next to me mad Aloysius turned summersaults, calling out the names of his generals; not far off the drunken Gumpertz bellowed, and crowds of people called out vociferously 'Long live the Emperor.'

HERR SCHLEGEL

A German poet was in old days a man who wore a threadbare ragged coat, supplied verses for a few dollars upon the occasion of a christening or a marriage, and enjoyed good liquor instead of good society, being turned from its doors; and indeed he often lay drunk in the gutter, tenderly kissed by Luna's compassionate beams. In old age such men sank even lower in their wretchedness, and it was indeed a state of misery without a care, or rather its only care was to know where most Schnapps could be had for the least money.

Such had always been my conception of a German poet. How pleasant was my surprise then in 1819, when I went to the University of Bonn as a very young man, and had the honor of meeting face to face the poet A. W. Schlegel, a man of genius. With the exception of Napoleon, he was the first great man I had seen, and I shall never forget that sublime moment. Even now I can feel the blessed tremor that passed through my soul when I stood before his desk and heard him speak.

I was wearing a white Petersham coat, a red cap, long fair hair and no gloves. But Herr A. W. Schlegel was wearing kid gloves, and was dressed in the latest Paris fashion; he wore the perfume of good society and eau de millefleurs: he was neatness and elegance in person and when he spoke of the Lord Chancellor of England, he added, 'my friend,' and near him stood his servant in the baronial livery of the House of Schlegel, and snuffed the wax candles which burned in silver candlesticks that stood next to a glass of sugar and water on the desk in front of the great man.

A liveried servant! Wax candles! Silver candlesticks! my friend, the Lord Chancellor of England! Kid gloves! Sugar and water! What unheard of things at the lectures of a German professor. This magnificence dazzled us young men not a little and myself especially, and I addressed three odes to Herr Schlegel.

GÖTTINGEN

The town of Göttingen, famous for its sausages and its University, belongs to the King of Hanover and contains 999 fire-places, several churches, a lying-in hospital, an observatory, a library, a town-cellar where the beer is very good. . . . The town itself is very beautiful and is most pleasing when you turn your back on it. It must have been standing for a very long time, for I remember when I matriculated there five years ago, and very soon afterwards was rusticated, it had the same grey, aged, wise appearance and was fully equipped with rattles, bulldogs, dissertations, thés dansant, washerwomen, compendia, roast pigeons, Guelphish orders, coaches, pipe-bowls, councillors of the Senate, councillors of justice and councillors for expulsion, professors and other fools. Some will have it that the town was built at the time of the emigration of nations and that every German stock left behind there a sample of its offspring and that from these come the Vandals, Frisians, Swabians, Teutons, Saxons, Thuringians, etc., who pass through the Weender Strasse in Göttingen in hordes and are distinguished by the color of their caps and the tassels of their pipes, and are forever fighting with each other on the bloody battlefields of the Roscnmühle, the Ritchsenkrug and Booden, and in manners and customs still live in the times of the emigration of nations, and are ruled partly by the duces, who are called Cocks, partly by their aboriginal book of statutes, which is called the Commentary and deserves a place in the legibus barbarorum.

You may read more concerning the town of Göttingen easily enough in the Topography of K. F. H. Marx. Although I cherish the most sacred of obligations to the author, who was my doctor and showed much affection for me, I cannot unreservedly recommend his work, and I must lodge this complaint that he has not contradicted flatly enough the false idea that the feet of the women of Göttingen are too large. Indeed, I have for a year and a day been busy with a serious contravention of this idea, and I have taken lectures in comparative anatomy on the subject; I have made extracts from most rare books in the library, and I have for hours together made a study of the feet of the ladies who passed along the Weender Strasse, and in the erudite dissertation which is to receive the results of these studies I shall write (1) of feet generally, (2) of feet among the ancients, (3) of the feet of elephants, (4) of the feet of the women of Göttingen, (5) I shall summarize what has already been said of these feet in Ullrich's gardens, (6) I shall consider these feet in relation to each other, and finally (7) if I can write so long a thesis I shall append copper-plates of the feet of the ladies of Göttingen.

A man has to live here like a solitary, for he can do nothing but cram. That was what induced me to go to the place. Often, as I loafed in the avenue of weeping willows of my paradise at Beul in the gloaming I saw hovering before me in apotheosis the shining genius of cram, in nightgown and trousers, holding out Macheldey's Institutions in one hand and with the other pointing away to the towers of Georgia Augusta. Then the clear waves of the Rhine murmured to me:

Cram, thou German youngster, study,
Chase thy tail, and chase away;
Else thou'lt rue it and be sorry
For thy frittered, dawdling day.

A MEETING WITH GOETHE

'Weimar, October 1, 1824.

Your Excellency,—I ask you to grant me the happiness of being in your presence for a few minutes. I will not trouble you much. I will only kiss your hand and depart. My name is H. Heine; I am a Rhinelander, and am lately come into residence at Göttingen, and I lived for several years in Berlin, where I enjoyed the society of many of your old acquaintances and admirers (such as Wolf, Varnhagen, etc.), and learned every day to love you more. I, too, am a poet, and three years ago I took the liberty of sending you my Poems, and a year and a half ago my Tragedies, together with a Lyrical Intermezzo (Ratcliff and Almansor). I am ill, and thus weeks ago I journeyed to the Harz Mountains for my health; and as I stood on the Brocken I was seized by a desire to make a pilgrimage to Weimar to pay my respects to Goethe. In the proper sense of the word I have made my pilgrimage hither, that is, on foot and in ragged clothes; and now I await the granting of my prayer.' . . .

Indeed, I found in Goethe most perfectly that accord of personality and genius which one expects in extraordinary men. His outward appearance was as significant as the phrases that live in his writings; his face was harmonious, clear, joyous, nobly proportioned, and one might study Greek art in him as in an antique. His dignified body was never cramped by the crawling humility of Christianity: his features were never distorted by Christian paroxysms of grief; there was not in his eyes the fearfulness of the Christian sinner, nor did they look gleaming in devotion heavenwards; no, his eyes were as serene as those of a god. Goethe's eyes remained as god-like in old age as they were in youth. Time had covered his head with snow but it could not bow it. He bore it high and proudly, and when he held out his hand, it was as though he could prescribe for the stars in the heavens the way that they should follow. Round his lips there was to be remarked a line of egoism; but this line is peculiar to the gods eternal, to the father of the gods, great Jupiter, with whom I have already compared Goethe. Indeed, when I visited him at Weimar, and stood face to face with him, I looked involuntarily aside to see whether I could not find the eagle with the lightnings in his beak. I was very near addressing him in Greek; but then I observed that he understood German, so I told him in German that the plums on the road between Jena and Weimar tasted very good. I had thought out on so many winter nights what sublime and profound things I should say to Goethe

if ever I were to see him. And when at length I did see him I told him that the plums of Saxony tasted very good. And Goethe smiled. He smiled with those lips with which he had kissed fair Leda, and Europa, and Danaë, and Semele, and so many other princesses or nymphs.

LONDON

What strange creatures men are. In our own country we growl, and every stupidity, every perverseness, makes us angry; and, like boys, we wish every day to run away from it into the wide, wide world, but when we do go into the wide, wide world it is too wide for us, and we long secretly for the narrow stupidities and perverseness of home, and want to be sitting once more in the old familiar room, and to build us a house behind the stove, and cower there in the warmth, and read the Allgemeine Anzeiger der Deutschen. So it was with me on my journey to England. Hardly had I lost sight of the German coast than there sprang to life in me a curious after-love for those Teutonic night-caps and periwigs which I had just left so ill-humoredly, and when the Fatherland was gone from my sight I found it again in my heart.

I have seen the most remarkable phenomenon that the world has to show to the amazed mind of man. I have seen it and am still amazed. In my memory their remains the stone forest of houses and in between the surging stream of vivid human faces, with all their gay passions, with all their horrible flurry of love and hunger and hate—I mean London.

Send a philosopher to London: but, on pain of your life, not a poet! Send a philosopher thither and set him at the corner of Cheapside, and he will learn more there than from all the books of the last Leipzig fair; and as the waves of human beings roar about him there will arise before him a sea of new thoughts, the eternal spirit which hovers over the place will waft him up and suddenly reveal to him the most hidden secrets of the social order, and he will hear with his ears and see with his eyes the beating pulse of the world—for, if London is the right hand of the world, the active, strong right hand, then that street which leads from the Exchange to Downing Street must be regarded as the pulse of the world.

But do not send a poet to London! The mere seriousness of everything, the colossal uniformity, the machine-like movement, the shrillness even of joy—this over-driven London oppresses fancy and rends the heart. And if you send a German poet thither, a dreamer who stands before everything that he sees, ragged beggar women or gleaming goldsmith's shop—oh! then, he will be in a bad way and he will be jostled on all sides and trampled under foot with a mild 'God damn!'

I had resolved not to be astonished at the magnificence of London, of which I had heard so much. But I was like the poor schoolboy who had made up his mind not to feel the thrashing that he was about to receive. He failed because he had expected the usual blows with the usual stick as usual upon his back, and instead of that he received an unusual number of strokes on an unusual place with a thin cane. I expected great palaces and saw nothing but little houses. But the very monotony of them, and the infinite number of them, make a powerful impression. . . .

It is eight years since I went to London to make the acquaintance of the language and the people! The devil take the people and their language! They take a dozen words of one syllable into their mouth, chew them, gnaw them, spit them out again and they call that talking. Fortunately, they are by nature rather silent, and although they look at us with gaping mouths yet they spare us long conversations.

I will confess that if I could stomach nothing in England, neither the people nor the cooking, the reason for it was really in myself. I brought a good stock of ill-temper with me from home, and I increased it among a people who can only kill their boredom in the whirlpool of political and mercantile activity. The perfection of machinery, which is used everywhere in England and has taken over so many human functions, is for me not a little disquieting: this clever driving of wheels, and rods, and cylinders, and a thousand different sorts of little loops and pegs and teeth which move almost with passion, filled me with horror. The certainty, the exactness, the great madness, and the punctiliousness of life in England made me not a little unhappy; for just as the machines in England appear like human beings, so do the human beings appear like machines.

But there is nothing like the black mood that came over me once when I stood in the evening on Waterloo Bridge and looked down at the waters of the Thames. It was as though my soul were mirrored in them, as though it were looking up at me out of the water with all its wounds. Then the most miserable thoughts came into my head. I thought of the rose which has been anointed with vinegar, and has lost its sweetest scents and withered too soon. I thought of the lost butterfly which a naturalist who climbed Mont Blanc saw fluttering there all alone between walls of ice. I thought of the tame she-ape who was so accustomed to men, and played and ate with them; but one fine day she recognized in the dish that was laid before them her own young, and she snatched it away and rushed into the forest with it, and never again appeared among her human friends. Ah! I was so woe-begone, that the hot tears gushed from my eyes. They fell down into the Thames and were carried away into the great sea which has already swallowed up so many human tears without noticing them.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS IN PARIS

I had done and suffered much, and when the sun of the July Revolution rose in France I was very weary and stood in need of some relaxation. The air of my own country was every day more unwholesome for me, and I had seriously to think of a change of climate, and I had visions; the clouds oppressed me and cut all sorts of terrible capers before me. Often I thought the sun was a Prussian cockade; at night I dreamed of an ugly black vulture that ate my liver, and I was very melancholy. I also made the acquaintance of an old judge of Berlin who had passed many years in the fortress of Spandau, and he told me how unpleasant it is to have to wear irons in winter. It seemed to me very unchristian not to warm the irons a little. If our chains were warmed a little they would not make so unpleasant an impression, and even men of a chilly nature could then bear them well; care should also be taken to scent fetters with roses and laurel as they do here in this country. I asked my old judge if he had often been given oysters to eat in Spandau. He said, 'No,' and that Spandau was far from the sea. Meat, too, he said, was rare there, and there was no other winged creature than the flies that fell into the soup. At the same time I made the acquaintance of a French commis voyageur, who traveled in wine and could not praise enough the jolly life of Paris, saying how the sky is hung with fiddles, and how they sing from morning to night the Marseillaise and En avant, marchons! and Lafayette aux cheveux blancs, and how liberty, equality, and fraternity are written up at all the street corners; incidentally, he praises the champagne of his firm, of whose cards he gave me a great number, and he promised me letters of introduction to the best Parisian restaurants, in case I should ever visit the capital in search of pleasure. And now as some sort of recreation is necessary, and Spandau is too far from the sea to eat oysters there, and the fly-soup of Spandau did not attract me much, and also the Prussian chains are very cold in winter and would not be good for my health, I made up my mind to go to Paris and in the fatherland of champagne and the Marseillaise to drink the one and to hear the other, together with En avant, marchons! and Lafayette aux cheveux blancs.

On May 1, 1831, I crossed the Rhine. I did not see the old river god, Father Rhine; I contented myself with throwing my visiting card into the water. I only saw the cathedral of Strasbourg from a distance; he wagged his head like good Old Eckart when he sees a youngster going to the Venusberg.

At Saint Denis I awoke from a sweet morning sleep and heard for the first time the cry of the driver: 'Paris! Paris!'—and the handbells of the cocoa-sellers. Here already you breathe the air of the capital which is visible on the horizon. An old rascal of a tout tried to persuade me to visit the tombs of the kings, but I had not come to France to see the kings; I contented myself with letting the guide tell me the legends of the place, how, for instance, the wicked Pagan king had Saint Denis's head cut off, and the Saint ran from Paris to Saint Denis with his head in his hand to be buried there, and to have the place called after him. 'If you think,' said my guide, 'if you think of the distance you cannot but be amazed at the miracle that any one could go so far on foot without a head"—and he added with a strange smile: Dans des cas pareils il n'y a que le premier pas qui coûte. It was worth two francs and I gave them to him pour l'amour de Voltaire, whose mocking smile I had already met in him. In twenty minutes I was in Paris, and entered through the triumphal arch of the Boulevard Saint Denis, which was originally erected in honor of Louis XIV, but now ¹⁰ served to glorify my entry in Paris. I was really surprised by the crowd of gay people, dressed very tastefully like fashion-plates. I was impressed by them all speaking French, which is with us the mark of ¹⁵ the polite world; but everybody is as polite here as the aristocracy in my country. The men were all so courteous, and the lovely ladies all so smiling. If anyone jostled me without at once begging my ²⁰ pardon, then I could wager that he was a fellow-countryman; and if ever a pretty woman looked sourly, then she had either been eating Sauerkraut or could read Klopstock in the original. I found every- ²⁵ thing so amusing, and the sky was so blue, and the air so sweet, so generous, and the beams of the July sun flickered hither and thither; the cheeks of the fair Lutetia were touched with the flaming kisses of that sun, ³⁰ and in her bosom her bridal nosegay was not yet withered. At the street corners Liberté, égalité, fraternité had in places been erased.

I sought at once the restaurants for ³⁵ which I had my letters of introduction; the proprietors assured me that they would have received me without letters of introduction, that I had such an honest and distinguished appearance as to be a recom- ⁴⁰ mendation in itself. Never did a German cookshop-keeper say the like to me, even if he thought it; such a fellow thinks he must say nothing pleasant, and that his German frankness compels him only to say ⁴⁵ to one's face disagreeable things. In the manners and speech of the French there is so much of that precious flattery that costs so little and yet is so kindly and refreshing. My poor sensitive soul, that often recoiled ⁵⁰ in shyness from German coarseness, opened out to the flattering sounds of French urbanity. God gave us our tongues so that we might say pleasant things to our fellow-men.

There was a hitch in my French when I arrived; but after half an hour's conversation with a little flower-seller in the Passage de l'Opéra, my French, which had grown rusty since the Battle of Waterloo, became fluent again and I stumbled about in the most gallant conjugations and explained to my little friend the Linnæan system, by which flowers are classified according to the filaments; she herself followed another method and divided the flowers into those which smelled sweet and those which smelled offensively. I believed that she applied the same method of classification to men. She was astonished that I was so learned, in spite of my youth, and she trumpeted the fame of my learning through all the Passage de l'Opéra. I drank in delightedly the sweet scents of flattery and was much amused. I walked on flowers, and many a roast pigeon flew into my open gaping maw. What amusing things I saw on my arrival! All the notabilities of public pleasure and official absurdity.

Paris delighted me much with the cheeriness which appears in everything, and influences even the most doleful disposition. Strange! Paris is the scene of the greatest tragedies of the history of the world, tragedies in the memory of which hearts in the most distant lands tremble, and eyes grow wet; but it is with the spectator of these great tragedies as it was once with me when I saw the Tour de Nesle at the ³⁵ Porte St. Martin. I was sitting behind a lady who was wearing a hat of rose-red gauze, and this hat was so wide that it cut off altogether my view of the stage, so that I could see the tragedy enacted through the red gauze of the hat, so that all the horrors of the Tour de Nesle appeared in the ⁴⁰ rosiest light. Yes, there is such a rosy light in Paris, which makes bright every tragedy for the spectator, so that it does not touch his enjoyment of life, and so the terrors which we bring to Paris lose their most bitter sting. Sorrows are strangely softened. In the air of Paris wounds are healed quicker than anywhere else; there is something so noble, so gentle, so sweet in the air, as in the people themselves.

The winter season began soon after my arrival in Paris and I entered into the life of the salons, in which society moves about more or less merrily. What struck me as most interesting in this society was not so ⁵⁵ much the equality of its fine manners as the differences between its component parts. Often, as I looked at the people in a great salon, gathered there peacefully, it was like being in one of those curiosity shops where the relics of all ages lie about higgledy-piggledy. A Greek Apollo next a Chinese pagoda, a Mexican Vizli-pizli next a Gothic Ecce homo, Egyptian idols with dog's heads, sacred grotesques of wood, ivory, metal, etc. There I saw old musketeers, who had once danced with Marie Antoinette; Republicans of the indulgent Observant, who had been idolised in the National Assembly; Montagnards without pity or stain; former men of the Directorate who had been enthroned in the Luxembourg, high dignitaries of the Empire, before whom all Europe had trembled; ruling Jesuits of the Restoration; in short, all the decayed deposed gods of old times, in whom all faith is lost. Their names cry aloud when they are stoned, but the people stand near each other peacefully and amicably, like the antiquities in the shops of the Quai Voltaire. In Germanic countries where the passions are less amenable to discipline such a sociable living together of such heterogeneous people would be impossible, and in the cold north the need of talking is not so strong as in warmer France where the greatest enemies, if they meet in a salon, cannot long maintain gloomy silence. In France pleasure-seeking is carried to such a pitch that the French are for ever striving to please not only their friends but also their enemies. They are for ever dressing up and cutting capers, and the women have to look to it to surpass the men in coquetry; but they succeed.

I do not wish to convey any ill meaning in this observation, no ill meaning, I mean, as regards the French women and last of all as regards the Parisian women. I am their greatest admirer, and I admire them for their faults even more than for their virtues. I know nothing more apt than the legend that Parisian women came into the world with every possible fault, but that a good fairy has taken pity on them and cast a spell on every one of their faults so that they have the effect of new attractions. This good fairy is Charm.

'HERE LIES A GERMAN POET'

It was the foolish arrogance of the German poet which withheld me from becoming a Frenchman, even only pro forma. It was an idea, a whim, from which I could not free myself. I have ever been free in mind of what is usually called patriotism, but I could not away with a certain horror if I were to do anything which might appear in any degree to be a renunciation of the Fatherland. Even in the minds of the most enlightened there lurks always a remnant of the old superstition which cannot be expelled; one does not like to speak of it, but in the most secret crannies of his soul it lives on. My marriage with our dear Lady Germany, the blonde Bearskin, had never been happy. I remember lovely moonlight nights when she held me tenderly to her large bosom—but I cannot tell you of those sentimental nights, and toward morning there was ever a boredom and a coldness, and then began the endless scolding. In the end we lived apart in both bed and board. But it never came to an actual breach. I have never been able to conquer my heart, or to renounce a German cat or a German dog, however insupportable their fleas and loyalty might be to me. The smallest sucking-pig of my native country cannot complain of me in this respect. In the midst of the distinguished and witty swine of Perigord, who nosed up truffles and batted on them, I did not calumniate the modest grunTERS who at home in the forest of Teutoburg feed on the fruit of the oak of the fatherland out of the wooden trough, as once their pious forbears did at the time when Arminius fought Varus. I have not lost a bristle of my Germanity, not a single frill of my German cap, and I have still the vigor to fix on to it the black, red and gold cockade. No: I have not exposed myself to such disgrace. Naturalization may do for other people; a drunken lawyer, a visionary with a brow of iron and a nose of brass might, in order to snap up a schoolmaster's job, give up his Fatherland which knows nothing of him—but it is not fitting for a German poet, who has written the most beautiful of German songs. It would be a horrible, crazy idea for me if I had to say to myself, 'I am a German poet and at the same time a naturalized Frenchman.' I should seem to myself like one of those abortions with two heads, whom one sees in booths at fairs. It would hamper me terribly in my writing if I were to think that one head was beginning to scan the most unnatural Alexandrines in French turkey-cock pathos, while the other was pouring out its sentiments in its true native meter in the German language. And oh! the verses, like the meter of the French, are insupportable to me, perfumed trifles. I can scarcely put up with their odorless poets. When I consider the so-called Poésie lyrique of the French, then I recognize the splendor of German poetry and then I can plume myself on having won my laurels in that realm. We will not give up a leaf of them, and the mason who has to adorn our last resting-10 place with an inscription will not have to expect any contradiction when he carves there the words: 'Here lies a German poet.'

HEINE'S LAST WISHES

I ask that my funeral should be as simple as possible, and that the expenses of my interment should not exceed the amount
 20 of those of the smallest citizen. Although I belong to the Lutheran confession by the act of baptism, I do not desire that the ministers of that church should be invited to my burial; and I object to any other sort
 25 of priest officiating at my funeral. This objection does not spring from any sort of free-thinking prejudice. For the last four years I have renounced all pride of philosophy and returned to religious ideas and 30 feelings. I die in faith in one God, the eternal Creator of the World, whose pity I beseech for my immortal soul. I regret having sometimes spoken of sacred things without due reverence in my writings, but 35 I was led astray more by the spirit of the time than by my own inclination. If I have unwittingly offended against good morals and the morality which is the true essence of all monotheistic doctrines of 40 faith, I do ask pardon of God and man. I forbid any speech being made at my graveside either in German or French. At the same time, I express a wish that my fellow-countrymen, however happily the destinies
 45 of our native country should shape themselves, should never carry my ashes to Germany. I have never cared to devote my personality to political mummery. It has been the great task of my life to work
 50 for a sincere understanding between Germany and France and to upset the plots of the enemies of democracy, who exploit international prejudices and animosities for their own uses. I believe that I have de-55 served well of my fellow-countrymen and of the French, and the claims which I have upon their gratitude are no doubt the most valuable legacy which I can bequeath to my universal legatee. . . .

I do not know if I deserve to have a wreath of laurel laid on my coffin. Though
 5 I love poetry much, it was never more than a sacred plaything, a means consecrated to a heavenly end. I have never held my fame as a poet of much account, and I care little whether my songs are praised or derided.
 10 But lay a sword upon my coffin, I pray you; for I have been a brave soldier in the wars of the liberty of mankind.

THE GRENADIERS

15

Two grenadiers restored to France,
 From Russian bondage came,
 And when they trod on the German sod,
 They hung their heads in shame.

For there were the mournful tidings told, 5
 That Fortune had France forsaken,
 That the army was routed and overthrown,
 And even the Emperor taken.

Full bitterly wept the grenadiers,
 The sorrowful news to learn. 10
 Said one: 'What bitter pangs I feel,
 How my old wound does burn.'

The other said: 'The game is lost,
 And fain would I die with thee,
 But I have a wife and child at home, 15
 Whose life depends on me.'

'I care not—I—for wife or child,
 Far loftier hopes awaken;
 Let wife and child go beg for bread,—
 My Emperor—art thou taken? 20

'Promise me, brother, before I die,
 To grant me my dying prayer,
 To carry me back to my native France,
 And bury my body there.

'The cross of honor on my heart, 25
 With its riband of red must lie;
 My trusty musket in my hand,
 My good sword on my thigh.

'There will I watch like a sentinel,
 And listen with patient heed, 30
 Till the cannon's roar I hear once more,
 And the tramp of the neighing steed.

'Then over my grave, amid clashing swords,
 I shall hear my Emperor ride;
 And ready I'll stand, with my arms in hand, 35
 To fight by my Emperor's side.'

INTERMEZZO

I

'Twas in the lovely month of May
 When blossoms deck the grove,
 Oh, then it was that in my heart
 I felt the birth of love!

'Twas in the lovely month of May, 5
 Loud sang the feathered choir,
 Oh, then it was I owned to her
 My longing and desire!

IV

When I gaze into thine eyes,
 All my pain and sorrow flies; 10
 When thy rosy lips I kiss,
 All is health and strength and bliss.

When I lean upon thy breast,
 'Tis the rapture of the blessed;
 When thou say'st thou lovest me, 15
 I must needs weep bitterly.

X

The timid lotus trembles
 When day is shining bright;
 With downcast head, and drooping,
 She dreamily waits for night. 20

The moon is her chosen lover,
 And waked by her lover's rays,
 To him does the flower uncover
 Her modest and friendly face.

She blooms, and glows, and sparkles, 25
 And silently gazes above;
 She weeps, and sighs, and trembles,
 With mingled pain and love.

XVIII

I'll not repine, no, though my heart-strings break,
 My love for ever lost! I'll not repine. 30
 Beam as thou wilt, yet 'mid thy diamonds'
 blaze,
 No ray of gladness on thy heart shall shine.

I've known it long; I've seen it in my dreams;
 I've mark'd the midnight darkness of thy
 heart;
 I've seen the serpent that thy bosom gnaws;
 I've seen how wretched and how lost thou art. 36

XIX

Yes, thou art wretched, but I'll not complain;—
 My love, we'll both be wretched and forlorn!
 Till death shall ease our suffering hearts
 from pain, 39
 My love, we'll both be wretched and for-
 lorn.

I see the scorn, that on each feature dwells,
 I see the haughty flashes of thine eye,
 I see the pride, with which thy bosom swells,—
 Yet art thou wretched, wretched e'en as I.

For pangs unseen around those features swim, 45
 With secret wounds that haughty breast is torn,
 With secret tears those brilliant eyes are dim,—
 My love, we both are wretched and forlorn.

XXX

Her eyes are two violets blue,
 Her cheeks two roses red, 50
 Her hands two lilies, so pure and white;
 And these are all living, and bloom so bright,
 Only her heart is dead.

XXXIII

A pine-tree stands in the North,
 All lone on a naked height: 55
 He sleeps; and the ice and snow
 Clothe him in robes of white.

He dreams of a slender palm,
 In India's burning zone,
 That stands on a scorching cliff, 60
 Mourning in silence lone.

XXXIX

A young man loves a maiden,
 But she for another has sighed;
 That other, he loves another,
 And makes her at length his bride. 65

The maiden marries, in anger,
 The first adventurous wight
 That chance may fling before her;
 The youth is in piteous plight.

The story is old as ages,
Yet happens again and again;
The last to whom it happened,
His heart is rent in twain.

XLIII

The stories of our childhood
Invite with beckoning hand,
And sing to softest music
About a magic land;

Where full-blown flowerets languish
In evening's golden light,
And mingle lovelorn glances,
In bridal beauty bright;

Where all the trees are vocal,
And all in concert sing,
And tuned to blithest music,
The limpid fountains spring;

And love-strains ring melodious,
Sweet as no tongue can tell,
Till love's resistless longings
Possess thee like a spell.

And, oh! could I be yonder,
And lighten there my breast,
And free from every torture,
Be happy and at rest!

Alas! that land enchanted,
Full oft my dreams display;
But with the dawn of morning,
Like mist it melts away.

LVI

All night I see thee in my dreams,
And see thee smile in welcome sweet,
And loud outweeping, fling myself
Before thee at thy feet.

Thou lookest down so mournfully,
And sadly shak'st thy lily head;
And on me fall the pearly tears
Thy lovely eyes have shed.

Thou breathest soft some secret words,
And giv'st me a branch of cypress hoar;
I wake, and find the branch is gone,
And remember the words no more.

THE RETURN

II

I cannot tell the reason
Why I'm so sad today;

70 A tale of days departed
I cannot drive away.

The air is cool and darkling,
The Rhine flows calm and bright;
The mountain-tops are sparkling
In evening's golden light. 5

75 On yonder rock is seated
A maiden wondrous fair;
Her golden robes are gleaming,—
She combs her golden hair. 10

80 With golden comb she combs it,
And sings a magic song;
Its strain is wild and wondrous,
So thrilling and so strong. 15

The boatman in his shallop
It fills with wild delight;
The rocky reef he sees not,
He gazes at the height. 20

I believe, that at last the billows
Boatman and boat destroy;
And this with her wondrous singing
Was wrought by Lorelei.

III

My heart, my heart is heavy,
Though brightly smiles the May;
I lean against the lime-tree,
High on the bastion gray. 25

Below, the deep blue river
Flows languidly and still;
A boy in his boat is rowing,
And fishing and whistling shrill. 30

Across, in motley mixture,
There rise before the ken,
Meadows, and woods, and oxen,
Villas, and parks, and men. 35

The maids are bleaching linen,
And dance on the grassy floor;
The mill-wheel scatters diamonds,
I hear its distant roar. 40

A sentry-box is standing,
Yon old gray tower below;
A young and lusty red-coat
Is marching to and fro.

He's playing with his rifle,
It gleams in the sunshine red; 45

And now he presents and shoulders—
I wish he would shoot me dead.

XXXVI

Mortal, do not mock the devil,
For the span of life is short; 50
And eternal hell, believe me,
Is no theme for idle sport.

Mortal, pay the debts thou owest,
For the span of life is long;
And thou'lt want when old to borrow, 55
Even as thou did'st when young.

XXXIX

My heart is oppressed and with longing
I think of the days that are gone,
When earth was so gay and delightful, 60
And men lived light-heartedly on.

Now all is so grim and so gloomy,
So jumbled and musty and cold;
Excepting what love we have left us,
There's nothing by which we can hold

XLII

'Worthy friend, how can it help you, 65
Still these stale old songs to fashion?
Wilt thou sit for ever, brooding
O'er the addled eggs of passion?

'Why, it's one eternal hatching!
From the shells the chickens shake them: 70
And they chirp about and flutter,
And straight in a book you bake them.'

XLVII

Thou'rt like a tender floweret,
So pure, so fair, so blessed;
I gaze on thee, and sadness 75
Steals slowly o'er my breast.

I feel as if I ought to lay
My hand upon thy brow,
And pray that God would guard thee 80
As pure and fair as now.

XLVIII

Maiden, it would be thy ruin,
And I strive most earnestly,
To prevent thy gentle bosom
Ever feeling love for me.

But that this should be so easy, 85
Rather hurts me, I confess;
And I ne'er the less would like it,
Wouldst thou love me ne'er the less.

LXX

How on earth shall I discover
Where the silly jade is flown? 90
Swearing with disgust, I've sought her
In each corner of the town.

Every single inn I've been to,
Tramping through the dirt and rain;
And of every saucy waiter 95
Asked about her all in vain.

Ha! I see her at the window,
Nodding with her laughing face;
How could I expect to find you,
Love, in such a splendid place? 100

LXXII

When thou art once my lawful wife,
Thy bliss shall know no measure;
Thy days will pass in a whirl of joy,
In a circle of endless pleasure.

And if thou scoldest, and turnest a shrew, 105
I'll bear it with resignation;
But if thou wilt not praise my songs,
I'll sue for a separation.

LXXXVII

Death is the cooling night,
And life the sultry day: 110
'Tis growing dusk, I long to sleep,
Day wears my strength away.

Over my couch is a spreading tree,
A nightingale sings above;
'E'en in my dreams I hear her sing, 115
She sings all night of love.

PROLOGUE TO THE HARZREISE

Black dress-coats and silken stockings,
Frills and ruffles, white and smart,
Honied speeches and caresses,—
Had they only any heart!

Had they only hearts, and in them 120
Did a spark of feeling glow:
Oh! 'tis death to hear their stories
Of their lying love and woe.

I will climb the hoary mountain,
Where the humble cottage stands; 10
There the mountain-breeze blows freely,
Freely there the heart expands.

I will climb the hoary mountain,
There the Tannen tower on high;
Streams are gushing, birds are singing, 15
And the clouds drive grandly by.

Fare ye well, ye gilded chambers,
Petty lords and ladies small!
I will climb the hoary mountain,
And look down upon you all. 20

AGE DREAMS OF YOUTH

I dreamed that I was once more young and merry
And in the country, high upon a hill,
And down I ran, adown the path, and very Light-hearted were we, tiny Jack and Jill.
How fine she was, how fairly made, my cousin 5
With sea-green eyes that lured like nixey's
eyes,
She stood so firm upon her feet; and thus in Her were grace and strength allied in wondrous wise,
The sweet sound of her voice is true and tender,
One seems to see into her inmost heart, 10
And all she says is wisdom thought doth lend her.
Her mouth is like a rose-bud passing art;
My reason's mine, I love her not and in me
Is nothing that I cannot understand;
And yet she doth disturb and wholly win
me, 15
And with a secret thrill I kiss her hand.
And in the end I think I plucked a flower
And gave it her and said, 'Do marry me,
Dear coz, my dearest, so that from this hour,
Like you I may both good and happy be.' 20
And what her answer was is lost for ever,
For, slowly I awoke—and found myself,
A sick man, sick past all endeavor,
A cripple laid long since upon the shelf.

RETROSPECT

In the kindly kitchen of the earth
I have smelt every smell, and know its worth.
I have drained the world's delight, full measure,

And like a king have had my pleasure.
I have drunk my coffee and eaten buns, 5
Have had dolls in plenty and pretty ones;
Worn silken vests and frock-coats grand,
And jingled my ducats with open hand.
Like Gellert I've ridden a charger high;
A house, and a castle as well, had I, 10
On Fortune's green meadow I lay; the sun
With a glance more golden has greeted none;
A garland of laurel crowned my head,
And odorous dreams sweet fragrance shed:
Of roses I dreamed and eternal May; 15
In an idle twilit trance I lay,
And into my mouth roast pigeons flew,
And dear little angels came and drew Champagne from their pockets to quench my thirst . . .

Alas! for my dreams—the soap-bubbles burst— 20
And now I lie on the grass in the damp,
My joints are rheumatic and twisted with cramp;
My body is chilled to the bone, I am lame,
And my soul is burdened and bowed with
shame.
Each joy, each pleasure, has cost me double 25
Its worth in vexation of spirit and trouble.
Of bitter woe my drink has been,
I have been stung by things unclean,
Harassed have been by gloomy sorrow,
Have had to lie, have had to borrow 30
From gilded fools, from filthy hags,
Have even had to beg in rags.
And now I'm tired of running round,—
Would fain be snoring underground.
My Christian brothers above, goodbye! 35
Of course we'll meet again on high.

WRITTEN IN 1829

Give me a wide and noble field,
Where there at least is room to die!
O from this narrow huckstering world,
Ere I am stifled, let me fly!

Their meat and drink is of the best, 5
And, blind as moles, they take their pleasure;
The opening in a poor-box lid
Their charity would more than measure.

Cigar in mouth, and idle hands
Stuck in their pockets, see them pass! 10
Their stomachs are beyond reproach—
'Tis how to stomach them, alas!

They deal in every spice that grows,
But roots, the sweetest, cannot quell
The putrid foulness of their souls
That vile as rotten haddocks smell.

15

O had I seen some monstrous vice,
Some crime colossal, bloody, found—
Aught save these virtues, morals smug
Of twenty shillings in the pound!

20

Ye clouds above, O bear me forth
To Africa, to Lapland drear:
To Pomerania itself—
No matter where, if far from here!

O take me with you! But the clouds
Are far too wise to pause or heed.
For, when they travel o'er this town,
They hurry on at double speed.

VICTOR HUGO (1802-1885)

The claims made for Victor Hugo were and are immense. Swinburne says of him: 'Poet, dramatist, historian, philosopher, and patriot, the spiritual sovereign of the nineteenth century was before all things and above all things a poet.' Professor Adolphe Cohn writes in the same strain: 'Victor Marie Hugo, always mentioned as Victor Hugo, is unquestionably the greatest literary figure of nineteenth-century France. By almost universal consent he is recognized as the greatest French poet; he is one of the greater poets of the world.' Time has tended to modify the more extravagant claims made on Hugo's behalf; even in France his literary reputation fell considerably after his death; more recently it has shown some recovery, and he is now recognized as a great literary figure, if not one of the greatest. There is general agreement that Hugo was the master-spirit of French romanticism, certainly in poetry and drama, and perhaps also in the novel, though the productions of the fiction-syndicate controlled by the genius of Alexandre Dumas seem likely to hold the attention of the youth of all lands longer than Notre Dame de Paris and Les Misérables.

In the lyric Hugo's achievement was most sustained and seems most secure against the ravages of time. He began when he was barely twenty with a volume of Odes, later expanded into Odes and Ballads (1825). Songs of the Orient (1829) made a decisive impression by the luxuriant freedom of their versification and the richness of their coloring. Meanwhile, the young poet had issued a famous challenge to classical drama in the preface to Cromwell (1827). This play was too long for the stage and the battle royal of romanticism in the theater was fought, with blows as well as arguments, during the early representations of Hernani in the spring of 1830.

Hugo, who had begun his vehement political life as a royalist under the influence of his mother, later espoused the cause of Napoleon I, and rejoiced at the fall of the Bourbons in the summer following the sensational triumph of Hernani. He was at ease under the bourgeois régime of Louis Philippe, and the next dozen years were the most happily productive of his life. Autumn Leaves (1831) announced themselves as 'serene and peaceful poems of the family, of the home, of private life, of the inner sanctuary of the soul.' The same spirit, with deepening pathos and wider sympathy, pervades Songs of Twilight (1835), Inner Voices (1837) and Sunbeams and Shadows.

To the beginning of this period belongs his great romance of the Middle Ages, Notre Dame de Paris. In drama we have Le Roi s'amuse (1832) which deals with the love affairs of François I and was on this account interdicted by the Government after its first performance, but found a permanent place on the operatic stage in the plot of Rigoletto. Hugo scored a great popular success with Ruy Blas (1838) and a colossal failure in Les Burgraves (1843). In this last year his favorite daughter, Léopoldine, was drowned with her young husband in the Seine, and for some years, though the poet continued to write, he published little.

A Peer of the Realm under the limited monarchy and a member of the Republican National Assembly of 1848, Hugo felt personally outraged by the coup d'état of 1851, and left France, reviling the usurper in vitriolic prose in Napoleon the Little and in no less vehement verse in the Chastisements. After he had found a home in the Channel Islands, he settled down to more restrained and thoughtful lyrics in Contemplations (1856), in which irony is mingled with tenderness. The first volume of The Legend of the Centuries marks the beginning of an ambitious attempt to set forth in sonorous verse the gradual ascent of humanity to the light by means of the arts, religion and science. Les Misérables (1862), his greatest achievement in fiction, belongs to the same period of exile, closed by the volume of lyrics, Songs of the Streets and the Woods.

The downfall of 'Napoleon the Little' in 1870 brought Hugo back to France, to share in the sufferings of the siege of Paris, and to take an active part in the National Assembly at Bordeaux in February, 1871. But he gave offense by the remark that 'of all the generals who fought for France, Garibaldi is the only one unbeaten,' and resigned in protest against the invalidation of Garibaldi's election. About the same time the poet suffered the second great bereavement of his life in the sudden death of his son Charles. The Terrible Year was the lyrical outcome of a bitter sense of personal and national loss and humiliation, and it was some time before Hugo could adjust himself, in public to play the part of a national hero, and in private to practise The Art of being a Grandfather, which contains the best of his many poems about children. The second and third volumes of the Legend were less successful, for the romantic period in French literature was clearly over. A final volume of lyrics, The Four Winds of the Spirit, brought to a close a lyrical career of extraordinary emotional force and sustained power and beauty of expression. Beside the long list of Hugo's works in poetry, drama, and fiction, he left behind him at his death an enormous amount of unpublished material, which has since been issued in a monumental edition.

The verse translations below (with the exception of one by Swinburne) are by Henry Carrington, Dean of Bocking. The passage from the Preface to Cromwell is taken by permission from the translation by George Burnham Ives of Victor Hugo's Dramatic Works, Vol. 3, copyrighted by the publishers, Little, Brown & Company.

'NATURE AND TRUTH'

FROM THE PREFACE TO CROMWELL

Let us then speak boldly. The time for it has come, and it would be strange if, in this age, liberty, like the light, should penetrate everywhere except to the one place where freedom is most natural—the domain of thought. Let us take the hammer to theories and poetic systems. Let us throw down the old plastering that conceals the façade of art. There are neither rules nor models; or, rather, there are no other rules than the general laws of nature, which soar above the whole field of art, and the special rules which result from the conditions appropriate to the subject of each composition. The former are essential, eternal, and do not change; the latter are variable, external, and are used but once. The former are the framework that supports the house; the latter the scaffolding which is used in building it, and which is made anew for each building. In a word, the former are the flesh and bones, the latter the clothing, of the drama. But these rules are not written in the treatises on poetry. Richelet has no idea of their existence. Genius, which divines rather than learns, devises for each work the general rules from the general plan of things, the special rules from the separate ensemble of the subject treated; not after the manner of the chemist, who lights the fire under his furnace, heats his crucible, analyzes and destroys; but after the manner of the bee, which flies on its golden wings, lights on each flower and extracts its honey, leaving it as brilliant and fragrant as before.

The poet—let us insist on this point—

should take counsel therefore only of nature, truth, and inspiration which is itself both truth and nature. 'Quando he,' says Lope de Vega,

Quando he de escribir una comedia,
Encierro los preceptos con seis llaves.

['When I have to write a comedy, I lock up the rules with six keys.']

To secure these precepts 'six keys' are none too many, in very truth. Let the poet beware especially of copying anything whatsoever.—Shakespeare no more than Molière, Schiller no more than Corneille. If genuine talent could abdicate its own nature in this matter, and thus lay aside its original personality, to transform itself into another, it would lose everything by playing this rôle of its own double. It is as if a god should turn valet. We must draw our inspiration from the original sources. It is the same sap, distributed through the soil, that produces all the trees of the forest, so different in bearing power, in fruit, in foliage. It is the same nature that fertilizes and nourishes the most diverse geniuses. The poet is a tree that may be blown about by all winds and watered by every fall of dew; and bears his works as his fruit, as the fablier of old bore his fables. Why attach one's self to a master, or graft one's self upon a model? It were better to be a bramble or a thistle, fed by the same earth as the cedar and the palm, than the fungus or the lichen of those noble trees. The bramble lives, the fungus vegetates. Moreover, however great the cedar and the palm may be, it is not with the sap one sucks from them that one can become great one's self. A giant's parasite will be at best a dwarf. The oak, colossus that it is, can produce and sustain nothing more than the mistletoe.

Let there be no misunderstanding: if some of our poets have succeeded in being great, even when copying, it is because while forming themselves on the antique model, they have often listened to the voice of nature and to their own genius—it is because they have been themselves in some one respect. Their branches became entangled in those of the near-by tree, but their roots were buried deep in the soil of art. They were the ivy, not the mistletoe. Then came imitators of the second rank, who, having neither roots in the earth, nor genius in their souls, had to confine themselves to imitation. As Charles Nodier says: 'After the school of Athens, the school of Alexandria.' Then there was a deluge of mediocrity; then there came a swarm of those treatises on poetry, so annoying to true talent, so convenient for mediocrity. We were told that everything was done, and God was forbidden to create more Molières or Corneilles. Memory was put in place of imagination. Imagination itself was subjected to hard-and-fast rules, and aphorisms were made about it: 'To imagine,' says La Harpe, with his naïve assurance, 'is in substance to remember, that is all.'

But nature! Nature and truth!—And here, in order to prove that, far from demolishing art, the new ideas aim only to reconstruct it more firmly and on a better foundation, let us try to point out the impassable limit which, in our opinion, separates reality according to art from reality according to nature. It is careless to confuse them as some ill-informed partisans of romanticism do. Truth in art cannot possibly be, as several writers have claimed, absolute reality. Art cannot produce the thing itself. Let us imagine, for example, one of those unreflecting promoters of absolute nature, of nature viewed apart from art, at the performance of a romantic play, say Lc Cid. 'What's that?' he will ask at the first word. 'The Cid speaks in verse? It isn't natural to speak in verse.'—'How would you have him speak, pray?'—'In prose.' Very good. A moment later, 'How's this! he will continue, if he is consistent; 'the Cid is speaking French!—'Well?'—'Nature demands that he speak his own language; he can't speak anything but Spanish.'

We shall fail entirely to understand, but again—very good. You imagine that this is all? By no means: before the tenth sentence in Castilian, he is certain to rise and ask if the Cid who is speaking is the real Cid, in flesh and blood. By what right does the actor, whose name is Pierre or Jacques, take the name of the Cid? That is false. There is no reason why he should not go on to demand that the sun should be substituted for the footlights, real trees and real houses for those deceitful wings. For, once started on that road, logic has you by the collar, and you cannot stop.

We must admit, therefore, or confess ourselves ridiculous, that the domains of art and of nature are entirely distinct. Nature and art are two things—were it not so, one or the other would not exist. Art, in addition to its idealistic side, has a terrestrial, material side. Let it do what it will, it is shut in between grammar and prosody, between Vaugelas and Richelet. For its most capricious creations, it has formule, methods of execution, a complete apparatus to set in motion. For genius there are delicate instruments; for mediocrity, tools.

It seems to us that someone has already said that the drama is a mirror wherein nature is reflected. But if it be an ordinary mirror, a smooth and polished surface, it will give only a dull image of objects, with no relief—faithful, but colorless; everyone knows that color and light are lost in a simple reflection. The drama, therefore, must be a concentrating mirror, which, instead of weakening, concentrates and condenses the colored rays, which makes of a mere gleam a light, and of a light a flame. Then only is the drama acknowledged by art.

The stage is an optical point. Everything that exists in the world—in history, in life, in man—should be and can be reflected therein, but under the magic wand of art. Art turns the leaves of the ages, of nature, studies chronicles, strives to reproduce actual facts (especially in respect to manners and peculiarities, which are much less exposed to doubt and contradiction than are concrete facts), restores what the chroniclers have lopped off, harmonizes what they have collected, divines and supplies their omissions, fills their gaps with imaginary scenes which have color of the time, groups what they have left scattered about, sets in motion anew the threads of Providence which work the human marionettes.

nettes, clothes the whole with a form at once poetical and natural, and imparts to it that vitality of truth and brilliance which gives birth to illusion, that prestige of reality which arouses the enthusiasm of the spectator, and of the poet first of all, for the poet is sincere. Thus the aim of art is almost divine: to bring to life again if it is writing history, to create if it is writing poetry.

It is a grand and beautiful sight to see this broad development of a drama wherein art powerfully seconds nature; of a drama wherein the plot moves on to the conclusion with a firm and unembarrassed step, without diffuseness and without undue compression; of a drama, in short, wherein the poet abundantly fulfils the multifold objects of art, which is to open to the spectator a double prospect, to illuminate at the same time the interior and the exterior of mankind; the exterior by their speech and their acts, the interior, by asides and monologues; to bring together, in a word, in the same picture, the drama of life and the drama of conscience.

It will readily be imagined that, for a work of this kind, if the poet must choose (and he must), he should choose, not the beautiful, but the characteristic. Not that it is advisable to 'make local color,' as they say today; that is, to add as an afterthought a few discordant touches here and there to a work that is at best utterly conventional and false. The local color should not be on the surface of the drama, but in its substance, in the very heart of the work, whence it spreads of itself, naturally, evenly, and, so to speak, into every corner of the drama, as the sap ascends from the root to the tree's topmost leaf. The drama should be thoroughly impregnated with this color of the time, which should be, in some sort, in the air, so that one detects it only on entering the theater, and that on going forth one finds one's self in a different period and atmosphere. It requires some study, some labor, to attain this end; so much the better. It is well that the avenues of art should be obstructed by those brambles from which everybody recoils except those of powerful will. Besides, it is this very study, fostered by an ardent inspiration, which will ensure the drama against a vice that kills it—the commonplace. To be commonplace is the failing of short-sighted, short-breathed poets. In this tableau of the stage, each figure must be held down to its most prominent, most individual, most precisely defined characteristic. Even the vulgar and the trivial should have an accent of their own. Like God, the true poet is present in every part of his work at once. Genius resembles the die which stamps the king's effigy on copper and golden coins alike.

We do not hesitate—and this will demonstrate once more to honest men how far we are from seeking to discredit the art—we do not hesitate to consider verse as one of the means best adapted to protect the drama from the scourge we have just mentioned, as one of the most powerful dams against the irruption of the commonplace, which, like democracy, is always flowing between full banks in men's minds. And at this point we beg the younger literary generation, already so rich in men and in works, to allow us to point out an error into which it seems to have fallen—an error too fully justified, indeed, by the extraordinary aberrations of the old school. The new century is at that growing age at which one can readily set one's self right.

There has appeared of late, like a penultimate branching-out of the old classical trunk, or, better still, like one of those excrescences, those polypi, which decrepitude develops, and which are a sign of decomposition much more than a proof of life—there has appeared a strange school of dramatic poetry. This school seems to us to have had for its master and its fountain-head the poet who marks the transition from the eighteenth to the nineteenth century, the man of wearisome description and periphrases—that Delille who, they say, toward the close of his life, boasted, after the fashion of the Homeric catalogues, of having made twelve camels, four dogs, three horses, including Job's, six tigers, two cats, a chess-board, a backgammon-board, a checker-board, a billiard-table, several winters, many summers, a multitude of springs, fifty sunsets, and so many day-breaks that he had lost count of them.

Now, Delille went into tragedy. He is the father (he and not Racine, God save the mark!) of an alleged school of refinement and taste which flourished until recently. Tragedy is not to this school what it was to Will Shakespeare, say, a source of emotions of every sort, but a convenient frame for the solution of a multitude of petty descriptive problems which it pro-pounds as it goes along. This muse, far from spurning, as the true French classic school does, the trivial and degrading things of life, eagerly seeks them out and brings them together. The grotesque, shunned as undesirable company by the tragedy of Louis the Fourteenth's day, cannot pass unnoticed before her. It must be described, that is to say, ennobled. A scene in the guard-house, a popular uprising, the fish-market, the galleys, the wine shop, the poule au pot of Henri Quatre, are treasure-trove in her eyes. She seizes upon this canaille, washes it clean, and sews her tinsel and spangles over its villainies; purpureus assuitur pannus. [A purple patch is sewn on.] Her object seems to be to deliver patents of nobility to all these roturiers of the drama; and each of these patents under the great seal is a speech.

This muse, as may be imagined, is of a rare prudery. Wonted as she is to the caresses of periphrasis, plain-speaking, if she should occasionally be exposed to it, would horrify her. It does not accord with her dignity to speak naturally. She underlines old Corneille for his blunt way of speaking, as in,—

'A heap of men ruined by debt and crimes.'

'Chimène, who'd have thought it? Rodrigue, who'd have said it?'

'When their Flaminius haggled with Hannibal.'

'Oh! do not embroil me with the Republic.'

She still has her 'tout beau, monsieur!' on her heart. And it needed many 'seigneurs' and 'madames' to procure forgiveness for our admirable Racine for his monosyllabic 'dogs!' and for so brutally bestowing Claudius in Agrippina's bed.

This Melpomene, as she is called, would shudder at the thought of touching a chronicle. She leaves to the costumer the duty of learning the period of the dramas she writes. In her eyes history is bad form and bad taste. How, for example, can one tolerate kings and queens who swear? They must be elevated from mere regal dignity to tragic dignity. It was in a promotion of this sort that she exalted Henri IV. It was thus that the people's king, purified by M. Legouvé, found his 'ventre-saint-gris' ignominiously banished from his mouth by two sentences, and that he was reduced, like the girl in the old fabliau, to the necessity of letting fall from those royal lips only pearls and sapphires and rubies: the apotheosis of falsity, in very truth.

The fact is that nothing is so commonplace as this conventional refinement and nobility. Nothing original, no imagination, no invention in this style; simply what one has seen everywhere—rhetoric, bombast, commonplaces, flowers of college eloquence, poetry after the style of Latin verses. The poets of this school are eloquent after the manner of stage princes and princesses, always sure of finding, in the costumer's labeled cases, cloaks and pinch-beck crowns, which have no other disadvantage than that of having been used by everybody. If these poets never turn the leaves of the Bible, it is not because they have not a bulky book of their own, the Dictionnaire de rimes. That is the source of their poetry—fontes aquarum. [Fountains of water.]

It will be seen that, in all this, nature and truth get along as best they can. It would be great good luck if any remnants of either should survive in this cataclysm of false art, false style, false poetry. This is what has caused the errors of several of our distinguished reformers. Disgusted by the stiffness, the ostentation, the pomposo, of this alleged dramatic poetry, they have concluded that the elements of our poetic language were incompatible with the natural and the true. The Alexandrine had wearied them so often that they condemned it without giving it a hearing, so to speak, and decided, a little hastily, perhaps, that the drama should be written in prose.

They were mistaken. If in fact the false is predominant in the style as well as in the action of certain French tragedies, it is not the verses that should be held responsible therefor but the versifiers. It was needful to condemn, not the form employed, but those who employed it: the workmen, not the tool.

To convince one's self how few obstacles the nature of our poetry places in the way of the free expression of all that is true, we should study our verse, not in Racine, perhaps, but often in Corneille and always in Molière. Racine, a divine poet, is elegiac, lyric, epic; Molière is dramatic. It is time to deal sternly with the criticisms heaped upon that admirable style by the wretched taste of the last century, and to proclaim aloud that Molière occupies the topmost pinnacle of our drama, not only as a poet, but also as a writer. Palmas vere habet iste duas. [He bears off indeed the two palms.]

In his work the verse surrounds the idea, becomes of its very essence, compresses and develops it at once, imparts to it a more slender, more definite, more complete form, and gives us, in some sort, an extract thereof. Verse is the optical form of thought. That is why it is especially adapted to the perspective of the stage. Constructed in a certain way, it communicates its relief to things which, but for it, would be considered insignificant and trivial. It makes the tissue of style finer and firmer. It is the knot which stays the thread. It is the girdle which holds up the garment and gives it all its folds. What could nature and the true lose, then, by entering into verse? We ask the question of our prose-writers themselves—what do they lose in Molière's poetry? Does wine—we beg pardon for another trivial illustration—does wine cease to be wine when it is bottled?

If we were entitled to say what, in our opinion, the style of dramatic poetry should be, we would declare for a free, outspoken, sincere verse, which dares say everything without prudery, express its meaning without seeking for words; which passes naturally from comedy to tragedy, from the sublime to the grotesque; by turns practical and poetical, both artistic and inspired, profound and impulsive, of wide range and true; verse which is apt opportunely to displace the cæsura, in order to disguise the monotony of Alexandrines; more inclined to the enjambment that lengthens the line than to the inversion of phrases that confuses the sense; faithful to rime, that enslaved queen, that supreme charm of our poetry, that creator of our meter; verse that is inexhaustible in the verity of its turns of thought, unfathomable in its secrets of composition and of grace; assuming, like Proteus, a thousand forms without changing its type and character; avoiding long speeches; taking delight in dialogue; always hiding behind the characters of the drama; intent, before everything, on being in its place, and when it falls to its lot to be beautiful, being so only by chance, as it were, in spite of itself and unconsciously; lyric, epic, dramatic, at need; capable of running through the whole gamut of poetry, of skipping from high notes to low, from the most exalted to the most trivial ideas, from the most extravagant to the most solemn, from the most superficial to the most abstract, without ever passing beyond the limits of a spoken scene; in a word, such verse as a man would write whom a fairy had endowed with Corneille's mind and Molière's brain. It seems to us that such verse would be as fine as prose.

There would be nothing in common between poetry of this sort and that of which we made a post-mortem examination just now. The distinction will be easy to point out if a certain man of talent, to whom the author of this book is under personal obligation, will allow us to borrow his clever phrase: the other poetry was descriptive, this would be picturesque.

Let us repeat, verse on the stage should lay aside all self-love, all exigence, all coquetry. It is simply a form, and a form which should admit everything, which has no laws to impose on the drama, but on the contrary should receive everything from it, to be transmitted to the spectator—French, Latin, texts of laws, royal oaths, popular phrases, comedy, tragedy, laughter, tears, prose and poetry. Woe to the poet whose verse does not speak out! But this form is a form of bronze which encases the thought in its meter, beneath which the drama is indestructible, which engraves it more deeply on the actor's mind, warns him of what he omits and of what he adds, prevents him from changing his rôle, from substituting himself for the author, makes each word sacred, and causes what the poet has said to remain vivid a long while in the hearer's memory. The idea, when steeped in verse, suddenly assumes a more incisive, more brilliant quality.

One feels that prose, which is necessarily more timid, obliged to wean the drama from anything like epic or lyric poetry, reduced to dialogue and to matter-of-fact, is a long way from possessing these resources. It has much narrower wings. And then, too, it is much more easy of access; mediocrity is at its ease in prose; and for the sake of a few works of distinction such as have appeared of late, the art would very soon be overloaded with abortions and embryos. Another faction of the reformers incline to drama written in both prose and verse, as Shakespeare composed it. This method has its advantages. There might, however, be some incongruity in the transitions from one form to the other; and when a tissue is homogeneous it is much stouter. However, whether the drama should be written in prose is only a secondary question. The rank of a work is certain to be fixed, not according to its form, but according to its intrinsic value. In questions of this sort, there is only one solution. There is but one weight that can turn the scale in the balance of art—that is genius.

Meanwhile, the first, the indispensable merit of a dramatic writer, whether he write in prose or verse, is correctness. Not a mere superficial correctness, the merit or defect of the descriptive school, which makes Lhomond and Restaut the two wings of its Pegasus; but that intimate, deep-rooted, deliberate correctness, which is permeated with the genius of a language, which has sounded its roots and searched its etymology; always unfettered, because it is sure of its footing, and always more in harmony with the logic of the language. Our Lady Grammar leads the former in leading-strings; the other holds grammar in leash. It can venture anything, can create or invent its style; it has a right to do so. For, whatever certain men may have said who did not think what they were saying, and among whom we must place, notably, him who writes these lines, the French tongue is not fixed and never will be. A language does not become fixed. The human intellect is always on the march, or, if you prefer, in movement, and languages with it. Things are made so. When the body changes, how could the coat not change? The French of the nineteenth century can no more be the French of the eighteenth, than that is the French of the seventeenth, or than the French of the seventeenth is that of the sixteenth. Montaigne's language is not Rabelais's, Pascal's is not Montaigne's, Montesquieu's is not Pascal's. Each of the four languages, taken by itself, is admirable because it is original. Every age has its own ideas; it must have also words adapted to those ideas. Languages are like the sea, they move to and fro incessantly. At certain times they leave one shore of the world of thought and overflow another. All that their waves thus abandon dries up and vanishes. It is in this wise that ideas vanish, that words disappear. It is the same with human tongues as with everything. Each age adds and takes away something. What can be done? It is the decree of fate. In vain, therefore, should we seek to petrify the mobile physiognomy of our idiom in a fixed form. In vain do our literary Joshuas cry out to the language to stand still; languages and the sun do not stand still. The day when they become fixed they are dead. That is why the French of a certain contemporary school is a dead language.

THE TWO ISLANDS

From Odes and Ballads

I

There are two Isles, whose oceans wide

A spacious world doth separate,

And which from far frown o'er the tide,

Like heads of Giants, gaunt and great;

And looking on their summits steep,

You guess God called them from the deep,

For some mysterious dread design.

Their brows with bolts of thunder smoke,

Their bare sides foam with ocean's stroke,

Their breasts volcanic groans confine.

These Isles, where Ocean's shattered spray

Upon the ruthless rocks is cast,

Seem like two treacherous ships of prey,

Made by eternal anchors fast,

The hand that settled bleak and black
 Those shores on their unpeopled track,
 And clad in fear and mystery,
 Perchance thus made them tempest-torn,
 That Bonaparte might there be born,
 And that Napoleon there might die.

15

20

There was his cradle, there his Tomb,
 'Tis for all time enough to say:
 A world to life or death may come;
 These words shall never fade away.
 Upon those Isles, that dismal coast,
 Shall come, at summons of his ghost,
 All peoples of futurity.
 Thunders that blast their rugged forms,
 And all their rocks, and all their storms,
 Nought but of him a record be.

25

30

Far from our shores, which rocked amain
 The tempests of his lot beneath,
 Upon these lonely Islands twain,
 God placed his birth, and placed his death,
 So that he might to life awake,
 Nor conscious earth too deeply quake,
 To tell the world his earliest day;
 And that upon his warrior bed,
 While stood the solid earth unswayed,
 His soul might gently pass away.

35

40

II

How did he dream when first his dawn arose!
 How mused in sorrow at his journey's close!
 'Twas that his frantic dream he had enjoyed.
 Of Thrones and Glory now he knew the lies,
 The dream's true worth lay bare before his eyes,
 And all the nothingness of hope when tried.

45

E'en as a child, in Corsica were shown
 Ambitious visions of his short-lived throne;
 The Imperial Eagle on his flag waved out,
 He heard beforehand, with prophetic pride,
 The hymn that in all tongues his tent beside,
 Sang subject nations with united shout.

50

III

Fame to Napoleon! Fame be to the Lord supreme!
 God's self upon his brow has placed the diadem!
 From Nile to Dneiper he, triumphant, reigns alone;
 Kings sprung from hundred kings before him shroud their face,
 And Rome itself he reckons fitting place
 But for his new-born Infant's throne.

55

To bear his thunderbolt to many a trembling land
 His Eagles, without pause, their dreadful wings expand.
 The conclave, the Divan he doth in bondage hold,
 And mingles with his flags, where blood for ever bides,
 Crescents ta'en from the Pyramids,
 And mighty Ivan's cross of gold.

60

The Mameluke bronzed, the Goth, unknowing flight and fear,
 The valiant Pole, who bears a flame upon his spear,
 Lend their blind strength to form his wild ambition's aid—
 His will their only law, his fame their only faith;
 And march his banner's shade beneath
 Armies, by hundred nations made.

65

70

And when his end is gained, he throws, with hasty palms,
 To some successful chief a kingdom for an alms.
 To guard his palace gates he subject monarchs sets,
 So that awhile he may, when war and banquets cease,
 Among his conquests sleep at peace,
 As fisherman among his nets.

75

He his imperial nest hath built so far and high,
 He seems to us to dwell within that tranquil sky,
 Where you shall never see the angry tempest break.
 'Tis but beneath his feet the growling storms are sped,
 And thunders to assault his head
 Must to their highest source go back.

80

IV

The bolt flew upwards: from his eyrie riven,
 Blazing he falls beneath the stroke of heaven;
 Then kings their tyrant foe reward—
 They chain him, living, on that lonely shore;
 And earth the captive giant handed o'er
 To ocean's more resistless guard.

85

At St. Helena how he scorned his life!
 When gazed his eye at eve, with envy rife,
 Upon the sun's declining track;
 And when, with lonely steps, he trod the sand,
 Till breaks his dream some jailer's stern command,
 Who cites him to his prison back.

90

With what despairing wrath this Lord of War
 Heard himself blamed by those who just before
 Worshiped, as though divine his art;
 The cry of Nations for revenge combined
 Echoes the constant ruthless voice, confined Within his self-accusing heart.

95

100

V

Shame, hate, misfortune, vengeance, curses sore,
 On him let heaven and earth together pour:
 Now, see we dashed the vast Colossus low.
 May he for ever rue, alive and dead,
 All tears he caused mankind to shed,
 And all the blood he caused to flow.

105

May at his name the Volga, Tiber, Seine,
 Alhambra's walls, the ditch that girds Vincennes,
 Jaffa, the Kremlin, burnt without remorse,

Carnage and conquest from their fields exclaim
 (In thunder echoing back his fatal fame),
 'Him do the slaughtered nations curse.' 110

Around him may he see his victims press,
 And crowds on crowds 'scaped from the dark abyss
 Countless describe the secrets of the tomb;
 Mangled and maimed by gun and saber stroke,
 Hurling their bones, all black with powderous smoke,
 Make a foul Hinnom of his prison home. 115

Let him live! dying every day and hour,
 His tear-stained eyes let the proud victor lower,
 His right deposed, e'en his renown scarce known;
 His jailers, with their icy fetters weigh
 That hand grown weary many a day
 With dragging kings from off their throne. 120

His conquering fate, he thought, would leave behind,
 The memory of the race that ruled mankind;
 God came, and quenched his flambeau with a breath,
 And to eternal Rome's mock rival leaves
 Only the time, the space each man receives,
 To fill the narrow room of death. 125

The seas shall lave his grave, and men forget!
 Within St. Denis did he vainly set
 A marble tomb with gold and sculpture brave;—
 God chose not that the shades of Royalty,
 While weeping, 'neath those somber walls should see
 His tainting body sleep within their grave. 135

VI

How sad the empty cup, how sad the dream begun
 In rapturous joy, but changed to terror e'er 'tis done!
 Young, we our reason yield to all our hopes allege;
 Older, we loathe the joys which then the spirit sate,
 And scan our life, alas! too late,
 From the horizon's further edge. 140

Thus at the mountain's foot, its vast and towering height
 Fills the adventurous heart with triumph and delight;
 Nor less the aspiring peaks, that time shall ne'er bring low—
 The woods that, like a cloak, its rocky desert shroud,
 And all its circling crown of cloud,
 That rolls in heaps about its brow. 145

Climb upwards and those zones yet unattempted try,
 Mid clouds and mists you stray, who thought to find the sky—
 All changed beneath your eye the mountain aspect seems:
 'Tis now a gulf obscured by pine woods old and black,
 Where torrents and the thunder's track
 Spring from the lightning and the streams. 150

VII

Glory's true image here we trace: 155
 First, like a prism bright and fair,
 Then, like an expiatory glass,
 Its purple hues like blood appear
 Now raised on high, now shattered low,
 His life a twofold form doth show. 160
 If we his youth and age recall,
 Two records for his life should be—
 When young he fashioned victory,
 When old he mused upon his fall.

In both these Isles, by fear beguiled, 165
 The fisherman on winter night,
 When storm-bred meteors, strange and wild,
 O'er the black rocks display their light,
 Thinks that he sees the lengthened shade,
 By the dark warrior captain made, 170
 With its arms crossed, unmoved remain;
 And fables that the unquiet soul
 Will now the dreadful storms control,
 As erst he ruled the battle plain.

VIII

If he an empire lost, two countries he shall own, 175
 Glorious and shameful made, by his repute alone:—
 One, where his breath he drew, the other, where he died;
 And none shall speak the name which shall illustrious make
 The age, but with the word he must two echoes wake, 180
 Which half the earth's globe doth divide.

Thus charged with hundred deaths, what time the fiery shell
 On the black sky describes its blazing course and fell,
 And balanced in the air, hangs o'er the frightened walls;
 And then, to vulture dread with cruel talons like,
 That with its mighty wing upon the earth does strike— 185
 With wreck and ruin loud it falls.

After its fall long time we see dark vapors still,
 The loud black throat of its vast mortar fill (Whence mounted but to fall the globe of ponderous flight);
 And where at last the shell in fragments dashed about, 190
 Died while disgorging death from its dark entrails out,
 And belching flames sank into night.

TO A YOUNG GIRL

From Odes and Ballads

You, who not yet can childhood's beauty tell—
 Child! envy not our grief-encumbered years,
 When hearts are now enslaved, and now rebel,
 When laughter oft is sadder than your tears.

So sweet your careless age—its memories fade,
 It passes like a breath upon the breeze,
 Like a glad voice by distance weaker made,
 Or like a halcyon on the seas. 5

O hasten not to force your artless mind;
 Enjoy the morn, enjoy life's vernal prime;
 Your days are flowers, one to the other twined—
 Pluck not the leaves before the hand of Time. 10

Let the years flow—like ours will be your lot,
 To know regrets and friendship's hollow ties,
 Grief without hope that pride avouches not,
 And pleasures we despise. 15

Yes, laugh, unknowing that your mirth will cease;
 Laugh, nor your lovely brow with sorrow shade
 Your blue eyes, glass of innocence and peace,
 Where beams your soul with heavenly radiance glad. 20

ECSTASY

From Songs of the Orient

I was alone beside the sea, upon a starry night,
 And not a cloud was in the sky, and not a sail in sight;
 Beyond the limits of the world far stretched my raptured eye,
 And the forests and the mountains, and nature all around,
 Seemed to unite in questioning, in vast and mingled sound,
 The billows of the ocean, and the splendor of the sky. 5

And the golden stars of heaven, in their unnumbered crowd,
 With harmonies ten thousand, with voices clear and loud,
 Replied, as low they bended down their radiant crowns of flame—
 And the blue floods that nought has power to govern or arrest, Replied, as low they bended down, the foam upon their crest—
 'The Lord, our great Creator, His glory we proclaim!' 10

CHILDREN

From Autumn Leaves

How beautiful the child! its smile how sweet!
 Its trust unshaken, voice with charms replete,
 Brief tears soon changed to bliss;
 Gazing around with wondering raptured sight,
 The young soul reaching out to life and light,
 The lips to meet our kiss. 5

O Lord, preserve me, and preserve all those
 I love—friends, brothers, kin, and e'en my foes
 On whom blind fate has smiled—
 From seeing summer without flowers arrive,
 Cage with no bird, and without bees the hive,
 The house without the child. 10

TO A LADY

From Autumn Leaves

Maiden, were I a king, the monarchy
 And subject millions I would all resign;
 Power, pomp, and state, and purple luxury,
 Armies unmatched, and fleets that sway the sea,
 For one kind look of thine.

5

And were I Jove, I would Olympus' height
 Forego, with its eternity of bliss,
 My reign o'er gods and men, my thunder's might
 Through earth and heaven, Maiden, wouldst thou requite
 My passion with a kiss.

10

TO THE COLUMN

From Songs of Twilight

Alas! alas! keep thy lone tomb,
 And keep thy barren sea-splashed rock,
 Where thou didst dash thee like a bomb,
 To fall with fiery smoking shock!
 Thy rugged St. Helena keep,
 Where, of thy fortune's proudest steep,
 The dazed eye sees the sad reverse;
 Keep the still shade thy grave receives,
 Beneath thy willow tree, whose leaves,
 Are scattered through the universe.

10

There, free from outrage, dost thou sleep,
 And, oft aroused thou near dost feel
 Those who from rage and sorrow weep—
 The red-clad soldiers o'er thee kneel.
 There thou, if e'er thou earth reseek,
 Shalt see from some commanding peak,
 Upon the world of waters pale,
 Bound for the rocky sea-girt hearth,
 As the true center of the earth,
 Ships of each clime, and realm, and sail.

THE TOMB SAID TO THE ROSE

From Inner Voices

The Tomb said to the Rose,
 With the dews thy leaves enclose
 What dost thou, Love's own flower?
 The Rose said to the Tomb,
 Tell me what is the doom
 Of hosts thy depths devour?

25

Said the Rose, of every drop
 That in my blooms doth stop
 Sweet perfume I distil.
 Said the Tomb, I make the souls
 My dreaded reign controls,
 Angels that heaven fill.

ALL THE WINGED CREATURES I HAVE LOVED

From Sunbeams and Shadows

All the winged creatures I have ever loved!
 And when, a child, I 'neath the thicket roved,
 I from their nests the little birds conveyed—
 At first, of reeds I cages for them made,
 Where, mid green mosses, I to tame them tried.
 Later, I used to leave the windows wide:
 They flew not off, or if the woods their choice,
 Still they returned whene'er they heard my voice.
 A dove and I long lived in friendliness!
 Now I the art of taming souls possess.

SINCE SUNK THE JUST WITHIN THE ABYSS

From Chastisements

Since sunk the just within the abyss,
 The crown to crime delivered is;
 Since right and law they all efface,
 Since now the boldest silent stand,
 Since the dishonor of the land,
 In placards, on the walls they place:

5

Republic! by our fathers wrought,
 Pantheon vast with glories fraught,
 Thou golden dome in freedom's blue,
 Great temple of immortal shades,
 Since villainy now escalades
 Thy walls the Empire there to glue;

10

Since all with weakness are beset,
 Since they can cringe, since they forget
 The true, the pure, the great, the brave,
 The indignant voice of history,
 Honor, fame, right, nobility,
 And those now resting in the grave:

15

Grief, Exile!—yes I cherish them.
 Mourning be thou my diadem;
 Proud poverty my humor fits.
 I love my door, which tempests smite,
 And that grave statue, sorrow hight,
 Which haunts my steps, and by me sits.

20

I cling to my unhappiness—
 The gloom wherein I repossess
 You, whom my heart and spirit prize—
 Honor, faith, virtue unavowed,
 Thou! liberty! the exile proud;
 Thou! great proscribed, self-sacrifice. 25 30

I love this island, lone and wild,
 Jersey, where England, freedom's child,
 'Neath its old flag doth right maintain;
 The gloomy billows, spreading far,
 The ships, that wandering chariots are,
 The ocean, that mysterious plain. 35

Thy gulls, O thou deep sea! I like,
 Who, with their sad-hued pinions, strike
 Thy waves, and briny pearl-drops throw;
 Who plunge beneath thy giant surge,
 And from the yawning jaws emerge,
 As a soul issues from its woe. 40

I like that solemn rock and drear
 Whence the eternal plaint I hear,
 Like vain regrets, for aye re-born:
 That each successive night awakes,
 As on the rock the billow breaks,
 As mothers for their children mourn.

THE WORST TREASON

From Châtisements

The deepest infamy man can attain,
 Is or to strangle Rome, or France enchain;
 Whate'er the place, the land, the city be,
 'Tis to rob man of soul and liberty—
 'Tis with drawn sword the senate to invade,
 And murder law, in its own court betrayed. 5
 To enslave the land is guilt of such black dye,
 It is ne'er quitted by God's vengeful eye;
 The crime once done, the day of grace expires,
 Heaven's punishment, which, howe'er slow, ne'er tires,
 Begins to march, and comes serene and calm,
 With her steel knotted whip beneath her arm. 10

OUR LIFE TOGETHER

From Contemplations

When we our life together led
 On the hill-side, now long ago
 Where waved the trees, and waters sped,
 Where the house hugged the wood below—

She was ten years—thrice ten was I,
 I was the universe to her.
 How sweet the grass, how clear the sky
 Beneath the thick green woods of fir. 5

My lot she glad and happy made,
 My labors light, and blue my sky;
 When she 'My father!' to me said,
 My full heart would 'My God!' reply. 10

'Mid thousand dreams, by fancy wrought,
 I heard her prattle, fond and bright;
 My forehead shadowed o'er with thought,
 Her merry glance o'erflowed with light. 15

And when her little hand I took,
 Like a princess she proudly trod,
 And always would for flowers look
 And for the poor upon the road. 20

As others steal she gave her store,
 Then would from observation flit.
 O! the fine little frock she wore!
 Ah, me! do you remember it? 25

Each evening she beside my light
 Prattled in low melodious strain,
 While out of doors the moths of night
 Struck up against the window-pane. 30

She was like angels of the skies—
 How charmingly she greeted you!
 Heaven's grace had placed within her eyes
 The look that could not be untrue. 35

I was so young when she was born
 To shine upon my destiny;
 She was the child of my glad morn,
 The star of dawn that lit my sky. 40

And when the moon shone calm and clear
 In Heaven, in those past days so good,
 How did we wander far and near,
 Or in the plain or in the wood! 45

Then toward the isolated light,
 Which, star-like, in our cottage burned,
 By the vale hastening through the night,
 The corner of the wall we turned. 50

When home regained, with hearts inflamed,
 We told heaven's glories o'er and o'er:
 I that young spirit shaped and framed,
 As bees concoct their honey store. 55

And then how glad she was—how gay,
 Sweet angel, with unspotted mind!
 But all these things are passed away—
 Gone like a shadow, or the wind! 60

VENI, VIDI, VICI

From Contemplations

I have lived long enough, since in my grief
 I walk, nor any arm to help is found;
 Since I scarce laugh at the dear children round,
 Since flowers, henceforth, can give me no relief.

Since in the Spring, when God makes Nature brave,
 I see with joyless soul that love so bright;
 Since reached the hour when man avoids the light,
 And knows the bitterness that all things have.

Since from my soul all hope has passed away;
 Since, in this month of fragrance and the rose,
 My child! I wish to share thy dark repose;
 Since, dead my heart, too long in life I stay.

From earth's set task I never sought to fly:
 Plowed is my furrow, and my harvest o'er.
 Cheerful I lived, and gentle more and more—
 Erect, yet prone to bow toward mystery.

I've done my best: with work and watching worn,
 I've seen that many mocked my grieving state;
 And I have wondered at their causeless hate,
 Having much sorrow and much labor borne.

In this world's jail, where all escape is vain,
 Unmurmuring, bleeding, prostrate 'neath the shock,
 Silent, exhausted, jeered by felon mock,
 I've dragged my link of the eternal chain.

Now my tired eyes are but half open kept,
 To turn when I am called is all I can,
 Wearied and stupefied, and like a man
 Who rises e'er the morn, and ne'er has slept.

Idle through grief, I neither deign nor care
 Notice to take of envy's noisome spite.
 O Lord! now open me the gates of night,
 That I may get me gone, and disappear.

DEATH

From Contemplations

I saw the reaper toiling far and wide,
 Reaping his field with long and speedy stride.
 Black skeleton! Night followed on his track,
 While in that shade all trembled and drew back.
 The sickle's flash, man followed with his eye;
 The victors 'neath the arch of victory
 Fell; now to a waste he changes Babylon—
 Thrones into scaffolds, scaffold into throne,

Makes roses refuse, children, birds or dreams,
 Gold turns to cinders, mothers' eyes to streams. 10
 'Give back that little child!' the mothers cry—
 'Why make him born, so over soon to die!'
 Earth was one sob—high, low, 'twas all the same.
 Those bony hands from endless pallets came;
 Cold shivery winds the shrouds unnumbered shook; 15
 Dazed seemed the people 'neath that fatal hook—
 A trembling flock, that in the shade took flight.
 All 'neath his feet was mourning, fear, and flight.
 Behind, his brow with gentle flames bathed o'er,
 His sheaf of souls a smiling angel bore. 20

POOR FOLK

From The Legend of the Centuries

'Tis night, the hut, though poor, keeps out the wind;
 The room is dark, yet something there you find
 Which like a ray amid the twilight falls;
 The fishing-nets are hung about the walls,
 And in a nook, where pots and plates in line 5
 Upon a cupboard shelf obscurely shine,
 Stands a large bed, with curtains hung around,
 Hard by a mattress spread upon the ground,
 Where, like a nest of souls, five children sleep;
 The hearth, where ashes still some fire keep, 10
 On bed and ceiling casts a reddish ray;
 A woman, thoughtful, pale, kneels down to pray:
 Their mother. She's alone; and out of doors
 The ocean, white with foam, its wailing pours
 To sky, night, rock, to howling winds and wild. 15

The man's at sea; a sailor from a child,
 With gloomy chance doth a fierce war sustain:
 For he must be afloat in squall and rain.
 The children cry for food, and off he hies
 At eve, when billows to the gunwale rise. 20
 Unhelped, alone, his bark he steers and tends.
 Meanwhile, the wife at home the canvas mends,
 Fits on the hooks, the broken nets repairs,
 And for the fish-soup in the cauldron cares.
 Then prays to God, while the five children sleep. 25
 He, tossed upon the ever-rolling deep,
 Fares on the boundless main, and through the night
 Hard toil, in cold and blackness, void of light,
 Mid breakers, where the frantic billows race.
 In the broad sea is the best fishing place, 30
 Uncertain, dark, capricious, apt to change,
 Where fish with silver fins delight to range.
 This spot, as their own room scarce twice as wide,
 In a December night, mid fog and tide,
 Upon the shifting wilderness to find 35
 How must he currents calculate and wind!
 What plans—what skilful reckonings it takes!
 The waves glide by his boat like glassy snakes,

The gulf rolls on, and bursts its mighty folds,
 The rigging creaks, and strains, and barely holds. 40
 He thinks of Jeanne while icy billows toss—
 She weeps and calls on him. So speed and cross
 Each night their thoughts, those soul birds through the skies.

She prays. The gull, with its harsh, mocking cries,
 Scares her; and 'mid the rocks, shattered by storms, 45
 The ocean fills her with dismay. Strange forms
 Pass through her mind. The sailors on the sea
 Who swept across the furious billows be,
 And in its case, like blood in th' artery,
 The cold clock ticks, casting in mystery 50
 Drop after drop, time, winter, summer's heat,
 And in the boundless world each several beat
 Opens to souls, that hawks or doves become,
 On either side the cradle and the tomb.
 She thinks and dreams. 'What poverty we know! 55
 Barefoot the children e'en in winter go!
 Black bread alone and never white we taste!
 O God!' The wind roars like a furnace blast.
 The coast sounds like an anvil and you see
 In the black storm the constellations flee, 60
 Like clouds of sparks that from the hearth arise.
 It is the hour, midnight (gay dancer) plies
 Folly's wild game, with mask and glances glad;
 It is the hour, midnight (dark brigand) clad
 In shade and rain, and in the stormy north, 65
 Takes the poor shivering sailor, and hurls forth
 And breaks on monstrous rocks that ocean crown.
 Horror! the man whose voice the waters drown
 Feels rent and wrecked his vessel as it sinks;
 Feels 'neath him gape th' abyss and night; and thinks 70
 On the old iron ring, of the safe quay.
 These, gloomy visions wring her heart, and she Trembles, dismayed, and weeps.

O wretched wives
 Of sailors! Dreadful 'tis to say, 'My lives—
 Father, Sons, Brothers, Lover—all most dear 75
 My heart, blood, flesh, are in that chaos there.'
 Waves like wild beasts devour their human prey.
 O God, that waves with such dear heads should play!
 With husband, master, and the shipboy child.
 That the wan wind, blowing its clarions wild, 80
 Unknits above them his long, haggard hair;
 And that, perhaps, e'en now such woes they bear,
 And that one ne'er is sure how they may be,
 And that for guard against the boundless sea,
 Against the gulf of night, where shines no star, 85
 A plank, a sail, their sole protections are.
 Dark Care! They run across the shingly track;
 The tide mounts, and they cry, 'Give me them back.'
 Vain words, alas! What answer can be brought,
 From the storm-tumbled sea, to anxious thought. 90

Jeanne's heart is torn.—Her husband helped by none
 In that fierce night; 'neath that black shroud alone!

Too young the boys to help. 'Would strong they were,'
 The mother cries, 'their father's toil to share;'
 One day, when with their father, you will plain,
 Weeping fast tears, 'Would they were young again.' 95

Lantern and cloak she takes: 'tis time to learn
 If the sea calms—if yet he may return—
 If breaks the dawn—and if the signal shows.
 She starts! not yet the breeze of morning blows;
 Nought can be seen, no single line of white, 100
 In all the gathered blackness of the night.
 It rains—nothing more black than morning rain;
 'Tis as though day with trembling doubt was ta'en,
 And dawn, like infants, weeps and wails at birth, 105
 No light from any window shines, or hearth.

Struck all at once her eyes, that seek the way,
 A sight that presaged undefined dismay—
 A gloomy hovel, ruined all, and waste;
 No light! no fire! the door sways in the blast; 110
 The roof hung tottering on the moldy walls,
 And rent the hideous thatch by northern squalls—
 The straw foul, yellow, as when waters rot.
 'Hold! this poor widow I had clean forgot!
 Ill and alone,' she cries, 'my husband late 115
 Found her. I needs must go and see her state.'
 She raps and listens, but none answers there,
 And Jeanette shivers in the cold sea air.
 'Sick, and her hungry children! What distress!
 She has but two, but she is husbandless.' 120
 She raps again.—'Ho! neighbor! answer me.'
 The house is silent still.—'Ah God,' says she,
 'How sound she sleeps—in vain I knock and cry.'
 But then the door, by some deep mystery,
 As though inanimate things could pity feel, 125
 Opened itself, its secret to reveal.

She entered; then her lamp its light shed o'er
 The dark dumb house, beside the sounding shore.
 Rain torrents through the ceiling forced their way.

At the room's end a dreadful object lay— 130
 A woman, ghastly, still, stretched out, who had Bare feet, glazed sightless eyes, and scarce was clad—
 A corpse, once a strong happy mother—now
 Disheveled specter of dead want and woe—
 All the poor leave, after their long hard fight. 135
 Half hid upon the straw, and half in sight,
 Her livid arm, her hand already green,
 Hung down and horror sped those lips between Whence had the fleeting soul that bitter cry
 Of death thrown forth—heard by eternity. 140

Close to the bed their mother lay upon,
 Two babes, a little daughter and a son,
 In the same cot slumbered with peaceful smile.
 The mother, feeling death's approach the while,

Her shawl, her gown, upon the children flings,
That in the shadow which death's presence brings,
Decay of heat she might from them withhold,
And they be warm, while she herself grew cold. 145

How in their cradle sleep they both; and how
Their breathing peaceful is, and calm their brow. 150
Seems it as nought those orphans' sleep could fray—
Not e'en the trumpet of the judgment day;
For, blameless, they dare stand the Judge before.

The rain abroad does like a deluge pour:
From the rent ceiling, which admits the squall, 155
At times a drop does on that dead brow fall,
And gliding to the cheek, becomes a tear.
The surge like an alarum clock you hear.—
Listens the dead, as if of sense bereft;
For bodies, when the radiant soul has left, 160
Seem the departed one to seek and reach;—
You think to hear the interchange of speech
Twixt the pale mouth and eyes that sightless stare;
Where is my breath, and thou, thy glances where?

Live, love, and pick the primroses. Alas!
Dance, laugh, inflame your heart, and drain your glass. 165
As every brook to the dark ocean flows,
One end to feast and cradle, fate bestows,
For mother's worshiping their children's bloom,
To kisses which the raptured heart consume, 170
To songs, to smiles, to love so fair and brave—
The melancholy chilling of the grave.

What is Jeanne doing in that house of death?
What in her cloak's wide folds hides she beneath?
What, as she goes away, does Jeanette take? 175
Why beats her heart, and steps unsteady quake?
Why hurry thus, and running like the wind,
Seeks her own cot, and dares not look behind?
What with so scared a look does she conceal,
In darkness on her bed? What does she steal? 180

When reached her house, the cliffs more white appear,
And close beside her bed she took a chair.
Pale she sat down, self-blamed you would have said,
To see her in the pillow hide her head.
At times her lips uttered some broken speech— 185
Afar the fierce sea roars upon the beach,

'My poor, good man! O God! what will he say?
So full of cares! What have I done today?
Five children on his hands—and labors so!
Had he not toil enough, that I must go 190
And add all this? 'Tis he.—My fault I own,
And if he beat me, it were rightly done.
'Tis he! No! Well! Yet seemed to move the door,
As though he came. See! what ne'er was before—
I fear to see my good man come again.' 195
Thus did she saddened and in thought remain,

Plunging more deep in grief, and anguish tossed,
 In endless cares as in abysses lost.
 She now not even hears the noise without,
 Of cormorants, that like black criers shout,
 And fury of the winds, and waves, and tide.

200

With sudden clasp the door flies open wide,
 And rays of light within the cabin lets;
 The fisherman, hauling in his dripping nets,
 Appeared, right glad, and said, 'Your sailor's here.'
 'Tis thou,' cried Jeanne. And to her breast as near
 Her husband clasped as lovers wont to strain;
 And warmly kissed, all soaked with seas and rain,
 The while he said—'Yes, wife, I'm here!' and showed,
 In his frank brow, on which the embers glowed,
 How pleased he was that safe with Jeanne he stood.
 'I'm robbed,' he cried; 'the sea's a brigand wooed.'
 'What weather was it?' 'Bad!' 'What fishing?'

205

210

'Bad!
 But now I kiss you, and that makes me glad.
 I've nothing caught at all, my net is torn;—
 The devil surely in the wind was borne.
 What night!—in such a storm I could but think,
 As snapped my cable, that the boat would sink.
 And thou, what wast thou doing all the while?'
 Jeanne shuddered—at a loss—unused to guile.
 'I,' said she; 'just as usual—nothing more;
 I sewed, and heard the sea like thunder roar.
 I feared—the winter's cold—'tis all the same.'
 She trembled like to one who feels to blame;
 Then added—'By-the-bye, our neighbor's dead.
 She died—no matter—yesterday, 'tis said,
 At eve—after you started for the night
 She leaves behind two children—babies quite.
 One is called William, and one Madeleine;
 He cannot walk, she scarcely prattles plain.
 The poor good soul great want had struggled through.'

215

220

225

230

The man looked grave, and in the corner threw
 His navy cap, all drenched; and, as he sat,
 'The devil!' twice exclaimed—and scratched his pate.
 'We had five children; this will seven make:
 Already in bad times we'd nought to take
 For supper, now and then: what to do now?
 Worse luck, 'tis not my fault! and, anyhow,
 'Tis the good God's concern. These be strange haps.
 Why did He take the mother from these scraps,
 No bigger than my fist?—such haps be rude,
 And need book-learning to be understood.
 So small, you cannot say—"To work betake."
 Wife, go and fetch them—if they're now awake,
 Alone and with the dead—how great their fear!
 Their mother rapping at the door we hear.
 Let's open to her babes—we'll mix them all;
 Upon our knees, at even, shall they crawl,
 Brother and sister to our other five;
 And when He sees we must for all contrive—

235

240

245

250

For the small girl, and this small boy as well—
 Kind God with larger draughts my nets will swell.
 For me I'll doubly work—and water drink.—
 'Tis said: go fetch them;—but you're loth, I think.
 In general you run more quickly far.'— 255

She drew the curtain—'Husband! here they are.'

FOR JEANNE ALONE

From Songs of the Streets

I care nothing, well I ween,
 For the belfry or the bell,
 I know nothing of the queen,
 Of the king can nothing tell.

I my ignorance confess,
 Whether proud the lord or meek;
 If the curate says the mass
 Or in Latin or in Greek.

5

If 'tis best to dance or cry,
 What birds chatter in the grove;
 But of one thing sure am I,
 That with all my heart I love.

10

Know you, Jeanne, of what I dream?
 'Tis the movement of your feet;
 When you trip across the stream,
 Like a bird so light and fleet.

15

Know you wherefore I complain?
 'Tis that, Jeanne, across the moor
 An unseen, compelling chain,
 Ever draws me to your door.

20

Know you, Jeanne, what hard I take?
 'Tis the charm, the conquering art,
 With which, either gloom you make,
 Or else sunshine in my heart.

Knowst what thoughts my head possess?
 'Tis that I more dearly prize
 The least flower upon your dress
 Than all the stars that deck the skies.

BEFORE THE CONCLUSION OF THE TREATY

From The Terrible Year

If this foul war we ended see,
 And grant all Prussia longs to get,
 Then, like a glass our France would be,
 Upon a pothouse table set:—

- You empty it, and then you break!
 Our haughty country is no more.
 O grief, that shame should overtake
 Where only honor lived of yore! 5
- Black morrow, with dismay for text;
 All dregs we drink—on ashes feed;
 The eagles gone; there follow next
 The vultures, these do hawks succeed. 10
- Two provinces now torn away—
 Metz poisoned, Strasburg crucified;
 Sedan, deserter in the fray,
 A brand on France that will abide. 15
- There lives in souls degenerate
 Base love of loathly happiness—
 Pride cast away; they cultivate
 The growth, the increase of disgrace. 20
- Our ancient splendor stained, belied,
 Our mighty wars dishonored now,
 The country mazed and stupefied,
 Unused to live with lowered brow.
- The foeman, in our citadels;
 Attila's shadow o'er us thrown;
 The swallow to its fellow tells,
 This is not France that we have known. 25
- Her mouth full of the foul Bazaine!
 Renown, with slow and broken wing,
 Does with unwholesome slaver stain
 The trump that erst did nobly ring. 30
- Brethren alone they dare to fight,
 Bayard! thy name no longer lives;
 They murder now, to hide from sight
 That lately they were fugitives. 35
- Black night mounts up on every brow,
 And not a soul dares soar on high;
 Heaven does itself our shame avow,
 Since we refuse to seek the sky. 40
- Chill hearts are here, and darkness deep—
 People from people separate
 All wide apart and hostile keep,
 And love is dead and turned to hate.
- Prussia and France are foemen sworn;
 That host is all with hatred fired;
 Our dark eclipse their joyful morn—
 Our tomb, by all of them desired. 45
- Shipwreck! To mighty deeds goodbye!
 Deceived, deceiving all is made;
 'The cowards!' to our flag they cry—
 And to our cannon, 'They're afraid.' 50

Our pride, our hopes, departed all,
 A shroud on history fallen is—
 O God! permit not France to fall
 In gulf of such a peace as this.

POOR CHILDREN

Translated by Swinburne

From How to be a Grandfather

Take heed of this small child of earth;
 He is great: he hath in him God most high.
 Children before their fleshly birth
 Are lights alive in the blue sky.

In our light bitter world of wrong
 They come; God gives us them awhile.
 His speech is in their stammering tongue,
 And His forgiveness in their smile.

5

Their sweet light rests upon our eyes.
 Alas! their right to joy is plain.
 If they are hungry, Paradise
 Weeps, and, if cold, Heaven thrills with pain.

10

The want that saps their sinless flower
 Speaks judgment on sin's ministers.
 Man holds an angel in his power.
 Ah! deep in Heaven what thunder stirs,

15

When God seeks out these tender things
 Whom in the shadow where we sleep
 He sends us clothed about with wings,
 And finds them ragged babes that weep!

DRY BREAD

From How to be a Grandfather

Jeanne to dry bread and the dark room consigned
 For some misdeed: I to my duty blind
 Visit the prisoner—traitor that I am!
 And in the dark slip her a pot of jam.
 Those in my realm, on whose authority
 Depends the welfare of society,
 Were outraged. Jeanne's soft little voice arose—
 'I'll put no more my thumb up to my nose;
 No more I'll let the puss my fingers tear.'
 But they all cry—'That child is well aware
 How weak and mean you are. She knows of old
 You always take to laughing when we scold;
 No government can stand; at every hour
 Rule you upset. There is an end of power.
 No laws exist. Nought keeps the child in bound.
 You ruin all.' I bow my head to ground,

5

10

15

And say—'Your grievous charge I can't oppose.
 I'm wrong. Yes, by indulgences like those
 The people's ruin has been always wrought;
 Put me upon dry bread.' 'I'm sure we ought,
 And will!' Then Jeanne, from her dark corner, cries,
 But low to me, raising her beauteous eyes—
 (Love gives the lion's courage to the lamb!)
 'And I will go and bring you pots of jam!'

TO MY DAUGHTER ADELE

From Four Winds

Near me you slept, a fresh and rosy child,
 Cradled, the infant Jesus thus had smiled.
 So calm, so soft your sleep of purity;
 You could not hear the birds sing in the shade,
 And I inhaled all the sad sweetness made
 By the mysterious sky.

5

I heard the angels round your pillow meet;
 And as I watched your slumbers, on your sheet
 Jasmine and pinks I strewed silent and still.
 Marking your lids fast closed in sleep, I prayed,
 And my eyes filled with tears, while I portrayed
 What might the future fill.

10

My turn will come for sleeping, and my bed
 Of darkness formed will be so drear and dread,
 That song of birds my ears shall waken not;
 In that bleak night, you will pour, O my Dove!
 The prayers, the tears, the flowers my grave above,
 Which I poured o'er your cot.

15

TO GARIBALDI

From Four Winds

Friend, though oppressed alike—we still are strong.
 We to each other will our stories tell,
 You how beneath your sword the Bourbon fell,
 I in your ears Paris's dark fate will pour,
 Or Homer read beside the sounding shore.
 Then you pursue your course, so stern and strange—
 There too shall glare to conflagration change.

5

O men of Italy, he was your stay.
 People! through him Rome had been yours today;
 His warrior arm, his great prophetic soul
 Had made it yours, then raised by wise control.

10

Yes, calm—inspired with loftiness so vast
 That he was kin to all the heroic past.
 Rome he had forged anew, the pattern shown
 Of all its ancient worth, its old renown.

15

All your conflicting states he had combined;
The North and South in strength harmonious joined—
Joined Dante's soul to Juvenal's fierce zeal,
And steeped your liberated hearts in steel.
The Titan's steps he showed, and bade you come.
Weep, Italy! He would have made you Rome.

BAUDELAIRE (1821-1867)

Pierre Charles Baudelaire won for a while a somewhat sinister reputation with his Fleurs du Mal, for he succeeded only too well in the favorite French occupation of shocking the respectable middle class; but he has now come to be recognized as the most important influence in French poetry since Victor Hugo. The fiftieth anniversary of his death was made the occasion for a monumental edition of his works and for tributes to his significance from various points of view. A devout Catholic, he celebrated neither the Greek Aphrodite nor the creative Venus of the modern scientific school, but the Lilith who symbolizes to the middle ages and to the romantic revival the sinful lusts of the flesh. He made important contributions to metrical technique and it is the perfection of his verse which makes his poetry almost impossible for even the most gifted translator, but Arthur Symonds undoubtedly achieved a most brilliant success in his renderings of the Petits Poemes en Prose, a few of which are given below. Baudelaire was aiming in these at 'a poetic prose, musical without rhythm and without rhyme, subtle and staccato enough to follow the lyric motions of the soul, the wavering outlines of meditation, the sudden starts of the conscience.'

WHICH IS TRUE?

I knew one Benedicta who filled earth and air with the ideal; and from whose eyes men learned the desire of greatness, of beauty, of glory, and of all whereby we believe in immortality.

But this miraculous child was too beautiful to live long; and she died only a few days after I had come to know her, and I buried her with my own hands, one day when Spring shook out her censer in the graveyards. I buried her with my own hands, shut down into a coffin of wood, perfumed and incorruptible like Indian caskets.

And as I still gazed at the place where I had laid away my treasure, I saw all at once a little person singularly like the deceased, who trampled on the fresh soil with a strange and hysterical violence, and said, shrieking with laughter: 'Look at me! I am the real Benedicta! A pretty sort of baggage I am! And to punish you for your blindness and folly you shall love me just as I am!'

But I was furious, and I answered: 'No! no! no!' And to add more emphasis to my refusal I stamped on the ground so violently with my foot that my leg sank up to the knee in the earth of the new grave; and now, like a wolf caught in a trap, I remained fastened, perhaps forever, to the grave of the ideal.

THE EYES OF THE POOR

Ah! you want to know why I hate you today. It will probably be less easy for you to understand than for me to explain it to you; for you are, I think, the most perfect example of feminine impenetrability that could possibly be found.

We had spent a long day together, and it had seemed to me short. We had promised one another that we would think the same thoughts and that our two souls should become one soul; a dream which is not original, after all, except that, dreamed by all men, it has been realized by none.

In the evening you were a little tired, and you sat down outside a new café at the corner of a new boulevard, still littered with plaster and already displaying proudly its unfinished splendors. The café glittered. The very gas put on all the fervency of a fresh start, and lighted up with its full force the blinding whiteness of the walls, the dazzling sheets of glass in the mirrors, the gilt of cornices and moldings, the chubby-cheeked pages straining back from hounds in leash, the ladies laughing at the falcons on their wrists; the nymphs and goddesses carrying fruits and pies and game on their heads, the Hebes and Ganymedes holding out at arm's length little jars of syrups or parti-colored obelisks of ices; the whole of history and of mythology brought together to make a paradise for gluttons. Exactly opposite to us, in the roadway, stood a man of about forty years of age, with a weary face and a greyish beard, holding a little boy by one hand and carrying on the other arm a little fellow too weak to walk. He was taking the nurse-maid's place, and had brought his children out for a walk in the evening. All were in rags. The three faces were extraordinarily serious, and the six eyes stared fixedly at the new café with an equal admiration, differentiated in each according to age.

The father's eyes said: 'How beautiful it is! how beautiful it is! One would think that all the gold of the poor world had found its way to these walls.' The boy's eyes said: 'How beautiful it is! how beautiful it is! But that is a house which only people who are not like us can enter.' As for the little one's eyes, they were too fascinated to express anything but stupid and utter joy.

Song-writers say that pleasure ennoble the soul and softens the heart. The song was right that evening, so far as I was concerned. Not only was I touched by this family of eyes, but I felt rather ashamed of our glasses and decanters, so much too much for our thirst. I turned to look at you, dear love, that I might read my own thought in you; I gazed deep into your eyes, so beautiful and so strangely sweet, your green eyes that are the home of caprice and under the sovereignty of the Moon; and you said to me: 'Those people are insupportable to me with their staring saucer-eyes! Couldn't you tell the head waiter to send them away?' So hard is it to understand one another, dearest, and so incommunicable is thought, even between people who are in love!

CROWDS

It is not given to every man to take a bath of multitude: to play upon crowds is an art; and he alone can plunge, at the expense of humankind, into a debauch of vitality, to whom a fairy has bequeathed in his cradle the love of masks and disguises, the hate of home and the passion of travel.

Multitude, solitude: equal terms mutually convertible by the active and begetting poet. He who does not know how to people his solitude, does not know either how to be alone in a busy crowd.

The poet enjoys this incomparable privilege, to be at once himself and others. Like those wandering souls that go about seeking bodies, he enters at will the personality of every man. For him alone, every place is vacant; and if certain places seem to be closed against him, that is because in his eyes they are not worth the trouble of visiting.

The solitary and thoughtful walker derives a singular intoxication from this universal communion. He who mates easily with the crowd knows feverish joys that must be forever unknown to the egoist, shut up like a coffer, and to the sluggard, imprisoned like a shell-fish. He adopts for his own all the occupations, all the joys and all the sorrows that circumstance sets before him.

What men call love is small indeed, narrow and weak indeed, compared with this ineffable orgie, this sacred prostitution of the soul which gives itself up wholly (poetry and charity!) to the unexpected which happens, to the stranger as he passes.

It is good sometimes that the happy of this world should learn, were it only to humble their foolish pride for an instant, that there are higher, wider, and rarer joys than theirs. The founders of colonies, the shepherds of nations, the missionary priests, exiled to the ends of the earth, doubtless know something of these mysterious intoxications; and, in the midst of the vast family that their genius has raised about them, they must sometimes laugh at the thought of those who pity them for their chaste lives and troubled fortunes.

THE CAKE

I was traveling. The landscape in the midst of which I was seated was of an irresistible grandeur and sublimity. Something no doubt at that moment passed from it into my soul. My thoughts fluttered with a lightness like that of the atmosphere; vulgar passions, such as hate and profane love, seemed to me now as far away as the clouds that floated in the gulfs beneath my feet; my soul seemed to me as vast and pure as the dome of the sky that enveloped me; the remembrance of earthly things came as faintly to my heart as the thin tinkle of the bells of unseen herds, browsing far, far away, on the slope of another mountain. Across the little motionless lake, black with the darkness of its immense depth, there passed from time to time the shadow of a cloud, like the shadow of an airy giant's cloak, flying through heaven. And I remember that this rare and solemn sensation, caused by a vast and perfectly silent movement, filled me with mingled joy and fear. In a word, thanks to the enrapturing beauty about me, I felt that I was at perfect peace with myself and with the universe; I even believe that, in my complete forgetfulness of all earthly evil, I had come to think the newspapers are right after all, and man was born good; when, incorrigible matter renewing its exigences, I sought to refresh the fatigue and satisfy the appetite caused by so lengthy a climb, I took from my pocket a large piece of bread, a leathern cup, and a small bottle of a certain elixir which the chemists at that time sold to tourists, to be mixed, on occasion, with liquid snow.

I was quietly cutting my bread when a slight noise made me look up. I saw in front of me a little ragged urchin, dark and disheveled, whose hollow eyes, wild and supplicating, devoured the piece of bread. And I heard him gasp, in a low, hoarse voice, the word: 'Cake!' I could not help laughing at the appellation with which he thought fit to honor my nearly white bread, and I cut off a big slice and offered it to him. Slowly he came up to me, not taking his eyes from the coveted object; then, snatching it out of my hand, he stepped quickly back, as if he feared that my offer was not sincere, or that I had already repented of it.

But at the same instant he was knocked over by another little savage, who had sprung from I know not where, and who was so precisely like the first that one might have taken them for twin brothers. They rolled over on the ground together, struggling for the possession of the precious booty, neither willing to share it with his brother. The first, exasperated, clutched the second by the hair; and the second seized one of the ears of the first between his teeth, and spat out a little bleeding morsel with a fine oath in dialect. The legitimate proprietor of the cake tried to hook his little claws into the usurper's eyes; the latter did his best to throttle his adversary with one hand, while with the other he endeavored to slip the prize of war into his pocket. But, heartened by despair, the loser pulled himself together, and sent the victor sprawling with a blow of the head in his stomach. Why describe a hideous fight which indeed lasted longer than their childish strength seemed to promise? The cake traveled from hand to hand, and changed from pocket to pocket, at every moment; but, alas, it changed also in size; and when at length, exhausted, panting and bleeding, they stopped from the sheer impossibility of going on, there was no longer any cause of feud; the slice of bread had disappeared, and lay scattered in crumbs like the grains of sand with which it was mingled.

The sight had darkened the landscape for me, and dispelled the joyous calm in which my soul had lain basking; I remained saddened for quite a long time, saying over and over to myself: 'There is then a wonderful country in which bread is called cake, and is so rare a delicacy that it is enough in itself to give rise to a war literally fratricidal!'

TWILIGHT

The day is over. A great restfulness descends into poor minds that the day's work has wearied; and thoughts take on the tender and dim colors of twilight.

Nevertheless, from the mountain peak there comes to my balcony, through the transparent clouds of evening, a great clamor, made up of a crowd of discordant cries, dulled by distance into a mournful harmony, like that of the rising tide or of a storm brewing.

Who are the hapless ones to whom evening brings no calm; to whom, as to the owls, the coming of night is the signal for a witches' sabbath? The sinister ululation comes to me from the hospital on the mountain; and, in the evening, as I smoke, and look down on the quiet of the immense valley, bristling with houses, each of whose windows seems to say, 'Here is peace, here is domestic happiness!' I can, when the wind blows from the heights, lull my astonished thought with this imitation of the harmonies of hell.

Twilight excites madmen. I remember I had two friends whom twilight made quite ill. One of them lost all sense of social and friendly amenities, and flew at the first-comer like a savage. I have seen him throw at the waiter's head an excellent chicken, in which he imagined he had discovered some insulting hieroglyph. Evening, harbinger of profound delights, spoilt for him the most succulent things.

The other, a prey to disappointed ambition, turned gradually, as the daylight dwindled, sourer, more gloomy, more nettlesome. Indulgent and sociable during the day, he was pitiless in the evening; and it was not only on others, but on himself, that he vented the rage of his twilight mania.

The former died mad, unable to recognize his wife and child; the latter still keeps the restlessness of a perpetual disquietude; and, if all the honors that republics and princes can confer were heaped upon him, I believe that the twilight would still quicken in him the burning envy of imaginary distinctions. Night, which put its own darkness into their minds, brings light to mine; and, though it is by no means rare for the same cause to bring about opposite results, I am always as it were perplexed and alarmed by it. O night! O refreshing dark! for me you are the summons to an inner feast, you are the deliverer from anguish! In the solitude of the plains, in the stony labyrinths of a city, scintillation of stars, outburst of gaslamps, you are the fireworks of the goddess Liberty!

Twilight, how gentle you are and how tender! The rosy lights that still linger on the horizon, like the last agony of day under the conquering might of its night; the flaring candleflames that stain with dull red the last glories of the sunset; the heavy draperies that an invisible hand draws out of the depths of the East, mimic all those complex feelings that war on one another in the heart of man at the solemn moments of life. Would you not say that it was one of those strange costumes worn by dancers, in which the tempered splendors of a shining skirt show through a dark and transparent gauze, as, through the darkness of the present, pierces the delicious past? And the wavering stars of gold and silver with which it is shot, are they not those fires of fancy which take light never so well as under the deep mourning of the night?

A HEROIC DEATH

Fancioulle was an admirable buffoon, and almost one of the friends of the Prince. But for persons professionally devoted to the comic, serious things have a fatal attraction, and, strange as it may seem that ideas of patriotism and liberty should seize despotically upon the brain of the player, one day Fancioulle joined in a conspiracy formed by some discontented nobles.

There exist everywhere sensible men to denounce those individuals of atrabilious disposition who seek to depose princes, and, without consulting it, to reconstitute society. The lords in question were arrested, together with Fancioulle, and condemned to death.

I would readily believe that the Prince was almost sorry to find his favorite actor among the rebels. The Prince was neither better nor worse than any other Prince; but an excessive sensibility rendered him, in many cases, more cruel and more despotic than all his fellows. Passionately enamored of the fine arts, an excellent connoisseur as well, he was truly insatiable of pleasures. Indifferent enough in regard to men and morals, himself a real artist, he feared no enemy but Ennui, and the extravagant efforts that he made to fly or to vanquish this tyrant of the world would certainly have brought upon him, on the part of a severe historian, the epithet of 'monster,' had it been permitted, in his dominions, to write anything whatever which did not tend exclusively to pleasure, or to astonishment, which is one of the most delicate forms of pleasure. The great misfortune of the Prince was that he had no theater vast enough for his genius. There are young Neros who are stifled within too narrow limits, and whose names and whose intentions will never be known to future ages. An unforeseeing Providence had given to this man faculties greater than his dominions.

Suddenly the rumor spread that the sovereign had decided to pardon all the conspirators; and the origin of this rumor was the announcement of a special performance in which Fancioulle would play one of his best rôles, and at which even the condemned nobles, it was said, were to be present, an evident sign, added superficial minds, of the generous tendencies, of the Prince.

On the part of a man so naturally and deliberately eccentric, anything was possible, even virtue, even mercy, especially if he could hope to find in it unexpected pleasures. But to those who, like myself, had succeeded in penetrating further into the depths of this sick and curious soul, it was infinitely more probable that the Prince was wishful to estimate the quality of the scenic talents of a man condemned to death. He would profit by the occasion to obtain a physiological experience of a capital interest, and to verify to what extent the habitual faculties of an artist would be altered or modified by the extraordinary situation in which he found himself. Beyond this, did there exist in his mind an intention, more or less defined, of mercy? It is a point that has never been solved.

At last, the great day having come, the little court displayed all its pomps, and it would be difficult to realize, without having seen it, what splendor the privileged classes of a little state with limited resources can show forth, on a really solemn occasion. This was a doubly solemn one, both from the wonder of its display and from the mysterious moral interest attaching to it.

The Sieur Fancioulle excelled especially in parts either silent or little burdened with words, such as are often the principal ones in those fairy plays whose object is to represent symbolically the mystery of life. He came upon the stage lightly and with a perfect ease, which in itself lent some support, in the minds of the noble public, to the idea of kindness and forgiveness.

When we say of an actor, 'This is a good actor,' we make use of a formula which implies that under the personage we can still distinguish the actor, that is to say, art, effort, will. Now, if an actor should succeed in being, in relation to the personage whom he is appointed to express, precisely what the finest statues of antiquity, miraculously animated, living, walking, seeing, would be in relation to the confused general idea of beauty, this would be, undoubtedly, a singular and unheard of case. Fancioulle was, that evening, a perfect idealization, which it was impossible not to suppose living, possible, real. The buffoon came and went, he laughed, wept, was convulsed, with an indestructible aureole about his head, an aureole invisible to all, but visible to me, and in which were blended, in a strange amalgam, the rays of Art and the martyr's glory. Fancioulle brought, by I know not what special grace, something divine and supernatural into even the most extravagant buffooneries. My pen trembles, and the tears of an emotion which

I cannot forget rise to my eyes, as I try to describe to you this never-to-be-forgotten evening. Fancioulle proved to me, in a peremptory, an irrefutable way, that the intoxication of Art is surer than all others to veil the terrors of the gulf; that genius can act a comedy on the threshold of the grave with a joy that hinders it from seeing the grave, lost, as it is, in a Paradise shutting out all thought of the grave and of destruction.

The whole audience, blasé and frivolous as it was, soon fell under the all-powerful sway of the artist. Not a thought was left of death, of mourning, or of punishment. All gave themselves up, without disquietude, to the manifold delights caused by the sight of a masterpiece of living art. Explosions of joy and admiration again and again shook the dome of the edifice with the energy of a continuous thunder. The Prince himself, in an ecstasy, joined in the applause of his court.

Nevertheless, to a discerning eye, his emotion was not unmixed. Did he feel himself conquered in his power as despot? humiliated in his art as the striker of terror into hearts, of chill into souls? Such suppositions, not exactly justified, but not absolutely unjustifiable, passed through my mind as I contemplated the face of the Prince, on which a new pallor gradually overspread its habitual paleness, as snow overspreads snow. His lips compressed themselves tighter and tighter, and his eyes lighted up with an inner fire like that of jealousy or of spite, even while he applauded the talents of his old friend, the strange buffoon, who played the buffoon so well in the face of death. At a certain moment, I saw his Highness lean towards a little page, stationed behind him, and whisper in his ear. The roguish face of the pretty child lit up with a smile, and he briskly quitted the Prince's box as if to execute some urgent commission.

A few minutes later a shrill and prolonged hiss interrupted Fancioulle in one of his finest moments, and rent alike every ear and heart. And from the part of the house from whence this unexpected note of disapproval had sounded, a child darted into a corridor with stifled laughter.

Fancioulle, shaken, roused out of his dream, closed his eyes, then re-opened them, almost at once, extraordinarily wide, opened his mouth as if to breathe convulsively, staggered a little forward, a little backward, and then fell stark dead on the boards.

Had the hiss, swift as a sword, really frustrated the hangman? Had the Prince himself divined all the homicidal efficacy of his ruse? It is permitted to doubt it. Did he regret his dear and inimitable Fancioulle? It is sweet and legitimate to believe it.

The guilty nobles had enjoyed the performance of comedy for the last time. They were effaced from life.

Since then, many mimes, justly appreciated in different countries, have played before the court of —; but none of them have ever been able to recall the marvelous talents of Fancioulle, or to rise to the same favor.

NIETZSCHE (1844-1900)

During the last quarter of the nineteenth century the newly-founded German Empire made remarkable progress in political influence, commercial and colonial expansion and scientific investigation, but in literature the one figure that commanded the attention of other nations (not counting Wagner, who belongs chiefly to music) was Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche, whose ideas were in direct antagonism to all that modern Germany stood for. Educated at Bonn and Leipsic, Nietzsche in 1869 obtained a professorship of classical philology at Basel, but was compelled through brain and eye troubles to retire in 1879. The next ten years, spent at various health resorts until his complete breakdown in 1888, were extraordinarily productive from the literary point of view, but he was always much more of a poet than a philosopher. He made no attempt to work out a complete or logical system, but uttered his thought in disconnected aphorisms and paradoxes, remarkable alike for their brilliance of phrasing and their revolutionary spirit. Of his numerous works the most finished and the most significant are Thus Spake Zarathustra (1883-4) and Beyond Good and Evil (1886). On account of the cryptic and paradoxical strain in his writings, he has been much misunderstood and held responsible for ideas he would have disowned. His idea of the 'Superman' who should be evolved as the next stage in human development has often been misrepresented, and nothing could be further from his thought than the 'Deutschland über Alles' cry, which is frequently ridiculed in his writings. He was anti-Nationalist, anti-Christian, 'anti-democratic,' a strong individualist and violently opposed to centralized government. His criticism of established institutions and accepted beliefs is often suggestive as well as keen, though its extravagance of statement is perhaps more likely to shock the ordinary reader than to awaken him to reconsider the traditional view.

His acceptance by English-speaking readers has been slow. The first translation into English, issued in the early years of the present century, had little sale, and a complete issue of his works in English was not achieved for some years. As edited by Dr. Oscar Levy, it is now being republished in this country in eighteen volumes by the Macmillan Company, to whom we are indebted for permission to republish the following chapters from Thus Spake Zarathustra and Beyond Good and Evil.

ZARATHUSTRA'S PROLOGUE

When Zarathustra was thirty years old, he left his home and the lake of his home, and went into the mountains. There he enjoyed his spirit and his solitude, and for ten years did not weary of it. But at last his heart changed,—and rising one morning with the rosy dawn, he went before the sun, and spake thus unto it:

'Thou great star! What would be thy happiness if thou hadst not those for whom thou shinest!

'For ten years hast thou climbed hither unto my cave: thou wouldst have wearied of thy light and of the journey, had it not been for me, mine eagle, and my serpent.

'But we awaited thee every morning, took from thee thine overflow, and blessed thee for it.

'Lo! I am weary of my wisdom, like the bee that hath gathered too much honey; I need hands outstretched to take it.

5 'I would fain bestow and distribute, until the wise have once more become joyous in their folly, and the poor happy in their riches.

'Therefore must I descend into the deep: as thou doest in the evening, when thou goest behind the sea, and givest light also 10 to the nether-world, thou exuberant star! 'Like thee must I go down, as men say, to whom I shall descend.

'Bless me, then, thou tranquil eye, that canst behold even the greatest happiness without envy!

'Bless the cup that is about to overflow, that the water may flow golden out of it, and carry everywhere the reflection of thy 20 bliss!

'Lo! This cup is again going to empty itself, and Zarathustra is again going to be a man.'

Thus began Zarathustra's down-going.

Zarathustra went down the mountain alone, no one meeting him. When he entered the forest, however, there suddenly stood before him an old man, who had left his holy cot to seek roots. And thus spake the old man to Zarathustra:

'No stranger to me is this wanderer: many years ago passed he by. Zarathustra was called; but he hath altered.'

'Then thou carriedst thine ashes into the mountains: wilt thou now carry thy fire into the valleys? Fearest thou not the incendiary's doom?'

'Yea, I recognize Zarathustra. Pure is his eye, and no loathing lurketh about his mouth. Goeth he not along like a dancer? Altered is Zarathustra; a child hath Zarathustra become; an awakened one is Zarathustra: what wilt thou do in the land of the sleepers?'

'As in the sea hast thou lived in solitude, and it hath borne thee up. Alas, wilt thou now go ashore? Alas, wilt thou again drag thy body thyself?'

Zarathustra answered: 'I love mankind.'

'Why,' said the saint, 'did I go into the forest and the desert? Was it not because I loved men far too well?'

'Now I love God: men, I do not love. Man is a thing too imperfect for me. Love to man would be fatal to me.'

Zarathustra answered: 'What spake I of love! I am bringing gifts unto men.'

'Give them nothing,' said the saint. 'Take rather part of their load, and carry it along with them—that will be most agreeable unto them: if only it be agreeable unto thee!'

'If, however, thou wilt give unto them, give them no more than an alms, and let them also beg for it!'

'No,' replied Zarathustra, 'I give no alms. I am not poor enough for that.'

The saint laughed at Zarathustra, and spake thus: 'Then see to it that they accept thy treasures! They are distrustful of anchorites, and do not believe that we come with gifts.'

'The fall of our footsteps ringeth too hollow through their streets. And just as at night, when they are in bed and hear a man abroad long before sunrise, so they ask themselves concerning us: where goeth the thief?'

'Go not to men, but stay in the forest! Go rather to the animals! Why not be like me—a bear amongst bears, a bird amongst birds?'

'And what doeth the saint in the forest?' asked Zarathustra.

The saint answered: 'I make hymns and sing them; and in making hymns I laugh and weep and mumble: thus do I praise God.'

'With singing, weeping, laughing, and mumbling do I praise the God who is my God. But what dost thou bring us as a gift?'

When Zarathustra had heard these words, he bowed to the saint and said: 'What should I have to give thee? Let me rather hurry hence lest I take aught away from thee!' And thus they parted from one another, the old man and Zarathustra, laughing like schoolboys.

When Zarathustra was alone, however, he said to his heart: 'Could it be possible! This old saint in the forest hath not yet heard of it, that God is dead!'

When Zarathustra arrived at the nearest town which adjoineth the forest, he found many people assembled in the marketplace; for it had been announced that a rope-dancer would give a performance. And Zarathustra spake thus unto the people:

'I teach you the Superman. Man is something that is to be surpassed. What have ye done to surpass man?'

'All beings hitherto have created something beyond themselves: and ye want to be the ebb of that great tide, and would rather go back to the beast than surpass man?'

'What is the ape to man? A laughing-stock, a thing of shame. And just the same shall man be to the Superman: a laughing-stock, a thing of shame.'

'Ye have made your way from the worm to man, and much within you is still worm. Once were ye apes, and even yet man is more of an ape than any of the apes.'

'Even the wisest among you is only a disharmony and hybrid of plant and phantom. But do I bid you become phantoms or plants?'

'Lo, I teach you the superman!'

'The Superman is the meaning of the earth. Let your will say: The Superman shall be the meaning of the earth!

"I conjure you, my brethren, remain true to the earth, and believe not those who speak unto you of superearthy hopes! Poisoners are they, whether they know it or not.

"Despisers of life are they, decaying ones and poisoned ones themselves, of whom the earth is weary: so away with them!

"Once blasphemy against God was the greatest blasphemy; but God died, and therewith also those blasphemers. To blaspheme the earth is now the dreadfulest sin, and to rate the heart of the unknowable higher than the meaning of the earth!

"Once the soul looked contemptuously on the body, and then that contempt was the supreme thing:—the soul wished the body meager, ghastly, and famished. Thus it thought to escape from the body and the earth.

"Oh, that soul was itself meager, ghastly, and famished; and cruelty was the delight of that soul!

"But ye, also, my brethren, tell me: What doth your body say about your soul? Is your soul not poverty and pollution and wretched self-complacency?

"Verily, a polluted stream is man. One must be a sea, to receive a polluted stream without becoming impure.

"Lo, I teach you the Superman: he is that sea; in him can your great contempt be submerged.

"What is the greatest thing ye can experience? It is the hour of great contempt. The hour in which even your happiness becometh loathsome unto you, and so also your reason and virtue.

"The hour when ye say: "What good is my happiness! It is poverty and pollution and wretched self-complacency. But my happiness should justify existence itself!"

"The hour when ye say: "What good is my reason! Doth it long for knowledge as the lion for his food? It is poverty and pollution and wretched self-complacency!"

"The hour when ye say: "What good is my virtue! As yet it hath not made me passionate. How weary I am of my good and my bad! It is all poverty and pollution and wretched self-complacency!"

"The hour when ye say: "What good is my justice! I do not see that I am fervor and fuel. The just, however, are fervor and fuel!"

"The hour when we say: "What good is my pity! Is not pity the cross on which he is nailed who loveth man? But my pity is not a crucifixion."

"Have ye ever spoken thus? Have ye ever cried thus? Ah! would that I had heard you crying thus! It is not your sin—it is your self-satisfaction that crieth unto heaven; your very sparingness in sin crieth unto heaven!

"Where is the lightning to lick you with its tongue? Where is the frenzy with which ye should be inoculated?

"Lo, I teach you the Superman: he is that lightning, he is that frenzy!

When Zarathustra had thus spoken, one of the people called out: "We have now heard enough of the rope-dancer; it is time now for us to see him!" And all the people laughed at Zarathustra. But the rope-dancer, who thought the words applied to him, began his performance.

Zarathustra, however, looked at the people and wondered. Then he spake thus:

"Man is a rope stretched between the animal and the Superman—a rope over an abyss.

"A dangerous crossing, a dangerous way-faring, a dangerous looking-back, a dangerous trembling and halting.

"What is great in man is that he is a bridge and not a goal: what is lovable in man is that he is an over-going and a down-going.

"I love those that know not how to live except as down-goers, for they are the over-goers.

"I love the great despisers, because they are the great adorers, and arrows of longing for the other shore.

"I love those who do not first seek a reason beyond the stars for going down and being sacrifices, but sacrifice themselves to the earth, that the earth of the Superman may hereafter arrive.

"I love him who liveth in order to know, and seeketh to know in order that the Superman may hereafter live. Thus seeketh he his own down-going.

"I love him who laboreth and inventeth, that he may build the house for the Superman, and prepare for him earth, animal, and plant: for thus seeketh he his own down-going.

"I love him who loveth his virtue: for virtue is the will to down-going, and an arrow of longing.

"I love him who reserveth no share of spirit for himself, but wanteth to be wholly the spirit of his virtue: thus walketh he as spirit over the bridge.

'I love him who maketh his virtue his inclination and destiny: thus, for the sake of his virtue, he is willing to live on, or live no more.

'I love him who desireth not too many virtues. One virtue is more of a virtue than two, because it is more of a knot for one's destiny to cling to.

'I love him whose soul is lavish, who wanteth no thanks and doth not give back: for he always bestoweth, and desireth not to keep for himself.

'I love him who is ashamed when the dice fall in his favor and who then asketh: "Am I a dishonest player?"—for he is willing to succumb.

'I love him who scattereth golden words in advance of his deeds, and always doeth more than he promiseth: for he seeketh his own down-going.

'I love him who justifieth the future ones, and redeemeth the past ones: for he is willing to succumb through the present ones.

'I love him who chasteneth his God, because he loveth his God: for he must succumb through the wrath of his God.

'I love him whose soul is deep even in the wounding, and may succumb through a small matter: thus goeth he willingly over the bridge.

'I love him whose soul is so overfull that he forgetteth himself, and all things are in him: thus all things become his down-going.

'I love him who is of a free spirit and a free heart: thus is his head only the bowels of his heart; his heart, however, causeth his down-going.

'I love all who are like heavy drops falling one by one out of the dark cloud that lowereth over man: they herald the coming of lightning, and succumb as heralds.

'Lo, I am a herald of the lightning, and a heavy drop out of the cloud: the lightning, however, is the Superman.'

When Zarathustra had spoken these words, he again looked at the people, and was silent. 'There they stand,' said he to his heart; 'there they laugh: they understand me not; I am not the mouth for these ears.

'Must one first batter their ears, that they may learn to hear with their eyes?

Must one clatter like kettledrums and penitential preachers? Or do they only believe the stammerer?

'They have something whereof they are proud. What do they call it, that which maketh them proud? Culture, they call it; it distinguisheth them from the goatherds.

'They dislike, therefore, to hear of "contempt" of themselves. So I will appeal to their pride.

'I will speak unto them of the most contemptible thing: that, however, is the last man!'

15 And thus spake Zarathustra unto the people:

'It is time for man to fix his goal. It is time for man to plant the germ of his highest hope.

'Still is his soil rich enough for it. But that soil will one day be poor and exhausted, and no lofty tree will any longer be able to grow thereon.

'Alas! there cometh the time when man will no longer launch the arrow of his longing beyond man—and the string of his bow will have unlearned to whizz!

'I tell you: one must still have chaos in one, to give birth to a dancing star. I 30 tell you: ye have still chaos in you.

'Alas! There cometh the time when man will no longer give birth to any star. Alas! There cometh the time of the most despicable man, who can no longer despise himself.

'Lo! I show you the last man.

'What is love? What is creation? What is longing? What is a star?'—so asketh the last man and blinketh.

40 'The earth hath then become small, and on it there hoppeth the last man who maketh everything small. His species is ineradicable like that of the ground-flea; the last man liveth longest.

'"We have discovered happiness"—say the last men, and blink thereby.

'They have left the regions where it is hard to live; for they need warmth. One still loveth one's neighbor and rubbeth 50 against him; for one needeth warmth.

'Turning ill and being distrustful, they consider sinful: they walk warily. He is a fool who still stumbleth over stones or men!

'A little poison now and then: that maketh pleasant dreams. And much poison at last for a pleasant death.

'One still worketh, for work is a pastime.

But one is careful lest the pastime should hurt one.

'One no longer becometh poor or rich; both are too burdensome. Who still wanteth to rule? Who still wanteth to obey? Both are too burdensome.'

'No shepherd, and one herd! Everyone wanteth the same; everyone is equal: he who hath other sentiments goeth voluntarily into the madhouse.'

"Formerly all the world was insane,"—say the subtlest of them, and blink thereby.

'They are clever and know all that hath happened: so there is no end to their railery. People still fall out, but are soon reconciled—otherwise it spoileth their stomachs.'

'They have their little pleasures for the day, and their little pleasures for the night: but they have a regard for health.'

"We have discovered happiness,"—say the last men, and blink thereby.'

And here ended the first discourse of Zarathustra, which is also called 'The Prologue': for at this point the shouting and mirth of the multitude interrupted him. 'Give us this last man, O Zarathustra,'—they called out—'make us into these last men! Then will we make thee a present of the Superman!' And all the people exulted and smacked their lips. Zarathustra, however, turned sad, and said to his heart:

'They understand me not: I am not the mouth for these ears.'

'Too long, perhaps, have I lived in the mountains; too much have I harkened unto the brooks and trees: now do I speak unto them as unto the goatherds.'

'Calm is my soul, and clear, like the mountains in the morning. But they think me cold, and a mocker with terrible jests.'

'And now do they look at me and laugh: and while they laugh they hate me too. There is ice in their laughter.'

Then, however, something happened which made every mouth mute and every eye fixed. In the meantime, of course, the rope-dancer had commenced his performance: he had come out at a little door, and was going along the rope which was stretched between two towers, so that it hung above the market-place and the people. When he was just midway across, the little door opened once more, and a gaudily-dressed fellow like a buffoon sprang out, and went rapidly after the first one.

'Go on, halt-foot,' cried his frightful voice, 'go on, lazy-bones, interloper, sallow-face!—lest I tickle thee with my heel! What dost thou here between the towers? In the tower is the place for thee, thou shouldst be locked up; to one better than thyself thou blockest the way!'

And with every word he came nearer and nearer the first one. When, however, he was but a step behind, there happened the frightful thing which made every mouth mute and every eye fixed:—he uttered a yell like the devil, and jumped over the other who was in his way. The latter, however, when he thus saw his rival triumph, lost at the same time his head and his footing on the rope; he threw his pole away, and shot downwards faster than it, like an eddy of arms and legs, into the depth. The market-place and the people were like the sea when the storm cometh on: they all flew apart and in disorder, especially where the body was about to fall.

Zarathustra, however, remained standing, and just beside him fell the body, badly injured and disfigured, but not yet dead. After a while consciousness returned to the shattered man, and he saw Zarathustra kneeling beside him. 'What art thou doing there?' said he at last. 'I knew long ago that the devil would trip me up. Now he draggeth me to hell: wilt thou prevent him?'

'On mine honor, my friend,' answered Zarathustra, 'there is nothing of all that whereof thou speakest: there is no devil and no hell. Thy soul will be dead even sooner than thy body: fear, therefore, nothing any more!'

The man looked up distrustfully. 'If thou speakest the truth,' said he, 'I lose nothing when I lose my life. I am not much more than an animal which hath been taught to dance by blows and scanty fare.'

'Not at all,' said Zarathustra, 'thou hast made danger thy calling; therein there is nothing contemptible. Now thou perishest by thy calling: therefore I will bury thee with my own hands.'

When Zarathustra had said this, the dying one did not reply further; but he moved his hand as if he sought the hand of Zarathustra in gratitude.

Meanwhile, the evening came on, and the market-place veiled itself in gloom. Then the people dispersed, for even curiosity and terror become fatigued. Zarathustra, however, still sat beside the dead man on the ground, absorbed in thought: so he forgot the time. But at last it became night, and a cold wind blew upon the lonely one. Then arose Zarathustra and said to his heart:

'Verily, a fine catch of fish hath Zarathustra made today! It is not a man he hath caught, but a corpse.

'Somber is human life, and as yet without meaning: a buffoon may be fateful to it.

'I want to teach men the sense of their existence, which is the Superman, the lightning out of the dark cloud—man.

'But still am I far from them, and my sense speaketh not unto their sense. To men I am still something between a fool and a corpse.

'Gloomy is the night, gloomy are the ways of Zarathustra. Come, thou cold and stiff companion! I carry thee to the place where I shall bury thee with mine own hands.'

When Zarathustra had said this to his heart, he put the corpse upon his shoulders and set out on his way. Yet had he not gone a hundred steps, when there stole a man up to him and whispered in his ear—and lo! he that spake was the buffoon from the tower. 'Leave this town, O Zarathustra,' said he, 'there are too many here who hate thee. The good and just hate thee, and call thee their enemy and despiser; the believers in the orthodox belief hate thee, and call thee a danger to the multitude. It was thy good fortune to be laughed at: and verily thou spakest like a buffoon. It was thy good fortune to associate with the dead dog; by so humiliating thyself thou hast saved thy life today. Depart, however, from this town,—or tomorrow I shall jump over thee, a living man over a dead one.' And when he had said this, the buffoon vanished; Zarathustra, however, went on through the dark streets.

At the gate of the town the gravediggers met him: they shone their torch on his face, and recognizing Zarathustra, they sorely derided him. 'Zarathustra is carrying away the dead dog: a fine thing that Zarathustra hath turned a gravedigger! For our hands are too cleanly for that roast. Will Zarathustra steal the bite from the devil? Well then, good luck to the repast! If only the devil is not a better thief than Zarathustra!—he will steal them both, he will eat them both!' And they laughed among themselves, and put their heads together.

Zarathustra made no answer thereto, but went on his way. When he had gone on for two hours, past forests and swamps, he had heard too much of the hungry howling of the wolves, and he himself became a-hungry. So he halted at a lonely house in which a light was burning.

'Hunger attacketh me,' said Zarathustra, 'like a robber. Among forests and swamps my hunger attacketh me, and late in the night.

'Strange humors hath my hunger. Often it cometh to me only after a repast, and all day it hath failed to come: where hath it been?'

And thereupon Zarathustra knocked at the door of the house. An old man appeared, who carried a light, and asked: 'Who cometh unto me and my bad sleep?'

'A living man and a dead one,' said Zarathustra. 'Give me something to eat and drink, I forgot it during the day. He that feedeth the hungry refresheth his own soul, saith wisdom.'

The old man withdrew, but came back immediately and offered Zarathustra bread and wine. 'A bad country for the hungry,' said he; 'that is why I live here. Animal and man come unto me, the anchorite. But bid thy companion eat and drink also, he is wearier than thou.' Zarathustra answered: 'My companion is dead; I shall hardly be able to persuade him to eat.' 'That doth not concern me,' said the old man sullenly; 'he that knocketh at my door must take what I offer him. Eat, and fare ye well!'

Thereafter Zarathustra again went on for two hours, trusting to the path and the light of the stars: for he was an experienced night-walker, and liked to look into the face of all that slept. When the morning dawned, however, Zarathustra found himself in a thick forest, and no path was any longer visible. He then put the dead man in a hollow tree at his head—for he wanted to protect him from the wolves—and laid himself down on the ground and moss. And immediately he fell asleep, tired in body, but with a tranquil soul.

Long slept Zarathustra; and not only the rosy dawn passed over his head, but also the morning. At last, however, his eyes opened, and amazedly he gazed into the forest and stillness, amazedly he gazed into himself. Then he arose quickly, like a seafarer who all at once seeth the land; and he shouted for joy: for he saw a new truth. And he spake thus to his heart:

'A light hath dawned upon me: I need 10 companions—living ones; not dead companions and corpses, which I carry with me where I will.

'But I need living companions, who will follow me because they want to follow themselves—and to the place where I will.

'A light hath dawned upon me. Not to the people is Zarathustra to speak, but to companions! Zarathustra shall not be the herd's herdsman and hound!

'To allure many from the herd—for that purpose have I come. The people and the herd must be angry with me: a robber shall Zarathustra be called by the herds-men.

'Herds-men, I say, but they call themselves the good and just. Herds-men, I say, but they call themselves the believers in the orthodox belief.

'Behold the good and just! Whom do 30 they hate most? Him who breaketh up their tables of values, the breaker, the law-breaker:—he, however, is the creator.

'Behold the believers of all beliefs! Whom do they hate most? Him who 35 breaketh up their tables of values, the breaker, the law-breaker: he, however, is the creator.

'Companions, the creator seeketh, not corpses—and not herds or believers either. 40 Fellow-creatures the creator seeketh—those who grave new values on new tables.

'Companions, the creator seeketh and fellow-reapers: for everything is ripe for the harvest with him. But he lacketh the 45 hundred sickles: so he plucketh the ears of corn and is vexed.

'Companions, the creator seeketh, and such as know how to whet their sickles. Destroyers, will they be called, and 50 despisers of good and evil. But they are the reapers and rejoicers.

'Fellow-creators, Zarathustra seeketh; fellow-reapers and fellow-rejoicers, Zarathustra seeketh; what hath he to do with 55 herds and herds-men and corpses!

'And thou, my first companion, rest in peace! Well have I buried thee in thy hollow tree; well have I hid thee from the wolves.

'But I part from thee; the time hath arrived. 'Twixt rosy dawn and rosy dawn 5 there came unto me a new truth.

'I am not to be a herdsman, I am not to be a gravedigger. Not any more will I discourse unto the people; for the last time have I spoken unto the dead.

'With the creators, the reapers, and the rejoicers will I associate: the rainbow will I show them, and all the stars to the Superman.

'To the lone-dwellers will I sing my 15 song, and to the twain-dwellers; and unto him who hath still ears for the unheard, will I make the heart heavy with my happiness.

'I make for my goal, I follow my course; 20 over the loitering and tardy will I leap. Thus let my on-going be their down-going!'

This had Zarathustra said to his heart 25 when the sun stood at noon-tide. Then he looked inquiringly aloft,—for he heard above him the sharp call of a bird. And behold! An eagle swept through the air in wide circles, and on it hung a serpent, not like a prey, but like a friend: for it kept itself coiled around the eagle's neck.

'They are mine animals,' said Zarathustra, and rejoiced in his heart.

'The proudest animal under the sun, and the wisest animal under the sun,—they have come out to reconnoiter.

'They want to know whether Zarathustra still liveth. Verily, do I still live?

'More dangerous have I found it among 40 men than among animals; in dangerous paths goeth Zarathustra. Let mine animals lead me!'

When Zarathustra had said this, he remembered the words of the saint in the forest. Then he sighed and spake thus to his heart:

'Would that I were wiser! Would that I were wise from the very heart, like my 50 serpent!

'But I am asking the impossible. Therefore do I ask my pride to go always with my wisdom!

'And if my wisdom should some day forsake me:—alas! it loveth to fly away!— 55 may my pride then fly with my folly!'

Thus began Zarathustra's down-going.

BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL

240

I heard, once again for the first time, Richard Wagner's overture to the Master-singers: it is a piece of magnificent, gorgeous, heavy, latter-day art, which has the pride to presuppose two centuries of music as still living, in order that it may be understood: it is an honor to Germans that such a pride did not miscalculate! What flavors and forces, what seasons and climes do we not find mingled in it! It impresses us at one time as ancient, at another time as foreign, bitter, and too modern, it is as arbitrary as it is pompously traditional, it is not infrequently roguish, still oftener rough and coarse—it has fire and courage, and at the same time the loose, dun-colored skin of fruits which ripen too late. It flows broad and full: and suddenly there is a moment of inexplicable hesitation, like a gap that opens between cause and effect, an oppression that makes us dream, almost a nightmare; but already it broadens and widens anew, the old stream of delight—the most manifold delight—of old and new happiness; including especially the joy of the artist in himself, which he refuses to conceal, his astonished, happy cognizance of his mastery of the expedients here employed, the new, newly acquired, imperfectly tested expedients of art which he apparently betrays to us. All in all, however, no beauty, no South, nothing of the delicate southern cleanness of the sky, nothing of grace, no dance, hardly a will to logic; a certain clumsiness even, which is also emphasized, as though the artist wished to say to us: 'It is part of my intention'; a cumbersome drapery, something arbitrarily barbaric and ceremonious, a flirring of learned and venerable conceits and witticisms; something German in the best and worst sense of the word, something in the German style, manifold, formless, and inexhaustible; a certain German potency and superplenitude of soul, which is not afraid to hide itself under the raffinements of decadence—which, perhaps, feels itself most at ease there; a real, genuine token of the German soul, which is at the same time young and aged, too ripe and yet still too rich in futurity. This kind of music expresses best what I think of the Germans; they belong to the day before yesterday and the day after tomorrow—they have as yet no today.

241

We 'good Europeans,' we also have hours when we allow ourselves a warm-hearted patriotism, a plunge and relapse into old loves and narrow views—I have just given an example of it—hours of national excitement, of patriotic anguish, and all other sorts of old-fashioned floods of sentiment. Duller spirits may perhaps only get done with what confines its operations in us to hours and plays itself out in hours—in a considerable time: some in half a year, others in half a lifetime, according to the speed and strength with which they digest and 'change their material.' Indeed, I could think of sluggish, hesitating races, which, even in our rapidly moving Europe, would require half a century ere they could surmount such atavistic attacks of patriotism and soil attachment, and return once more to reason, that is to say, to 'good Europeanism.' And while digressing on this possibility, I happen to become an ear-witness of a conversation between two old patriots—they were evidently both hard of hearing and consequently spoke all the louder.

'He has as much, and knows as much, philosophy as a peasant or a corps-student,' said the one—he is still innocent. But what does that matters nowadays! It is the age of the masses: they lie on their belly before everything that is massive. And so also in politics [in political affairs]. A statesman who rears up for them a new Tower of Babel, some monstrosity of empire and power, they call "great"—what does it matter that we more prudent and conservative ones do not meanwhile give up the old belief that it is only the great thought that gives greatness to an action or affair. Supposing a statesman were to bring his people into the position of being obliged henceforth to practise "high politics," for which they were by nature badly endowed and prepared, so that they would have to sacrifice their old and reliable virtues, out of love to a new and doubtful mediocrity;—supposing a statesman were to condemn his people generally to "practise politics," when they have hitherto had something better to do and think about, and when in the depths of their souls they have been unable to free themselves from a prudent loathing of the restlessness, emptiness, and noisy wranglings of the essentially politics-practising nations;—supposing such a statesman were to stimulate the slumbering passions and avidities of his people, were to make a stigma out of their former diffidence and delight in aloofness, an offense out of their exoticism and hidden permanency, were to depreciate their most radical proclivities, subvert their consciences, make their minds narrow, and their tastes “national”—what! a statesman who should do all this, which for throughout their whole future, if they had a future, such a statesman would be great, would he?

‘Undoubtedly!’ replied the other old patriot vehemently; ‘otherwise he could not have done it! It was mad perhaps to wish such a thing! But perhaps everything great has just been mad at its commencement!’

‘Misuse of words!’ cried his interlocutor, contradictorily—‘Strong! Strong! Strong and mad! Not great!’

The old men had obviously become heated as they thus shouted their ‘truths’ in each other’s faces; but I, in my happiness and apartness, considered how soon a stronger one may become master of the strong; and also that there is a compensation for the intellectual superficializing of a nation—namely, in the deepening of another.

242

Whether we call it ‘civilization,’ or ‘humanizing,’ or ‘progress,’ which now distinguishes the European; whether we call it simply, without praise or blame, by the political formula: the democratic movement in Europe—behind all the moral and political foregrounds pointed to by such formulas, an immense physiological process goes on, which is ever extending: the process of the assimilation of Europeans; their increasing detachment from the conditions under which, climatically and hereditarily, united races originate; their increasing independence of every definite milieu, that for centuries would fain inscribe itself with equal demands on soul and body;—that is to say, the slow emergence of an essentially super-national and nomadic species of man, who possesses, physiologically speaking, a maximum of the art and power of adaptation as his typical distinction. This process of the evolving European, which can be retarded in its tempo by great relapses, but will perhaps just gain and grow thereby in vehemence and depth—the still raging storm and stress of ‘national sentiment’ pertains to it, and also the anarchism which is appearing at present—this process will probably arrive at results on which its naive propagators and panegyrists, the apostles of ‘modern ideas,’ would least care to reckon. The same new conditions under which on an average a leveling and mediocrizing of man will take place—a useful, industrious, variously serviceable and clever, gregarious man—are in the highest degree suitable to give rise to exceptional men of the most dangerous and attractive qualities. For, while the capacity for adaptation, which is ever trying changing conditions, and begins a new work with every generation, almost with every decade, makes the powerfulness of the type impossible; while the collective impression of such future Europeans will probably be that of numerous, talkative, weak-willed, and very handy workmen who require a master, a commander, as they require their daily bread; while, therefore, the democratizing of Europe will tend to the production of a type prepared for slavery in the most subtle sense of the term: the strong man will necessarily, in individual and exceptional cases, become stronger and richer than he has perhaps ever been before—owing to the unprejudicedness of his schooling, owing to the immense variety of practise, art, and disguise. I meant to say that the democratizing of Europe is at the same time an involuntary arrangement for the rearing of tyrants—taking the word in all its meanings, even in its most spiritual sense.

I hear with pleasure that our sun is moving rapidly toward the constellation Hercules: and I hope that the men on this earth will do like the sun. And we foremost, we good Europeans!

244

There was a time when it was customary to call Germans ‘deep’ by way of distinction; but now that the most successful type of new Germanism is covetous of quite other honors, and perhaps misses ‘smartness’ in all that has depth, it is almost opportune and patriotic to doubt whether we did not formerly deceive ourselves with that commendation: in short, whether German depth is not at bottom something different and worse—and something from which, thank God, we are on the point of successfully ridding ourselves. Let us try, then, to relearn with regard to German depth; the only thing necessary for the purpose is a little vivisection of the German soul.

The German soul is above all manifold, varied in its source, aggregated and superimposed, rather than actually built: this is owing to its origin. A German who would embolden himself to assert: 'Two souls, alas, dwell in my breast,' would make a bad guess at the truth, or, more correctly, he would come far short of the truth about the number of souls. As a people made up of the most extraordinary mixing and mingling of races, perhaps even with a preponderance of the pre-Aryan element, as the 'people of the center' in every sense of the term, the Germans are more intangible, more ample, more contradictory, more unknown, more incalculable, more surprising, and even more terrifying than other peoples are to themselves:—they escape definition, and are thereby alone the despair of the French. It is characteristic of the Germans that the question: 'What is German?' never dies out among them. Kotzebue certainly knew his Germans well enough: 'We are known,' they cried jubilantly to him—but Sand also thought he knew them. Jean Paul knew what he was doing when he declared himself incensed at Fichte's lying but patriotic flatteries and exaggerations,—but it is probable that Goethe thought differently about Germans from Jean Paul, even though he acknowledged him to be right with regard to Fichte. It is a question what Goethe really thought about the Germans? But about many things around him he never spoke explicitly, and all his life he knew how to keep an astute silence—probably he had good reason for it. It is certain that it was not the 'Wars of Independence' that made him look up more joyfully, any more than it was the French Revolution,—the event on account of which he reconstructed his Faust, and indeed the whole problem of 'man,' was the appearance of Napoleon. There are words of Goethe in which he condemns with impatient severity, as from a foreign land, that which Germans take pride in: he once defined the famous German turn of mind as 'indulgence toward its own and others' weaknesses.' Was he wrong? It is characteristic of Germans that one is seldom entirely wrong about them. The German soul has passages and galleries in it, there are caves, hiding-places, and dungeons therein; its disorder has much of the charm of the mysterious; the German is well acquainted with the by-paths to chaos. And as everything loves its symbol, so the German loves the clouds and all that is obscure, evolving, crepuscular, damp, and shrouded: it seems to him that everything uncertain, undeveloped, self-displacing, and growing is 'deep.' The German himself does not exist: he is becoming, he is 'developing himself.' 'Development' is therefore the essentially German discovery and hit in the great domain of philosophical formulas,—a ruling idea, which, together with German beer and German music is laboring to Germanize all Europe. Foreigners are astonished and attracted by the riddles which the conflicting nature at the basis of the German soul propounds to them (riddles which Hegel systematized and Richard Wagner has in the end set to music). 'Good-natured and spiteful'—such a juxtaposition, preposterous in the case of every other people, is unfortunately only too often justified in Germany: one has only to live for a while among Swabians to know this! The clumsiness of the German scholar and his social distastefulness agree alarmingly well with his psychical rope-dancing and nimble boldness, of which all the Gods have learnt to be afraid. If anyone wishes to see the 'German soul' demonstrated ad oculos [before his eyes], let him only look at German taste, at German arts and manners: what boorish indifference to 'taste'! How the noblest and the commonest stand there in juxtaposition! How disorderly and how rich is the whole constitution of this soul! The German drags at his soul, he drags at everything he experiences. He digests his events badly; he never gets 'done' with them; and German depth is often only a difficult, hesitating 'digestion.' And just as all chronic invalids, all dyspeptics, like what is convenient, so the German loves 'frankness' and 'honesty'; it is so convenient to be frank and honest!

This confidingness, this complaisance, this showing-the-cards of German honesty, is probably the most dangerous and most successful disguise which the German is up to nowadays: it is his proper Mephistophelean art; with this he can 'still achieve much'! The German lets himself go, and thereby gazes with faithful, blue, empty German eyes—and other countries immediately confound him with his dressing-gown!

I meant to say that let 'German depth' be what it will—among ourselves alone we perhaps take the liberty to laugh at it—we shall do well to continue henceforth to honor its appearance and good name, and not barter away too cheaply our old reputation as a people of depth for Prussian 'smartness,' and Berlin wit and sand. It is wise for a people to pose and let itself be regarded as profound, clumsy, good-natured, honest, and foolish: it might even be—profound to do so! Finally, we should do honor to our name—we are not called the 'tiusche Volk' (deceptive people) for nothing.

The 'good old' time is past, it sang itself out in Mozart—how happy are we that his rococo still speaks to us, that his 'good company,' his tender enthusiasm, his childish delight in the Chinese and in flourishes, his courtesy of heart, his longing for the elegant, the amorous, the tripping, the tearful, and his belief in the South, can still appeal to something left in us! Ah, some time or other it will be over with it!—but who can doubt that it will be over still sooner with the intelligence and taste for Beethoven! For he was only the last echo of a break and transition in style, and not, like Mozart, the last echo of a great European taste which had existed for centuries. Beethoven is the intermediate event between an old mellow soul that is constantly breaking down, and a future over-young soul that is always coming; there is spread over his music the twilight of eternal loss and eternal extravagant hope,—the same light in which Europe was bathed when it dreamed with Rousseau, when it danced round the Tree of Liberty of the Revolution, and finally almost fell down in adoration before Napoleon. But how rapidly does this very sentiment now pale, how difficult nowadays is even the apprehension of this sentiment, how strangely does the language of Rousseau,

Schiller, Shelley, and Byron sound to our ear, in whom collectively the same fate of Europe was able to speak, which knew how to sing in Beethoven!

Whatever German music came afterwards, belongs to Romanticism, that is to say, to a movement which, historically considered, was still shorter, more fleeting, and more superficial than that great interlude, the transition of Europe from Rousseau to Napoleon, and to the rise of democracy. Weber—but what do we care nowadays for Freischütz and Oberon! Or Marschner's Hans Heiling and Vampyre! Or even Wagner's Tannhäuser! That is extinct, although not yet forgotten music. This whole music of Romanticism, besides, was not noble enough, was not musical enough, to maintain its position anywhere but in the theater and before the masses; from the beginning it was second-rate music, which was little thought of by genuine musicians. It was different with Felix Mendelssohn, that halcyon master, who, on account of his lighter, purer, happier soul, quickly acquired admiration, and was equally quickly forgotten: as the beautiful episode of German music. But with regard to Robert Schumann, who took things seriously, and has been taken seriously from the first—he was the last that founded a school,—do we not now regard it as a satisfaction, a relief, a deliverance, that this very Romanticism of Schumann's has been surmounted? Schumann, fleeing into the 'Saxon Switzerland' of his soul, with a half Werther-like, half Jean-Paul-like nature (assuredly not like Beethoven! assuredly not like Byron!)—his Manfred music is a mistake and a misunderstanding to the extent of injustice; Schumann, with his taste, which was fundamentally a petty taste (that is to say, a dangerous propensity—doubly dangerous among Germans—for quiet lyricism and intoxication of the feelings), going constantly apart, timidly withdrawing and retiring, a noble weakling who reveled in nothing but anonymous joy and sorrow, from the beginning a sort of girl and noli me tangere [don't touch me]—this Schumann was already merely a German event in music, and no longer a European event, as Beethoven had been, as in a still greater degree Mozart had been; with Schumann German music was threatened with its greatest danger, that of losing the voice for the soul of Europe and sinking into a merely national affair.

What a torture are books written in German to a reader who has a third ear! How indignantly he stands beside the slowly turning swamp of sounds without tune and rhythms without dance, which Germans call a 'book'! And even the German who reads books! How lazily, how reluctantly, how badly he reads! How many Germans know, and consider it obligatory to know, that there is art in every good sentence—art which must be divined, if the sentence is to be understood! If there is a misunderstanding about its tempo, for instance, the sentence itself is misunderstood! That one must not be doubtful about the rhythm-determining syllables, that one should feel the breaking of the too-rigid symmetry as intentional and as a charm, that one should lend a fine and patient ear to every staccato and every rubato, that one should divine the sense in the sequence of the vowels and diphthongs, and how delicately and richly they can be tinted and retinted in the order of their arrangement—who among book-reading Germans is complaisant enough to recognize such duties and requirements, and to listen to so much art and intention in language? After all, one just 'has no ear for it'; and so the most marked contrasts of style are not heard, and the most delicate artistry is as it were squandered on the deaf.

These were my thoughts when I noticed how clumsily and unintuitively two masters in the art of prose-writing have been confounded: one, whose words drop down hesitatingly and coldly, as from the roof of a damp cave—he counts on their dull sound and echo; and another who manipulates his language like a flexible sword, and from his arm down into his toes feels the dangerous bliss of the quivering, over-sharp blade, which wishes to bite, hiss and cut.

How little the German style has to do with harmony and with the ear, is shown by the fact that precisely our good musicians themselves write badly. The German does not read aloud, he does not read for the ear, but only with his eyes; he has put his ears away in the drawer for the time. In antiquity when a man read—which was seldom enough—he read something to himself, and in a loud voice; they were surprised when anyone read silently, and sought secretly the reason of it. In a loud voice: that is to say, with all the swellings, inflections, and variations of key and changes of tempo, in which the ancient public world took delight. The laws of the written style were then the same as those of the spoken style; and these laws depended partly on the surprising development and refined requirements of the ear and larynx; partly on the strength, endurance, and power of the ancient lungs. In the ancient sense, a period is above all a physiological whole, inasmuch as it is compressed in one breath. Such periods as occur in Demosthenes and Cicero, swelling twice and sinking twice, and all in one breath, were pleasures to the men of antiquity, who knew by their own schooling how to appreciate the virtue therein, the rareness and the difficulty in the deliverance of such a period;—we have really no right to the big period, we modern men, who are short of breath in every sense! Those ancients, indeed, were all of them dilettanti in speaking, consequently connoisseurs, consequently critics—they thus brought their orators to the highest pitch; in the same manner as in the last century, when all Italian ladies and gentlemen knew how to sing, the virtuosship of song (and with it also the art of melody) reached its elevation. In Germany, however (until quite recently when a kind of platform eloquence began shyly and awkwardly enough to flutter its young wings), there was properly speaking only one kind of public and approximately artistical discourse—that delivered from the pulpit. The preacher was the only one in Germany who knew the weight of a syllable or a word, in what manner a sentence strikes, springs, rushes, flows, and comes to a close; he alone had a conscience in his ears, often enough a bad conscience: for reasons are not lacking why proficiency in oratory should be especially seldom attained by a German, or almost always too late. The masterpiece of German prose is therefore with good reason the masterpiece of its greatest preacher: the Bible has hitherto been the best German book. Compared with Luther's Bible, almost everything else is merely 'literature'—something which has not grown in Germany, and therefore has not taken and does not take root in German hearts, as the Bible has done.

248

There are two kinds of geniuses: one which above all engenders and seeks to engender, and another which willingly lets itself be fructified and brings forth. And similarly, among the gifted nations, there are those on whom the woman's problem of pregnancy has devolved, and the secret task of forming, maturing and perfecting—the Greeks, for instance, were a nation of this kind, and so are the French; and others which have to fructify and become the cause of new modes of life—like the Jews, the Romans, and, in all modesty be it asked: like the Germans?—nations tortured and enraptured by unknown fevers and irresistibly forced out of themselves, amorous and longing for foreign races (for such, as 'let themselves be fructified'), and withal imperious, like everything conscious of being full of generative force, and consequently empowered 'by the grace of God.' These two kinds of geniuses seek each other like man and woman; but they also misunderstand each other—like man and woman.

249

Every nation has its own 'tartuffery,' and calls that its virtue. One does not know—cannot know, the best that is in one.

250

What Europe owes to the Jews? Many things, good and bad, and above all one thing of the nature both of the best and the worst: the grand style in morality, the fearfulness and majesty of infinite demands, of infinite significations, the whole Romanticism and sublimity of moral questionableness—and consequently just the most attractive, ensnaring, and exquisite element in those iridescences and allurements to life, in the aftersheen of which the sky of our European culture, its evening sky, now glows—perhaps glows out. For this, we artists among the spectators and philosophers, are—grateful to the Jews.

251

It must be taken into the bargain, if various clouds and disturbances—in short, slight attacks of stupidity—pass over the spirit of a people that suffers and wants to suffer from national nervous fever and political ambition: for instance, among present-day Germans there is alternately the anti-French folly, the anti-Semitic folly, the anti-Polish folly, the Christian-romantic folly, the Wagnerian folly, the Teutonic folly, the Prussian folly (just look at those poor historians, the Sybels, and Treitschkes, and their closely bandaged heads), and whatever else these little obscurations of the German spirit and conscience may be called. May it be forgiven me that I, too, when on a short daring sojourn on very infected ground, did not remain wholly exempt from the disease, but like everyone else, began to entertain thoughts about matters which did not concern me—the first symptom of political infection.

About the Jews, for instance, listen to the following:—I have never yet met a German who was favorably inclined to the Jews; and however decided the repudiation of actual anti-Semitism may be on the part of all prudent and political men, this prudence and policy is not perhaps directed against the nature of the sentiment itself, but only against its dangerous excess, and especially against the distasteful and infamous expression of this excess of sentiment;—on this point we must not deceive ourselves. That Germany has amply sufficient Jews, that the German stomach, the German blood, has difficulty (and will long have difficulty) in disposing only of this quantity of 'Jew'—as the Italian, the Frenchman, and the Englishman have done by means of a stronger digestion:—that is the unmistakable declaration and language of a general instinct, to which one must listen and according to which one must act. 'Let no more Jews come in! And shut the doors, especially toward the East (also toward Austria)!'—thus commands the instinct of a people whose nature is still feeble and uncertain, so that it could be easily wiped out, easily extinguished by a stronger race. The Jews, however, are beyond all doubt the strongest, toughest, and purest race at present living in Europe; they know how to succeed even under the worst conditions (in fact, better than under favorable ones), by means of virtues of some sort, which one would like nowadays to label as vices—owing above all to a resolute faith which does not need to be ashamed before 'modern ideas'; they alter only, when they do alter, in the same way that the Russian Empire makes its conquest—as an empire that has plenty of time and is not of yesterday—namely, according to the principle, ‘as slowly as possible’! A thinker who has the future of Europe at heart, will, in all his perspectives concerning the future, calculate upon the Jews, as he will calculate upon the Russians, as above all the surest and likeliest factors in the great play and battle of forces. That which is at present called a ‘nation’ in Europe, and is really rather a res facta [a thing made] than nata [born] (indeed, sometimes confusingly similar to a res ficta et picta [a thing imagined and painted]), is in every case something evolving, young, easily displaced, and not yet a race, much less such a race ære perennius [more lasting than brass], as the Jews are: such ‘nations’ should most carefully avoid all hot-headed rivalry and hostility! It is certain that the Jews, if they desired—or if they were driven to it, as the anti-Semites seem to wish—could now have the ascendancy, nay, literally the supremacy, over Europe; that they are not working and planning for that end is equally certain. Meanwhile, they rather wish and desire, even somewhat importunately, to be insorbed and absorbed by Europe; they long to be finally settled, authorized, and respected somewhere, and wish to put an end to the nomadic life, to the ‘wandering Jew’;—and one should certainly take account of this impulse and tendency, and make advances to it (it possibly betokens a mitigation of the Jewish instincts): for which purpose it would perhaps be useful and fair to banish the anti-Semitic bawlers out of the country. One should make advances with all prudence, and with selection; pretty much as the English nobility do. It stands to reason that the more powerful and strongly marked types of new Germanism could enter into relation with the Jews with the least hesitation, for instance, the nobleman officer from the Prussian border: it would be interesting in many ways to see whether the genius for money and patience (and especially some intellect and intellectuality—sadly lacking in the place referred to) could not in addition be annexed and trained to the hereditary art of commanding and obeying—for both of which the country in question has now a classic reputation.

But here it is expedient to break off my festal discourse and my sprightly Teutomania: for I have already reached my serious topic, the ‘European problem,’ as I understand it, the rearing of a new ruling caste for Europe.

They are not a philosophical race—the English; Bacon represents an attack on the philosophical spirit generally, Hobbes, Hume, and Locke, an abasement and a depreciation of the idea of a ‘philosopher’ for more than a century. It was against Hume that Kant arose and raised himself; it was Locke of whom Schelling rightly said, ‘Je méprise Locke’ [I despise Locke]; in the struggle against the English mechanical stultification of the world, Hegel and Schopenhauer (along with Goethe) were of one accord: the two hostile brother-geniuses in philosophy, who pushed in different directions toward the opposite poles of German thought, and thereby wronged each other as only brothers will do.

What is lacking in England, and has always been lacking, that half-actor and rhetorician knew well enough, the absurd muddle-head, Carlyle, who sought to conceal under passionate grimaces what he knew about himself; namely, what was lacking in Carlyle—real power of intellect, real depth of intellectual perception, in short, philosophy. It is characteristic of such an unphilosophical race to hold on firmly to Christianity—they need its discipline for ‘moralizing’ and humanizing. The Englishman, more gloomy, sensual, headstrong, and brutal than the German—is for that very reason, as the baser of the two, also the most pious: he has all the more need of Christianity. To finer nostrils, this Christianity itself has still a characteristic English taint of spleen and alcoholic excess, for which, owing to good reasons, it is used as an antidote—the finer poison to neutralize the coarser: a finer form of poisoning is in fact a step in advance with coarse-mannered people, a step towards spiritualization. The English coarseness and rustic demureness is still most satisfactorily disguised by Christian pantomime, and by praying and psalm-singing (or, more correctly, it is thereby explained and differently expressed); and for the herd of drunkards and rakes who formerly learned moral grunting under the influence of Methodism (and more recently as the 'Salvation Army'), a penitential fit may really be the relatively highest manifestation of 'humanity' to which they can be elevated: so much may reasonably be admitted. That, however, which offends even in the humanest Englishman is his lack of music, to speak figuratively (and also literally): he has neither rhythm nor dance in the movements of his soul and body; indeed, not even the desire for rhythm and dance, for 'music.' Listen to him speaking; look at the most beautiful Englishwomen walking—in no country on earth are there more beautiful doves and swans; finally, listen to them singing! . . . But I ask too much . . .

There are truths which are best recognized by mediocre minds, because they are best adapted for them, there are truths which only possess charms and seductive power for mediocre spirits:—one is pushed to this probably unpleasant conclusion, now that the influence of respectable but mediocre Englishmen—I may mention Darwin, John Stuart Mill, and Herbert Spencer—begins to gain the ascendancy in the middle-class region of European taste. Indeed, who could doubt that it is a useful thing for such minds to have the ascendancy for a time? It would be an error to consider the highly developed and independently soaring minds as specially qualified for determining and collecting many little common facts, and deducing conclusions from them; as exceptions, they are rather from the first in no very favorable position toward those who are 'the rules.' After all, they have more to do than merely to perceive:—in effect, they have to be something new, they have to signify something new, they have to represent new values! The gulf between knowledge and capacity is perhaps greater, and also more mysterious, than one thinks: the capable man in the grand style, the creator, will possibly have to be an ignorant person;—while on the other hand, for scientific discoveries like those of Darwin, a certain narrowness, aridity, and industrious carefulness (in short, something English) may not be unfavorable for arriving at them.

Finally, let it not be forgotten that the English, with their profound mediocrity, brought about once before a general depression of European intelligence. What is called 'modern ideas,' or 'the ideas of the eighteenth century,' or 'French ideas'—that, consequently, against which the German mind rose up with profound disgust—is of English origin, there is no doubt about it. The French were only the apes and actors of these ideas, their best soldiers, and likewise, alas! their first and profoundest victims; for owing to the diabolical Anglomania of 'modern ideas,' the âme française [French soul] has in the end become so thin and emaciated that at present one recalls its sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, its profound, passionate strength, its inventive excellence, almost with disbelief. One must, however, maintain this verdict of historical justice in a determined manner, and defend it against present prejudices and appearances: the European noblesse—of sentiment, taste, and manners, taking the word in every high sense,—is the work and invention of France; the European ignobleness, the plebeianism of modern ideas—is England's work and invention.

Even at present France is still the seat of the most intellectual and refined culture of Europe, it is still the high school of taste; but one must know how to find this 'France of taste.' He who belongs to it keeps himself well concealed:—they may be a small number in whom it lives and is embodied, beside perhaps being men who do not stand upon the strongest legs, in part fatalists, hypochondriacs, invalids, in part persons over-indulged, over-refined, such as have the ambition to conceal themselves. They have all something in common: they keep their ears closed in presence of the delirious folly and noisy spouting of the democratic bourgeois. In fact, a besotted and brutalized France at present sprawls in the foreground—it recently celebrated a veritable orgy of bad taste, and at the same time of self-admiration, at the funeral of Victor Hugo. There is also something else common to them: a predilection to resist intellectual Germanizing—and a still greater inability to do so! In this France of intellect, which is also a France of pessimism, Schopenhauer has perhaps become more at home, and more indigenous than he has ever been in Germany; not to speak of Heinrich Heine, who has long ago been re-incarnated in the more refined and fastidious lyrists of Paris; or of Hegel, who at present, in the form of Taine—the first of living historians—exercises an almost tyrannical influence. As regards Richard Wagner, however, the more French music learns to adapt itself to the actual needs of the âme moderne [modern soul], the more will it ‘Wagnerize’; one can safely predict that beforehand,—it is already taking place sufficiently!

There are, however, three things which the French can still boast of with pride as their heritage and possession, and as indelible tokens of their ancient intellectual superiority in Europe, in spite of all voluntary or involuntary Germanizing and vulgarizing of taste. First, the capacity for artistic emotion, for devotion to ‘form,’ for which the expression, l’art pour l’art [art for art’s sake], along with numerous others, has been invented:—such capacity has not been lacking in France for three centuries; and owing to its reverence for the ‘small number,’ it has again and again made a sort of chamber music of literature possible, which is sought for in vain elsewhere in Europe.

The second thing whereby the French can lay claim to a superiority over Europe is their ancient, many-sided, moralistic culture, owing to which one finds on an average, even in the petty romanciers of the newspapers and chance boulevardiers de Paris, a psychological sensitiveness and curiosity, of which, for example, one has no conception (to say nothing of the thing itself!) in Germany. The Germans lack a couple of centuries of the moralistic work requisite thereto, which, as we have said, France has not grudged: those who call the Germans ‘naïve’ on that account give them commendation for a defect. (As the opposite of the German inexperience and innocence in voluptate psychologica [psychological delight], which is not too remotely associated with the tediousness of German intercourse,—and as the most successful expression of genuine French curiosity and inventive talent in this domain of delicate thrills, Henri Beyle may be noted; that remarkable anticipatory and fore-unning man, who, with a Napoleonic tempo, traversed his Europe, in fact, several centuries of the European soul, as a survivor and discoverer thereof:—it has required two generations to overtake him one way or other, to divine long afterwards some of the riddles that perplexed and enraptured him—this strange Epicurean and man of interrogation, the last great psychologist of France).

5 There is yet a third claim to superiority: in the French character there is a successful halfway synthesis of the North and South, which makes them comprehend many things, and enjoins upon them other things, which an Englishman can never comprehend. Their temperament, turned alternately to and from the South, in which from time to time the Provençal and Ligurian blood froths over, preserves them from the dreadful, northern gray-in-gray, from sunless conceptualism and from poverty of blood—our German infirmity of taste, for the excessive prevalence of which at the present moment, blood and iron, that is to say ‘high politics,’ has with great resolution been prescribed (according to a dangerous healing art, which bids me wait and wait, but not yet hope).

There is also still in France a pre-understanding and ready welcome for those rarer and rarely gratified men, who are too comprehensive to find satisfaction in any kind of fatherlandism, and know how to love the South when in the North and the North when in the South—the born Midlanders, the ‘good Europeans’. For them Bizet has made music, this latest genius, who has seen a new beauty and seduction,—who has discovered a piece of the South in music.

I hold that many precautions should be taken against German music. Suppose a person loves the South as I love it—as a great school of recovery for the most spiritual and the most sensuous ills, as a boundless solar profusion and effluence which o’erspreads a sovereign existence believing in itself—well, such a person will learn to be somewhat on his guard against German music, because, in injuring his taste anew, it will also injure his health anew. Such a Southerner, a Southerner not by origin but by belief, if he should dream of the future of music, must also dream of its being freed from the influence of the North; and must have in his ears the prelude to a deeper, mightier, and perhaps more perverse and mysterious music, a super-German music, which does not fade, pale, and die away, as all German music does, at the sight of the blue, wanton sea and the Mediterranean clearness of sky—a super-European music, which holds its own even in presence of the brown sunsets of the desert, whose soul is akin to the palm-tree, and can be at home and can roam with big, beautiful, lonely beasts of prey. . . . I could imagine a music of which the rarest charm would be that it knew nothing more of good and evil; only that here and there perhaps some sailor's home-sickness, some golden shadows and tender weaknesses might sweep lightly over it; an art which, from far distance, would see the colors of a sinking and almost incomprehensible moral world fleeing toward it, and would be hospitable enough and profound enough to receive such belated fugitives.

Owing to the morbid estrangement which the nationality-craze has induced and still induces among the nations of Europe, owing also to the short-sighted and hasty-handed politicians, who, with the help of this craze, are at present in power, and do not suspect to what extent the disintegrating policy they pursue must necessarily be only an interlude policy—owing to all this, and much else that is altogether unmentionable at present, the most unmistakable signs that Europe wishes to be one, are now overlooked, or arbitrarily and falsely misinterpreted. With all the more profound and large-minded men of this century, the real general tendency of the mysterious labor of their souls was to prepare the way for that new synthesis, and tentatively to anticipate the European of the future; only in their simulations, or in their weaker moments, in old age perhaps, did they belong to the 'fatherlands'—they only rested from themselves when they became 'patriots.' I think of such men as Napoleon, Goethe, Beethoven, Stendhal, Heinrich Heine, Schopenhauer: it must not be taken amiss if I also count Richard Wagner among them, about whom one must not let one's self be deceived by his own misunderstandings (geniuses like him have seldom the right to understand themselves), still less, of course, by the unseemly noise with which he is now resisted and opposed in France; the fact remains, nevertheless, that Richard Wagner and the later French Romanticism of the forties, are most closely and intimately related to one another. They are akin, fundamentally akin, in all the heights and depths of their requirements; it is Europe, the one Europe, whose soul presses urgently and longingly outward and upward, in their multifarious and boisterous art—whither? Into a new light? Toward a new sun? But who would attempt to express accurately what all these masters of new modes of speech could not express distinctly? It is certain that the same storm and stress tormented them, that they sought in the same manner, these last great seekers! All of them steeped in literature to their eyes and ears—the first artists of universal literary culture—for the most part even themselves writers, poets, intermediaries and blenders of the arts and the senses (Wagner, as musician, is reckoned among painters, as poet among musicians, as artist generally among actors); all of them fanatics for expression 'at any cost'—I specially mention Delacroix, the nearest related to Wagner;—all of them great discoverers in the realm of the sublime, also of the loathsome and dreadful, still greater discoverers in effect, in display, in the art of the show-shop; all of them talented far beyond their genius, out and out virtuosi, with mysterious accesses to all that seduces, allures, constrains, and upsets; born enemies of logic and the straight line, hankering after the strange, the exotic, the monstrous, the crooked, and the self-contradictory; as men, Tantaluses of the will, plebeian parvenus, who knew themselves to be incapable of a noble tempo or of a lento in life and action—think of Balzac, for instance,—unrestrained workers, almost destroying themselves by work; antinomians and rebels in manners, ambitious and insatiable, without equilibrium and enjoyment; all of them finally shattering and sinking down at the Christian cross (and with right and reason, for who of them would have been sufficiently profound and sufficiently original for an Antichristian philosophy?);—on the whole, a boldly daring, splendidly overbearing, high-flying, and aloft-up-dragging class of higher men, who had first to teach their century—and it is the century of the masses—the conception 'higher man'. . . . Let the German friends of Richard Wagner advise together as to whether there is anything purely German in the Wagnerian art, or whether its distinction does not consist precisely in coming from super-German sources and impulses; in which connection it may not be underrated how indispensable Paris was to the development of his type, which the strength of his instincts made him long to visit at the most decisive time—and how the whole style of his proceedings, of his self-apostolate, could only perfect itself in sight of the French socialistic original. On a more subtle comparison it will perhaps be found, to the honor of Richard Wagner's German nature, that he has acted in everything with more strength, daring, severity, and elevation than a nineteenth-century Frenchman could have done—owing to the circumstance that we Germans are as yet nearer to barbarism than the French;—perhaps even the most remarkable creation of Richard Wagner is not only at present, but forever inaccessible, incomprehensible, and inimitable to the whole latter-day Latin race: the figure of Siegfried, that very free man, who is probably far too free, too hard, too cheerful, too healthy, too anti-Catholic for the taste of old and mellow civilized nations. He may even have been a sin against Romanticism, this anti-Latin Siegfried: well, Wagner atoned amply for this sin in his old sad days, when—anticipating a taste which has meanwhile passed into politics—he began, with the religious vehemence peculiar to him, to preach, at least, the way to Rome, if not to walk therein.

That these last words may not be misunderstood, I will call to my aid a few powerful rimes, which will even betray to less delicate ears what I mean—what I mean counter to the 'last Wagner' and his Parsifal music:—

Is this our mode?

From German heart came this vexed ululating?

From German body, this self-lacerating?

Is ours this priestly hand-dilation,

This incense-fuming, exaltation?

Is ours this faltering, falling, shambling,

This quite uncertain ding-dong-dangling?

This sly nun-ogling, Ave-hour-bell ringing,

This wholly false enraptured heaven-o'erspringing?

Is this our mode?

Think well!—ye still wait for admission—

For what ye hear is Rome—Rome's faith by intuition!

VI

LITERARY THEORY AND CRITICISM

LITERARY THEORY AND CRITICISM

In the series of Century Readings no attempt has been made to include drama and the modern novel, on the ground that the masterpieces in these genres could be adequately studied only as wholes; and this rule, first established in Century Readings in English Literature, seems to hold good for even stronger reasons, as to limitations of space, in this volume of European Literature. In all the European literatures during the last century the novel has been the form of literary expression most practised, so that it seems now almost in danger of sinking under its own weight. Not only the English, French, Italians and Spanish, who were early in the field, but the Germans, the Scandinavians, and, above all, the Russians have published countless volumes of fiction which one cannot undertake even to discuss in the same book. In the theory of the novel, however, France has maintained a literary supremacy amounting almost to monopoly, and it has appeared worth while to include in this volume some of the more remarkable critical pronouncements which may fairly claim international significance.

Among the various schools of fiction which sprang up in France in the wake of the Romantic Revival, three tendencies may be clearly distinguished:—(1) The tendency toward realism, already to be discerned in the monumental work of Balzac (1799-1850), was developed by Flaubert, and carried by Zola and Maupassant to a conscious method founded on a theory. (2) The contrasted or idealistic method of Georges Sand was contemporaneous with the later work of Balzac and with that of Flaubert, and aroused at the time great enthusiasm both in France and abroad, but after her death fell rapidly in critical and popular esteem. (3) The analytic method, recommended and practised in the thirties by Henri Beyle ('Stendhal') without attracting much attention, was revived half a century later by Paul Bourget with a large measure of success.

Critical theory in the latter half of the nineteenth century was greatly influenced by the progress of science and especially of biological science. The discussion and establishment of the theory of evolution had remarkable reactions in the literary world. It was not merely that the principles of heredity and environment were applied to literary history and criticism; they became basic principles in the production of fiction. Taine adopted these biological principles, not unalloyed with critical imaginativeness, in his History of English Literature; and Zola, though he remained a confirmed romanticist in practise, advocated the application of scientific methods to the composition of the novel. The so-called experimental method, based mainly upon careful observation, became the watchword of the new Naturalism, which extended to all the other countries of Europe and America, and has not yet spent its force. As applied to external facts, it is now better known as realism; as applied, with equal objectivity, to the inner working of the intellect and the emotions, it has been strengthened by the recent theories of the psycho-analysts, whose results, as well as those of the earlier psychologists, had been to some extent anticipated by the novelists of the analytic school.

French preëminence in literary theory and criticism, so strongly marked in the nineteenth century, was shared in the twentieth by other nations. The Dane Brandes and the Belgian Maeterlinck owed much to French predecessors, but the Russian writers who have come into international prominence during the last few years are more independent. They are not so logical, and often, unfortunately, not so clear as the French critics, but their letters and occasional articles are frequently very suggestive as to literary methods, and their judgments acute and original. The most considerable contributor to æsthetic theory is an Italian, Benedetto Croce, whose essay at the close of this volume may be commended to the attention of those who have the intellectual energy to grapple with the fundamental questions of the philosophy of art.

STE. BEUVE (1804-1869)

Charles Augustin Sainte-Beuve spent nearly all his life at Paris, where he was one of the leading literary figures for nearly half a century, being elected a member of the Academy in 1845 and a Senator in 1865. He was the founder of that school of modern criticism which seeks to interpret an author rather than to judge him, to bring out his salient characteristics and opinions by allowing him to speak for himself, and at the same time to make of this task of elucidation and interpretation an original work of art. He is known to the world of French scholarship by important works of erudition, and to the larger public by some fifty volumes of criticism, begun as newspaper articles under the title of Causeries du Lundi in 1850 and continued up to the time of his death. As the friend of Victor Hugo, he gave the new romantic movement the support of his solid learning and it was largely to his influence that the revival of interest in French poetry of the sixteenth century was due. His literary articles of a more general character lifted the occasional essay to a new plane of excellence and gave to his new critical method a vogue which it has not ceased to enjoy, though not many who have practised it since Sainte-Beuve have brought to it his peculiar combination of scholarship, sympathy, intelligence, and charm.

WHAT IS A CLASSIC?

A delicate question, to which somewhat diverse solutions might be given according to times and seasons. An intelligent man suggests it to me, and I intend to try, if not to solve it, at least to examine and discuss it face to face with my readers, were it only to persuade them to answer it for themselves, and, if I can, to make their opinion and mine on the point clear. And why, in criticism, should we not, from time to time, venture to treat some of those subjects which are not personal, in which we no longer speak of some one but of some thing? Our neighbors, the English, have well succeeded in making of it a special division of literature under the modest title of 'Essays.' It is true that in writing of such subjects, always slightly abstract and moral, it is advisable to speak of them in a season of quiet, to make sure of our own attention and that of others, to seize one of those moments of calm moderation and leisure seldom granted our amiable France; even when she is desirous of being wise and is not making revolutions, her brilliant genius can scarcely tolerate them.

A classic, according to the usual definition, is an old author canonized by admiration, and an authority in his particular style. The word classic was first used in this sense by the Romans. With them not all the citizens of the different classes were properly called classici, but only those of the chief class, those who possessed an income of a certain fixed sum. Those who possessed a smaller income were described by the term infra classem, below the preëminent class. The word classicus was used in a figurative sense by Aulus Gellius, and applied to writers: a writer of worth and distinction, classicus assiduusque scriptor, a writer who is of account, has real property, and is not lost in the proletariat crowd. Such an expression implies an age sufficiently advanced to have already made some sort of valuation and classification of literature.

At first the only true classics for the moderns were the ancients. The Greeks, by peculiar good fortune and natural enlightenment of mind, had no classics but themselves. They were at first the only classical authors for the Romans, who strove and contrived to imitate them. After the great periods of Roman literature, after Cicero and Virgil, the Romans in their turn had their classics, who became almost exclusively the classical authors of the centuries which followed. The middle ages, which were less ignorant of Latin antiquity than is believed, but which lacked proportion and taste, confused the ranks and orders. Ovid was placed above Homer, and Boethius seemed a classic equal to Plato. The revival of learning in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries helped to bring this long chaos to order, and then only was admiration rightly proportioned. Thenceforth the true classical authors of Greek and Latin antiquity stood out in a luminous background, and were harmoniously grouped on their two heights.

Meanwhile, modern literatures were born, and some of the more precocious, like the Italian, already possessed the style of antiquity. Dante appeared, and, from the very first, posterity greeted him as a classic. Italian poetry has since shrunk into far narrower bounds; but, whenever it desired to do so, it always found again and preserved the impulse and echo of its lofty origin. It is no indifferent matter for a poetry to derive its point of departure and classical source in high places; for example, to spring from Dante rather than to issue laboriously from Malherbe.

Modern Italy had her classical authors, and Spain had every right to believe that she also had hers at a time when France was yet seeking hers. A few talented writers endowed with originality and exceptional animation, a few brilliant efforts, isolated, without following, interrupted and recommenced, did not suffice to endow a nation with a solid and imposing basis of literary wealth. The idea of a classic implies something that has continuance and consistency, and which produces unity and tradition, fashions and transmits itself, and endures. It was only after the glorious years of Louis XIV that the nation felt with tremor and pride that such good fortune had happened to her. Every voice informed Louis XIV of it with flattery, exaggeration, and emphasis, yet with a certain sentiment of truth. Then arose a singular and striking contradiction: those men of whom Perrault was the chief, the men who were most smitten with the marvels of the age of Louis the Great, who even went the length of sacrificing the ancients to the moderns, aimed at exalting and canonizing even those whom they regarded as inveterate opponents and adversaries. Boileau avenged and angrily upheld the ancients against Perrault, who extolled the moderns—that is to say, Corneille, Molière, Pascal, and the eminent men of his age, Boileau, one of the first, included. Kindly La Fontaine, taking part in the dispute in behalf of the learned Huet, did not perceive that, in spite of his defects, he was in his turn on the point of being held as a classic himself.

Example is the best definition. From the time France possessed her age of Louis XIV and could contemplate it at a little distance, she knew, better than by any arguments, what to be classical meant. The eighteenth century, even in its medley of things, strengthened this idea through some fine works, due to its four great men. Read Voltaire's Age of Louis XIV, Montesquieu's Greatness and Fall of the Romans, Buffon's Epochs of Nature, the beautiful pages of reverie and natural description of Rousseau's Savoyard Vicar, and say if the eighteenth century, in these memorable works, did not understand how to reconcile tradition with freedom of development and independence. But at the beginning of the nineteenth century and under the Empire, in view of the first attempts of a decidedly new and somewhat adventurous literature, the idea of a classic in a few resisting minds, more sorrowful than severe, was strangely narrowed and contracted. The first Dictionary of the Academy (1694) merely defined a classical author as 'a much-approved ancient writer, who is an authority as regards the subject he treats.' The Dictionary of the Academy of 1835 narrows that definition still more, and gives precision and even limit to its rather vague form. It describes classical authors as those 'who have become models in any language whatever,' and in all the articles which follow, the expressions, models, fixed rules for composition and style, strict rules of art to which men must conform, continually recur. This definition of classic was evidently made by the respectable Academicians, our predecessors, in face and sight of what was then called romantic—that is to say, in sight of the enemy. It seems to me time to renounce these timid and restrictive definitions and to free our mind of them.

A true classic, as I should like to hear it defined, is an author who has enriched the human mind, increased its treasure, and caused it to advance a step; who has discovered some moral and not equivocal truth, or revealed some eternal passion in the heart where all seemed known and discovered; who has expressed his thought, observation, or invention, in no matter what form, only provided it be broad and great, refined and sensible, sane and beautiful in itself; who has spoken to all in his own peculiar style, a style which is found to be also that of the whole world, a style new without neologism, new and old, easily contemporary with all time.

Such a classic may for a moment have been revolutionary; it may at least have seemed so, but it is not; it only lashed and subverted whatever prevented the restoration of the balance of order and beauty.

If it is desired, names may be applied to this definition which I wish to make purposely majestic and fluctuating, or in a word, all-embracing. I should first put there Corneille of the Polyeucte, Cinna, and Horaces. I should put Molière there, the fullest and most complete poetic genius we have ever had in France. Goethe, the king of critics, said:—'Molière is so great that he astonishes us afresh every time we read him. He is a man apart; his plays border on the tragic, and no one has the courage to try and imitate him. His Avarc, where vice destroys all affection between father and son, is one of the most sublime works, and dramatic in the highest degree. In a drama every action ought to be important in itself, and to lead to an action greater still. In this respect Tartuffe is a model. What a piece of exposition the first scene is! From the beginning everything has an important meaning, and causes something much more important to be foreseen. The exposition in a certain play of Lessing that might be mentioned is very fine, but the world only sees that of Tartuffe once. It is the finest of the kind we possess. Every year I read a play of Molière, just as from time to time I contemplate some engraving after the great Italian masters.'

I do not conceal from myself that the definition of the classic I have just given somewhat exceeds the notion usually ascribed to the term. It should, above all, include conditions of uniformity, wisdom, moderation, and reason, which dominate and contain all the others. Having to praise M. Royer-Collard, M. de Remusat said—'If he derives purity of taste, propriety of terms, variety of expression, attentive care in suiting the diction to the thought, from our classics, he owes to himself alone the distinctive character he gives it all.' It is here evident that the part allotted to classical qualities seems mostly to depend on harmony and nuances of expression, on graceful and temperate style:

such is also the most general opinion. In this sense the preëminent classics would be writers of a middling order, exact, sensible, elegant, always clear, yet of noble feeling and airily veiled strength. Marie-Joseph Chénier has described the poetics of these temperate and accomplished writers in lines where he shows himself their happy disciple:—'It is good sense, reason which does all,—virtue, genius, soul, talent, and taste. What is virtue? reason put in practise; talent? reason expressed with brilliance; soul? reason delicately put forth; and genius is sublime reason.'

While writing these lines he was evidently thinking of Pope, Boileau, and Horace, the master of them all. The peculiar characteristic of the theory which subordinated imagination and feeling itself to reason, of which Scaliger perhaps gave the first sign among the moderns, is, properly speaking, the Latin theory, and for a long time it was also by preference the French theory. If it is used appositely, if the term reason is not abused, this theory possesses some truth; but it is evident that if it is abused and that if, for instance, reason can be confounded with poetic genius and made one with it in a moral epistle, it cannot be the same thing as the genius, so varied and so diversely creative in its expression of the passions, of the drama or the epic. Where will you find reason in the fourth book of the Æneid and the transports of Dido? Be that as it may, the spirit which prompted the theory, caused writers who ruled their inspiration, rather than those who abandoned themselves to it, to be placed in the first rank of classics; put Virgil there more surely than Homer, Racine in preference to Corneille. The masterpiece to which the theory likes to point, which in fact brings together all conditions of prudence, strength, tempered boldness, moral elevation, and grandeur, is Athalie. Turenne in his two last campaigns and Racine in Athalie are the great examples of what wise and prudent men are capable of when they reach the maturity of their genius and attain their supremest boldness.

Buffon, in his Discourse on Style, insisting on the unity of design, arrangement, and execution, which are the stamps of true classical works, said:—'Every subject is one, and however vast it is, it can be comprised in a single treatise. Interruptions, pauses, sub-divisions should only be used when many subjects are treated, when, having to speak of great, intricate, and dissimilar things, the march of genius is interrupted by the multiplicity of obstacles, and contracted by the necessity of circumstances: otherwise, far from making a work more solid, a great number of divisions destroys the unity of its parts; the book appears clearer to the view, but the author's design remains obscure.' And he continues his criticism, having in view Montesquieu's Spirit of Laws, an excellent book at bottom, but sub-divided: the famous author, worn out before the end, was unable to infuse inspiration into all his ideas, and to arrange all his matter. However, I can scarcely believe that Buffon was not also thinking, by way of contrast, of Bossuet's Discourse on Universal History, a subject vast indeed, and yet of such unity that the great orator was able to comprise it in a single treatise. When we open the first edition, that of 1681, before the division into chapters, which was introduced later, passed from the margin into the text, everything is developed in a single series, almost in one breath. It might be said that the orator has here acted like the nature of which Buffon speaks, that 'he has worked on an eternal plan from which he has nowhere departed,' so deeply does he seem to have entered into the familiar counsels and designs of providence.

Are Athalie and the Discourse on Universal History the greatest masterpieces that the strict classical theory can present to its friends as well as to its enemies? In spite of the admirable simplicity and dignity in the achievement of such unique productions, we should like, nevertheless, in the interests of art, to expand that theory a little, and to show that it is possible to enlarge it without relaxing the tension. Goethe, whom I like to quote on such a subject, said:—'I call the classical healthy, and the romantic sickly. In my opinion the Nibelungen song is as much a classic as Homer. Both are healthy and vigorous. The works of the day are romantic, not because they are new, but because they are weak, ailing, or sickly. Ancient works are classical not because they are old, but because they are powerful, fresh and healthy. If we regarded romantic and classical from these two points of view we should soon all agree.'

Indeed, before determining and fixing one's opinions on this matter, I should like every unbiased mind to take a voyage round the world and devote itself to a survey of different literatures in their primitive vigor and infinite variety. What would be seen? Chief of all a Homer, the father of the classical world, less a single distinct individual than the vast living expression of a whole epoch and a semi-barbarous civilization. In order to make him a true classic, it was necessary to attribute to him later a design, a plan, literary invention, qualities of atticism and urbanity of which he had certainly never dreamed in the luxuriant development of his natural inspiration. And who appear by his side? August, venerable ancients, the Æschyluses and the Sophocles, mutilated, it is true, and only there to present us with a debris of themselves, the survivors of many others as worthy, doubtless, as they to survive, but who have succumbed to the injuries of time. This thought alone would teach a man of impartial mind not to look upon the whole of even classical literatures with a too narrow and restricted view; he would learn that the exact and well-proportioned order which has since so largely prevailed in our admiration of the past was only the outcome of artificial circumstances.

And in reaching the modern world, how would it be? The greatest names to be seen at the beginning of literatures are those which disturb and run counter to certain fixed ideas of what is beautiful and appropriate in poetry. For example, is Shakespeare a classic? Yes, now, for England and the world; but in the time of Pope he was not considered so. Pope and his friends were the only preëminent classics; directly after their death they seemed so forever. At the present time they are still classics, as they deserve to be, but they are only of the second order, and are forever subordinated and relegated to their rightful place by him who has again come to his own on the height of the horizon.

It is not, however, for me to speak ill of Pope or his great disciples, above all, when they possess pathos and naturalness like Goldsmith: after the greatest they are perhaps the most agreeable writers and the poets best fitted to add charm to life. Once when Lord Bolingbroke was writing to Swift, Pope added a postscript, in which he said, 'I think some advantage would result to our age, if we three spent three years together.' Men who, without boasting, have the right to say such things must never be spoken of lightly: the fortunate ages, when men of talent could propose such things, then no chimera, are rather to be envied. The ages called by the name of Louis XIV or of Queen Anne are, in the dispassionate sense of the word, the only true classical ages, those which offer protection and a favorable climate to real talent. We know only too well how in our untrammelled times, through the instability and storminess of the age, talents are lost and dissipated. Nevertheless, let us acknowledge our age's part and superiority in greatness. True and sovereign genius triumphs over the very difficulties that cause others to fail: Dante, Shakespeare, and Milton were able to attain their height and produce their imperishable works in spite of obstacles, hardships and tempests. Byron's opinion of Pope has been much discussed, and the explanation of it sought in the kind of contradiction by which the singer of Don Juan and Childe Harold extolled the purely classical school and pronounced it the only good one, while himself acting so differently. Goethe spoke the truth on that point when he remarked that Byron, great by the flow and source of poetry, feared that Shakespeare was more powerful than himself in the creation and realization of his characters. 'He would have liked to deny it; the elevation so free from egoism irritated him; he felt when near it that he could not display himself at ease. He never denied Pope, because he did not fear him; he knew that Pope was only a low wall by his side.'

If, as Byron desired, Pope's school had kept the supremacy and a sort of honorary empire in the past, Byron would have been the first and only poet in his particular style; the height of Pope's wall shuts out Shakespeare's great figure from sight, whereas when Shakespeare reigns and rules in all his greatness, Byron is only second.

In France there was no great classic before the age of Louis XIV; the Dantes and Shakespeares, the early authorities to whom, in times of emancipation, men sooner or later return, were wanting. There were mere sketches of great poets, like Mathurin Regnier, like Rabelais, without any ideal, without the depth of emotion and the seriousness which canonizes, Montaigne was a kind of premature classic, of the family of Horace; but for want of worthy surroundings, like a spoiled child, he gave himself up to the unbridled fancies of his style and humor. Hence it happened that France, less than any other nation, found in her old authors a right to demand vehemently at a certain time literary liberty and freedom, and that it was more difficult for her, in enfranchising herself, to remain classical. However, with Molière and La Fontaine among her classics of the great period, nothing could justly be refused to those who possessed courage and ability.

The important point now seems to me to be to uphold, while extending, the idea and belief. There is no receipt for making classics; this point should be clearly recognized. To believe that an author will become a classic by imitating certain qualities of purity, moderation, accuracy, and elegance, independently of style and inspiration, is to believe that after Racine the father there is a place for Racine the son; dull and estimable rôle, the worst in poetry. Further, it is hazardous to take too quickly and without opposition the place of a classic in the sight of one's contemporaries; in that case there is a good chance of not retaining the position with posterity. Fontanes in his day was regarded by his friends as a pure classic; see how at twenty-five years' distance his star has set. How many of these precocious classics are there who do not endure, and who are so only for a while! We turn round one morning and are surprised not to find them standing behind us. Madame de Sévigné would wittily say they possessed but an evanescent color. With regard to classics, the least expected prove the best and greatest: seek them rather in the vigorous genius born immortal and flourishing forever. Apparently the least classical of the four great poets of the age of Louis XIV was Molière; he was then applauded far more than he was esteemed; men took delight in him without understanding his worth. After him, La Fontaine seemed the least classical; observe after two centuries what is the result for both. Far above Boileau, even above Racine, are they not now unanimously considered to possess in the highest degree the characteristics of an all-embracing morality?

Meanwhile there is no question of sacrificing or depreciating anything. I believe the temple of taste is to be rebuilt; but its reconstruction is merely a matter of enlargement, so that it may become the home of all noble human beings, of all who have permanently increased the sum of the mind's delights and possessions. As for me, who cannot, obviously, in any degree pretend to be the architect or designer of such a temple, I shall confine myself to expressing a few earnest wishes, to submit, as it were, my designs for the edifice. Above all I should desire not to exclude any one among the worthy, each should be in his place there, from Shakespeare, the freest of creative geniuses and the greatest of classics without knowing it, to Andrieux, the last of classics in little. 'There is more than one chamber in the mansions of my Father,' that should be as true of the kingdom of the beautiful here below, as of the kingdom of Heaven. Homer, as always and everywhere, should be first, likeliest a god; but behind him, like the procession of the three wise kings of the East, would be seen the three great poets, the three Homers, so long ignored by us, who wrote epics for the use of the old peoples of Asia, the poets Valmiki, Vyasa of the Hindoos, and Firdusi of the Persians; in the domain of taste it is well to know that such men exist, and not to divide the human race. Our homage paid to what is recognized as soon as perceived, we must not stray further; the eye should delight in a thousand pleasing or majestic spectacles, should rejoice in a thousand varied and surprising combinations, whose apparent confusion would never be without concord and harmony. The oldest of the wise men and poets, those who put human morality into maxims, and those who in simple fashion sung it, would converse together in rare and gentle speech, and would not be surprised at understanding each other's meaning at the very first word. Solon, Hesiod, Theognis, Job, Solomon (and why not Confucius?) would welcome the cleverest moderns, La Rochefoucauld and La Bruyère, who, when listening to them, would say 'they knew all that we know, and in repeating life's experiences, we have discovered nothing.' On the hill, most easily discernible, and of most accessible ascent, Virgil, surrounded by Menander, Tibullus, Terence, Fénelon, would occupy himself in discoursing with them with great charm and divine enchantment:

his gentle countenance would shine with an inner light, and be tinged with modesty; as on the day when entering the theater at Rome, just as they finished reciting his verses, he saw the people rise with a unanimous movement and pay to him the same homage as to Augustus. Not far from him, regretting the separation from so dear a friend, Horace, in his turn, would preside (as far as so accomplished and wise a poet could preside) over the group of poets of social life who could talk although they sang,—Pope, Boileau, the one become less irritable, the other less fault-finding. Montaigne, a true poet, would be among them, and would give the finishing touch that should deprive that delightful corner of the air of a literary school. There would La Fontaine forget himself, and becoming less volatile would wander no more. Voltaire would be attracted by it, but while finding pleasure in it would not have patience to remain. A little lower down, on the same hill as Virgil, Xenophon, with simple bearing, looking in no way like a general but rather resembling a priest of the Muses, would be seen gathering round him the Attic writers of every tongue and of every nation, the Addison, Pellissons, Vauvenargues—all who feel the value of an easy persuasiveness, an exquisite simplicity, and a gentle negligence mingled with ornament. In the center of the place, in the portico of the principal temple (for there would be several in the enclosure), three great men would like to meet often, and when they were together, no fourth, however great, would dream of joining their discourse or their silence. In them would be seen beauty, proportion in greatness, and that perfect harmony which appears but once in the full youth of the world. Their three names have become the ideal of art—Plato, Sophocles, and Demosthenes. These demi-gods honored, we see a numerous and familiar company of choice spirits who follow, the Cervantes and Molières, practical painters of life, indulgent friends who are still the first of benefactors, who laughingly embrace all mankind, turn man's experience to gaiety, and know the powerful workings of a sensible, hearty, and legitimate joy. I do not wish to make this description, which if complete would fill a volume, any longer. In the middle ages, believe me, Dante would occupy the sacred heights; at the feet of the singer of Paradise all Italy would be spread out like a garden; Boccaccio and Ariosto would there disport themselves, and Tasso would find again the orange groves of Sorrento. Usually a corner would be reserved for each of the various nations, but the authors would take delight in leaving it, and in their travels would recognize, where we should least expect it, brothers or masters. Lucretius, for example, would enjoy discussing the origin of the world and the reducing of chaos to order with Milton. But both arguing from their own point of view, they would only agree as regards divine pictures of poetry and nature.

Such are our classics; each individual imagination may finish the sketch and choose the group preferred. For it is necessary to make a choice, and the first condition of taste, after obtaining knowledge of all, lies not in continual travel, but in rest and cessation from wandering. Nothing blunts and destroys taste so much as endless journeyings; the poetic spirit is not the Wandering Jew. However, when I speak of resting and making choice, my meaning is not that we are to imitate those who charm us most among our masters in the past. Let us be content to know them, to penetrate them, to admire them; but let us, the late-comers, endeavor to be ourselves. Let us have the sincerity and naturalness of our own thoughts, of our own feelings; so much is always possible. To this let us add what is more difficult, elevation, an aim, if possible, toward an exalted goal; and while speaking our own language, and submitting to the conditions of the times in which we live, whence we derive our strength and our defects, let us ask from time to time, our brows lifted toward the heights and our eyes fixed on the group of honored mortals: what would they say of us?

But why speak always of authors and writings? Maybe an age is coming when there will be no more writing. Happy those who read and read again, those who in their reading can follow their unrestrained inclination! There comes a time in life when, all our journeys over, our experiences ended, there is no enjoyment more delightful than to study and thoroughly examine the things we know, to take pleasure in what we feel, and in seeing and seeing again the people we love: the pure joys of our maturity. Then it is that the word classic takes its true meaning, and is defined for every man of taste by an irresistible choice. Then taste is formed, it is shaped and definite; then good sense, if we are to possess it at all, is perfected in us. We have neither more time for experiments, nor a desire to go forth in search of pastures new. We cling to our friends, to those proved by long intercourse. Old wine, old books, old friends. We say to ourselves with Voltaire in these delightful lines:—'Let us enjoy, let us write, let us live, my dear Horace! . . . I have lived longer than you: my verse will not last so long. But on the brink of the tomb I shall make it my chief care to follow the lessons of your philosophy, to despise death in enjoying life, to read your writings full of charm and good sense, as we drink an old wine which revives our senses.'

In fact, be it Horace or another who is the author preferred, who reflects our thoughts in all the wealth of their maturity, of some one of those excellent and antique minds shall we request an interview at every moment; of some one of them shall we ask a friendship which never deceives, which could not fail us; to some one of them shall we appeal for that sensation of serenity and amenity (we have often need of it) which reconciles us with mankind and with ourselves.

As we had already signalized these two as leaders of opposite schools of fiction the collocation of their names may cause surprise. But they were at one in their supreme devotion to literature as an art, and their remarkable friendship in the latter part of their lives has bequeathed to the world a correspondence which is all the more interesting because they were of very different points of view.

George Sand's ardent enthusiasm and somewhat facile gifts as a novel writer had won for her a world-wide reputation and great popular success. She was some years senior to Flaubert and his deferential attitude toward her in the correspondence would, at the time, have occasioned no surprise. He was already well known in literary circles in Paris, and was highly appreciated by the critics, but his importance as a figure in the world of letters was not so evident then as it is now. His reputation has gained during the last half-century, while that of George Sand has fallen off. She, on her part, writes with a distinct tone of authority, rather scolding Flaubert at times with the friendly urgency of an older friend, but writing always with the affectionate vivacity and lucid ease which are characteristic of her.

The correspondence has been translated by Aimée L. McKenzie, and we are indebted to her as well as to her publishers, Boni and Liveright, for the use of the following letters, which begin in 1875 when Flaubert had just published l'Education sentimentale and had been rather disappointed with its reception.

LETTERS ABOUT NOVEL-WRITING

SAND TO FLAUBERT

Nohant, November 18, 1875.

What's our next move? For you, of course, desolation, and, for me, consolation. I do not know on what our destinies depend; you see them pass, you criticize them, you abstain from a literary appreciation of them, you limit yourself to depicting them, with deliberate meticulous concealment of your personal feelings. However, one sees them very clearly through your narrative, and you make the people sadder who read you. As for me, I should like to make them less sad. I cannot forget that my personal victory over despair was the work of my will and of a new way of understanding which is entirely opposed to what I had before.

I know that you criticize the intervention of the personal doctrine in literature. Are you right? Isn't it rather a lack of conviction than a principle of aesthetics? One cannot have a philosophy in one's soul without its appearing. I have no literary advice to give you, I have no judgment to formulate on the author friends of whom you speak. I myself have told the Gon-courts all my thought; as for the others, I firmly believe that they have more education and more talent than I have. Only I think that they, and you especially, lack a definite and extended vision of life. Art is not merely painting. True painting, moreover, is full of the soul that wields the brush. Art is not merely criticism and satire: criticism and satire depict only one side of the truth.

I want to see a man as he is; he is not good or bad, he is good and bad. But he is something more . . . nuance. Nuance, which is for me the purpose of art, being good and bad, he has an internal force which leads him to be very bad and slightly good,—or very good and slightly bad.

I think that your school is not concerned with the substance, and that it dwells too much on the surface. By virtue of seeking the form, it makes the substance too cheap! It addresses itself to the men of letters. But there are no men of letters, properly speaking. Before everything, one is a man. One wants to find man at the basis of every story and every deed. That was the defect of l'Education sentimentale, about which I have so often reflected since, asking myself why there was so general a dislike of a work that was so well done and so solid. This defect was the absence of action of the characters on themselves. They submitted to the event and never mastered it. Well, I think that the chief interest in a story is what you did not want to do. If I were you, I would try the opposite; you are feeding on Shakespeare just now, and you are doing well! He is the author who puts men to grips with events; observe that by them, whether for good or for ill, the event is always conquered. In his works, it is crushed underfoot.

FLAUBERT TO SAND

December, 1875.

Your good letter of the 18th, so maternally tender, has made me reflect a great deal. I have reread it ten times, and I shall confess to you that I am not sure that I understand it. Briefly, what do you want me to do? Make your instructions exact.

I am constantly doing all that I can to enlarge my brain, and I work in the sincerity of my heart. The rest does not depend on me.

I do not enjoy making 'desolation,' believe me, but I cannot change my eyes! As for my 'lack of convictions,' alas! I choke with convictions. I am bursting with anger and restrained indignation. But according to the ideal of art that I have, I think that the artist should not manifest anything of his own feelings, and that the artist should not appear any more in his work than God in nature. The man is nothing, the work is everything! This method, perhaps mistakenly conceived, is not easy to follow. And for me, at least, it is a sort of permanent sacrifice that I am making to good taste. It would be agreeable to me to say what I think and to relieve M. Gustave Flaubert by words, but of what importance is the said gentleman?

I think as you do, dear master, that art is not merely criticism and satire; moreover, I have never tried to do intentionally the one or the other. I have always tried to go into the soul of things and to stick to the greatest generalities, and I have purposely turned aside from the accidental and the dramatic. No monsters and no heroes!

You say to me: 'I have no literary advice to give you; I have no judgments to formulate on the authors, your friends, etc.' Well? indeed! but I implore advice, and I am waiting for your judgments. Who, pray, should give them, and who, pray, should formulate them, if not you?

Speaking of my friends, you add 'my school.' But I am ruining my temperament in trying not to have a school! A priori, I spurn them, every one. The people whom I see often and whom you designate, cultivate all that I scorn and are indifferently disturbed about what torments me. I regard technical detail, local exactness, in short the historical and precise side of things, as very secondary. I am seeking above all for beauty, which my companions pursue but languidly. I see them insensible when I am ravaged with admiration or horror. Phrases make me swoon with pleasure which seem very ordinary to them. Goncourt is very happy when he has seized upon a word in the street that he can stick in a book, and I am well satisfied when I have written a page without assonances or repetitions. I would give all the legends of Gavarni for certain expressions and master strokes, such as 'the shade was nuptial, august and solemn!' from Victor Hugo, or this from Montaigne: 'the vices of Alexander were extreme like his virtues. He was terrible in his wrath. It made him cruel.'

In short, I try to think well, in order to write well. But writing well is my aim, I do not deny it.

'I lack a well-defined and extended vision of life.' You are right a thousand times over, but by what means could it be otherwise? I ask you that. You do not enlighten my darkness with metaphysics, neither mine nor that of others. The words religion or Catholicism on the one hand; progress, fraternity, democracy on the other, do not correspond to the spiritual needs of the moment. The entirely new dogma of equality which radicalism praises is experimentally denied by physiology and history. I do not see the means of establishing today a new principle, any more than of respecting the old ones. Therefore I am hunting, without finding it, that idea on which all the rest should depend.

Meanwhile I repeat to myself what Littré said to me one day: 'Ah! my friend, man is an unstable compound, and the earth an inferior planet.'

Nothing sustains me better than the hope of leaving it soon, and of not going to another which might be worse. 'I would rather not die,' as Marat said. Ah! no! enough, enough weariness!

SAND TO FLAUBERT

Nohant, January 12, 1876.

I want to write to you every day; time is lacking absolutely. At last here is a free moment; we are buried under the snow; it is the sort of weather that I adore: this whiteness is like general purification, and the amusements of the house seem more intimate and sweeter. Can anyone hate the winter in the country? The snow is one of the most beautiful sights of the year!

It appears that I am not clear in my sermons; I have that much in common with the orthodox, but I am not of them; neither in my idea of equality, nor of authority, have I any fixed plan. You seem to think that I want to convert you to a doctrine. Not at all, I don't think of such a thing. Every one sets off from a point of view, the free choice of which I respect. In a few words, I can give a résumé of mine: not to place one's self behind an opaque glass through which one can see only the reflection of one's own nose. To see as far as possible the good, the bad, about, around, yonder, everywhere; to perceive the continual gravitation of all tangible and intangible things toward the necessity of the decent, the good, the true, the beautiful.

I don't say that humanity is on the way to the heights. I believe it in spite of everything; but I do not argue about it; it is useless because each one judges according to his own personal vision, and the general aspect is for the moment poor and ugly. Besides, I do not need to be sure of the safety of the planet and its inhabitants in order to believe in the necessity of the good and the beautiful; if the planet departs from that law, it will perish; if the inhabitants discard it, they will be destroyed. Other stars, other souls will pass over their bodies; so much the worse! But, as for me, I want to gravitate up to my last breath, not with the certitude or the need of finding elsewhere a good place, but because my sole joy is in keeping myself with my family on an upward road.

In other words, I am fleeing the sewer, and I am seeking the dry and the clean, certain that it is the law of my existence. Being a man amounts to little; we are still near the monkey from which they say we proceed. Very well! a further reason for separating ourselves still more from it and for being at least at the height of the relative truth that our race has been admitted to comprehend; a very poor truth, very limited, very humble! Well, let us possess it as much as we can and not permit any one to take it from us.

We are, I think, quite agreed; but I practise this simple religion and you do not practise it, since you let yourself become discouraged; your heart has not been penetrated with it since you curse life, and desire death like a Catholic who yearns for compensation, were it only the rest eternal. You are no surer than another of this compensation. Life is perhaps eternal, and therefore work is eternal. If this is so, let us do our day's work bravely. If it is otherwise, if the moi perishes entirely, let us have the honor of having done our stated task, it is our duty; for we have evident duties only toward ourselves and our equals. What we destroy in ourselves, we destroy in them. Our abasement lowers them, our falls drag them down; we owe it to them to remain erect so that they shall not fall. The desire for an early death, as that for a long life, is therefore a weakness, and I do not want you to admit any longer that it is a right. I thought that I had it once; I believed, however, what I believe today, but I lacked strength, and like you I said: 'I cannot help it.' I lied to myself. One can help everything. One has the strength that one thinks one has not, when one desires ardently to gravitate, to mount a step each day, to say to one's self: 'The Flaubert of tomorrow must be superior to the one of yesterday, and the one of day after tomorrow more steady and more lucid still.'

When you feel you are on the ladder, you will mount very quickly. You are about to enter gradually upon the happiest and most favorable time of life: old age. It is then that art reveals itself in its sweetness; as long as one is young, it manifests itself with anguish. You prefer a well-turned phrase to all metaphysics. I also, I love to see condensed into a few words what elsewhere fills volumes; but these volumes, one must have understood them completely (either to admit them or to reject them) in order to find the sublime résumé which becomes literary art in its fullest expression; that is why one should not scorn the efforts of the human mind to arrive at the truth.

I tell you that, because you have excessive prejudices as to words. In truth, you read, you dig, you work much more than I and a crowd of others do. You have acquired learning that I shall never attain. Therefore you are a hundred times richer than all of us; you are a rich man, and you complain like a poor man. Be charitable to a beggar who has his mattress full of gold, but who wants to be nourished only on well-turned phrases and choice words. But, brute, ransack your own mattress and eat your gold. Nourish yourself with the ideas and feelings accumulated in your head and your heart; the words and the phrases, the form to which you attach so much importance, will issue by itself from your digestion. You consider it as an end, it is only an effect. Happy manifestations proceed only from an emotion, and an emotion proceeds only from a conviction. One is not moved at all by the things that one does not believe with all one's heart.

I do not say that you do not believe; on the contrary, all your life of affection, of protection, and of charming and simple goodness, proves that you are the most convinced individual in the world. But, as soon as you handle literature, you want, I don't know why, to be another man, one who should disappear, one who destroys himself, who does not exist! What an absurd creature man is! What a false rule of good taste! Our work is worth only what we are worth.

Who is talking about putting yourself on the stage? That, in truth, is of no use, unless it is done frankly by way of a chronicle. But to withdraw one's soul from what one does, what is that unhealthy fancy? To hide one's own opinion about the characters that one puts on the stage, to leave the reader therefore uncertain about the opinion that he should have of them, that is to desire not to be understood, and from that moment, the reader leaves you; for if he wants to understand the story that you are telling him, it is on the condition that you should show him plainly that this one is a strong character and that one weak.

L'Education sentimentale has been a misunderstood book, as I have told you repeatedly, but you have not listened to me. There should have been a short preface, or, at a good opportunity, an expression of blame, even if only a happy epithet to condemn the evil, to characterize the defect, to signalize the effort. All the characters in that book are feeble and come to nothing, except those with bad instincts; that is what you are reproached with, because people did not understand that you wanted precisely to depict a deplorable state of society that encourages these bad instincts and ruins noble efforts; when people do not understand us, it is always our fault. What the reader wants, first of all, is to penetrate into our thought, and that is what you deny him, arrogantly. He thinks that you scorn him and that you want to ridicule him. For my part, I understood you, for I knew you. If any one had brought me your book without its being signed, I should have asked myself if you were immoral, sceptical, indifferent or heart-broken. You say that it ought to be like that, and that M. Flaubert will violate the rules of good taste if he shows his thought and the aim of his literary enterprise. It is false in the highest degree. When M. Flaubert writes well and seriously, one attaches one's self to his personality. One wants to sink or swim with him. If he leaves you in doubt, you lose interest in his work, you neglect it, or you give it up.

I have already combated your favorite heresy, which is that one writes for twenty intelligent people and does not care a fig for the rest. It is not true, since the lack of success irritates you and troubles you. Besides, there have not been twenty critics favorable to this book which was so well written and so important. So one must not write for twenty persons any more than for three, or for a hundred thousand.

One must write for all those who have a thirst to read and who can profit by good reading. Then one must go straight to the most elevated morality within one's self, and not make a mystery of the moral and profitable meaning of one's book. People found that with Madame Bovary. If one part of the public cried scandal, the healthiest and the broadest part saw in it a severe and striking lesson given to a woman without conscience and without faith, to vanity, to ambition, to irrationality. They pitied her; art required that, but the lesson was clear, and it would have been more so, it would have been so for everybody, if you had wished it, if you had shown more clearly the opinion that you had, and that the public ought to have had, about the heroine, her husband, and her lovers.

That desire to depict things as they are, the adventures of life as they present themselves to the eye, is not well thought out, in my opinion. Depict inert things as a realist, as a poet, it's all the same to me, but, when one touches on the emotions of the human heart, it is another thing. You cannot abstract yourself from this contemplation; for man, that is yourself, and men, that is the reader. Whatever you do, your tale is a conversation between you and the reader. If you show him the evil coldly, without ever showing him the good, he is angry. He wonders if it is he that is bad, or if it is you. You work, however, to rouse him and to interest him; you will never succeed if you are not roused yourself, or if you hide it so well that he thinks you indifferent. He is right: supreme impartiality is an anti-human thing, and a novel ought to be human above everything. If it is not, the public is not pleased in its being well written, well composed and conscientious in every detail. The essential quality is not there: interest. The reader breaks away likewise from a book where all the characters are good without distinctions and without weaknesses; he sees clearly that that is not human either. I believe that art, this special art of narration, is only worth while through the opposition of characters; but, in their struggle, I prefer to see the right prevail. Let events overwhelm the honest man, I agree to that, but let him not be soiled or belittled by them, and let him go to the stake feeling that he is happier than his executioners.

FLAUBERT TO SAND

March 9, 1876.

You distress me a bit, dear master, by attributing æsthetic opinions to me which are not mine. I believe that the rounding of the phrase is nothing. But that writing well is everything, because 'writing well is at the same time perceiving well, thinking well, and saying well' (Buffon). The last term is then dependent on the other two, since one has to feel strongly, so as to think, and to think, so as to express.

All the bourgeois may have a great deal of heart and delicacy, be full of the best sentiments and the greatest virtues, without becoming for all that, artists. In short, I believe that the form and the matter are two subtleties, two entities, neither of which can exist without the other.

This anxiety for external beauty which you reproach me with is for me a method.

When I discover a bad assonance or a repetition in one of my phrases, I am sure that I am floundering in error; by dint of searching, I find the exact expression which was the only one and is, at the same time, the harmonious one. The word is never lacking when one possesses the idea.

SAND TO FLAUBERT

Nohant, March 15, 1876.

I should have a good deal to say about the novels of M. Zola, and it would be better to say it in an article than in a letter, because there is a general question there which must be formulated with a refreshed brain. I should like to read M. Daudet's book first, the book you spoke of to me, but the title of which I cannot recall. Have the publisher send it to me collect, if he does not want to give it to me; that is very simple. On the whole, the thing that I shall not gainsay, meanwhile making a philosophical criticism of the method, is that Rougon is a strong book, as you say, and worthy of being placed in the first rank.

That does not change anything in my way of thinking, that art ought to be the search for the truth, and that truth is not the picture of evil. It ought to be the picture of good and evil. A painter who sees only one is as false as he who sees only the other. Life is not crammed with monsters only. Society is not formed of rascals and wretches only. The honest people are not the minority, since society exists in a certain order and without too many unpunished crimes. Imbeciles dominate, it is true, but there is a public conscience which weighs on them and obliges them to respect the right. Let people show up and chastise the rascals, that is good, it is even moral, but let them tell us and show us the opposite; otherwise the simple reader, who is the average reader, is discouraged, saddened, horrified, and contradicts you so as not to despair.

FLAUBERT TO SAND

April 3, 1876.

I do not share in Tourgueneff's severity as regards Jack, nor in the immensity of his admiration for Rougon. The one has charm, the other force. But neither one is concerned above all else with what is for me the end of art, namely, beauty. I remember having felt my heart beat violently, having felt a fierce pleasure in contemplating a wall of the Acropolis, a perfectly bare wall (the one on the left as you go up to the Propylæa). Well! I wonder if a book, independently of what it says, cannot produce the same effect! In the exactness of its assembling, the rarity of its elements, the polish of its surface, the harmony of its ensemble, is there not an intrinsic virtue, a sort of divine force, something eternal as a principle? (I speak as a Platonist). Thus, why is a relation necessary between the exact word and the musical word? Why does it happen that one always makes a verse when one restrains his thought too much? Does the law of numbers govern then the feelings and the images, and is what seems to be the exterior quite simply inside it? If I should continue a long time in this vein, I should blind myself entirely, for on the other side art has to be a good fellow; or rather art is what one can make it, we are not free. Each one follows his path, in spite of his own desire. In short, your Cruchard no longer knows where he stands.

But how difficult it is to understand one another! There are two men whom I admire a great deal and whom I consider real artists, Tourgueneff and Zola. Yet they do not admire the prose of Chateaubriand at all, and even less that of Gautier. Phrases which ravish me seem hollow to them. Who is wrong? And how please the public when one's nearest friends are so remote? All that saddens me very much. Do not laugh.

(Later.) Well, dear master, and this is to answer your last letter, this is, I think, what separates us essentially. You, on the first bound, in everything, mount to heaven, and from there you descend to the earth. You start from a priori, from the theory, from the ideal. Thence your pity for life, your serenity, and, to speak truly, your greatness.—I, poor wretch, I am stuck on the earth as with soles of lead; everything disturbs me, tears me to pieces, ravages me, and I make efforts to rise. If I should take your manner of looking at the whole of life, I should become laughable, that is all. For you preach to me in vain. I cannot have another temperament than my own; nor another æsthetics than what is the consequence of it. You accuse me of not letting myself go, according to nature. Well, and that discipline? that virtue? what shall we do with it? I admire M. Buffon putting on cuffs when he wrote. This luxury is a symbol. In short I am trying simply to be as comprehensive as possible. What more can one exact?

As for letting my personal opinion be known about the people I put on the stage: no, no, a thousand times no! I do not recognize the right to that. If the reader does not draw from a book the moral that should be found there, the reader is an imbecile or the book is false from the point of view of accuracy. For, the moment that a thing is true, it is good. Obscene books likewise are immoral only because they lack truth. Things are not 'like that' in life.

And observe that I curse what they agree to call realism, although they make me one of its high priests; reconcile all that.

RENAN (1823-1892)

Ernest Renan was born at Tréguier of a devout Catholic family and was educated for the priesthood. An ardent student, he appeared to have before him a career of tranquil and scholarly usefulness in the service of the church of his fathers, but he was only 22 when the doubts and difficulties raised by his philological studies led to his quitting the seminary of St. Sulpice at Paris and beginning a life of arduous intellectual adventure. He won a high reputation as an Orientalist, and in 1860 was sent to do archeological work in Syria. He was accompanied by his devoted sister Henriette and together they worked on the Life of Jesus until at Byblos they were both struck down by fever, and on his recovery he found that all he could do was to dedicate the book to her memory. The Life of Jesus (published in 1863) aroused bitter controversy, and although Renan's eminence as a scholar secured his appointment about this time to the Chair of Semitic Philology at the Collège de France, he was afterwards removed from it by the Imperial Government. As the violence of feeling about the Life of Jesus died down, the book won recognition for the beauty of its style and the charm of its descriptions of scenery and life in Palestine, as well as for its erudition. It was, however, only a small part of the scholarly work undertaken by Renan, whose contributions to Oriental philology and the history of religion were the outcome of unceasing labor. His literary skill found expression in his Remembrances of Childhood and Youth, published in 1883, and in imaginative works such as Caliban, a fanciful continuation of Shakespeare's Tempest (in which Caliban figures as the villain-hero and the champion of democracy), and The Abbess of Jouarre, a romance of the French Revolution. His essay on The Future of Science, written in 1848-9, although not published till 1890, also made a great impression, and the latter part of his life he was recognized as one of the leading men of letters and most influential thinkers of his time. When in 1925 President Eliot, of Harvard, was asked to name ten writers of the last century who had most affected modern thought, the only French author he put on the list was Renan.

The following translation of Renan's inaugural lecture as Professor at the Collège de France was made by the Rev. O. B. Frothingham, pastor of the third Unitarian Church of New York City.

THE SHARE OF THE SEMITIC PEOPLES IN THE HISTORY OF CIVILIZATION

I am proud to ascend this chair—the most ancient in the Collège de France—made illustrious in the sixteenth century by eminent men, and in our own generation occupied by a scholar of the merit of M. Quatremère. In creating in the Collège de France an asylum for liberal science, King Francis I laid down, as the constitutional law of this great foundation, the complete independence of criticism; the disinterested search for truth; impartial discussion, that knows no rules save those of good taste and sincerity. Precisely this is the spirit which I would fain bring to the instruction here. I know the difficulties that are inseparable from the chair which I have the honor to occupy. It is the privilege and the peril of Semitic studies that they touch on the most important problems in the history of mankind. The free mind knows no limits; but the human race at large is far from having reached that stage of serene contemplation in which it has no need of beholding God in this or that particular order of facts, for the very reason that it sees Him in everything. Liberty, had it been well understood, would have allowed these opposite claims to exist side by side. I hope that, by your favor, this course will prove that they can. As I shall bring to my instruction no dogmatism; as I shall confine myself always to appeals to your reason, to the statement of what I think most probable, leaving you full liberty of judgment, who can complain? Those only who believe they have a monopoly of the truth; but these must renounce the claim to be the masters of the world. In our day Galileo would not go down on his knees to retract what he knew to be the truth.

You will permit me, in the fulfilment of my task, to descend even to the smallest details, and to be habitually technical and austere. Science reaches its holy end, which is the discovery of truth, only on the condition of being specific and rigorous. It is not every man's destiny to be a chemist, a naturalist, a philologist, to shut himself up in laboratories, to pursue for years an experiment or a calculation. All men, nevertheless, share in the great philosophical results of chemistry, physics, and philology. To present these results, disencumbered of the apparatus that has served to bring them out, is a useful labor, and one that science should not decline. Such, however, is not the purpose of the Collège de France. All the apparatus of the most special and minute science should be there displayed. Laborious demonstrations, patient analyses, not excluding, it is true, any general development, any legitimate digression—such is the programme of these courses. It is the very laboratory of philological science, which is open to the public in order that shape may be given to special vocations, and that people of the world may be able to form an idea of the methods that are employed in arriving at the truth.

Today I should depart from usage, and should disappoint your expectation, were I to begin with expositions of too technical a character. It would have given me pleasure to recall here the memory of the illustrious brother laborer whom I have the honor to succeed,—M. Etienne Quatremère. But this duty having been performed in this very place, and in a manner which forbids my recurring to it, I shall devote this first lecture to a colloquy with you on the general character of the peoples whose language and literatures we shall study together; to the part which they have played in history; to the contribution which they have made to the common work of civilization.

The most important result at which historical and philological science has arrived in the last half century has been to show, in the general development of humanity, two elements, which, mingled in unequal proportions, have made the woof of the web of history. As early as the sixteenth century, and almost as early as the middle age, it was discovered that the Hebrews, the Phenicians, the Carthaginians, the Syrians, the Babylonians, from a certain period, at least, the Arabs, the Abyssinians, spoke languages wholly cognate. Eichhorn, in the eighteenth century proposed to call these languages Semitic, and this name, inexact as it is, may as well be retained. In the first years of the nineteenth century a discovery, otherwise important, was made. Thanks to the knowledge of Sanskrit, due to the English scholars in Calcutta, the philologists of Germany, M. Bopp in particular, laid down sure principles, by means of which it was demonstrated that the ancient idioms of Brahmanic India, the different dialects of Persia, the Armenian, many dialects of the Caucasus, the Greek and Latin languages, with their derivatives, the Slavic languages, the Germanic, the Celtic formed a vast whole, radically distinct from the Semitic group, and this they called Indo-Germanic, or Indo-European.

The line of demarcation revealed by the comparative study of languages was soon fortified by the study of literatures, institutions, manners, religions. When one is capable of instituting delicate comparisons, he recognizes in the ancient literatures of India, of Greece, of Persia, of the Germanic nations, common types, rooted in a profound spiritual identity. The literature of the Hebrews and that of the Arabs have likewise a close relation to each other; on the other hand, they have the least possible relation with those I have just enumerated.

We should look in vain among the Semitic peoples for an epopee or a tragedy; we should seek in vain among the Indo-European nations for anything analogous to the Kasida of the Arabs and that species of eloquence which distinguishes the Jewish prophets and the Koran. The same may be said of institutions. The Indo-European nations had at their origin an old system of law, the remnants of which are found again in the Brahmanas of India, in the formulas of the Latins, in the Celtic, Slavic, and Germanic customs. Patriarchal life among the Hebrews and among the Arabs was subjected, undoubtedly, to entirely different laws.

Finally, the comparison of religions has come in to throw decisive light upon this question. By the side of comparative philology there was founded, a few years ago, in Germany, a comparative mythology, which demonstrated that all the Indo-European nations had originally, with a similar language, a similar religion, of which each one, in departing from the common cradle, has carried away the scattered remnants. This religion is the worship of the powers and phenomena of Nature, tending by philosophical development to a species of pantheism. The religious developments of the Semitic races obeyed entirely different laws. Judaism, Christianity, Islamism show a dogmatic, absolute, severely monotheistic spirit, which distinguishes them fundamentally from the Indo-European religions, or, as we call them, the Pagan beliefs.

Here, then, are two entirely distinct individualities, which, between them, fill up, in a manner, almost the whole field of history, and which are, as it were, the two poles of movement for the human race. I say almost the whole field of history; for outside of these two great individualities there are yet two or three which are already traced clearly enough for science, and the action of which has been extensive. I set aside China, which constitutes a world apart, and the Tartar races, which have acted only as natural scourges to destroy the work of the others. Egypt has played a considerable part in the history of the world. Now, Egypt is neither Semitic nor Indo-European; nor is Babylon purely Semitic. There seems to have been in Babylon an original type of civilization analogous to that of Egypt. It may even be said, in general, that before the entrance of the Indo-European and the Semitic nations on the scene of history, the world held already very old civilizations, to which ours owe, if not moral, at least industrial elements, and a long experience of material life. But all this is still faintly outlined before the eyes of history; all this is, moreover, obscured by events, such as the mission of Moses, the invention of alphabetical writing, the conquests of Cyrus and of Alexander, the occupation of the world by Greek genius, Christianity, the Roman Empire, Islamism, the Germanic conquest, Charlemagne, the revival of learning, the Reformation, philosophy, the French Revolution, the conquest of the world by modern Europe. There is the great current of history, a current formed by the mingling of two rivers, compared with which all other confluent are but rivulets. Let us endeavor to distinguish, in this complex whole, the share of each of these two great races, which, by their combined action, and most frequently by their antagonism, have produced the condition of the world of which we ourselves are the final results.

At the outset an explanation is necessary. In speaking of the mingling of the two races, I refer simply to the blending of ideas, or if I may venture to say so, a sort of historic collaboration. The Indo-European and the Semitic peoples are, even in our days, entirely distinct. I do not speak of the Jews, whose peculiar and wonderful historic destiny has given them an exceptional place in humanity; and yet, if we except France, which has set up in the world the principle of a purely ideal civilization, discarding all notion of difference in races, the Jews almost everywhere form still a society by themselves. The Arab at least, and in a more general sense the Mussulman, are further removed from us today than they have ever been. The Mussulman (the Semitic mind is especially represented in our days by Islam) and the European are face to face like two beings of a different species, having nothing in common in their manner of thinking and feeling. But the march of humanity is advanced by the struggle of contrary tendencies, by a sort of polarization in virtue of which every idea has on earth its exclusive representatives. It is in the aggregate that all these contradictions harmonize, and that perfect peace results from the shock of elements apparently hostile.

So much granted, if we ask what the Semitic peoples have contributed to this organic and living whole which is called civilization, we shall find, in the first place, that, in polity, we owe them nothing at all. Political life is perhaps the most peculiar and native characteristic of the Indo-European nations. These nations are the only ones that have known liberty, that have reconciled the State with the independence of the individual. To be sure, they are far from having always equally well adjusted these two opposite necessities. But among them are never found those great unitary despotisms, crushing all individuality, reducing man to the condition of a kind of abstract nameless function, as is the case in Egypt, China, and the Mussulman and Tartar despotisms. Examine successively the small municipal republics of Greece and of Italy, the Germanic feudalisms, the grand centralized organizations of which Rome gave the first model and whose ideal reappeared in the French Revolution, you find always a vigorous moral element, a powerful idea of the public good, sacrifice for a general object. In Sparta, individuality was little protected; the petty democracies of Athens and of Italy in the Middle Ages were almost as ferocious as the most cruel tyrant; the Roman Empire became (in part, however, through the influence of the East) an intolerable despotism; feudalism in Germany resulted in regular brigandage; royalty in France under Louis XIV almost reached the excesses of the dynasties of Sassanids or the Mongols; the French Revolution, while establishing with incomparable energy the principle of unity in the State, often strongly compromised liberty. But swift reactions have always saved these nations from the consequences of their errors. Not so in the East. The East, especially the Semitic East, has known no medium between the utter anarchy of the nomadic Arabs and bloody unmitigated despotism. The idea of the commonweal, of the public welfare, is totally wanting among these nations. Liberty, true and entire, such liberty as the Anglo-Saxon peoples have realized, and grand State organizations, such as the Roman Empire and France have created, were equally unknown to them. The ancient Hebrews, the Arabs have been or are at times the freest of men, but on condition of having the next day a chief who cuts off heads at his own good pleasure. And when this happens, no one complains of violated right: David seizes the scepter by means of an energetic military campaign, which does not hinder his being a very religious man, a king after God's own heart; Solomon ascends the throne and maintains himself there by measures such as Sultans in all ages have used, but this does not prevent his being called the wisest of kings. When the prophets storm against royalty, it is not in the name of a political right, it is in the name of the theocracy. Theocracy, anarchy, despotism, such is a summary of the Semitic polity; happily it is not ours. The political principle drawn from the Holy Scriptures (very badly drawn, it is true) by Bossuet, is a detestable principle. In polity, as in poetry, religion, philosophy, the duty of the Indo-European nations is to seek after nice combinations, the harmony of opposite things, the complexity so totally unknown among the Semitic nations whose organization has always been of a disheartening and fatal simplicity.

In art and poetry, what do we owe to them? In art nothing. These tribes have but little of the artist; our art comes entirely from Greece. In poetry, nevertheless, without being their tributaries, we have with them more than one bond of union. The Psalms have become in some respects one of our sources of poetry. Hebrew poetry has taken a place with us beside Greek poetry, not as having furnished a distinct order of poetry, but as constituting a poetic ideal, a sort of Olympus where in consequence of an accepted prestige everything is suffused with a halo of light. Milton, Lamartine, Lamennais would not exist, or at least would not exist as they are, but for the psalms. Here again, however, all the shades of expression, all the delicacy, all the depth is our work. The thing essentially poetic is the destiny of man, his melancholy moods, his restless search after causes, his just complaint to heaven. There was no necessity for going to strangers to learn this. The eternal school here is each man's soul.

In science and philosophy we are exclusively Greek. The investigation of causes, knowledge for knowledge's own sake, is a thing of which there is no trace previous to Greece, a thing that we have learned from her alone. Babylon possessed a science, but it had not that preëminently scientific principle, the absolute fixedness of natural law. Egypt had some knowledge of geometry, but it did not originate the Elements of Euclid. As for the old Semitic spirit, it is by its nature anti-philosophic, anti-scientific. In Job, the investigation of causes is represented as almost an impiety. In Ecclesiastes, science is declared to be a vanity. The author, prematurely surfeited with more reason than he had exhausted the universe, never speaks of his weariness. The wisdom of the Semitic nations never got beyond parables and proverbs. We often hear of Arabian science and philosophy, and it is true that during one or two centuries in the Middle Ages, the Arabs were our masters, but only, however, until the discovery of the Greek originals. This Arabian science and philosophy was but a poor translation of Greek science and philosophy. As soon as authentic Greece arises, these miserable translations become useless, and it is not without reason that all the philologists of the Renaissance undertake a veritable crusade against them. Moreover, on close examination, we find that this Arabian science had nothing of the Arab in it. Its foundation is purely Greek; among those who originated it, there is not one real Semite; they were Spaniards and Persians writing in Arabic. The Jews of the Middle Ages acted also as simple interpreters of philosophy. The Jewish philosophy of that epoch is unmodified Arabic. One page of Roger Bacon contains more of the true scientific spirit than does all that second-hand science, worthy of respect, certainly, as a link of tradition, but destitute of all noble originality.

If we examine the question with reference to moral and social ideas, we shall find that the Semitic ethics are occasionally very lofty and very pure. The code attributed to Moses contains elevated ideas of right. The prophets are at times very eloquent tribunes. The moralists, Jesus son of Sirach, and Hillel, reach a surprising grandeur. Let us not forget, finally, that the ethics of the Gospel were first preached in a Semitic tongue. On the other hand, the Semitic nature is in general hard, narrow, egotistical. This race possesses noble passions, complete self-devotions, matchless characters. But there is rarely that delicacy of moral sense which seems to be the especial endowment of the Germanic and Celtic races. Tender, profound, melancholy sentiments, those dreams of the Infinite in which all the faculties of the soul blend, that grand revelation of duty which alone gives a solid basis to our faith and our hopes, are the work of our race and of our climate. Here then the task is divided. The moral education of humanity is not the exclusive merit of any race. The reason is quite simple; morals are not taught any more than poetry; fine aphorisms do not make the honest man; each one finds goodness in the loftiness of his nature, in the immediate revelation of his heart.

In industrial pursuits, inventions, external civilization, we owe, certainly, much to the Semitic peoples. Our race did not set out with a taste for comfort and for business. It was a moral, brave, warlike race, jealous of liberty and honor, loving nature, capable of sacrifice, preferring many things to life. Trade, the arts of industry, were practised for the first time on a grand scale by the Semitic tribes, or at least by those speaking a Semitic language, the Phenicians. In the middle ages also, the Arabs and the Jews were our instructors in commercial affairs. All European luxury, from ancient times till the seventeenth century, came from the East. I say luxury, and not art; the distance from one to the other is infinite; Greece, which in point of art was immensely superior to the rest of mankind, was not a country of luxury; there the magnificence of the great king's palace was spoken of with disdain, and were it permitted to us to see the house of Pericles, we should probably find it hardly habitable. I do not insist on this point, for it would be necessary to consider whether this Asiatic luxury, that of Babylon, for instance, is really due to the Semites; I doubt it, for my part. But one gift they have incontestably made us, a gift of the highest order, and one which ought to place the Phenicians, in the history of progress, almost by the side of the Hebrews and the Arabs, their brothers,—Writing. You know that the characters we use at this day are, through a thousand transformations, those that the Semites used first to express the sounds of their language. The Greek and Latin alphabets, from which all our European alphabets are derived, are nothing else than the Phenician alphabet. Phonetics, that bright device for expressing each articulate sound by a sign and for reducing the articulate sounds to a small number (twenty-two), is a Semitic invention. But for them, we should perhaps be still dragging along painfully with hieroglyphics. In one sense we may say that the Phenicians, whose whole literature has so unfortunately disappeared, have thus laid down the essential condition of all vigorous and precise exercise of thought.

But I am eager to come at the prime service which the Semitic race has rendered to the world, its peculiar work, its providential mission, if I may so express myself. We owe to the Semitic race neither political life, art, poetry, philosophy, nor science. What then do we owe to them? We owe to them religion. The whole world, if we except India, China, Japan, and tribes altogether savage, has adopted the Semitic religions. The civilized world comprises only Jews, Christians, and Mussulmans. The Indo-European race in particular, excepting the Brahmanic family and the feeble relics of the Parsees, has gone over completely to the Semitic faiths. What has been the cause of this strange phenomenon? How happens it that the nations who hold the supremacy of the world have renounced their own creed to adopt that of the people 10 they have conquered?

The primitive worship of the Indo-European race was charming and profound, like the imagination of the nations themselves. It was like an echo of nature, 15 a sort of naturalistic hymn, in which the idea of one sole cause appears but occasionally and uncertainly. It was a child's religion, full of artlessness and poetry, but destined to crumble at the first demand of 20 thought. Persia first effected its reform (that which is associated with the name of Zoroaster) under influences and at an epoch unknown to us. Greece, in the time of Pisistratus, was already dissatisfied with 25 her religion, and was turning toward the East. In the Roman period, the old pagan worship had become utterly insufficient. It no longer addressed the imagination; it spoke feebly to the moral sense. The old 30 myths on the forces of nature had become changed into fables, not unfrequently amusing and ingenious, but destitute of all religious value. It is precisely at this epoch 35 that the civilized world finds itself face to face with the Jewish faith. Based upon the clear and simple dogma of the divine unity, discarding naturalism and pantheism by the marvelously terse phrase: 'In the beginning, God created the heaven and the 40 earth,' possessing a law, a book, the depositary of grand moral precepts and of an elevated religious poetry, Judaism had an incontestable superiority, and it might have been foreseen then that some day the world 45 would become Jewish, that is to say, would forsake the old mythology for Monotheism. An extraordinary movement which took place at this epoch in the heart of Judaism itself decided the victory. By the side of 50 its grand and incomparable qualities Judaism contained the principle of a narrow formalism, of an exclusive and scornful fanaticism; this was the Pharisaic spirit which became later the Talmudic spirit. 55 Had Judaism been merely Phariseism it would have had no future. But this race had within itself a truly remarkable religious activity. Like all the noble races, moreover, it combined contrary elements; it knew how to react on itself, and to develop at need qualities the very opposite of 5 its defects.

In the midst of the enormous ferment in which the Jewish nation was plunged under the last Asmoneans, there took place in Galilee the most wonderful moral event which history has ever recorded. A matchless man—so grand, that although here all must be judged from a purely scientific point of view, I would not gainsay those who, struck with the exceptional character of his work, call him God—effected a reform in Judaism, a reform so radical, so thorough, that it was in all respects a complete creation. Having reached a higher religious plane than ever man reached before, having attained the point of regarding himself, in his relation to God, as a son to his father, devoted to his work with a total forgetfulness of all else and a self-renunciation never so sublimely practised before, the victim at last of his idea and deified by death, Jesus founded the eternal religion of humanity, the religion of the soul, stripped of everything sacerdotal, of creed, of external ceremonies, accessible to every race, superior to all castes, in a word, absolute: 'Woman, the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father; but when the true worshipers shall worship him in spirit and in truth.' The vital center was established to which humanity must for centuries refer its hopes, its consolations, its motives for well-doing. The most copious source of virtue that the sympathetic touch of a sublime conscience ever caused to well up in the heart of a man was opened. The lofty thought of Jesus, hardly comprehended by his disciples, suffered many lapses. Christianity, notwithstanding, prevailed from the very first, and prevailed supremely over other existing religions. These religions, which pretended to no absolute value, which had no strong organizations, and which represented 5 no moral idea, offered but feeble resistance. Some attempts which were made to reform them, in accordance with the new needs of humanity, and to introduce into them an earnest moral element—the effort of Julian, for instance—failed completely. The Empire, which saw justly its principle threatened by the birth of a new power, the Church, resisted at first energetically.

It ended by adopting the faith it had opposed. All the nations that were under Greek and Latin influence became Christian; the Germanic and Slavic peoples came in a little later. Persia and India alone, of the Indo-European race, thanks to their very strong religious institutions, which are closely allied to their polity, preserved, though much modified, the ancient worship of their forefathers. The Brahmanic race, especially, rendered to the world a scientific service of the highest kind, by preserving, with a minute and touching excess of precaution, the oldest hymns of their faith, the Vedas.

But after this incomparable victory the religious fecundity of the Semitic race was not exhausted. Christianity, absorbed by Greek and Latin civilization, had become a Western institution. The East, its cradle, was precisely the land in which it encountered the most formidable obstacles. Arabia in particular, in the seventh century, could not make up its mind to become Christian. Hesitating between Judaism and Christianity, native superstitions and the remembrance of the old patriarchal faith, recoiling from the mythologic elements which the Indo-European race had introduced into the heart of Christianity, Arabia wished to return to the religion of Abraham; she founded Islamism. Islamism, in its turn, appeared immensely superior amidst the debased religions of Asia. With one breath it overturned Parseeism, which had been vigorous enough, under the Sassanidæ, to triumph over Christianity and reduce it to the condition of an insignificant sect. India, in its turn, saw, but without being converted, the divine unity proclaimed victoriously in the midst of its obsolete pantheon. Islamism, in a word, won over to Monotheism almost all the heathen whom Christianity had not yet converted. It is finishing its mission in our days by the conquest of Africa, which is becoming, at this time, almost wholly Mussulman. With a few exceptions, of secondary importance, the world has been thus conquered entire by the monotheistic apostleship of the Semites.

Do we mean to say that the Indo-European nations, in adopting the Semitic dogma, have completely given up their own individuality? No, indeed. In adopting the Semitic religion, we have modified it profoundly. Christianity, as popularly understood, is in reality, our work. Primitive Christianity, consisting essentially of the apocalyptic belief in a Kingdom of God which was about to come; Christianity, as it existed in the mind of a St. James, of a Papias, was very different from our Christianity, encumbered with metaphysics by the Greek Fathers and with scholasticism by the Middle Ages, and by the progress of modern times reduced to a teaching of morality and charity. The victory of Christianity was secured only when it broke completely its Jewish shell, when it became again what it had been in the lofty purpose of its founder, a creation released from the narrow trammels of the Semitic mind. This is so true, that the Jews and Mussulmans feel only aversion to this religion, the sister of their own, but which, in the hands of another race, has clothed itself with an exquisite poetry, with a delicious attire of romantic legends. Refined, sensitive, imaginative souls, such as the author of the Imitation, the mystics of the Middle Ages, and the saints in general, professed a religion, which had, indeed, sprung from the Semitic genius, but had been transformed from its very foundation by the genius of modern nations, especially of the Celts and Germans. That depth of sentimentalism, that species of religious languor of a Francis of Assisi, of a Fra Angelico, were the precise opposite of the Semitic genius, which is essentially hard and dry.

As regards the future, I see in it more and more the triumph of the Indo-European genius. Since the sixteenth century an immense event, until then undecided, has been coming out with striking vigor. It is the definitive victory of Europe, the accomplishment of this old Semitic proverb: 'Let God increase Japhet, and let him dwell in the tents of Shem, and let Ham be his servant.'

Till that time the Semitic spirit had been master on its soil. The Mussulman East defeated the West; had better arms and a better political system; sent it riches, knowledge, civilization. Henceforward the parts are changed. European genius rises with peerless grandeur; Islamism, on the contrary, is slowly decomposing,—in our days it is falling in with a crash. At the present time, the essential condition of a diffused civilization is the destruction of the peculiarly Semitic element, the destruction of the theocratic power of Islamism; consequently the destruction of Islamism itself; for Islamism can exist only as an official religion; as soon as it shall be reduced to the state of a free, personal religion, it will perish. Islamism is not merely a state religion, as Catholicism was in France under Louis XIV—as it still is in Spain. It is religion excluding the state; it is an organization the type of which, in Europe, the Pontifical States alone exhibited. There is the endless strife, the strife which will cease only when the last son of Ishmael shall have died of misery, or shall have been driven by terror into the depths of the desert. Islam completely negatives Europe; Islam is fanaticism, such as Spain under Philip II and Italy under Pius V have scarcely known; Islam is contempt for science, suppression of civil society; it is the appalling simplicity of the Semitic spirit cramping the human intellect, closing it against every delicate thought, every fine feeling, every rational inquiry, to confront it with an eternal repetition: God is God.

The future belongs then to Europe, and to Europe alone; Europe will conquer the world, and spread through it her religion, which is law, liberty, respect for man, the belief that there is something divine in the heart of humanity. In all departments progress for the Indo-European people will consist in departing farther and farther from the Semitic spirit. Our religion will become less and less Jewish; more and more will it reject all political organizations as connected with the affairs of the soul. It will become the religion of the heart, the innermost poetry of every soul. In ethics we shall cultivate a refinement unknown to the austere natures of the Old Alliance; we shall become more and more Christian. In polity we shall reconcile two things which the Semitic nations have always ignored—liberty and a strong state organization. From poetry we shall demand expression for that instinct of the infinite which is at once our joy and our torment,—at all events our greatness. From philosophy, instead of the absolute of the scholastics, we shall demand delicate studies on the general system of the universe. In everything we shall seek after fine distinctions, subtlety instead of dogmatism, the relative in place of the absolute. There is the future, as I anticipate it, if the future is to belong to progress. Shall we attain a clearer view of the destiny of man and his relations with the infinite?

Shall we know more surely the law of the origin of beings, the nature of conscience, what is life and personality? Without relapsing into credulity, and still persisting in its path of positive philosophy, will the world recover its joy, its ardor, its hope, its deeper thoughts? Will existence become again worth the possessing, and will the man who believes in duty find in duty his reward? This science to which we consecrate our life—will it render back to us what we sacrifice to it? I know not. But this is certain, that in seeking out truth by scientific methods we shall have done our duty. If truth be cheerless, we shall at least have the consolation of having honestly discovered it; we may say that we deserved to find it more consoling; still, we shall bear this witness in our hearts, that we have been thoroughly sincere.

To tell the truth, I cannot dwell on such thoughts. History demonstrates that there is in human nature a transcendent instinct that urges it toward a nobler aim. The development of man is inexplicable on the hypothesis that man is only a being with an already finished destiny, virtue only a refined egotism, religion but a chimera. Let us work on, then. Whatever the author of Ecclesiastes may say in a moment of discouragement, science is not 'the meanest occupation that God has given to the sons of men.' It is the best. If all be vanity, he who has consecrated his life to truth will be no more duped than others. If all the good and the true be real, and we are sure that they are, their seeker and lover will have unquestionably breathed the finest spirit.

We shall not meet again, gentlemen. At my next lecture I shall plunge into Hebraic philology, where the greater number of you will not follow me. But I pray those who are young, and to whom I may be allowed to offer a word of counsel, to favor me with their attention.

Direct your attention to solid studies; believe that the liberal thing par excellence is cultivation of mind, nobleness of heart, independence of judgment. Prepare for our country generations ripe for all that makes the glory and the ornament of life. Beware of rash enthusiasms, and remember that liberty is won only by earnestness, respect for ourselves and others, devotion to the commonweal and to the special work that each of us in this world is called upon to establish or to continue.

TAINE (1828-1893)

Hippolyte Adolphe Taine was well known to English and American students of the last generation through his History of English Literature (1863). French contemporary opinion regarded him as a philosopher as well as a historian and critic, and his life, though it was in the main the peaceful career of a scholar and professor, was diversified by some vehement debates. He aroused antagonism in the earlier part of his career by his attempt to introduce into literary criticism and morals the certitude established in physical science. 'Virtue and vice,' he said, 'are products like vitriol and sugar,' and he addressed his volumes of history and criticism to 'the lovers of moral zoology, the naturalists of the intellect.' To the present generation, scientific certitude seems to have narrower limits than were evident in the first flush of nineteenth century scientific enthusiasm, and Taine himself, before the end of his active and laborious career as a teacher and writer, did not press his theories so far or so hard as he did at the beginning. The scientific principles of heredity and environment—'La race, le milieu, le moment'—as Taine phrased them, have their uses, in literary and artistic criticism, and Taine's wide learning and literary skill enabled him to employ them effectively. If he sometimes forces them further than seems justifiable, the modern student who believes in an irreducible minimum of human personality, which cannot be explained by any scientific method yet known, can guard himself from being misled. Taine had a very alert and penetrating mind, and in his later work was careful to guard himself against the excessive application of the theories he espoused in the enthusiasm of youth. The passages from The Ideal in Art given below are from the translation of J. Durand, and we are indebted to Henry Holt and Company for permission to reprint.

THE IDEAL IN ART

In the human kingdom, as in the animal or vegetable kingdom, the principle of the subordination of characters establishes the same hierarchy: the superior rank and the first importance belong to the most stable characters; and if these are more stable it is that, being more elementary, they are present on a much larger surface and are swept away only by a greater revolution.

To this scale of moral values corresponds, step by step, the scale of literary values. All things in other respects being equal, according as the character set forth in a book is more or less important, that is to say more or less elementary and stable, this book becomes more or less beautiful, and you will see the layers of the moral strata communicate, to the literary works which express them, their proper degree of power and duration.

There is, first, a literature of fashion which expresses the character in the fashion; it lasts, like that character, three or four years and sometimes less; it commonly blossoms and decays with the leaves of the year: it consists of the romance, the farce, the pamphlet, the novelty in vogue. Read, if you have the courage to do so, a vaudeville or a humorous piece of the year 1835,—you will let it drop out of your hand. Attempts are often made to reproduce it on the stage; twenty years ago it was the rage; today the audience yawn and the piece quickly disappears from the play-bills. This or that romance, once sung at every piano, is now ludicrous; we find it insipid and discordant; it is at best only encountered in some remote and antiquated province; it expresses only some of those evanescent sentiments which a slight variation in customs suffices to do away with; it has become old-fashioned, and we are surprised at ourselves for having been pleased with such foolish things. Thus, from among the innumerable writings which see the light, time makes its selection; superficial and slightly persistent characters are borne away with the works which express them.

Other works correspond to characters somewhat more durable, and seem to be masterpieces to the generations which read them. Such was the famous Astrée which D'Urfé composed at the commencement of the seventeenth century—a pastoral romance, of infinite length and yet greater dulness, a bower of foliage and flowers to which men, weary with the slaughter and brigandage of religious wars, betook themselves to listen to the sighs and sentimentalities of Celadon. Such were the romances of Mademoiselle de Scudéry—the Grand Cyrus, and Clélie,—in which the exaggerated, refined and measured gal-

 10 lantry introduced into France by the Spanish queens, the noble dissertation on the new language, the mysteries of the heart and the ceremonial of politeness, were displayed like the majestic robes and formal reverences of the Hotel de Ram-
 15 bouillet. Countless works had this kind of merit which today are nothing more than historical documents: for example, the Euphues of Lyly, the Adonis of Marini, 20 the Hudibras of Butler, and the biblical pastorals of Gessner. We are not without such writings nowadays, but I prefer not to mention them; I will only remark that about 1806 M. Esmenard held at Paris the 25 position of a great man, and enumerate the multitude of works which seemed sublime at the beginning of the literary revolution of which we now see the end—Atala, The
 30 Last of the Abencerages, the Natchez and many of Madame de Staël's and Lord Byron's personages. At present the first stage of the journey has been passed over, and, stationed where we are, we detect
 35 without any difficulty the exaggeration and the affectation which contemporaries did not suspect. The celebrated elegy of Millevoye on the Chute des Feuilles leaves
 40 us as unmoved as the Messénienues of Casimir Delavigne; it is because the two works, half classic and half romantic, corresponded by their mixed character to a 45 generation placed on the frontier of two periods, and their success has had precisely the duration of the moral character which they manifested.

Many very remarkable cases show most clearly how the value of a work increases and decreases with the value of the character expressed. It seems that here nature
 50 yoked together experience and counter-experience with premeditated purpose. We might cite writers who have left one work of the first among twenty of the secondary order. In both cases the talent, the educa-55 tion, the preparation, the effort was all alike; nevertheless, in the first, there issued from the crucible an ordinary work; in the second, a masterpiece saw the light. This is due to the fact that in the first case the writer expressed only superficial and transitory characters, whilst in the second he 5 seized upon enduring and profound characters. Lesage wrote twelve volumes of romances imitated from the Spanish, and the Abbé Prevost twenty volumes of tragic and pathetic novels; the curious alone seek 10 these out, while everybody has read Gil Blas and Manon Lescaut. The reason of this is that a happy accident twice brought to the artist's hand a stable type of which

 15 every man encounters traits in the society around him or in the sentiments of his own breast. Gil Blas is a bourgeois with a classic education, having passed through 20 all conditions of society and made a fortune, easy in his conscience, somewhat a valet his whole life, a little picaro in his youth, accommodating himself to the
 25 standard of worldly morality, by no means a stoic and still less a patriot, securing his own share of the cake and freely biting into that of the public, but gay, sympathetic, no
 30 hypocrite, capable occasionally of self-judgment, having fits of honesty with a substratum of honor and benevolence, and winding up with a well-regulated and 35 straightforward life. A like character adopting the medium in all things, and a like destiny, so tangled and diversified, is daily encountered, and will be again to-morrow, as it was in the eighteenth cen-40 tury.

In a similar manner, in Manon Lescaut, the courtesan who is an amiable girl, immoral through the craving for luxury, but affectionate by instinct, and capable in the 45 end of returning a love equal to the absolute love which made all sacrifices for her, is a type of so permanent a nature that George Sand in Leone Leoni and Victor Hugo in Marion Desorme have taken it up
 50 to put it again upon the stage, simply reversing the parts and changing the time.

De Foe wrote two hundred volumes, and Cervantes I know not how many dramas and romances, the former with the truth-
 55 ful detail, the minutiae, the dry precision of a puritan business-man, and the latter with the invention, the glow, the insufficiency, the generosity of a Spanish cavalier and adventurer; of the one there remains Robinson Crusoe, and of the other Don Quixote. It is because Robinson Crusoe is, primarily, the genuine Englishman completely embodying the profound instincts of the race still visible in the sailor and in the colonial squatter of his country, violent and savage in his resolutions, protestant and biblical at heart, with those silent fermentations of the imagination and of the conscience which lead to crises of conversion and of grace, energetic, obstinate, patient, indefatigable, born for labor, capable of clearing away and colonizing continents; it is because the same personage, apart from national character, presents to the eye the severest experience of human life and an abridgement of all human invention, showing the individual torn from civilized society and constrained to recover by his solitary effort so many arts and so many industries, of which the benefits surround him hourly and unconsciously as water surrounds the fish. In like manner, in Don Quixote we see at first the chivalrous and morbid Spaniard, such as eight centuries of crusades and of overcharged reveries had made him, but, beside this, one of the eternal prototypes of human history, the heroic, sublime, visionary, meager and broken-down idealist: in order to strengthen the impression, and by way of contrast, we see alongside of him the sage, matter-of-fact, vulgar and gross bumpkin.

May I cite to you still another of those immortal personages in which a race and an epoch are recognized, and whose name becomes one of the current terms of a language, the Figaro of Beaumarchais, a kind of Gil Blas more nervous and more revolutionary than the other? And yet the author was simply a man of talent; he was too sparkling with wit to create, like Molière, spirits that live; but, one day, drawing a picture of himself, with his gaiety, his expedients, his irreverence, his repartees, his courage, his natural good-heartedness, his inexhaustible vivacity, he had delineated, without so intending it, the portrait of the true Frenchman, and his talent rose to genius.

There occur counter verifications, and there are cases where genius descends to talent. Many a writer who knows how to mold and put in motion the greatest personages leaves in his group of figures a crowd of inanimate beings, who, at the end of a century, seem dead or repulsive, open to ridicule, whose whole interest belongs to antiquaries and historians. For example the lovers of Racine are all marquises; all their character is in their good behavior; their sentiments are so fashioned as to please dandies; he makes them gallants; in his hands they become court-puppets; even now intelligent foreigners cannot endure M. Hippolyte and M. Xiphares.

In the same way the clowns of Shakespeare amuse no more, and his young gentlemen appear extravagant; one must be a critic and an expert in order to place himself at the proper point of view; their play on words is offensive, and their metaphors are unintelligible; their pretentious jargon is a convention of the sixteenth century, as the refined tirade is one of the proprieties of the seventeenth century. There are also fashionable personages; the exterior and the effect of the hour are so predominant in them that the rest disappears.

You perceive, by this twofold experience, the importance of profound and enduring characters, since a lack of them degrades a great man's work to the second rank, and their presence exalts the work of a lesser talent to the first rank.

It is for this reason that if one goes through the great literary works, he will find that all manifest a profound and durable character, and that their rank is higher according as this character is more durable and more profound. They are generalizations which present to the mind under a sensible form at one time the principal traits of a historical period, at another the primordial instincts and faculties of a race, at another some fragment of the universal man and those elementary psychological forces which are the ultimate explanation of human events. In order to be convinced of this we need not pass in review the various literary works. It will be sufficient to note the use which is now made of literary works in history. It is through these that the deficiencies of memoirs, constitutions, and diplomatic documents are supplied; they show us, with an astonishing precision and clearness, the sentiments of diverse epochs, the instincts and aptitudes of diverse races, all the great secret springs whose equilibrium maintains societies and whose discords lead to revolutions. The positive history and chronology of ancient India are almost useless; but its heroic and sacred poems remain to us, and in these we see its spirit laid bare, that is to say, the order and condition of its imagination, the extent and connection of its dreams, the depth and disorder of its philosophical divinations and the inner principle of its religion and of its institutions.

Let us consider Spain at the end of the sixteenth and at the beginning of the seventeenth century. If you read Lazarillo de Tormes and the picaresque romances, if you study the drama of Lope de Vega, of Calderon and other dramatists, you will see rising before you two living figures, the beggar and the cavalier, who will show you all the misery, all the grandeur and all the folly of this strange civilization.

The more perfect a work is the deeper are the characteristics portrayed in it. We might extract from Racine the whole system of the monarchical sentiments of our seventeenth century,—the portrait of the king, of the queen, of the children of France, of noble courtiers, ladies of honor, and prelates; all the dominant ideas of the time,—feudal fidelity, chivalric honor, servility of the ante-chamber, the decorum of the palace, the devotion of servants and subjects, the perfection of manners, the sway and tyranny of propriety, the natural and artificial niceties of language, of the heart, of Christianity, and of morality; in short, the habits and sentiments which make up the principal traits of the ancient regime.

Our greatest modern epics, the Divine Comedy and Faust, are summaries of two grand European historical epochs. One shows us the way in which the Middle Ages regarded life, and the other the way in which we regard it. Both of them express the highest truth to which two sovereign minds, each in its time, attained. Dante's poem depicts the man who, transported outside of this ephemeral world, traverses the supernatural, the sole definitive and subsisting world; he was conducted by two powers, the exalted love which then controlled human life, and systematic theology which was then the queen of speculative thought; his poetic dream, by turns horrible and sublime, is the mystic reverie which then seemed the perfect state of the human mind. Goethe's poem depicts the man who, led through all the ways of science and of life, gets bruised and disgusted, wanders and gropes around, and finally settles down resignedly into practical life without, among so many painful experiences and unsatisfied questionings, ever ceasing to realize behind its legendary veil that superior realm of ideal forms and of incorporeal forces on the threshold of which thought is arrested, and to which alone the divinations of the heart can penetrate. Among so many finished works, which manifest the essential character of a race or an epoch, there are some which, by a singular chance, express, moreover, some sentiment, some type, common to almost all groups of humanity; such are the Hebrew Psalms that confront the monotheistic man with the Almighty Judge and Sovereign God; the Imitation which shows the communion of the tender soul with the loving and consoling Redeemer; the poems of Homer and the dialogues of Plato, which represent the heroic youth of the active man, or the charming adolescence of the reflective man; nearly all that Greek literature which possessed the privilege of representing healthy and simple sentiments; Shakespeare, in fine, the greatest in original creations, the deepest observer of man, the most clear-sighted of all those who have comprehended the mechanism of the human passions, the mute fermentations and the violent explosions of the imaginative brain, the unforeseen derangements of consciousness, the tyranny of the flesh and blood, the fatalities of character and the obscure causes of our sanity and insanity. Don Quixote, Candide, and Robinson Crusoe are books of a like scope. Works of this class survive the century and the people to whom they owe their origin. They pass beyond the ordinary limits of time and space; they are understood wherever we find a thinking mind; their popularity is indestructible and their duration infinite—a final proof of the connection between moral and literary values, and of the principle which arranges the works of art above or below each other, according to the importance, the stability and the depth of the historic or psychological character which they have expressed. . . .

MORAL AND LITERARY VALUES

To this classification of moral values corresponds, step by step, a classification of literary values. All things equal in other respects, the work which expresses a beneficent character is superior to the work which expresses a malevolent character. If, in two given works, both exhibit, with the same talent in execution, natural forces of like grandeur, that which represents to us a hero is better than that which represents to us a dolt; and in this gallery of living works of art, which form the definitive museum of the human mind, you will see established, according to our new principle, a new order of ranks.

At the lowest step of all are the types preferred by the literature of realism and by the comic drama; that is to say, simpletons and egotists—limited, weak and inferior natures. They are those, in fact, encountered in ordinary life, or those that can be turned into ridicule. Nowhere will you find a more complete assemblage than in the Scenes of Middle-class Life of Henri Monnier. Almost all good romances thus recruit their secondary personages; such as the Sancho of Don Quixote; the seedy sharpers of the picaresque romances; Fielding's squires, parsons, and servants; and Walter Scott's shrewd lairds and rigid ministers; all of that lower class of figures, swarming in Balzac's Comédie Humaine and in contemporary English literature, will supply us with further examples. These writers, undertaking to depict men as they are, were obliged to portray them incomplete, mixed up and inferior, most of the time abortive in their character, or distorted by their condition. As to the comic drama it is sufficient to cite Turcaret, Basile, Organ, Arnolphe, Harpagon, Tartuffe, Georges Dandin, all of the marquises, valets, pedants, and doctors in Molière. It is the quality of the comic drama to lay bare human deficiencies. Great artists, however, on whom the exigences of their class of subjects, or a love of strict truth, imposed studies of this sad kind, have made use of two artifices to conceal the mediocrity and repulsiveness of the characters they have figured. They have either made of them accessories or contrasts, which serve to bring out some principal figure in stronger relief—the most frequent proceeding of novelists—and which you may study in the Don Quixote of Cervantes, in Balzac's Eugénie Grandet, and in the Madame Bovary of Gustave Flaubert; or they have turned our sympathies against the personage, causing him to descend from one mishap to another, exciting against him the disapprobatory and vengeful laugh, purposely showing off the unlucky consequences of his inaptitude, and hunting out and expelling from life the defect which dominates in him. The spectator, become hostile, is satisfied; he experiences the same pleasure in seeing folly and egotism crushed, as he does in seeing an expansion of goodness and strength; the banishment of an evil is worth a triumph of the good. This is the great resource of comedians, but novelists likewise make use of it; and you may see its success not merely in the Précieuses, the École des Femmes, the Femmes Savantes, and numerous other pieces by Molière, but again in the Tom Jones of Fielding, Dickens' Martin Chuzzlewit, and in the Vieille Fille by Balzac. The spectacle, nevertheless, of these belittled or crippled spirits ends by leaving in the reader's mind a vague sentiment of weariness and disgust, and even irritation and bitterness. When they are very numerous in a work and occupy the prominent place, one is disheartened. Sterne, Swift, and the comic writers of the Restoration, many contemporary comedies and romances, the scenes of Henri Monnier, finally repel you; the admiration or approval of the reader gets to be mingled with repugnance; it is disagreeable to see vermin even when we kill it, and we demand that we be shown creations of a more vigorous birth and of loftier character. . . .

THE PRINCIPLE OF CONCENTRATION

After having considered characters in themselves it remains for us to examine them when incorporated in a work of art. Not only is it necessary that in themselves they should have the greatest possible value but likewise it is necessary that in a work of art they should become as paramount as possible. It is in this way that they become more manifest and hold a more prominent place; in this way only will they become more apparent than in nature. To this end it is evidently necessary that all parts of a work should contribute to their manifestation. No element should remain passive or divert the attention in another direction; it would be a force wasted or a force employed in a counter sense. In other words, in a picture, in a statue, in a poem, in an edifice, and in a symphony all the effects should converge to one point. The degree of this convergence marks the place of the work, and you will see a third scale erected alongside of the two first to measure the value of works of art.

Let us first take the arts which disclose the moral man, and above all literature. We will begin by distinguishing the diverse elements which constitute a drama, an epic or a romance, in brief a work which places before us acting agents. In the first place there are agents in it, that is to say personages endowed, all of them, with a distinct character; and in a character we may recognize many parts. From the moment, says Homer, 'an infant first falls on the knees of a woman,' he possesses, at least in germ, faculties and instincts of a certain kind and to a certain degree; he is a compound of his father, of his mother, of his family and, in general, of his race; furthermore, inherited qualities, transmitted through the blood, take in him dimensions and proportions by which he is distinguished from his compatriots and from his relatives. This innate moral foundation is allied to a physical temperament, and the whole together forms the primitive combination which education, example, training, all subsequent events and actions of infancy and of youth are to oppose or to complete. When these different forces, instead of neutralizing, reinforce each other, this convergence of forces stamps itself deeply on man, and there appear strong and striking characters. This convergence is often wanting in nature; it never fails in the work of great artists; it is thus that their characters, although composed of the same elements as real characters are more powerful than real characters. They prepare their personages minutely and remotely; when they are presented to us we feel that they cannot be otherwise than they are. A vast framework supports them; a profound logic has built them up. Nobody has possessed this gift to the same extent as Shakespeare. If you attentively read each of his parts you will find at every step, in a word, in a gesture, in an outburst of the imagination, in a desultory flow of ideas, in the turn of a phrase, an echo and an index revealing to you the inward state, the entire past and the future of the personage before you.

These are his substrata. Organic temperament, original or acquired aptitudes and tendencies, the complex growth of ideas and of remote or recent habits, all the sap of human nature infinitely transformed from its most primitive roots to its latest offshoots have contributed to produce the actions and the expressions which form their terminal jet. This multitude of present forces and this concordance of concentrated effects were necessary in order to animate figures like Coriolanus, Macbeth, Hamlet, and Othello, and to form, nourish, and exalt the master-passion which is to nerve and to usher them forth. With Shakespeare may I name a modern, almost a contemporary, Balzac, the most gifted of all those who in our time have mined the treasures of our moral nature? No one has better shown the formation of man, the successive stages of his varied stratifications, the superposed and intersecting effects of relationship, of early impressions, of conversation, of studies, of friendships, of professions, of habitation, of the innumerable imprints which day after day come and stamp themselves on our soul in order to give to it its consistency and its form. He, however, is a novelist and a savant instead of being, like Shakespeare, a poet and dramatist; hence, instead of concealing his substrata he displays them; you will find them extensively enumerated in his infinite descriptions and dissertations, in his circumstantial portraits of a house, of a face, or of a costume, in his preparatory accounts of an infancy or an education, and in his technical explanations of an invention or of a process. But his art, substantially, is the same, and when he builds up personages, such as Hulot, Père Grandet, Philippe Brideau, the old maid, a spy, a courtesan, a great business-man, his talent always consists in accumulating an enormous quantity of formative elements and moral influences into one channel and in one direction, like so many streams which swell and precipitate the same current.

A second group of elements in the literary work consists of situations and events. The character conceived, it is necessary that the conflict to which it is subjected should be suitable for its manifestation. In this respect, art, again, is superior to nature. for in nature things do not always thus transpire. Some great and imposing character remains there buried and inert for lack either of opportunity or of temptation. If Cromwell had not happened to be in the midst of the English Revolution he would probably have kept up the same life he led for forty years in his own family and district, that of a rural proprietor, town-magistrate, and rigid puritan solely concerned with his manures, his animals, his children, and his scruples of conscience. Postpone the French Revolution three years and Mirabeau would have been only a gentleman without social position, an adventurer and man of pleasure. On the other hand, a mediocre or feeble character who was not equal to tragic events might have been equal to ordinary events. Suppose Louis XVI to have been born in a middle-class family, and to have been an employee or a proprietor with a moderate fortune: he might have lived tranquilly and highly esteemed; he might have honestly fulfilled his daily task; we might have seen him attentive to his business, gentle with his wife, a good father to his children; in the evening by his fireside he might have taught them geography, and on Sunday, after the service, he would have amused them with his locksmith's tools. The organized being whom nature subjects to the struggle for existence is like a ship which has just glided from the stocks into the water; it requires a strong wind or a light breeze according as it is either a frigate or a skiff; the gale which impels the frigate founders the skiff, and the light breeze which makes the skiff dance lets the frigate remain motionless in port. It is accordingly necessary that the artist should adapt his situations to his characters. You have here a second concordance, and there is no necessity to show you that great artists never fail to establish it. What we call intrigue or action among them is simply a series of events and an order of situations arranged with a view to manifest characters, to probe natures to their depths, to bring up to the surface profound instincts and unknown faculties which the monotonous current of habit prevents from emerging into day, in order to measure, as in Corneille, the force of their will and the grandeur of their heroism, in order to expose, as in Shakespeare, the lusts, madness, and fury, the strange devouring monsters which blindly rage and roar in the depths of our hearts. These experiences are varied relatively to the same personage: they can accordingly be so disposed as to always render them effective: this is the crescendo of all writers; they make use of it in each petty action as in the entire conception, and thus culminate in some supreme victory or in some supreme defeat. You perceive that the law is as applicable in the details as in the masses. Portions of a scene are grouped together in view of a certain effect; all effects are combined in view of a dénouement; the entire story is constructed in view of the natures which we wish to bring upon the stage. The noteworthy class and the visible character are due to the qualities which converge or persist in them; this convergence of the entire character and of its successive situations manifests the essence of the character, and even its elements in drawing it out to a definite success or to a final overthrow.

One last element remains, that of style. It is in fact, the sole apparent one; the other two are simply its substrata; it is a dress for them and it appears only on the surface. A book is merely a set of phrases which the author utters or makes his personages utter; our exterior eyes and ears lay hold of nothing more, and whatever else is perceived by hearing and sight is conveyed to them only through the medium of these same phrases. Hence there is a third element of superior importance, the effect of which must accord with the effect of others in order that the total impression may be the greatest possible. But a phrase taken in itself is capable of diverse forms and, consequently, of diverse effects. It may be one verse followed by other verses; it may comprise several verses of equal or unequal length, of rhythms and rhymes diversely arranged, enabling you to appreciate the full wealth of meter. On the other hand, it may form one line of prose followed by other lines of prose; and these lines are at one time linked together in a period, at another are cut up into little isolated phrases, at another they are composed in turn of short periods and phrases, enabling you to perceive the full wealth of syntax.

Finally the words which compose the phrases have a character of their own; according to their origin and their ordinary use they are noble and generous, or dry and technical, or familiar and striking, or abstract and dull, or brilliant and picturesque. In short, a phrase uttered is a combination of forces which at once awaken in the reader the logical instinct, the musical aptitude, the acquisitions of memory, and the fires of the imagination, and thrills the whole man through the nerves, the senses, and the habits. It is necessary therefore that the style should be in keeping with the rest of the work; there is therein a final convergence, and on this domain the art of the great writers is without limit; their tact is of extraordinary delicacy and their invention is of inexhaustible fertility; we do not find in them a rhythm, a turn, a construction, a word, a sound or a combination of words, sounds, and phrases whose value is not felt and whose use is not intentional. Here again art is superior to nature; for through this choice, this transformation, and this use of style the imaginary personage speaks better and more conformably to his character than the real personage. Without here entering into the subtleties of art, and without going into the detail of processes, we easily perceive that verse is a sort of song and prose a sort of conversation; that the stately alexandrine line raises the voice up to a sustained and noble accent, and that the short lyrical strophe is still more musical and still more exalted; that the clear short phrase has the imperious or tripping tone; that the long period has the oratorical inspiration and the majestic emphasis; in short, that every form of style determines a state of the soul, either expansion or tension, transport or indifference, order or disorder, and that therefore the effects of situations and of characters are diminished or heightened according as the effects of style follow in the contrary sense or in the same sense. Suppose that Racine should adopt the style of Shakespeare, and Shakespeare that of Racine, their work would be absurd or rather they would not be able to write; the seventeenth century phrase, so clear, so well-proportioned, so purified, so well put together, so well adapted to a palace discourse, is incapable of expressing the crude passions and imaginative sallies, the inward and irresistible tempest which vents itself in the English drama. On the other hand, the sixteenth century phrase, at one time familiar and at another lyrical, venturesome, harsh and disjointed, would be a blemish if put in the mouths of the polished, well-educated, and accomplished personages of French tragedy. Instead of a Racine and a Shakespeare you would have Drydens and Otways and a Ducis and Casimir Delavigne. Such is the power and such the conditions of style. The characters which situations unfold to the mind are manifested to the senses only through language, and the convergence of the three forces gives to the character all its prominence. The more the artist has discriminated and made converge in his work numerous elements and capable of effect, the more the character which he wishes to place in light becomes prominent. The whole of art lies in two words, concentration in manifestation.

According to this principle we may class once more various literary works. All things equal in other respects, they will be more or less beautiful according to the greater or less completeness of the convergence of effects in them; and, through a singular coincidence, this rule applied to the schools, establishes, between the successive stages of the same art, the divisions which history and experience have already introduced into them.

At the commencement of every literary age we remark a period of gestation; art is weak and infantile; it is because the convergence of effects is insufficient there, and the fault is due to the ignorance of the writer. He is not wanting in inspiration; he has it and often in a natural and vigorous way; talent abounds at this moment; noble forms flit obscurely through the depths of the soul; but processes are not known; people do not know how to write, how to distribute the parts of a subject, how to employ literary resources. Such is the defect of early French literature in the middle-ages. In reading the Chanson de Roland, Renaud de Montauban, Ogier le Danois, you quickly perceive that the men of this age entertained grand and original sentiments; a new society had been organized; the crusades were in progress; the proud independence of the baron, the indomitable fidelity of the vassal, military and heroic habits, strength of body and simplicity of heart provided poetry with characters equal to those of Homer. It only half profited by them; it has felt their beauty without being able to render it. The trouvère was a layman and French, that is to say, born of a race ever prosaic and at that day so situated as to be deprived of superior culture by clerical monopoly. He narrates in a dry and coarse manner; he has not the broad and brilliant imagery of Homer and of antique Greece; his story is tame; his monorhythmic stanza repeats thirty times in succession the same monotonous stroke of the bell. He is not master of his subject; he does not know how to curtail, develop and proportion, to prepare a scene and strengthen an effect. His work takes no place in the literature of all time; it disappears from the world, and only engages the attention of antiquaries. If it is successful it is through isolated works, through a Nibelungen in Germany, where the old national foundation has not been upturned by the ecclesiastical establishment; through the Divine Comedy in Italy, where Dante, by a supreme effort of labor, enthusiasm and genius finds, in a mystic and learned poem, the unlooked-for union of lay sentiments and theological theories. When art re-10 vives in the sixteenth century other examples show us the same want of convergence, resulting, at first, in the same insufficiency. Marlowe, the early English dramatist, is a man of genius; he felt, like

 15 Shakespeare, the fury of violent passions, the somber grandeur of northern melancholy, the tragic poesy of contemporary history; but he did not know how to manage dialogue, vary circumstances, graduate
 20 situations and contrast characters; his process is only continuous murder and speechless death; his drama is powerful, but rusted out, and only known to the curious. In order that his tragic concep-
 25 tion of life may bloom out before all eyes and in full daylight, it is necessary that a greater genius after him, furnished with accumulated experience, should brood a 30 second time over the same spirits; it is necessary that Shakespeare, after having himself groped his way more than once, should imbue the crude sketches of his precursor with the varied, full and pro-35 foud life for which primitive art had proved inadequate.

On the other hand, at the end of every literary era we remark a period of decadence; art here becomes corrupt, worn out, and stiffened through routine and conven-
 40 tionalism. Here also the convergence of effects is wanting, but the fault is not due to ignorance. On the contrary, people have never been so cultivated; all methods have been perfected and refined; they have 45 even become common property; whoever desires to make use of them can avail himself of them. The language of poetry is complete; the feeblest writer knows how a phrase is constructed, how rhymes are 50 coupled together, and how to bring about a catastrophe. It is feeble sentiment which lowers art. The great conception which formed and sustained the works of the masters, droops and perishes; it is pre-55 served only through reminiscences and tradition. It is no longer pursued to the end; changes are effected in it by introducing into it another spirit; it is supposed to be perfected by incongruities. Such was the situation of the Grecian drama in the time of Euripides, and of the French drama in the time of Voltaire. The outward form remained the same as before; but the spirit that animated it was transformed, and the contrast is disagreeable. Euripides retains the accessories, the choruses, the meter

 5 and the heroic and divine personages of Æschylus and of Sophocles. But he degrades them down to the level of the sentiments and the plottings of ordinary life; he makes them discourse like lawyers and 10 sophists; he delights in exposing their misfortunes, weaknesses and lamentations. Voltaire accepts or takes upon himself the proprieties and the mechanism of Racine and of Corneille, the confidants, high-
 15 priests, princes and princesses, chivalric and graceful love-making, alexandrine stanzas—a recognized and noble style—dreams, oracles and divinities. But he adds an exciting intrigue borrowed from 20 the English stage; he attempts, moreover, to give it historic varnish; he forces into it philosophical and humanitarian intentions; he insinuates attacks against kings
 25 and priests; he is the innovator and the thinker out of season and out of place. With both of them the various elements of the work no longer concur to the same
 30 result. Antique drapery is foreign to modern sentiments; modern sentiments do violence to antique drapery. The person-
 35 ages are nonplused between two rôles; those of Voltaire are princes, enlightened by the Encyclopédie; those of Euripides are heroes, polished in the schools of the 40 rhetorician. Under this double mask their figure flickers; we no longer see it; or rather, they do not live except by fits and starts, and at rare intervals. Here the 45 reader abandons this world, which is self-destructive, and seeks works in which, according to the model of living creatures, all the parts are organs which conspire to 50 the same result.

We find them at the central point of literary ages, at the moment when art is in flower; previously it is in germ, a little later it becomes faded. At this moment the convergence of effects is complete, and an admirable harmony equalizes amongst 55 them characters, style and action. This moment is encountered in Greece in the time of Sophocles and, if I am not mistaken, still better in the time of Æschylus when tragedy, true to its origins, is yet a dithyrambic chant, when the religious sentiment of the initiated is thoroughly infused into it, when the gigantic forms of heroic or divine legend possess their full stature, when fatality, arbiter of human life, and justice, custodian of social life, spin and cut the threads of destiny, to the sounds of a poesy obscure like an oracle, terrible as a prophecy, and sublime as a vision. You may see in Racine the perfect concordance of oratorical skill, of pure and noble diction, of learned composition, of well-planned dénouement, of dramatic decorum, of princely politeness, and of the delicacies and proprieties of the court and the drawing-room. You will find a like concordance in the complex and composite work of Shakespeare if you observe that, depicting man intact and complete, he has had to employ the most poetic verses side by side with the most familiar prose, every contrast of style in order to manifest in turn the heights and the depths of human nature, the exquisite delicacy of female characters and the uncontrollable violence of men's characters, the crude coarseness of popular manners and the over-refined polish of worldly ceremonial, the gossip of current conversation and the enthusiasm of extreme emotion, the surprises of petty vulgar occurrences and the fatality of unrestrained passions. However different the methods may be they always, with great writers, converge; they converge in the fables of La Fontaine as in the funeral orations of Bossuet, in Voltaire's tales as in the stanzas of Dante, in Byron's Don Juan as in Plato's Dialogues, among the ancients as among the moderns, among the romanticists as among the classicists.

It must not be supposed that the example of the masters imposes any fixed form, style or arrangement on their successors. If one succeeds in one way, another succeeds in an opposite way; one point only is essential, which is that his whole work should move forward on the same line; it is necessary that it should direct all its forces toward a given end. Art, like nature, casts its objects in every mold; only, in order that the object be viable it is necessary, in art as in nature, that the parts should constitute a whole, and that the least part of the least element should be subordinate to the whole.

ZOLA (1840-1902)

Emile Zola was the inventor of the naturalistic formula in fiction and the author of a score of novels made according to that formula, so far as his romantic temperament and tradition permitted him to adhere to it. The novels are no longer held in such high esteem or such violent detestation as they enjoyed when the controversy about Naturalism was at its height, but Zola's essay on The Experimental Novel still remains one of the most notable literary documents of the nineteenth century. It was issued in 1880, when the Rougon-Macquart series of novels was about half way through its course. The translation is that of Belle M. Sherman, revised.

THE EXPERIMENTAL NOVEL

CHAPTERS III AND IV

The object of the experimental method in physiology and in medicine is to study phenomena in order to become their master. Claude Bernard in each page of his Introduction to the Study of Experimental Medicine comes back to this idea. He declares: 'All natural philosophy is summed up in this: To know the laws which govern phenomena. The experimental problem reduces itself to this: To foresee and direct phenomena.' Farther on he gives an example: 'It will not satisfy the experimental doctor, though it may the merely empirical one, to know that quinine cures fever; the essential thing is to know what fever is, and to understand the mechanism by which quinine cures. All this is of the greatest importance to the experimental doctor; for as soon as he knows it positively, the fact that quinine cures fever will no longer be an isolated and empirical fact, but a scientific fact. This fact will be connected then with the conditions which bind it to other phenomena, and we shall be thus led to the knowledge of the laws of the organism, and to the possibility of regulating their manifestations.' A striking example can be quoted in the case of scabies. 'Today the cause of this disease is known and determined experimentally: the whole subject has become scientific, and empiricism has disappeared. A cure is surely and without exception effected when you place yourself in the conditions known by experiment to produce this end.'

in physiology and in experimental medicine: to make one's self master of life in order to be able to direct it. Let us suppose that science advances and that the conquest of the unknown is finally completed; the scientific age which Claude Bernard saw in his dreams will then be realized. When that time comes the doctor will be the master of maladies; he will cure without fail; his influence upon the human body will conduce to the welfare and strength of the species. We shall enter upon a century in which man, grown more powerful, will make use of nature and will utilize its laws to produce upon the earth the greatest possible amount of justice and freedom. There is no nobler, higher, or grander end. Here is our rôle as intelligent beings: to penetrate to the wherefore of things, to become superior to these things, and to reduce them to a condition of subservient machinery.

Well, this dream of the physiologist and the experimental doctor is also that of the novelist who employs the experimental method in his study of man as a simple individual and as a social animal. Their object is ours; we also desire to master certain phenomena of an intellectual and personal order, to be able to direct them. We are, in a word, experimental moralists, showing by experiment in what way a passion acts in a certain social condition. The day in which we gain control of the mechanism of this passion we can treat it and reduce it, or at least make it as inoffensive as possible. And in this consists the practical utility and high morality of our naturalistic works, which experiment on man, and which dissect piece by piece this human machinery in order to set it going through the influence of the environment. When things have advanced further, when we are in possession of the different laws, it will only be necessary to work upon the individuals and the surroundings if we wish to find the best social condition. In this way we shall construct a practical sociology, and our work will be a help to political and economical sciences. I do not know, I repeat, of a more noble work, nor of a grander application. To be the master of good and evil, to regulate life, to regulate society, to solve in time all the problems of socialism, above all, to give justice a solid foundation by solving through experiment the questions of criminality—is not this being the most useful and the most moral workers in the human workshop?

This, then, is the end, this is the purpose

Let us compare, for one instant, the work of the idealistic novelists to ours; and here this word idealistic refers to writers who cast aside observation and experiment, and base their works on the supernatural and the irrational, who admit, in a word, the power of mysterious forces outside of the determinism of the phenomena. Claude Bernard shall reply to this for me: 'What distinguishes experimental reasoning from scholastic is the fecundity of the one and the sterility of the other. It is precisely the scholastic who believes he has absolute certitude, who attains to no results. This is easily understood, since by his belief in an absolute principle he puts himself outside of nature, in which everything is relative. It is, on the contrary, the experimenter, who is always in doubt, who does not think he possesses absolute certainty about anything, who succeeds in mastering the phenomena which surround him, and in increasing his power over nature.' By and by I shall return to this question of the ideal, which is in truth but the question of indeterminism. Claude Bernard says truly: 'The intellectual conquest of man consists in diminishing and driving back indeterminism, and so, gradually, by the aid of the experimental method, gaining ground for determinism.' We experimental novelists have the same task; our work is to go from the known to the unknown, to make ourselves masters of nature; while the idealistic novelists deliberately remain in the unknown, through all sorts of religious and philosophical prejudices, under the astounding pretense that the unknown is nobler and more beautiful than the known. If our work, often cruel, if our terrible pictures needed justification, I should find, indeed, with Claude Bernard this argument conclusive: 'You will never reach really fruitful and luminous generalizations on the phenomena of life until you have experimented yourself and stirred up in the hospital, the amphitheater, and the laboratory the fetid or palpitating sources of life. If it were necessary for me to give a comparison which would explain my sentiments on the science of life, I should say that it is a superb salon, flooded with light, which you can only reach by passing through a long and nauseating kitchen.'

I insist upon the word which I have employed, that of experimental novelists as applied to naturalistic novelists. One page of the Introduction struck me as being very forcible, that in which the author speaks of the vital circulus. 'The muscular and nervous organs preserve the activity of the organs which make the blood; but the blood, in its turn, nourishes the organs which produce it. There is in this a social or organic solidarity, which keeps up a perpetual movement, until the derangement or cessation of the action of a necessary and vital element has broken the equilibrium or brought about some trouble or stoppage in the play of the animal machinery. The problem of the experimentalist doctor consists in finding the cause of any organic disarrangement, that is to say, in seizing the initial phenomenon. We shall see how a dislocation of the organism, or a disarrangement the most complex in appearance, can be traced to a simple initial cause, which calls forth immediately the most complex effects.' All that is necessary here is to change the words experimental doctor to experimental novelist, and this passage is exactly applicable to our naturalistic literature. The social circulus is identical with the vital circulus; in society, as in human beings, a solidarity exists which unites the different members and the different organisms in such a way that if one organ becomes rotten many others are tainted and a very complicated disease results. Hence, in our novels, when we experiment on a dangerous wound which poisons society, we proceed in the same way as the experimentalist doctor; we try to find the simple initial cause in order to reach the complex causes of which the action is the result.

Go back once more to the example of Baron Hulot in Cousine Bette. See the final result, the dénouement of the novel: an entire family is destroyed, all sorts of secondary dramas are produced, under the action of Hulot's amorous temperament. It is there, in this temperament, that the initial cause is found. One member, Hulot, becomes rotten, and immediately all around him are tainted, the social circulus is interrupted, the health of that society is compromised. What emphasis Balzac lays on the character of Baron Hulot; with what scrupulous care he analyzes him! The experiment deals with him chiefly, because its object is to master the symptoms of this passion in order to govern it. Suppose that Hulot is cured, or at least restrained and rendered inoffensive, immediately the drama ceases to have any longer any raison d'être; the equilibrium, or more truly the health, of the social body is again established. Thus the naturalistic novelists are really experimental moralists.

And I reach thus the great reproach with which they think to crush the naturalistic novelists, by treating them as fatalists. How many times have they wished to prove to us that as soon as we did not accept free will, that as soon as man was no more to us than a living machine, acting under the influence of heredity and surroundings, we should fall into gross fatalism, we should debase humanity to the rank of a troop marching under the baton of destiny. It is necessary to define our terms: we are not fatalists, we are determinists, which is not at all the same thing. Claude Bernard explains the two terms very plainly: 'We have given the name of determinism to the nearest or determining cause of phenomena. We never act upon the essence of phenomena in nature, but only on their determinism, and by this very fact, that we act upon it, determinism differs from fatalism, upon which we could not act at all. Fatalism assumes that the appearance of any phenomenon is necessary apart from its conditions, while determinism is just the conditions essential for the appearance of any phenomenon, and such appearance is never forced. Once the search for the determinism of phenomena is placed as a fundamental principle of the experimental method, there is no longer either materialism, or spiritualism, or inanimate matter, or living matter; there remain but phenomena of which it is necessary to determine the conditions, that is to say, the circumstances which play, by their proximity to these phenomena, the rôle of nearest cause.' This is decisive. All we do is to apply this method in our novels, and we are the determinists who experimentally try to determine the condition of the phenomena, without departing in our investigations from the laws of nature. As Claude Bernard very truly says, the moment that we can act, and that we do act, on the determining cause of phenomena—by modifying their surroundings, for example—we cease to be fatalists.

Here you have, then, the moral purpose of the experimental novelist clearly defined. I have often said that we do not have to draw a conclusion from our works; and this means that our works carry their conclusion with them. An experimentalist has no need to conclude, because, in truth, experiment concludes for him. A hundred times, if necessary, he will repeat the experiment before the public; he will explain it; but he need neither become indignant nor approve of it personally; such is the truth, such is the way phenomena work; it is for society to produce or not to produce these phenomena, according as the result is useful or dangerous. You cannot imagine, as I have said elsewhere, a savant being provoked with nitrogen because it is dangerous to life; he suppresses nitrogen when it is harmful, and not otherwise. As our power is not the same as that of a savant, as we are experimentalists without being practitioners, we ought to content ourselves with searching out the determinism of social phenomena, and leaving to legislators and to men of affairs the care of controlling sooner or later these phenomena in such a way as to develop the good and reject the bad, from the point of view of their utility to man.

In our rôle as experimental moralists we show the mechanism of the useful and the useless, we disengage the determinism of the human and social phenomena so that, in their turn, the legislators may one day dominate and control these phenomena. In a word, we are working with the whole country toward that great object, the conquest of nature and the increase of man's power a hundredfold. Compare with ours the work of the idealistic writers, who rely upon the irrational and the supernatural, and whose every flight upward is followed by a deeper fall into metaphysical chaos. We are the ones who possess strength and morality.

I have said before that I chose the Introduction because medicine is still looked upon by many as an art. Claude Bernard proves that it ought to be a science, and in his book we see the birth of a science, a very instructive spectacle in itself, and which shows us that the scientific domain is 10 extending and conquering all the manifestations of human intelligence. Since medicine, which was an art, is becoming a science, why should not literature also become a science by means of the experimen- 15 tal method?

It must be remarked that all things hang together. If the territory of the experimental doctor is the body of man, as shown in the phenomena of his different organs 20 both in their normal and pathological condition, our territory is equally the body of man, as shown by his sensory and cerebral phenomena, both in their normal and pathological condition. If we are not sat- 25 isfied with the metaphysical man of the classical age we must, perforce, take into consideration the new ideas on nature and on life, with which our age has become imbued. We continue necessarily, I re- 30 peat, the work of the physiologist and the doctor, who have continued, in their turn, that of the physicist and the chemist. Hence we enter into the domain of science. I will not touch on the question of senti- 35 ment and form, but will reserve that for another time.

Let us see first what Claude Bernard says about medicine: 'Certain doctors contend that medicine can only be conjectural, 40 and they conclude that a doctor is an artist, who ought to make up for the indeterminism in particular cases by his genius and his personal tact. All sciences have necessarily commenced by being conjec- 45 tural; there are still today in every science conjectural parts. Medicine is still nearly all conjecture, I do not deny that; but I only want to say that modern science should make an effort to come out of this 50 provisional state, which does not constitute a definite scientific condition—not any more for medicine than for the other sciences. The scientific condition will be longer in taking shape and more difficult 55 to obtain in medicine by reason of the complexities of its phenomena; but the end of the medical savant is to reduce in his science, as in all the others, the indeterminate to the determinate.' The mechanism of the birth and the development of a science is here clearly defined. Men still 5 look upon the doctor as an artist, because there is in medicine an enormous place still left to conjecture. Naturally, the novelist merits still more the name of artist, as he finds himself buried still deeper in the indeterminate. If Claude Bernard confesses that the complexity of its phenomena will prevent medicine, for a long time yet, from arriving at a scientific state, what shall we say of the experi- 10 mental novel, in which the phenomena are more complicated still? But this does not prevent the novel from entering upon the scientific pathway, obedient to the general evolution of the century.

Moreover, Claude Bernard himself has indicated the evolutions of the human mind. 'The human mind,' he says, 'at various periods of its progress has passed successively through feeling, reason, and experi- 15 ment. First, feeling alone, dominating reason, created the truths of faith, that is to say, theology. Reason, or philosophy, becoming afterward the mistress, brought forth scholasticism. Finally, experiment, that is to say, the study of natural phe- 20 nomena, taught man that the truths of the exterior world were to be found formulated, in the first place, neither in reason nor in feeling. These last are, indeed, our indispensable guides, but to obtain the truth it is necessary to descend into the objective reality of things, where they lie 25 concealed under their phenomenal form. Thus it is that in the natural progress of things the experimental method appears, which sums up the whole, and which supports itself successfully on the three branches of this immovable tripod: feeling, reason, and experiment. In the search 30 after truth by means of this method, feeling has always the initiative; it engenders the idea a priori, or intuition; reason, or the reasoning power, immediately develops the idea and deduces its logical consequences. But if feeling must be guided by the light of reason, reason in its turn must be guided by experiment.'

I have given this passage entire, as it is of the greatest importance. It shows clearly the rôle that the personality of the novelist should play, apart from the style. Since feeling is the starting point of the experimental method, since reason subsequently intervenes to end in experiment and to be controlled by it, the genius of the experimentalist dominates everything, and this is what has made the experimental method, so inert in other hands, such a powerful tool in the hands of Claude Bernard. I have said the word; method is but the tool; it is the workman, it is the idea which he brings, which makes the masterpiece. I have already quoted these lines: 'It is a particular feeling, a quid proprium, which constitutes the originality, the invention, or the genius of each one.' This, then, is the part taken by genius in the experimental novel. As Claude Bernard says again: 'The idea is the seed; the method is the soil which furnishes the conditions for developing and prospering it, and bringing forth its best fruits, according to nature.' Thus everything is reduced to a question of method. If you are content to remain in the a priori idea, and enjoy your own feelings without finding any basis for it in reason or any verification in experiment, you are a poet; you venture upon hypotheses which you cannot prove; you are struggling vainly in a painful indeterminism, and in a way that is often injurious. Listen to these lines of the Introduction: 'Man is naturally a metaphysician and proud; he believes that the idealistic creations of his brain, which coincide with his feelings, represent the reality. Thus it follows that the experimental method is not innate and natural to man, for it is only after having wandered for a long time among theological and scholastic discussions that he ends by recognizing the sterility of his efforts in this path. Man then perceives that he cannot dictate laws to nature, because he does not possess in himself the knowledge and the criterion of exterior things; he realizes that, in order to arrive at the truth, he must, on the contrary, study the natural laws and submit his ideas, if not his reason, to experiment, that is to say, to the criterion of facts.' What becomes of the genius of the experimental novelist? The genius, the idea a priori, remains, only it is controlled by experiment. The experiment naturally cannot destroy his genius; on the contrary, it confirms it. To take the case of a poet, for example. To show he has genius, is it necessary that his feeling, his idea, a priori, should be false? Evidently not, for the genius of a man will be so much the greater when experiment has proved the truth of his personal idea. Our age of lyricism, our romantic disease, was alone capable of measuring a man's genius by the quantity of nonsense and folly which he put in circulation. I conclude by saying that in our scientific century experiment must prove genius.

This is the drift of our quarrel with the idealistic writers. They always start out from an irrational source of some kind, such as a revelation, a tradition, or conventional authority. As Claude Bernard declares: 'We must admit nothing occult; there are but phenomena and the conditions of phenomena.' We naturalistic novelists submit each fact to the test of observation and experiment, while the idealistic writers admit mysterious elements which escape analysis, and therefore remain in the unknown, outside of the influence of the laws governing nature. This question of the ideal, from the scientific point of view, reduces itself to a question of indeterminate or determinate. All that we do not know, all that escapes us still, that is truly the ideal, and the aim of our human efforts is each day to reduce the ideal, to conquer truth from the unknown. We are all idealists, if we mean by this that we busy ourselves with the ideal. But I dub those idealists who take refuge in the unknown for the pleasure of being there, who have a taste but for the most risky hypotheses, who disdain to submit them to the test of experiment under the pretext that the truth is in themselves and not in the things. These writers, I repeat, accomplish a vain and harmful task, while the observer and the experimentalist are the only ones who work for the strength and happiness of man, making him more and more the master of nature. There is neither nobility, nor dignity, nor beauty, nor morality in not knowing, in lying, in pretending that you are greater according as you advance in error and confusion. The only great and moral works are those of truth.

What we alone must accept is what I will call the stimulus of the ideal. Certainly our science is very limited as yet beside the enormous mass of things of which we are ignorant. This great unknown which surrounds ought to inspire us with the desire to pierce it, to explain it by means of scientific methods. And this does not refer only to scientific men; all the manifestations of human intelligence are connected together, all our efforts have their birth in the need we feel of making ourselves masters of the truth. Claude Bernard explains this very clearly when he writes: 'The sciences each possess, if not a special method, at least special processes, and moreover, they reciprocally serve as tools for one another. Mathematics serves as a tool to physics, to chemistry and to biology in very different measure; physics and chemistry serve as powerful tools to physiology and medicine. In this mutual help which the sciences are to each other, you must distinguish clearly the savant who advances each science and him who makes use of it. The physicist and the chemist are not mathematicians because they employ calculation; the physiologist is not a chemist or a physicist because he uses chemical reactions or instruments of physics, any more than the chemist and the physicist are physiologists because they study the compositions or the properties of certain liquids and certain animal or vegetable tissues.' This is the reply which Claude Bernard can be said to make for us naturalists to the critics who taunt us with making pretensions to science. We are neither chemists nor physicists nor physiologists; we are simply novelists who depend upon the sciences for support. We certainly do not pretend to have made discoveries in physiology which we do not practise; only, being obliged to make a study of man, we feel we cannot deny the efficacy of the new physiological truths. And I will add that the novelists are certainly the workers who rely at once upon the greatest number of sciences, for they treat of them all and must know them all, as the novel has become a general inquiry on nature and on man. This is why we have been led to apply to our work the experimental method, as soon as this method had become the most powerful tool of investigation. We sum up investigation, we throw ourselves anew into the conquest of the ideal, employing all forms of knowledge.

Let it be well understood that I am speaking of the 'how' of things and not of the 'why.' For an experimental savant, the ideal which he is endeavoring to reduce, the indeterminate, is always restricted to the 'how.' He leaves to philosophers the other ideal, that of the 'why,' which he despairs of determining. I think that the experimental novelists equally ought not to occupy themselves with this unknown quality, unless they wish to lose themselves in the follies of the poets and the philosophers. It is surely an object large enough to try to know the entire mechanism of nature, without troubling one's self for the time being with the origin of the mechanism. If we some day succeed in knowing it, we shall doubtless owe our knowledge to method, and it is better then to begin at the beginning with the study of phenomena, instead of hoping that a sudden revelation will reveal to us the secret of the world. We are the workmen; we will leave to the metaphysicians this great unknown of the 'why' they have struggled with so vainly for centuries, in order to confine our efforts to that other unknown of the 'how,' which is cleared away more and more every day by our investigation. The only ideal which ought to exist for us, the naturalistic novelists, should be one which we can conquer.

Besides, in the slow conquest which we can make over this unknown which surrounds us, we humbly confess the ignorant condition in which we are. We are beginning to march forward, nothing more; and our only real strength lies in our method. Claude Bernard, after acknowledging that experimental medicine is in its infancy still, does not hesitate to give great credit to empirical medicine. 'In reality,' he says, 'empiricism, that is to say, observation or accidental experiment, has been the origin of all science. In the complex sciences dealing with man empiricism necessarily governs practise much longer than in the case of the more simple sciences.' And he is willing to admit that at the crisis of a disease, when the determinism or nearest cause of the pathological phenomena has not been found, the best thing to do is to act empirically; as, moreover, happens in the growth of knowledge, since empiricism invariably precedes the scientific condition of any branch of knowledge.

Certainly if doctors must have recourse to empiricism in nearly every case, we have much greater reasons for using it, we novelists whose science is more complicated and less determined. I say once more, it is not a question of creating the science of man, as an individual and as a social being, out of whole cloth; it is only a question of emerging little by little and with all the inevitable struggles from the obscurity in which we lie concerning our own natures, happy if, amid so many errors we can determine one truth. We experiment, that is to say that, for a long time still, we must use the false to reach the true.

Such is the feeling among strong men. Claude Bernard argues fiercely against those who persist in seeing only an artist in a doctor. He knows the habitual objection of those who look upon experimental medicine 'as a theoretical conception of which nothing for the moment justifies the practical reality, because no fact demonstrates the attainment in medicine of the scientific precision of the experimental sciences.' But he does not let this worry him; he shows that 'experimental medicine is but the natural outcome of practical medical investigation directed by a scientific mind.' And here is his conclusion: 'Without doubt it will be a long time before medicine becomes truly scientific; but that does not prevent us from conceiving the possibility of such a thing, and doing all we can to help it by trying daily to introduce into medicine the method which is to lead us to it.'

All this, which I will not tire you by repeating, applies perfectly to the experimental novel. Put the word 'novel' in place of 'medicine,' and the passage remains equally true.

I will address to the young literary generation which is growing up around me these grand and strong words of Claude Bernard. I know none more manly. 'Medicine is destined to escape little by little from empiricism, and she will escape, as have all the other sciences, by the experimental method. This profound conviction sustains and controls my scientific life. I am deaf to the voices of those doctors who demand that the causes of scarlatina and measles shall be experimentally shown to them, and who think by that to draw forth an argument against the use of the experimental method in medicine.

These discouraging objections and denials generally come from systematic or lazy minds, those who prefer to rest on their systems or to sleep in darkness instead of making an effort to become enlightened.

The experimental direction which medicine is taking today is definitely defined. And it is no longer the ephemeral influence of a personal system of any kind; it is the result of the scientific evolution of medicine itself. My convictions in this respect are so strong that I endeavor to impress them clearly upon the minds of the young medical students who are following my course at the Collège de France. The students must be inspired before all else with the scientific spirit, and initiated into the ideas and the tendencies of modern science.'

Though I have frequently written the same words and given the same advice, I will repeat them here: The experimental method alone can bring the novel out of the atmosphere of lies and errors in which it is plunged. All my literary life has been controlled by this conviction. I am deaf to the voices of the critics who demand that I shall formulate the laws of heredity and the influence of surroundings in my characters; those who make these discouraging objections and denials but speak from slothfulness of mind, from an infatuation for tradition, from an attachment more or less conscious to philosophical and religious beliefs. The experimental direction which the novel is taking today is a definite one. And it is no longer the ephemeral influence of a personal system of any kind, it is the result of the scientific evolution, of the study of man himself. My convictions in this respect are so strong that I endeavor to impress them clearly upon the minds of the young writers who read my works; for I think it necessary, above all things else, to inspire them with the scientific spirit, and to initiate them into the ideas and the tendencies of modern science.

MAUPASSANT (1850-1893)

Guy de Maupassant's fame as the creator of the typical short story of our own day has rather overshadowed his achievements as a novelist, which were hardly less notable. Une Vie was the acknowledged model of Arnold Bennett's Old Wives' Tale, and both these gave suggestions for the studies of American small-town life which have been a remarkable feature of recent fiction. Unlike most of his contemporaries, Maupassant was more interested in writing novels than in theorizing about the art of fiction; but his one considerable contribution to theory, the essay printed below, is a classic. We are indebted for it to the excellent set of translations of The Collected Novels and Stories of Maupassant now being issued under the editorship of Ernest Boyd, published by Alfred A. Knopf. The translation is revised from an earlier rendering by Clara Bell.

THE NOVEL

I am not the only writer who finds himself taken to task in the same terms each time he brings out a new book. Among many laudatory phrases, I invariably meet with this observation, penned by the same critics: 'The greatest fault of this book is that it is not, strictly speaking, a novel.'

The same form might be adopted in 10 reply:

'The greatest fault of the writer who does me the honor to review me is that he is not a critic.'

For what are, in fact, the essential char- 15 asteristics of a critic?

It is necessary that, without preconceived notions, prejudices of 'school,' or partisanship for any class of artists, he should appreciate, distinguish, and explain the most antagonistic tendencies and the most dissimilar temperaments, recognizing and accepting the most varied efforts of art.

Now the critic who, after reading Manon 25 Lescaut, Paul and Virginia, Don Quixote, Les Liaisons dangereuses, Werther, Elective Affinities (Wahlverwandschaften), Clarissa Harlowe, Emile, Candide, Cinq-Mars, René, Les Trois Mousquetaires, 30 Mauprat, Le Père Goriot, La Cousine Bette, Colomba, Le Rouge et le Noir, Mademoiselle de Maupin, Notre Dame de Paris, Salammbô, Madame Bovary, Adolphe, Monsieur de Camors, L'Assom- 35 moir, Sapho, etc., still can be so bold as to write: 'This or that is, or is not, a novel,' seems to me to be gifted with a perspicacity

strangely akin to incompetence. Such a critic commonly understands by a novel a more or less improbable narrative of adventure, elaborated after the fashion of a 5 piece for the stage, in three acts, of which the first contains the exposition, the second the action, and the third the catastrophe or dénouement.

And this method of construction is perfectly admissible, but on condition that all others are accepted on equal terms.

Are there any rules for the making of a novel, which, if we neglect, the tale must be called by another name? If Don Quixote is a novel, then is Le Rouge et le Noir a novel? If Monte Christo is a novel, is L'Assommoir? Can any conclusive comparison be drawn between Goethe's Elective Affinities, The Three Musketeers, by Du- 10 mas, Flaubert's Madame Bovary, Monsieur de Camors, by Octave Feuillet, and Germinal, by Zola? Which of them all is The Novel? What are these famous rules? Where did they originate? Who laid them 15 down? And in virtue of what principle, of whose authority, and of what reasoning?

And yet, as it would appear, these critics know in some positive and indisputable way what constitutes a novel, and what distinguishes it from other tales which are not novels. What this amounts to is that without being producers themselves they are enrolled under a school, and that, like the writers of novels, they reject all work which is conceived and executed outside the pale of their æsthetics. An intelligent critic ought, on the contrary, to seek out everything which least resembles the novels already written, and urge young authors as much as possible to try fresh paths.

All writers, Victor Hugo as much as Zola, have insistently claimed the absolute and incontrovertible right to compose—that is to say, to imagine or observe—in accordance with their individual conception of originality, and that is a special manner of thinking, seeing, understanding, and judging. Now the critic who assumes that 'the novel' can be defined in conformity with the ideas he has based on the novels he prefers, and that certain immutable rules of construction can be laid down, will always find himself at war with the artistic temperament of a writer who introduces a new manner of work. A critic really worthy of the name ought to be an analyst, devoid of preferences or passions; like an expert in pictures, he should simply estimate the artistic value of the object of art submitted to him. His intelligence, open to everything, must so far supersede his individuality as to leave him free to discover and praise books which as a man he may not like, but which as a judge he must duly appreciate.

But critics, for the most part, are only readers; whence it comes that they almost always find fault with us on wrong grounds, or compliment us without reserve or measure.

The reader, who looks for no more in a book than that it should satisfy the natural tendencies of his own mind, wants the writer to respond to his predominant taste, and he invariably praises a work or a passage which appeals to his imagination, whether idealistic, gay, licentious, melancholy, dreamy, or positive, as 'striking' or 'well written.'

The public as a whole is composed of various groups, whose cry to us writers is:

'Comfort me.'
'Amuse me.'
'Touch me.'
'Make me dream.'
'Make me laugh.'
'Make me shudder.'
'Make me weep.'
'Make me think.'

And only a few chosen spirits say to the artist:

'Give me something fine in any form which may suit you best, according to your own temperament.'

The artist makes the attempt; succeeds or fails.

The critic ought to judge the result only in relation to the nature of the attempt; he has no right to concern himself about tendencies. This had been said a thousand times already: it will always need repeating.

Thus, after a succession of literary schools which have given us deformed, superhuman, poetical, pathetic, charming, or magnificent pictures of life, a realistic or naturalistic school has arisen, which asserts that it shows us the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

We must accept with equal interest these different theories of art, and we must judge the works which are their outcome solely from the point of view of artistic value, with an a priori acceptance of the general notions which gave birth to each. To dispute the author's right to produce a poetical work or a realistic work, is to endeavor to coerce his temperament, to take exception to his originality, to forbid his using the eyes and wits bestowed on him by Nature. To blame him for seeing things as beautiful or ugly, as mean or epic, as gracious or sinister, is to reproach him for not being made on this or that pattern, and for having eyes which do not see exactly as ours see.

Let him be free by all means to conceive of things as he pleases, provided he is an artist. Let us rise to poetic heights to judge an idealist, and then prove to him that his dream is commonplace, ordinary, not mad or magnificent enough. But if we judge a materialistic writer, let us show him wherein the truth of life differs from the truth in his book.

It is self-evident that schools so widely different must have adopted diametrically opposite processes in composition.

The novelist who transforms truth—immutable, uncompromising, and displeasing as it is—to extract from it an exceptional and delightful adventure, must necessarily manipulate events without an exaggerated respect for probability, molding them to his will, dressing and arranging them so as to attract, excite, or affect the reader. The scheme of his novel is no more than a series of ingenious combinations, skilfully leading to the issue. The incidents are planned and graduated up to the culminating point and effect of the conclusion, which is the crowning and fatal result, satisfying the curiosity aroused from the first, closing the interest, and ending the story so completely that we have no further wish to know what happened on the morrow to the most engaging actors in it.

The novelist who, on the other hand, proposes to give us an accurate picture of life, must carefully eschew any concatenation of events which might seem exceptional. His aim is not to tell a story to amuse us, or to appeal to our feelings, but to compel us to reflect, and to understand the occult and deeper meaning of events. By dint of seeing and meditating, he has come to regard the world, facts, men, and things in a way peculiar to himself, which is the outcome of the sum total of his studious observation. It is this personal view of the world which he strives to communicate to us by reproducing it in a book. To make the spectacle of life as moving to us as it has been to him, he must bring it before our eyes with scrupulous exactitude. Hence he must construct his work with such skill, it must be so artful under so simple a guise, that it is impossible to detect and sketch the plan, or discern the writer's purpose.

Instead of manipulating an adventure and working it out in such a way as to make it interesting to the last, he will take his actor or actors at a certain period of their lives, and lead them by natural stages to the next. In this way he will show either how men's minds are modified by the influence of their environment, or how their passions and sentiments are evolved; how they love or hate, how they struggle in every sphere of society, and how their interests clash—social interests, pecuniary interests, family interests, political interests. The skill of his plan will not consist in emotional power or charm, in an attractive opening or a stirring catastrophe, but in the happy grouping of small but constant facts from which the final purpose of the work may be discerned. If within three hundred pages he depicts ten years of a life so as to show what its individual and characteristic significance may have been in the midst of all the other human beings which surrounded it, he ought to know how to eliminate from among the numberless trivial incidents of daily life all which do not serve his end, and how to set in a special light all those which might have remained invisible to less clear-sighted observers, and which give his book significance and value as a whole.

It is intelligible that this method of construction, so unlike the old manner which was patent to all, must often mislead the critics, and that they will not all detect the subtle and secret wires—almost invisibly fine—which certain modern artists use instead of the one string formerly known as the 'plot.'

In a word, while the novelist of yesterday preferred to relate the crises of life, the acute phases of the mind and heart, the novelist of today writes the history of the heart, soul, and intellect in their normal condition. To achieve the effect he aims at—that is to say, the sense of simple reality—and to point the artistic lesson he endeavors to draw from it—that is to say, a revelation of what his contemporary man is before his very eyes—he must bring forward no facts that are not irrefragable and invariable.

But even when we place ourselves at the same point of view as these realistic artists, we may discuss and dispute their theory, which seems to be comprehensively stated in these words: 'The whole truth and nothing but the truth.' Since the end they have in view is to bring out the philosophy of certain constant and current facts, they must often correct events in favor of probability and to the detriment of truth; but le vrai peut quelquefois n'être pas le vraisemblable. [Truth may sometimes not seem probable.]

The realist, if he is an artist, will endeavor not to show us a commonplace photograph of life, but to give us a presentment of it which shall be more complete, more striking, more cogent than reality itself. To tell everything is out of the question; it would require at least a volume for each day to enumerate the endless, insignificant incidents which crowd our existence. A choice must be made—and this is the first blow to the theory of 'the whole truth.'

Life, moreover, is composed of the most dissimilar things, the most unforeseen, the most contradictory, the most incongruous: it is merciless, without sequence or connection, full of inexplicable, illogical, and contradictory catastrophes, such as can only be classed as miscellaneous facts. This is why the artist, having chosen his subject, can select only such characteristic details as are of use to it, from this life overladen with chances and trifles, and reject everything else, everything by the way.

To give an instance from among a thousand: The number of persons who, every day, meet with an accidental death, all over the world, is very considerable. But how can we bring a tile on to the head of an important character, or fling him under the wheels of a vehicle in the middle of a story, under the pretext that an accident must have its due?

Again, in life there is no difference of foreground and distance, and events are sometimes hurried on, sometimes left to linger indefinitely. Art, on the contrary, consists in the employment of foresight and elaboration in arranging skilful and ingenious transitions, in setting essential events in a strong light, simply by the craft of composition, and giving all else the degree of relief, in proportion to their importance, requisite to produce a convincing sense of the special truth to be conveyed.

'Truth' in such work consists in producing a complete illusion by following the common logic of facts and not by transcribing them pell-mell, as they succeed each other.

Whence I conclude that the higher order of Realists should rather call themselves Illusionists.

How childish it is, indeed, to believe in this reality, since to each of us the truth is in his own mind, his own organs! Our own eyes and ears, taste and smell, create as many different truths as there are human beings on earth. And our brains, duly and differently informed by these organs, apprehend, analyse, and decide as differently as if each of us were a being of an alien race. Each of us, then, has simply his own illusion of the world—poetical, sentimental, cheerful, melancholy, foul, or gloomy, according to his nature. And the writer has no other mission than faithfully to reproduce this illusion, with all the elaborations of art which he may have learned and have at his command. The illusion of beauty—which is merely a conventional term invented by man! The illusion of ugliness—which is a matter of varying opinion! The illusion of truth—never immutable! The illusion of depravity—which fascinates so many minds! All the great artists are those who can make other men see their own particular illusion.

Then we must not be wroth with any theory, since each is simply the outcome.

in generalizations, of a special temperament analyzing itself.

Two of these theories have more particularly been the subject of discussion, and set up in opposition to each other instead of being admitted on an equal footing; that of the purely analytical novel, and that of the objective novel.

The partisans of analysis require the writer to devote himself to indicating the smallest evolutions of a soul, and all the most secret motives of our every action, giving but a quite secondary importance to the act and fact in itself. It is but the goal, a simple milestone, the excuse for the book. According to them, these works, at once exact and visionary, in which imagination merges into observation, are to be written after the fashion in which a philosopher composes a treatise on psychology, seeking out causes in their remotest origin, telling the why and wherefore of every impulse, and detecting every reaction of the soul's movements under the promptings of interests, passion, or instinct.

The partisans of objectivity—odious word—aiming, on the contrary, at giving us an exact presentment of all that happens in life, carefully avoid all complicated explanations, all disquisitions on motive, and confine themselves to letting persons and events pass before our eyes. In their opinion, psychology should be concealed in the book, as it is in reality, under the facts of existence.

The novel as conceived of on these lines gains in interest; there is more movement in the narrative, more color, more of the stir of life.

Hence, instead of giving long explanations of the state of mind of an actor in the tale, the objective writer tries to discover the action or gesture which that state of mind must inevitably lead to in that personage, under certain given circumstances. And he makes him so demean himself from one end of the volume to the other that all his actions, all his movements, shall be the expression of his inmost nature, of all his thoughts, and all his impulses or hesitations. Thus they conceal psychology instead of flaunting it; they use it as the skeleton of the work, just as the invisible bony framework is the skeleton of the human body. The artist who paints our portrait does not display our bones.

To me it seems that the novel executed on this principle gains also in sincerity. It is, in the first place, more probable, for the persons we see moving about us do not divulge to us the motives from which they act.

We must also take into account the fact that even if by close observation of men and women we can so exactly ascertain their characters as to predict their behavior under almost any circumstances, if we can say decisively: 'Such a man, of such a temperament, in such a case, will do this or that,' yet it does not follow that we could lay a finger, one by one, on all the secret evolutions of his mind—which is not our own; all the mysterious pleadings of his instincts—which are not the same as ours; all the mingled promptings of his nature—in which the organs, nerves, blood, and flesh are different from ours.

However great the genius of the gentle, delicate man, guileless of passions and devoted to science and work, he never can so completely transfuse himself into the body of a dashing, sensual, and violent man, of exuberant vitality, torn by every desire or even by every vice, as to understand and delineate the inmost impulses and sensations of a being so unlike himself, even though he may very adequately foresee and relate all the actions of his life.

In short, the man who writes pure psychology can do no more than put himself in the place of all his puppets in the various situations in which he places them. It is impossible that he should change his organs, which are the sole intermediary between external life and ourselves, which constrain us by their perceptions, circumscribe our sensibilities, and create in each of us a soul essentially dissimilar to all those about us. Our view and knowledge of the world, and our ideas of life, are acquired by the aid of our senses, and we cannot help transferring them, in some degree, to all the personages whose secret and unknown nature we propose to reveal. Thus, it is always ourselves that we disclose in the body of a king or an assassin, a robber or an honest man, a courtesan, a nun, a young girl, or a coarse market-woman; for we are compelled to put the problem in this personal form: 'If I were a king, a murderer, a prostitute, a nun, or a market-woman, what should I do, what should I think, how should I act?' We can vary our characters only by altering the age, the sex, the social position, and all the circumstances of life, of that ego which nature has in fact enclosed in an insurmountable barrier of organs of sense. Skill consists in not betraying this ego to the reader, under the various masks which we employ to cover it.

Still, though on the point of absolute exactitude pure psychological analysis is impregnable, it can nevertheless produce works of art as fine as any other method of work.

Here, for instance, we have the Symbolists. And why not? Their artistic dream is a worthy one; and they have this especially interesting feature: that they know and proclaim the extreme difficulty of art.

And, indeed, a man must be very daring or foolish to write at all nowadays. Amid so many and such various masters of the craft, of such multifarious genius—what remains to be done that has not been done, or what to say that has not been said? Which of us all can boast of having written a page, a phrase, which is not to be found—or something very like it—in some other book? When we read, we who are so soaked in French literature, that our whole body seems as it were, a mere compound of words, do we ever light on a line, a thought, which is not familiar to us, or of which we have not had at least some vague forecast?

The man who only tries to amuse his public by familiar methods, writes confidently, in his candid mediocrity, works intended only for the ignorant and idle crowd. But those who are conscious of the weight of centuries of past literature, whom nothing satisfies, whom everything disgusts because they dream of something better, to whom the bloom is off everything, and who always are impressed with the uselessness, the commonness of their own achievements—these come to regard literary art as a thing unattainable and mysterious, scarcely to be detected save in a few pages by the greatest masters.

A score of verses, a score of phrases suddenly discovered thrill us to the heart like a startling revelation; but the lines which follow are just like all other verse, the further flow of prose is like all other prose.

Men of genius, no doubt, escape this anguish and torment because they bear within themselves an irresistible creative power. They do not sit in judgment on themselves. The rest of us, who are no more than persevering and conscious workers, can only contend against invincible discouragement by unremitting effort.

Two men, by their simple and lucid teaching, give me the strength to try again and again: Louis Bouilhet and Gustave Flaubert.

If I here speak of myself in connection with them, it is because their counsels, as summed up in a few lines, may prove useful to some young writers who may be less self-confident than most are when they make their debut in print. Bouilhet, whom I first came to know somewhat intimately about two years before I gained the friendship of Flaubert, by dint of telling me that a hundred lines—or less—if they are without a flaw and contain the very essence of the talent and originality of even a second-rate man, are enough to establish an artist's reputation, made me understand that persistent toil and a thorough knowledge of the craft might, in some happy hour of lucidity, power, and enthusiasm, by the fortunate occurrence of a subject in perfect concord with the tendency of our mind, lead to the production of a single work, short but as perfect as we can make it. Then I learned to see that the best-known writers have hardly ever left us more than one such volume; and that needful above all else is the good fortune which leads us to hit upon and discern, amid the multifarious matter which offers itself for selection, the subject which will absorb all our faculties, all that is of worth in us, all our artistic power.

At a later date, Flaubert, whom I had occasionally met, took a fancy to me. I ventured to show him a few attempts. He read them kindly and replied: 'I cannot tell whether you will have any talent. What you have brought me proves a certain intelligence; but never forget this, young man: talent—as Buffon says—is nothing but long patience. Go and work.'

I worked; and I often went to see him, feeling that he liked me, for he had taken to calling me, in jest, his disciple. For seven years I wrote verses, I wrote tales, I even wrote a villainous play. Nothing of all this remains. The master read it all; then, the next Sunday while we lunched together, he would give me his criticisms, driving into me by degrees two or three principles which sum up the drift of his long and patient exhortations: 'If you have any originality,' said he, 'you must, above all things, bring it out; if you have not, you must acquire it.'

Talent is long patience.

Everything you want to express must be considered so long, and so attentively, as to enable you to find some aspect of it which no one has yet seen and expressed. There is an unexplored side to everything, because we are wont never to use our eyes but with the memory of what others before us have thought of the things we see. The smallest thing has something unknown in it; we must find it. To describe a blazing fire, a tree in a plain, we must stand face to face with that fire or that tree, till to us they are wholly unlike any other fire or tree.

Thus we may become original.

Then, having established the truth that there are not in the whole world two grains of sand, two flies, two hands, or two noses absolutely alike, he would make me describe in a few sentences some person or object, in such a way as to define it exactly, and distinguish it from every other of the same race or species.

'When you pass a grocer sitting in his doorway,' he would say, 'a concierge smoking his pipe, or a cab-stand, show me that grocer and that concierge, their attitude and their whole physical aspect, including, as indicated by the skill of the portrait, their whole moral nature, in such a way that I could never mistake them for any other grocer or concierge; and by a single word give me to understand wherein one cab-horse differs from fifty others before or behind it.'

I have explained his notions of style at greater length in another place; they bear a marked relation to the theory of observation I have just laid down. Whatever the thing we wish to say, there is but one word to express it, but one verb to give it movement, but one adjective to qualify it. We must seek till we find this noun, this verb, and this adjective, and never be content with getting very near it, never allow ourselves to play tricks, even happy ones, or have recourse to sleights of language to avoid a difficulty. The subtlest things may be rendered and suggested by applying the hint conveyed in Boileau's line: 'D'un mot mis en sa place enseigne le pouvoir.' [He taught the power of a word put in the right place.]

There is no need for an eccentric vocabulary to formulate every shade of thought —the complicated, multifarious, and outlandish words which are put upon us nowadays in the name of artistic writing; but every modification of the value of a word by the place it fills must be distinguished with extreme clearness. Give us fewer nouns, verbs, and adjectives, with almost inscrutable shades of meaning, and let us have a greater variety of phrases, more variously constructed, ingeniously divided, 10 full of sonority and learned rhythm. Let us strive to be admirable in style rather than curious in collecting rare words.

It is in fact more difficult to bend a sentence to one's will and make it express 15 everything—even what it does not say—to fill it full of implications of covert and inexplicit suggestions, than to invest new expressions, or seek out in old and forgotten books all those which have fallen 20 into disuse and lost their meaning, so that to us they are as a dead language.

The French tongue, to be sure, is a pure stream, which affected writers never have 5 and never can trouble. Each age has flung into the limpid waters its pretentious archaisms and euphuisms, but nothing has remained on the surface to perpetuate these futile attempts and impotent efforts. It is the nature of the language to be clear, logical, and vigorous. It does not lend itself to weakness, obscurity, or corruption.

Those who write descriptions without duly heeding abstract terms, those who 5 make rain and hail fall on the cleanliness of the window-panes, may throw stones at the simplicity of their brothers of the pen. The stones may indeed hit their brothers, who have a body, but will never hurt simplicity—which has none.

BRUNETIÈRE (1849-1906)

Ferdinand Brunetière occupied a commanding position in French criticism during the period following the death of Ste. Beuve. Professor of French Literature in the Ecole Normale Supérieure, a member of the French Academy, and, for ten years before his death, editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes, he had all the solid learning which these distinctions imply, and his natural inclination to assume an authoritative position was backed by knowledge and sincerity. His sympathies were with the classical and scientific point of view, and he made weighty contributions to the history of French literature treated on the basis of the evolutionary theory then in its first vogue. But he is now chiefly remembered for his clash with the impressionistic school of criticism, of which the leading representative was Anatole France. Brunetière brought to his side of the debate, which was one of the famous pitched battles of literary history, profound erudition and a vigorous mind; but he lacked the grace and charm and skill of fence displayed by his more gifted adversary. Both Brunetière's attack and Anatole France's reply are printed below, and the student may derive amusement as well as instruction from the varied powers brought to bear by two redoubtable antagonists on a literary issue of first-class importance. Brunetière, it will be remarked, takes more space to say what he has to say, and says it more elaborately as well as more solemnly; Anatole France appears frivolous by contrast, but he is no less serious, in his own wicked way, in searching for the weak points in his opponent's armor.

IMPRESSIONIST CRITICISM

When a man himself follows the profession or business of criticism, it is always easy—and sometimes tempting—to oppose his opinion to that of his colleagues, to praise the novel they condemn, and find fault with the writer they admire; but it is not so easy to assume the airs of judging them themselves and to affect in this way a sort of superiority over them. This smacks, as the phrase goes, of the pedantry of the schools. But what is more difficult still, and may reasonably appear rather presumptuous, is to reproach them with understanding their science or their art badly because they understand it differently from us, to dare to tell them so, and to claim, in short, that their way of thinking should yield to and coincide with ours. Yet we must do so: in the first place, that we may not be imposed upon—the most unpardonable thing in the world in this age of Americanism; and further, because in this kind of quarrel, as we shall see immediately, questions of persons include questions of principles. Born before us and destined to survive us, criticism would have been dead long ago, had it not an object, a rôle, and a function, exterior and superior to the idea formed of it by M. Anatole France, M. Jules Lemaitre, M. Paul Desjardins, and some others whom I could mention—and myself.

Need I say that I have the greatest respect for M. Anatole France, for his kindly, ironical, and dainty manner, where such subtle thoughts are so prettily veiled, with such elegance, indifference, and sometimes even negligence? I have hardly less respect for M. Jules Lemaitre; and, with all Paris, I enjoy, as I well may, his learned pranks, where so much simplicity, and ingenuousness even, is always allied to so much wit, and sometimes so much sense. His masterpiece is perhaps the funeral oration on Victorine Demay of the 'Concert d'Horloge' or the 'Ambassadeurs' and the account he has left us of the interview of the popular singer with the learned author of the General and Comparative History of Semitic Languages. Nobody, moreover, writes better than he does, in a style more lively, more supple, and more full of surprises. He plays with words, he does what he likes with them, he juggles with them. And I esteem also M. Paul Desjardins for his anxious care, his good will, his studied endeavor to be agreeable to those he likes, for the touching sadness with which he tells them the most unpleasant things. But, with all their talent, I am afraid they may manage to lead criticism into a grievous path, and if I see great difficulties in it, why should I not point them out? I like all three very much, but I still prefer criticism; and I do not think they will be annoyed at it, and the reader will commend me for it.

M. Paul Desjardins said this just the other day, in reference to M. Taine; and M. Jules Lemaitre has said this twenty times if he has said it once; but it is perhaps M. Anatole France, in an article on M. Jules Lemaitre, who has most energetically claimed for criticism the right of being henceforth only personal, impressionist, and, as is said, subjective. 'Objective criticism does not exist any more than objective art, and all those who are pleased to think they put something else than themselves into their work are dupes of the most fallacious philosophy. The truth is we can never come out of ourselves. It is one of our greatest misfortunes. What would we not give to see, for one minute, the skies and the earth with the facet-eye of a fly, or to understand nature with the rude and simple brain of an orang-outang? But this is quite forbidden us. We are shut up in our personality as in a perpetual prison. The best thing we can do, it seems to me, is to recognize this sorry condition with a good grace and to admit that we speak of ourselves every time we have not the strength to hold our tongue.' It would really be impossible to insinuate more cleverly anything more 'fallacious,' to confuse with greater adroitness ideas which are more distinct, and, in short, to affirm with greater assurance that there is nothing assured.

That this manner of understanding criticism has, moreover, great advantages, I do not deny. It allows, or rather it authorizes, every compliance, every contradiction. The 'relativity' of changing impressions explains everything and answers everything. In giving us its opinions not as true, but as 'its own,' impressionist criticism provides itself with a means of changing them, which we know it does not abstain from using. It dispenses accordingly with studying the books it talks about or the subjects those books treat, and this is sometimes a considerable gain. 'Need I endeavor to tell you the impression I felt on first reading the second volume of the History of the People of Israel?' asked M. Anatole France a short time ago. 'Need I show you the state of my mind when I dreamt between its pages?' And, without awaiting our reply—for, after all, we others, officers of the 199th infantry, or merchants of the Rue du Sentier, I suppose, and good people of Carpentras or Landernau, why should we be so curious of M. France's state of mind?—M. France tells us that while he was a child he had among his toys 'a Noah's Ark, painted red, with all the animals in pairs, and Noah and his children most beautifully shaped.' If the process is ingenious, it is apparently eminently convenient. Thanks to his Noah's Ark, M. Anatole France found it quite unnecessary to read the History of the People of Israel; he dreamt between the pages of the book; and, as he is M. France, he spoke of it none the less pleasantly.

A little less pleasantly, if we must be sincere, but in the same manner did M. Paul Desjardins speak the other day about the fifth volume of the Origins of Contemporary France. He said that M. Taine saw Bonaparte and the Revolution with the eyes of M. Taine, and he added, or at least gave us to understand, that his—Desjardins'—eyes were not those of M. Taine, and he described another Revolution and another Bonaparte. But which Bonaparte and which Revolution? He took care not to tell us; and, after all, why did he not, since every Revolution and every Bonaparte is equally legitimate, I mean to say equally true? Would it not be amusing if M. Paul Desjardins has an opinion on Bonaparte or the Revolution which the labors of M. Taine aimed at obliging him to change? But if he has no opinion, shall we require that he should find one before speaking of M. Taine or his book? This is yet another advantage in impressionist criticism: it dispenses with conclusions. Quot capita, tot sensus, so said the rudiments: since we can never be freed from ourselves, what is the good of trying? What more useless and more fatiguing? What more fatiguing, since it is undoubtedly no small matter to form a reasoned opinion on the Revolution: what more useless, since M. Paul Desjardins, M. Jules Lemaitre, and M. Anatole France think so, and since we disguise ourselves to no purpose, for we can never express anything but our 'personal preferences.'

But I should have liked them not to be content with thinking it and saying it, I should have liked them to endeavor to prove it: for this they have forgotten to do. Metaphors are not reasons. Assuredly if we had the 'facet-eye of a fly' or 'the rude and simple brain of an orang-outang,' our vision of the world would be different, and it would be above all less complex and less contradictory; it does not seem to be proved that it would be so different as it appears to be laid down in theory, and we know, for example, that in many animals the sensations of form and color are similar enough to ours. But what is more certain still is that we are neither flies nor orang-outangs; we are men, and we are so chiefly from the power we have of going out of ourselves to seek and find and recognize ourselves in others. Impressionist or subjective, when criticism borrows arguments from metaphysics, without even taking the trouble to consider their bearing, it forgets that the value of these arguments is purely metaphysical. I mean to say that we may well discuss whether color is a quality of colored objects or a mere sensation of the eyes; but, sensation of the eyes or quality of the objects, it is all one to us, and of no importance; and, in one case as in the other, things happen in the same way. Red is always red, and green is always green. Similarly, if what is square is not round, what is round is not square. Although we can speak of the relativity of our impressions or the subjectivity of our sensations, the capacity of feeling and experiencing them, which is alike in every one of us if not always the same, and of the same nature if not the same degree, is one of the characteristics of the species, not to say a part of the definition of man. So let us leave the flies and the orang-outangs: we have nothing to do with them; and they only cause confusion. What is fallacious, let us say so in our turn, is to misuse words so as to throw us off the scent as to the real meaning of things. The deception, if there must be deception, is to believe and teach that we cannot come out of ourselves, when, on the contrary, life is taken up with nothing else. And the reason will doubtless appear strong enough if we take into account that otherwise there would be neither society, language, literature, nor art.

We are asked, it is true, where then arise the difficulties in agreement, and how does it come about that in matters of art and literature opinions are so varied? For they seem at least to be so: and, to say nothing of our contemporaries—whom we agree we do not see from a sufficient distance or height,—how many judgments, how many diverse judgments, have been given, for the last three or four hundred years, on a Corneille or a Shakespeare, a Cervantes or a Rabelais, a Raphael or a Michael Angelo! Just as there is no extravagant or absurd opinion that some philosopher or other has not held, so there is none that is scandalous, or hostile to genius, that cannot find authority in the name of some critic. Poets and novelists, moreover, have not been treated any better by themselves: Ronsard abused Rabelais, and Corneille, we know, never understood Racine: he even openly declared his preference for Boursault. What does this mean but that we are shut up in our personality as in a 'perpetual prison,' and whatever effort we make to escape from it wearies us and confines us the more closely?

It is this I take the liberty of denying; and our impressionist critics here think themselves too original. It is not true that opinions are so diverse, nor differences so deep. 'Among true mandarins of letters'—the phrase is M. Jules Lemaitre's—"it is agreed that such writers, whatever may be their faults or their manias, exist, as is said, and are worth the trouble of being closely examined." Here is the first point: Racine exists, Voltaire exists, I mean the author of Zaire, Alzire, or Tancrède; Campistron does not exist, nor the Abbé Leblanc, nor M. de Jouy. And here is a second: there are degrees between Campistron and Voltaire, there are other degrees between Zaire and Bajazet, there are degrees everywhere, and there is nobody who will not admit it. We may not agree as to the degrees. We may scoff at those who 'fix the rank.' We cannot refuse to put Victor Hugo above M. Vacquerie, Lamar-tine above Madame Desbordes-Valmore, Balzac above Charles de Bernard; and neither M. France, nor M. Lemaitre, nor M. Desjardins has ever tried it, or ever will try it. And to these two points I add a third: 'faults' or 'manias,' they are just what some will like in Balzac or Hugo, what others will like less, what others still will censure, but which all will recognize. And, even when it is a contemporary writer, look at what M. France in the Temps, M. Lemaître in the Revue bleue, and M. Desjardins in the Journal des Débats have said of the author of the Rêve and the Bête humaine; the whole difference lies in what they have unduly infused of their personality, of the expression of their personal sympathies, in what they considered they had to say of M. Zola: there is only a change of words.

But I am wrong in saying 'unduly.' We are not capable of divesting ourselves so completely of our own personality, that nothing, absolutely nothing, of ourselves mingles with our judgments. We are too fond of ourselves for that! In literature, as in everything, we go to those who flatter us, or who we believe will help us. I wish to make a larger allowance still for our impressionists. Literary opinion is the complex product of three unequal terms. In a literary work, poem, drama, or novel, we find in the first place what we bring to it of ourselves, what we put into it of our inmost personality; and, in this sense, as has been said, we make its beauty. Some take greater pleasure in Candide, and others prefer Paul et Virginie. We find, next, what their admirers or critics have put into it, the good qualities or faults which time, alone, in its imperceptible course, has added, and which were not for contemporaries. Contemporaries did not see in the École des Femmes or Tartufe what we see, and with good reason, for Molière did not think of it. No more did they see in Cléopâtre or the Grand Cyrus the tediousness, the dulness, the insipidity which we do, for they did not think so quickly, they read more slowly, and they were less refined. But, lastly, must we not find in Cléopâtre and Tartufe and Candide something also that La Calprenède and Molière and Voltaire did put into them? No matter what we be who can arouse in ourselves fixed impressions, must there not be in Candide and Tartufe some qualities to fix them or arouse them? And is it not true that these qualities, whatever they be of themselves, are not to be found in a novel of the younger Crébillon or in a comedy of Poisson or Montfleury?

This is all that is necessary to establish objective criticism. When we have got a clear idea of the true nature of our impressions—which is not always easy, and which is always a slow matter; when we have made allowance, which is much more difficult still, for prejudice, for education, for the age, for example or authority in our impressions, there remains a work, a man, and a date. This is enough. We can try to fix this date exactly, and determine consequently in what time, at what moment of literary history, in what social surroundings, amid what circumstances the man lived and the work appeared. We can try to say what the man was, what kind of a man, sad or gay, humble or of high rank, worthy of hate or admiration. For generations inherit more than they believe from everything that has preceded them: Nisard loved to say that the most living thing in the present, at all times, is the past. And we can then try, after such an explanation, to classify and judge this work. This is the whole object of criticism. What do we see there that is not objective, and that is not or cannot be independent of personal tastes, of the private sympathies of him who tries to explain, classify, and judge? And if this is not to be seen, or if it cannot be mentioned, what remains of the insinuating paradoxes of M. Anatole France, the sparkling paradoxes of M. Jules Lemaître, and the peevish paradoxes of M. Paul Desjardins?

Shall I here insist on the obligation of judging? Shall I remind them that it is as much as implied in the very etymology of the word criticism? Or shall I show that few judges at this very day are more resolute judges than our impressionists? The Contemporains of M. Jules Lemaître is nothing but a collection of judgments—on men, it is true, rather than on works—and its 'impressionism,' after all, consists almost only in the malice or whimsicality of the motives which influence them. Who then has been severer and harder—on M. George Ohnet, for example, or M. Emile Zola—than the sceptical, indulgent, and cheerful M. France? 'Extravagance,' 'platitude,' 'tediousness,' 'wretched rhapsodies,' 'abominable insipidities,' M. France lost that day even his Attic—or rather Alexandrian—style, on which he usually piques himself. And could I not cite judgments of M. Desjardins, which, though less brilliant, are no less decisive? Heaven protect me from reproaching them for these judgments! I do not dislike a rhapsody being called by its proper name, or a thought being freely uttered. In literature, as elsewhere, it would only be for the better if this were done oftener, and more boldly. But what is this affectation of pretending not to judge when one really does judge, of giving us as 'impressions' judgments which our conscience tells us we regard as such, and, when one thing is done, of trying to persuade us it is another?

In truth I well know that if they undergo, whether they will or not, the obligation of judging, for that is in the nature of things, our impressionists flatter themselves, on the other hand, on escaping from the necessity of classifying. To classify they say is to fix the rank, to distribute prizes, to put Balzac above Flaubert, or a tragedy of Racine above a vaudeville of Labiche; and this work is in their eyes just the very acme of absurdity. Don't speak to them only of comparing men and works! Is every pleasure not as good as another? I mean those which are called æsthetic. What is the use of comparing the Fleurs du mal with the Méditations? The Cid is a fine thing; Andromaque is another; is that any reason why Ruy Blas should not be a third? If I prefer Valentine to the Cousine Bette, what ground and what right has anyone to try to make me change or reverse the order of my preferences? Is each one of us not a little universe for himself alone? Is variety not a necessary condition of pleasure? For of what do we not weary? What then more barbarous or more inhuman, say they, than thus to try to place on every head, in the name of theoretic principle and abstract ideal, the heavy level of the same definitions, the same rules, or the same laws? So let the world go its own way, and let each one of us appear just as he is. If he discovers in himself some curious failing, or the germ of some hidden flaw, let him, instead of destroying it, cultivate it; and let him make with it, if he can, a means of literary existence, a reputation, and an income.

In opposition to these theories, I cannot discuss the principles of the classification of literary forms: it would take up too much space and time. But I shall be content to reply to our impressionists that they have perhaps not sufficiently considered either the nature of classification or of comparison. Would it not really be very extraordinary that, in an age like ours, where the comparative method has renewed almost everything, criticism alone should refuse its assistance, so as not to expose itself to the witticisms of certain philologers or certain anatomists who live in their seminaries or their laboratories only to compare old texts or old bones? Why, this would be a useful, interesting, and fruitful work, to compare the calcaneum or the navicular of the Lemuridæ with that of the Simiadæ, or the meter and the assonances of the Chanson de Roland with the assonances of the Chanson d'Aiol; but it would be a waste of time to compare the tragedy of Racine with the drama of Shakespeare, or the novel of Fielding with that of Balzac. And as to the 'relativity' of things, what comes of that now? A man is neither big, nor small, nor thin, nor stout, nor beautiful, nor ugly; he is only more ugly or more beautiful, more stout or more thin, more small or more big than another, than the others, than the average of his race or species. So also a work of art is what it is, succeeds in being so, and is so fully and decidedly, only in so far as it is compared with another. Zaire would be a beautiful tragedy if there were no Bajazet, and we would doubtless still read the Doyen de Killerine or Cleveland with avidity, if we did not know the novels of George Sand and Balzac. All the progress that criticism can flatter itself on having accomplished during this century is due to this kind of comparison; and it is possible that this mania of comparing, if it is persisted in, may be a sign of slowness or narrowness of spirit: but in the meantime I recommend it none the less to all those who believe they should place truth above themselves and the interests of their own particular talent.

As to the power and, if I may say so, the virtue of classification, so many philosophers, so many scholars have spoken of it so well, that I hardly know whom I should here call to my aid, a Haeckel or an Agassiz, a Stuart Mill or an Auguste Comte. I could add also the Darwins and Huxleys. The fine Essay on Classification by Agassiz is a book which our impressionists cannot be too strongly advised to read. But if they prefer to have a Frenchman cited, Auguste Comte has shown quite as well, in his Positivist Philosophy, that 'in whatever kind of intellectual work, be it scientific, literary, artistic, as well as in natural history, a methodical classification is not only the indispensable summary of the actual system of our knowledge, but also the chief logical instrument of its subsequent perfection.' And how, in the hierarchy of the forms, could we place tragedy, for example, above melodrama, Polyculte above the Tour de Nesle, or, in the novel, Père Goriot above the Exploits de Rocambole, without giving our reasons? How could we give these without penetrating further into the knowledge of the history, the evolution, and the essence of the form? And the further we penetrated, how could these very reasons, whether 'subjective' or personal, fail to become more and more general, and properly 'objective'? After the obligation of judging, the necessity of classifying thus seems strictly inherent in the very notion of criticism.

It is not then classifying or comparing that is old and superannuated, but, on the contrary, abstaining from doing so; and what is arbitrary is not to 'distribute prizes' but to wish to be the sole judge, the infallible judge, and the judge beyond appeal of the prizes we award. So act the 'people of society' whose 'taste' takes the place of competence and study, and whom we see deciding on the play or the novel of the day by the prettiness of the things they find to say about it. But Boileau, Boileau himself was even then looking to something more. He knew well that if his taste was good, it was not because it was his own, but on the contrary because it was exterior and superior to his own, and that the object of criticism is to teach men to judge often against their own taste. Do not morality and education also consist, like criticism, in substituting in ourselves other motives of judgment and action than those suggested to us by temperament, instinct, and nature? There is one other observation which I submit to our impressionists. If each of us had the pretension to concede or yield nothing to others, life would be unbearable; and, similarly, if a work of art were merely the expression of the individuality of the artist, not only criticism but art itself would perish.

Yet judging and classifying are only a beginning, and we must then explain. As to this obligation of criticism, or this function, if you will, which was for Sainte-Beuve the whole of criticism, and which must remain one of its essential parts, shall I say that impressionist criticism does not submit to it any more than to the others? In reality, impressionist criticism does not explain, it states; and it describes, or it comments, but it does not interpret. I rather fear I know at least one of its motives. It is that if we wished to distinguish what each book and author owe to all those who have preceded them and 'caused' them, so to speak, we should be startled at the smallness of the originality of mankind. We all write, say, a poem, a play, a novel, or an article: and how much do we put into it of ourselves, which is of ourselves and from ourselves, and only of and from ourselves? The explanation, then, is first to be found, or at least to be sought for, everywhere but in ourselves; and too happy are those whose originality has not disappeared in this very search! There is another proof, if that is needed, of the existence of objective criticism. The originality of a writer—of M. Zola, for example, or M. Henri Becque—is not defined by reference to himself, which would imply a contradiction; it is not defined by reference to me, who am doubtless less original than they are; it is defined by reference to the dramatists or novelists who have preceded them, who have their place in history, and it is defined by reference to the laws they have themselves made of their literary form, which likewise has its place in history.

The foundation of objective criticism is therefore really the same as that of history. Just as there can be no possible doubt or allowable hesitation about the military genius of Napoleon or the political genius of Richelieu, so too there can be none about the unique originality of the comedy of Molière or the tragedy of Racine: and whoever will treat as a 'scamp' the author of Andromaque will act like the simple Lanfrey when he gave lessons on retrospective tactics to the victor of Austerlitz: it is himself he will have judged. But whoever says that one is at liberty to prefer Regnard's comedy to Molière's, the Distract to the École des Femmes, and the Folies amoureuses to Tartufe, does something much worse still, for he might as well say that there is no reason for placing a living being below or above another in the order of species; and, along with the foundations of objective criticism, he destroys with the same blow those of natural history. A literary form is, indeed, superior to another, and, in the same form,—drama, ode or novel,—a work is nearer or farther away from the perfection of its form, only from reasons analogous to those which, in the hierarchy of organisms, raise vertebrates above molluscs, for example, and, among the vertebrates, the dog and cat above the ornithorhynchus. Such is the true way of understanding the 'relativity of knowledge'; such is the real way; such is the only way that is not sophistry or pure word-splitting. Had we the 'facet-eye of a fly' or the 'rude and simple brain of an orang-outang,' things might change for us in appearance and meaning; but the relations which would still continue to unite them, and the system formed by these relations, in whatever way, yet always connected, would not suffer change. And hence, since laws are nothing else than the expression of these relations, the result follows that to deny the possibility of objective criticism is to deny the possibility of any science whatever. If there is no objective criticism, no more is there objective natural history, chemistry or physics. This does not mean that criticism is a science, but that they are connected; and, as it has, like science, a precise object, it can borrow from science methods, processes, and directions.

How then can they have failed to recognize this? There are many reasons, of which I would choose, for the present occasion, only the least unkind, or even the most flattering to our impressionist critics. It is no use for them to write critiques; they all nourish, in their inmost heart, the secret ambition of novelist, dramatist, or poet. So too did Sainte-Beuve, who well knew, since he himself confessed it in so many words, that 'the true condition of the critical spirit is to have no art of its own,' but who could not refrain, as often as he had to speak of Balzac or Hugo, from considering them from the point of view of Joseph Delorme or Volupté. It is the same with M. France, M. Lemaitre, and M. Paul Desjardins. Even if M. Desjardins, the youngest of the three, were not the author of some novels, his critical articles, the form he habitually gives them, the pleasure he takes in mingling traits which describe or deal with himself but are equally foreign to his subject, would still proclaim the novelist which lies dormant in him. As for M. Lemaitre, after having made practically his first appearance with his Petites Orientales, if I remember rightly, and after having written some Contes, of which there are at least two or three that are charming, he is now attracted by the drama, as all those know who lately applauded his Révoltée, and, more recently, his Député Leveau. Lastly, to say nothing of the Noces corinthiennes or the Poèmes dorés, it is not in his criticism, it is in the Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard, or still more in Thaïs, that M. France has put his best. Evidently, if criticism interests all of them, it has never been, and never will be, their principal business; or rather they use it only to experiment with ideas, until they can give them a different and still more personal form, which will some day be the soul of their dramas, poems, or novels.

There is nothing more natural. Poet or novelist, what makes the originality of the artist is his impressionist, subjective, or truly personal way of seeing and feeling. Add something to the knowledge we have of common life; discover in it some unexplored province, if such still exists; complete, correct, or modify the idea which we have of it, such is the work of the poet, in the most general sense of the term. And here is the work of the artist: he enlarges, develops, perfects the means of his art; he finds means to render what his art had not yet expressed; and he adds to it the individuality of his own sensations. The only precaution which, I believe, must then be taken, is, in perfecting the means of the art, not to reduce it entirely to the perfection of the form, as our Parnassians have done, nor to begin by mutilating and calumniating life in some way or other before imitating it, as our Naturalists have done. But if the object of criticism is entirely different, do not the merits of the poet and the novelist become for it as many faults? This fashion of intervening in person may greatly assist the novelty of impressions, but does it not affect justice and truth? This is what all those believe who—like Villemain and Guizot formerly, like Littré, like Scherer nearer our time, and lastly like M. Taine, who were much more convinced of the relativity of things than our impressionists themselves, and who understood it as it should be understood—have believed no less thoroughly in the existence of objective criticism; and we believe in it along with them.

I do not know, indeed, if the disadvantages, or even the dangers of this impressionism are evident, and that, in the first place, it would break the bonds which closely unite criticism and history. M. Anatole France, M. Jules Lemaitre, M. Paul Desjardins are not merely talented writers. They are also scholars, mandarins, as M. Lemaitre says, whose impressions, whatever they be, are determined and caused, more often than they believe, by the literary education they have received. They readily reproach objective criticism that its 'dogmatism' is only the form which it gives to its 'personal preferences.' Yet, among their 'personal preferences,' or what they take for such, there is quite a part of 'dogmatism' which is neither theirs nor of them. It is what they 'know'; and their knowledge preserves them from the trap which impressionism keeps always laid for ignorance. They may therefore prefer Madame Bovary to Racine's Athalie. In reality, their paradox amuses them; they admit it in spite of themselves; and the proof is that they cannot keep from letting something of the truth slip into the development of their paradox, and this truth ruins it. But smaller scholars will come in their turn, (they have come already), who will know nothing, who will abstain from reading anything, from fear that their impressions will be taken from them beforehand, and who will constitute themselves, none the less, by right of their impressionism, partial judges of matters of intellect. I know more than twenty whom I could name. Literary history would perish first; tradition next, with literary history; and finally, with tradition, the sentiment of solidarity which binds the generations together.

One consequence would follow from this, that criticism, now thus cut off from its connection with history, would lose, at the same time as the notion of its object, the knowledge of its rôle or function. For to say that it has no function or rôle is another error, just as we saw that it was wrong, in order to deny its purpose, to exaggerate gratuitously the number, the nature, and the bearing of its contradictions. Its province is to give direction to art; and this may be noted several times in history. With a little exaggeration, but not without some truth, has it not been claimed that modern German literature is the work or the creation of Lessing's criticism? And with us, three times at least within three hundred years, has not criticism directed the evolution of our poetry? DuBellay, Ronsard himself, and Baïf above all began by being critics as much as poets; Boileau was only that; and who now does not know that romanticism was already clearly present in the Génie du Christianisme? If nobody can flatter himself on ever being either Chateaubriand, Boileau, or Ronsard, nobody is forbidden, I think, from trying to follow them: and, in any case, their example is enough to show what services, and what kind of services, criticism can render. Infatuated as authors are today with themselves and their sens propre, as used to be said, if criticism cannot immediately act on them, it can act, and acts to some purpose every day, on opinion, of which they are only the expression, when they are not its humble servants. It can take away from them their public, and, by modifying the milieu, it can make even the most stubborn change his manner.

Are examples necessary? Has not one of our impressionists, M. Paul Desjardins, somewhere defined naturalism as 'the application of the processes of criticism to the literature of the imagination;' and though it is a little narrow, the definition is none the less ingenious and happy. But what I hold as absolutely true in it, is that, without criticism, naturalism would never have had the success it has had. It would be easily proved that the author of La Bête humaine and L'Assommoir owes almost everything, not to Balzac, nor even to Flaubert, but to M. Taine, to M. Taine's essay On Balzac, and to the History of English Literature. So, too, how many times, in his earliest work, when he was as yet the author only of the Fortune des Rougon or the Conquête de Plassans, did he not complain that M. Taine had abandoned him! Quare me credereliquisti! If M. Taine had laid down, in his History of English Literature, the principles of naturalism, he had been careful to mark, in his Philosophy of Art, the limits which naturalism could not pass without departing from the conditions of art itself. So criticism has not only determined, as we said, the direction of contemporary naturalism, but has also protected it from its own excesses; and so what is best in naturalism—and nobody, I know, denies that there is much good in it—must be laid to the credit of criticism.

The same thing is to be said of the drama. For the last twenty-five or thirty years no work has appeared on the stage which marks an epoch in the history of the art, which is capable of forming a school and inspiring successful imitators. Yet the aesthetics of the drama have completely changed. If there are some of us still who used to praise the ingeniousness, the abundance of resource, the very real ability of Eugène Scribe, how many are we? And what is there, in the eyes of young people, more out of fashion, more artificial, and more false, than Une Chaine, for example, if not Bertrand et Raton? There is no more desire for these preparations, these conventions, this confusion or medley of styles. Criticism alone has accomplished this work. It is criticism which asked itself why the drama had remained for thirty or forty years in arrear of the novel. It is criticism which showed the good points in the conventions which the school of Scribe had constituted as so many articles of faith. Better still: among these conventions, it is criticism which labors to separate the necessary from the arbitrary. And, should M. Becque, or someone else, give us one day or other this comedy, doubtless not entirely new, but yet freer and franker, of which we must admit that La Parisienne or Les Corbeaux are little more than the promise, it is still criticism to which the twentieth century will be indebted.

There, in the present as in all time, is the true function of criticism, which it can evidently fulfil only by escaping from impressionism. If criticism means to act, it must be something else, and something more interesting, than the manifestation of our tastes and preferences, for these, to tell the truth, usually interest only ourselves. Do not M. Lemaitre and M. France know that the remnant of authority which it still preserves in the provinces is due to the presence, in their judgments, of reasons which are not theirs but everybody's? In the same way, when reading the Memoirs or Confessions of others, we think we like what we find similar or applicable to ourselves, while in reality what we seek is a wider, more varied, and deeper knowledge of man in general. So let us admit it with a good grace: let us put something above our tastes; and since there must be criticism, let us say that there cannot be any that is not objective. This is all that I have endeavored to show in these pages: and I think that to have shown it successfully would not be a matter of indifference, either to the idea which we must hold of criticism, or to the education of the mind, or perhaps to the very future of literature—or to the literature of the future.

Now, as for some dilettanti who ask what is the good of criticism and why we do not do without it, we may be content to reply by asking another question: what is the good also of art, of history, of science? And, indeed, the world would not be changed if the Comédie-Française were to give us this year at least a masterpiece; and since we live very comfortably in an entire ignorance of the nature of Merovingian institutions, we may with stronger reason do without knowing what must be thought of the works of those who have studied them. But I shall add that if criticism is inferior to history and art in so many other respects, it has this advantage or this superiority over art and history that it alone can prevent the world, according to M. Renan's expression, from 'being devoured by charlatanism.' Too occupied, too diligent, too much a slave to the labor of daily life, unable to analyse its pleasure and recognize the quality of it, the crowd always runs at the call of those who flatter; and the charlatans of art or literature know this well. It is precisely the business of criticism to think and to judge for the crowd. In fixing the rank and distributing its prizes, it is possible it may give certain little philosophers something to laugh at, but it does work doubly useful: it teaches the crowd that there is some difference between Ponson du Terrail and Balzac, which it is doubtless well to know; and it avenges talent for the successes of mediocrity, which are humiliating some way or other to everybody. Why, alas, must we end by saying that, if the task has never been more urgent, these latter words make no pretense to perform it; and that as our fathers might have used them, those who come after us will use them in their turn? And they will be always true.

ANATOLE FRANCE (1844-1924)

Jacques Anatole Thibault was born in Paris on the left of the Seine, where his father kept a book-shop on the Quai-Voltaire and passed on to his son the name of 'France,' which, used first merely as a bibliographical signature, has become one of the most famous names of the pen. France's literary career, extending from the publication of an essay on Alfred de Vigny in 1868 to a volume of reminiscences of childhood, La Vie en Fleur, in 1922, covers more than half a century of varied achievement. Known first as an epicurean philosopher, a retiring scholar, and a detached critic who had gradually obtained the mastery of a style of remarkable ease, lucidity and charm, he became involved in politics at the time of the Dreyfus agitation, and so developed into a leader of international radicalism and a bitter satirist of modern civilization. His main contributions to literary criticism were made in the late eighties and early nineties, before he became involved in political issues; in this earlier period he wrote for the conservative Temps a series of articles afterwards published in four volumes under the title La Vie Littéraire. It is to the translation of these by D. B. Stewart, entitled Life and Letters, that we are indebted for the following selections, reproduced here with the permission of Dodd, Mead and Co., the American publishers of the admirable version of France's works in English started by John Lane.

SUBJECTIVE AND OBJECTIVE CRITICISM

M. Ferdinand Brunetière, of whom I am very fond, is extremely angry with me. He charges me with misunderstanding the very laws of criticism, of having no standard by which to judge the things of the mind, of floating according to my instincts among contradictions, of not emerging from myself, and of being enclosed in my own subjectivity, as in a dark prison.

Far from complaining of being thus attacked, I rejoice in this honorable dispute, which is entirely flattering to myself when one considers the merit of my adversary, the severity of a censure which conceals much indulgence, the greatness of the interests concerned, for according to M. Brunetière it is a matter of no less than the intellectual future of our country, and, to conclude, the choice of my accomplices, M. Jules Lemaitre and M. Paul Desjardins being denounced along with me as guilty of subjective and personal criticism, and as corrupters of youth. I have an old and ever fresh affection for the wit of M. Lemaitre, for his quick intelligence, his winged poetry, and his delightful lucidity. M. Paul Desjardins interests me by reason of the tremulous gleams of his delicate imagination. If I were in the slightest degree cunning, I should be careful to refrain from separating my cause from theirs.

But truth compels me to declare that I do not see in what way my crimes are their crimes, or my iniquities their iniquities.

M. Lemaitre divides himself with a marvelous agility; he sees the for and against; he places himself successively at the most opposite points of view; he displays by turns the refinements of an ingenious mind and the goodwill of an ingenuous soul. He engages in dialogue with himself, and makes the most diverse individuals speak in turn. He has widely exercised the faculty of understanding. He is a modern, and a humanist. He respects the traditions and loves novelty. He has an open mind, with a taste for beliefs. His criticism, indulgent as it is, even when he is employing irony, is, if correctly assessed, objective enough. And if, when he has said all there is to say, he adds, 'What do I know?', is not that a gentle philosophy? I cannot quite understand what it is that annoys M. Brunetière in his manner, unless it is, perhaps, a certain restless gaiety, as of a young fawn.

As for M. Paul Desjardins, with whatever he may be reproached, it certainly cannot be with a too frolicsome gaiety. I do not think I shall displease him by saying that he poses rather as an apostle than as a critic. His is a distinguished mind, but above all it is that of a prophet. He is severe, and does not like people to write. For him, literature is the Beast of the Apocalypse. A well-turned phrase strikes him as a public danger. He reminds me of the dismal Tertullian, who stated that the Holy Virgin could not have been beautiful, otherwise she would have been desired, which is unimaginable. According to M. Paul Desjardins, style is evil. Yet M. Paul Desjardins himself has style; so true it is that the human soul is full of contradictions. His humor being what it is, his advice must not be asked on subjects so frivolous and profane as literature. He does not criticize; he anathematizes without hatred. Pale and melancholy, he goes his way scattering compassionate maledictions. By what turn of Fortune's wheel does he find himself burdened with a share of the charges that are heaped upon me, precisely when he declares, in his articles, and his lectures, that I am the barren fig-tree of Holy Writ? With what shuddering horror must he appeal to the man who brackets us: 'Judica me, et discerne causam meam de gente non sancta?'

It is therefore only right that I should defend myself singly. I shall attempt so to do, but not without first doing homage to the courage of my adversary. M. Brunetière is a warrior critic of rare intrepidity. In polemics, he is of the school of Napoleon and the great captains who know that one can defend oneself victoriously only by taking the offensive, and that to await attack is to be already half defeated. He has come to attack me in my little wood, beside my limpid stream. He is a tough customer. He sets to with teeth and nails, to say nothing of feints and tricks. I understand thereby that he has many methods in polemics, and that when the deductive fails he does not despise the intuitive. I never muddled his stream. But he is tetchy, and even rather quarrelsome. It is a defect of the brave. I much like him thus. Was it not Nicolas, his master and mine, who said: 'Achilles would displease were he less heated and less quick.'

If it is absolutely necessary for me to fight M. Brunetière, I suffer under many disadvantages. I will not point out the too evident inequalities. I will merely indicate one, which is of a private nature; it is that, whilst he finds my criticism annoying, I find his excellent. I am thereby reduced to that defensive position, which, as we said but now, is considered bad by tacticians. I hold M. Brunetière's strong constructive criticism in high regard. I admire the strength of the materials and the grandeur of the plan. I have just read this clever professor's lectures at the Ecole Normale, on the subject of the evolution of criticism from the Renaissance down to our own time, and I experience no displeasure in stating, for all to hear, that the ideas therein are developed with much method, and placed in a pleasing, imposing and novel order. Their heavy but certain advance recalls the famous manoeuvre of the legionaries marching shoulder to shoulder, protected by their shields, to the assault of a town. It was called the Tortoise, and it was a formidable device. There is, perhaps, some surprise mingled with my admiration, when I see whither this army of ideas leads. M. Ferdinand Brunetière proposes to apply the theory of evolution to criticism. And while the enterprise in itself appears interesting and praiseworthy, we have not forgotten the energy recently employed by the critic of the Revue des Deux Mondes, in subordinating science to morality and invalidating the authority of all doctrine founded on the natural sciences. It was employed in connection with The Disciple, and we know whether M. Brunetière was then niggardly of his remonstrances against those who presumed to introduce theories of transformation into the province of psychology or sociology. He repelled the Darwinian ideas in the name of unchangeable morality.

He expressly states, 'These ideas must be false, since they are dangerous.'

And now he founds the new criticism on the hypothesis of evolution. 'Our proposal,' he says, 'is none other than to borrow from Darwin and Haeckel the assistance which M. Taine obtained from Geoffroy St. Hilaire and Cuvier.' I am well aware that it is one thing to profess, as does M. Sixte, the irresponsibility of criminals and absolute indifference in the matter of morality, and quite another matter to apply to literary questions the laws which preside over the evolution of animal and vegetable species. I do not for one moment affirm that M. Brunetière belies and contradicts himself. I note a peculiarity of his nature, a twist of character, which is, notwithstanding his appreciation of logical sequence, voluntarily to deviate into the unexpected and unforeseen.

It was once said that he was paradoxical, and it seemed very much like irony, so strongly established was his reputation as a sound logician. But after reflection one sees that his manner is really somewhat paradoxical. He is extraordinarily clever at demonstration; he must always be demonstrating, and he dearly loves stoutly to maintain extraordinary and even staggering opinions.

By what unhappy chance was I compelled to love and admire a critic who so little returns my affection? There are for M. Brunetière only two sorts of criticism, the subjective, which is bad, and the objective, which is good. According to him, M. Jules Lemaitre, M. Paul Desjardins and I are all tainted by subjectivity, the worst of evils; for from subjectivity one sinks into illusion, sensuality and concupiscence, and one judges human work by the pleasure received therefrom, which is an abomination, because one must not derive pleasure from any intellectual work without knowing whether one is right to be pleased; because man, being a reasoning animal, must first of all reason; for it is necessary to be right, and not necessary to find gratification; because it is man's business to seek instruction by means of dialectic, which is infallible; because one must always put a truth at the end of a chain of reasoning, like a knot at the end of a thread, since otherwise the reasoning would not hold, and it is necessary that it should, because one attaches thereto several further reasons so as to form an indestructible system, which lasts ten years or so. And that is why objective criticism is the only criticism worth having. M. Ferdinand Brunetière holds the other method to be fallacious and full of deception. He gives several reasons. But I must first reproduce the text of the incriminated passage. It occurs in the Vie littéraire and reads as follows: There exists no objective criticism, any more than there is objective art, and all those who flatter themselves that they put anything else but themselves into their books are the dupes of the most fallacious philosophy. The truth is that one never emerges from one's self. It is one of our greatest misfortunes. What would we not give to contemplate, just for one moment, the earth and sky with the faceted eye of the fly, or understand Nature with the simple, elementary mind of an orang-outang? But that is forbidden us. We are restricted to our personalities, as to a perpetual prison. It appears that the best thing we can do is to recognize this horrible situation gracefully; and to admit that we are speaking of ourselves whenever we have not the strength to keep silence. (Life and Letters, 1st series, Preface.)

Quoting the above, M. Brunetière remarks that 'it is impossible to state with greater assurance that nothing is assured.'

I might perhaps reply that there is no contradiction and no novelty in stating that we are condemned to know things only by the impression they make on us. This truth is capable of establishment by observation, and so obvious that it strikes everyone. It is a commonplace of natural philosophy. One must not pay too much attention to it, and one must perceive therein a doctrinal Pyrrhonism. I admit that I have more than once glanced in the direction of absolute scepticism. But I never entered; I feared to place my foot on a basis which engulfs all that steps thereon. I have feared those two words, full of a formidable sterility, 'I doubt.' So powerful are they that the mouth that has once pronounced them truly is forever sealed, and can never reopen. If one doubts, one must keep silent; for, whatever one may discourse about, to speak is to affirm. Since I had not the courage for silence and renunciation, I willed to believe and did so. I at least believed in the relativity of things and the succession of phenomena.

As a matter of fact, appearance and reality are the same thing. In order to love and suffer in this world, images suffice; there is no need for their objectivity to be demonstrated. In whatever manner one conceives Life, even as the dream of a dream, one lives. Naught else is required for the foundation of art, science, morality, and impressionist criticism, and, if you will, of objective criticism.

M. Brunetière is of opinion that we can emerge from ourselves by our own volition like the old Nuremberg professor, whose amazing adventure has been related to us by M. Joséphin Péladan, a magian. This professor, who was much absorbed in æsthetics, used by night to exchange his visible body for an astral one, in order to compare the legs of beautiful sleepers with those of the Venus of Praxiteles.

'The fraud,' states M. Brunetière, 'if there must be a fraud, is to believe and to teach that we cannot emerge from ourselves, while, on the contrary, Life does nothing else. And the reason, doubtless, will appear sufficiently good, if we realize that otherwise there would be neither society, language, literature nor art.' And he adds, 'We are men . . . and we are supremely so because of the power enabling us to come out of ourselves, in order that we may seek, find, and recognize ourselves in others.'

To come out of ourselves; that is to say a great deal. We are in a cavern, and we see the phantoms in the cavern. Without that, Life would be too sad. It has neither charm nor value, save in the shadows passing along the surface of the walls within which we are enclosed, shadows which resemble us, which we strive to know in passing, and sometimes to love.

In reality, we know the world only through our senses, which alter and color it at their will; M. Brunetière does not contest it. On the contrary, he relies on these conditions of knowledge to find a basis for his objective criticism. Considering that the senses convey practically similar impressions of nature to all men, so that what is round for one man would not be square for another, and that the functions of understanding operate in the same manner, if not in the same degree, in all minds, which is the origin of common sense, he bases his criticism on universal consent. But he himself sees that it has an uneasy seat. For this consent, although sufficient to form and maintain society, is not sufficient if it is a question of establishing the superiority of one poet over another. It is beyond doubt that men resemble each other sufficiently for them all to find the requirements of their existence in the markets and bazaars of a great town; but nothing is less probable than that two men in the same country have an absolutely similar impression of a particular line of Virgil.

There is in mathematics a sort of higher truth, which we all accept, every one of us, for the very reason that it is not obvious to the senses. But physicists are obliged to reckon with what is called, in the sciences of observation, the personal equation. Two observers never perceive a phenomenon in absolutely the same manner.

It is impossible for M. Brunetière to conceal from himself that the personal equation enters more freely than anywhere into the illusive domains of art and literature.

In that province there is never unanimous consent, nor stable opinion. To this he agrees, or begins by agreeing to it: 'To say nothing of our contemporaries, whom it is admitted we do not see from a great enough distance, nor from a sufficiently lofty standpoint, how many varying judgments have been passed, during the last three or four hundred years, on Corneille, Shakespeare, Cervantes, Rabelais, Raphael, and Michael Angelo! There is no opinion, however extravagant and absurd, that has not been upheld by some philosopher; no scandal or outrageous attack on genius that has not had the authority of some critic behind it.' And to prove that great men never obtain justice from their peers, he shows us Rabelais insulted by Ronsard, and Corneille publicly preferring Boursault to Racine. He should also have shown us Lamartine despising La Fontaine. He could also have exhibited Victor Hugo contemptuous of all our classics, except Boileau, for whom, as he grew old, he nourished a certain affection.

In short, M. Brunetière recognizes the fact that in the republic of letters there are many warring opinions. It is in vain that he immediately corrects himself, and declares with assurance that 'it is not true that there is so much diversity of opinion, or such deep divisions.' It is in vain that he fortifies himself with an opinion of M. Jules Lemaitre in order to affirm that it is admitted by all literary authorities that certain writers exist, in spite of their defects, whilst others do not exist. For instance, that the tragic Voltaire exists, and that Campistron, the Abbé Leblanc, and M. de Jouy do not exist. It is a first point which he wishes us to grant, but we shall not do so, for if it came to drawing up the two lists there would hardly be any agreement.

The second point upon which he insists is that there are degrees which are properly the grades conferred on genius in the faculties of grammarians and the universities of rhetoricians. It is conceivable that such diplomas might be of advantage in the ordering and regulation of fame. Unfortunately human contradictions cause them to lose much of their value; and these doctors' degrees, these diplomas, which M. Brunetière regards as universally recognized, have little authority save for those who confer them.

In pure theory one can conceive a system of criticism which, proceeding from science, partakes of its certainty. It is possible that our opinion on M. Maurice Barrès' æsthetics and M. Jean Moréas' prosody depends on our ideas of the cosmic forces and the heavenly mechanism. The universe is interlinked throughout. But in reality the links are here and there so involved that the devil himself would be unable to disentangle them, logician though he be. Further, we must admit with a good grace that, unlike Petit Jean, what Humanity knows least about is its beginning. We lack principles in everything, particularly in knowledge of the creations of the mind. Whatever anyone may say, it is impossible today to foresee the time when criticism will have the rigidity of an exact science, and one may reasonably believe that that time will never come. For all that, the great philosophers of antiquity crowned their world system with poetry, and they acted wisely. It is better to speak with an uncertain voice of beautiful thoughts and forms than forever to hold one's peace. Few objects in this world are so absolutely subject to science as to admit of their being produced or predicted thereby. It is a certainty that neither a poem nor a poet will ever be thus subject. The things which touch us most, which appear the most beautiful and most desirable, are precisely those which appear vague, and in some degree mysterious. Beauty, virtue, and genius will forever keep their secrets. Neither the charm of Cleopatra, the sweetness of St. Francis of Assisi, nor the poetry of Racine can be reduced to formulæ, and if these things spring from science, it is from some science mingled with art, intuitive, restless, and always incomplete. This science, or rather this art, exists: it is philosophy, morality, history, criticism; in short, the whole beautiful romance of Humanity.

All works of art or poetry have for all time been the subject of dispute, and it is one of the great attractions of beautiful things to remain thus doubtful, for it is impossible to deny that they are so. M. Brunetière is unwilling altogether to admit this fatal and universal uncertainty. It is too repugnant to his authoritative and methodical mind, which always wishes to judge and classify everything. As he is judicially minded, let him sit in the seat of judgment! And as he is a warlike critic, let him advance his close-packed arguments in tortoise formation!

But can he not forgive a simple soul for concerning himself less severely with art matters, and for displaying fewer reasons, and particularly fewer arguments?—for restricting criticism to the familiar style of conversation and the idle pace of the saunter; for stopping where he chooses, and indulging in an occasional confidence; for following his tastes, fancies, and even caprices, on condition of being always honest, sincere, and benevolent; for not being all-knowing, and not explaining everything; for believing in the irremediable diversity of opinions and ideas, and for speaking more unconstrainedly of what one should admire?

JULES LEMAÎTRE (1853-1914)

Jules Lemaître was included with Anatole France in Brunetière's onslaught upon the subjective or impressionistic school of criticism, and he did not fail to respond to the attack. In his Contemporaries (seven volumes of essays, originally contributed to newspapers and periodicals), and Impressions of the Theater (ten volumes), which practically cover the whole period from the early eighties to the end of the century, Lemaître professed to treat criticism as a representation of the world, like any other branch of literature, and hence by its nature, 'as personal, as relative, as vain, and therefore as interesting as the rest.' Like Anatole France, Lemaître commanded a much more flexible and lively style than his erudite antagonist, and he turned on Brunetière the piercing shafts of his wit in the preface to the sixth volume of the Contemporaries series, originally published in September, 1892:—

'M. Brunetière is incapable, it seems to me, of considering any work, whatever it be, great or small, except in its relations with a group of other works, whose relations with other groups, throughout time and space, are immediately evident to him; and so on. A whole philosophy of literary history and at the same time a whole system of æsthetics and a whole system of ethics are visibly implied in the least of his judgments. Marvelous gift! When he is reading a book, he is thinking, one may say, of all the books that have been written since the beginning of the world. He touches nothing which he does not class, and that for eternity. I admire the majesty of such criticism. . . . But look at what it costs. How sad it must be not to be able to open a book without remembering others and without comparing it with them! To judge always is perhaps never to enjoy. I should not be astonished if M. Brunetière had become really incapable of "reading for his own pleasure." He would be afraid of being a dupe, he would even be afraid of committing a sin. For us, it matters not if we make a mistake in liking what pleases us or amuses us, or if we have to smile tomorrow at our admirations of today. Our errors are without consequence; they only concern particular cases. If M. Brunetière, on the other hand, made a mistake, it would be frightful; for beside the fact that he would have had no pleasure in his error, it would be without help or remedy; it would be total and irreparable; it would be the wreck of his whole being.'

The above passage is quoted from the volume of essays from Les Contemporains, selected and translated by A. W. Evans, entitled Literary Impressions by Jules Lemaître, to which we are also indebted for the article on Bourget which follows:

PAUL BOURGET

I do not remember ever to have felt an embarrassment comparable with that which I feel in speaking of the work and literary personality of M. Paul Bourget. Its richness, its apparent complexity, bewilder me. I see him in one fashion; but immediately afterwards I see him in another. The idea most commonly formed of him is that of an affected, subtle, feminine person, of a sort of dandy of letters, very elegant, very refined, very cajoling. But this is far from being the complete man. For, on the contrary, several of the pages he has written (perhaps the greater number) are especially remarkable for the virile vigor and fine lucidity of an essentially philosophical intelligence. And, in the same way, he can appear in many passages as a pure dilettante, a dilettante of the decadence, full of affectation and artifice, of an unwholesome sensuality and an ambiguous mysticism; but suddenly one discovers in him a very grave spirit, with the gravity of a priest, very much preoccupied with the moral life, serious to the point of taking everything tragically.

His style presents the same contrasts; he is affected and he is forcible; he is pedantic and he is simple; frozen by abstractions, stiff and stilted, and then suddenly graceful and languishing, or full, colored and robust. He is excellent, and he is little short of detestable. And one is astonished that the cruel opening of Cruelle Enigme, and the adorable account of the meetings of the lovers at Folkestone, or the powerful picture of the duel of the sexes in love, in the style of the plays of the younger Dumas, have come from the same hand. And as I turn over those latter beautiful pages, I am imperatively arrested by brilliant phrases like this, which ends a paragraph about the part played by love in the development of our moral being: 'All through our years thus there is enriched or impoverished, at the hazard of this sovereignly beneficent or destructive power, the treasure of acquired morality of which we are the depositories; faithless depositories so often, preparing, amid caresses and smiles, the bankruptcy of our successors.' Or this passage dazzles me like a magnificent flash of lightning: 'Love alone has remained irreducible, like death, to human conventions. It is untamed and free, in spite of codes and fashions. The woman who undresses in order to give herself to a man, rids herself with her clothing of her whole social personality; she becomes again for him whom she loves what he becomes again for her, a natural and solitary creature whose happiness is guaranteed by no protection, whose unhappiness can be removed by no decree.' I am delighted with this beauty of thought and form; but I turn over the page and I find a 'flowering time,' or an 'abortion' which is 'derived' from a certain quality of love. I find there that 'the Lady' is a superior and charming being, 'made of unshaken security,' as if the security was in the lady and not in the adorer. Or there are gasping mannerisms of language: 'What to do against that? To kneel before the dolorous sister and adore her for being dolorous.'

These things grieve me, and my embarrassment redoubles. . . . The most penetrating and most vigorous intelligence, and with it a morbid debility, pedantry also, and certain intellectual predilections that resemble superstition, and a taste for certain elegances which one might almost take for snobbishness—how is one to see clearly in all this?

Add that M. Paul Bourget is doubtless a poet and a novelist, but is perhaps above all a critic—and not a critic who judges and relates, but a critic who understands and feels, who has especially striven to picture to himself different states of soul, to make them his own. Among so many souls which he penetrates and assimilates, where is his own?

It seems at first sight that the more a critic had breadth of mind and power of sympathy, the fewer individual traits he would present to the writer who desired to define and to paint him. The most marked, the most original, not only among men, but among writers, are those who do not understand at all, who do not feel at all, who do not love at all, whose knowledge, intelligence, and tastes are clearly bounded. The ideal man who will come at the end of time, as he will know and conceive equally of all things, will doubtless have hardly any intellectual personality; and he will only have very attenuated passions, vices and eccentricities. The members of the small philosophical oligarchy who, according to M. Renan, will perhaps one day govern the world, delivered by omniscience from inferior passions, should resemble one another to such a degree that they will be almost indistinguishable from each other. They will approximate to God, the great scholar and the great critic; and God has no individuality. This very day the critic who would form an entire and thorough notion of all the aspects under which the world has been reflected in men's minds, could hardly be defined except by that very aptitude for penetrating and embracing everything.

We have not yet reached that point. In reality there are as many ways of understanding criticism as there are of understanding fiction, drama or poetry; the personality of the writer—when he has one—can therefore be equally strongly impressed upon his criticism. Only a little more care is sometimes needed in order to detach it.

It is too evident (I have need of these truisms in order that I may recover confidence) that, like any other writer, a critic necessarily puts into his writings his own temperament and his own conception of life, since it is with his own mind that he describes other minds; that the differences are as profound between M. Taine, M. Nisard, and Sainte-Beuve, as between—let us say, between Corneille, Racine, and Molière,—and, finally, that criticism is a representation of the world as personal, as relative, as vain, and consequently as interesting, as those which constitute the other literary forms.

Criticism varies infinitely according to the object studied, according to the mind which studies it, according to the point of view in which that mind places itself. It can consider works, men, or ideas. And it can judge or merely define. At first dogmatic, it has become historical and scientific; but to all appearance its evolution has not ended. Vain as a doctrine, necessarily incomplete as a science, it tends perhaps to become simply the art of enjoying books, and of enriching and refining its impressions by means of them.

M. Nisard begins by forming a general and, as it were, purified idea of the French genius. He has deduced this idea from a first glance at the whole of our literature. He makes the beliefs of spiritual philosophy enter into it as an integral part. With the ideal thus conceived, he compares the works of writers, and extols or mal-treats them as they approach it more or less closely. For the rest, he isolates those works, most often neglects the persons of the writers; or, if he speaks of them, it is in order to attribute to them, in the name of free-will, the merit or the dishonor of having served or betrayed the ideal which he has defined in the beginning. He does not grasp any necessary bond between the works and their producers, between the latter and their social environment, or between successive epochs. And yet his History unrolls according to an inexorable plan, and the French spirit in his writings resembles a moral personality who develops and then declines throughout the ages. Hence his History possesses a rigorous unity. It is very systematic and singularly partial and incomplete; but how interesting is M. Nisard's mind! How subtle, delicate, and contemptuous it is!

M. Taine, in his History of English Literature, does the direct contrary and yet does the same thing. Whilst M. Nisard only considers the actual books, M. Taine affects especially to consider the near or distant causes of which they are the result; and whilst M. Nisard cuts off the books from their roots, M. Taine studies these roots down to their utmost ramifications and the very soil in which they are buried. But this explanation of the books by the men, and of the men by the race and the environment, is often only a snare. For the critic has first of all formed, without saying so, by a first rapid review of English literature, an idea of the English genius (as M. Nisard did of the genius of France), and it is from this that he deduces the conditions and the environment in which works that are specifically English could be produced. And then, all those which this environment does not explain, he affects to lay aside. He thus reaches by another road an exclusiveness as narrow as that of M. Nisard. The spiritualism of the one, the positivism of the other, end therefore in an analogous result. And we can say, as we said just now: M. Taine's History is singularly systematic, partial, and incomplete; but how interesting is M. Taine's genius! What a power of generalization, and, at the same time, what magic of color in the work of this poet-logician!

Thus, whether dogmatic or scientific, literary criticism is never, in the end, more than the personal and decrepit work of a miserable human being. Sainte-Beuve blends the two methods with much grace, sometimes appreciates, but more often describes, still judges works in accordance with tradition, and in the classic taste, but enlarges that tradition, applies himself more readily, by wandering over the whole field of literature, to the construction of moral portraits and biographies, and furnishes I don't know how many scattered but exquisite fragments toward what he called the natural history of men's minds.

I pass over the various combinations of doctrine, history, and psychology proper to MM. Scherer, Montégut, and Brunetière. But either I am greatly mistaken or M. Paul Bourget has imagined an almost new form of criticism. Criticism becomes for M. Bourget the history of his own intellectual and moral formation. It is, so to say, egotist criticism. His mind being eminently and almost uniquely a product of this century's end (the influence of the Græco-Latin tradition is little marked in his case), he confines himself to the writers of the last thirty years, and chooses from among them those with whom he finds himself in conformity of head and heart. And he does not paint their portraits or write their biographies: he does not analyse their works and study their methods of procedure; he does not define the impression that their books have made upon him considered as works of art. He only seeks to explain and describe such of their states of conscience and such of their ideas as he has best appropriated by imitation and sympathy. And thus, whilst at bottom only writing the history of his own soul, at the same time he writes the history of the most original sentiments of his generation, and thus constructs a considerable—and definitive—fragment of the moral history of our epoch.

One means of knowing M. Paul Bourget would be to do for him what he has done for the ten writers who figure in his Essais de Psychologie Contemporaine. It would be a question of seeking, to use his own expression, 'what ways of feeling and tasting life he proposes to those who are younger than he is'—or to those of his own generation. For it seems that M. Paul Bourget has a rather great influence on the young people of the present day, not perhaps on those who have carried classical studies to some length, and who are fortified and defended by the Latin and Gallic tradition, but on the more restless, the more nervous, the more ignorant section of the young people who write. In vain has the Academy honored him publicly; this does not prevent the more adventurous among the younger school of writers and those with the most troubled brains, the symbolists, aesthetes, Wagnerians, and Mallarmists, from being full of respect for him, from regarding him as a master. And, besides, he has all the young women on his side. Perhaps no one, at the present moment, inspires a more tender devotion in certain souls. He is, for many, the preëminent poet, the friend, the consoler, almost the spiritual director. On the other hand, many ripe men, especially among old-fashioned folk and among those who are deeply impregnated with classical letters, cannot endure him. But, whether one likes him or not, it must be admitted that his mind is one of the richest and most distinguished results of the literary and moral culture of the second half of the century.

What is first of all eminent in him is precisely this intellectual and sentimental curiosity, this aptitude and also this effort to know, to experience, and to understand the most recent states of soul as they manifest themselves in the books of our most original writers. He himself thus sums up the precious contents of his Essais: 'In reference to M. Renan and the Goncourt brothers, I have indicated the germ of melancholy that is enveloped in diletantism. I have attempted to show, in reference to Stendhal, Tourgeniev, and Amiel, some of the fatal consequences of cosmopolitan life. The poems of Baudelaire and the comedies of M. Dumas have furnished me with a pretext for analysing several fine shades of modern love and for indicating the perversions or the incapacities of that love under the pressure of the spirit of analysis. Gustave Flaubert and MM. Leconte de Lisle and Taine have permitted me to show some examples of the effects produced by science on various imaginations and sensibilities. I have been able, in reference also to M. Renan, the Goncourts, M. Taine, and Flaubert, to study several cases of conflict between democracy and the higher culture.'

There, in fact, is the complete inventory of the sentiments, the anxieties, and the torments imagined and experienced by the modern soul.

M. Bourget prides himself on comprehending the soul, of loving it in its entirety, even in its most morbid and most ephemeral manifestations. He has strange partialities for the obscure and mystic poetry of the latest little coteries (and this has gained him their veneration). He will not have it said that any mental predilection of his time has been alien from him or has not been understood by him. This is a rare critical scruple. Similarly, as cosmopolitanism appears to him to be one of the signs of our age, he has been a cosmopolitan, he has set himself to be one. He has lived in London and in Florence as much as in Paris. He has even stayed in Spain and Morocco, and, I ask you, what could Morocco say to him, to him the meditative philosopher, the man of inner dreams?

Similarly, he affects to know and to love the latest refinements of contemporary luxury; he would be angry with himself for having been ignorant of a single detail of the most elegant manner of living invented by the latest products of civilization. This belongs to him, this is his province in the same manner as is diletantism or cosmopolitanism. And this is why this psychologist, who is but rarely and feebly a landscape artist, is often enough an upholsterer.

However, among the sentiments which M. Paul Bourget defines and explains with a like precision, we distinguish those which he experiences naturally and which he prefers, and those which he makes some effort to appropriate, and we can discover, among the writers that engage his attention, which are they whom he most esteems.

From Baudelaire, for whom his predilection is very marked, he seems to have taken a singular mixture of sensuality and mysticism, a sort of rather depraved Catholicism. This sentiment is very peculiar to our age. It is a hundred miles away from the classical eroticism. It presupposes a somewhat debilitated race, a diminution of muscular force and a refinement of the nervous system, the persistence of the spirit of analysis even in the midst of sensations best calculated to make you lose your head, and consequently a certain incapacity for full and tranquil enjoyment of the pleasures of the body, the feeling of this incapacity, a paradoxical return, at the height of debauch, to contempt for the flesh, and even in pollution, a half-feigned and half-sincere aspiration towards purity which sharpens the savor of sin and transforms it into an intellectual sin, into a sin of malice.

From M. Renan he takes aristocratic disdain and especially dilettantism, 'that disposition of mind, at once very intelligent and very voluptuous, which in turn inclines us towards the various forms of life, and leads us to lend ourselves to all of those forms without giving ourselves to any of them'; from M. Taine he takes the scientific temper, certain habits of composition and of language, and a fondness for large generalizations; from M. Dumas the younger (an unexpected thing) he takes a tragic preoccupation with the moral questions in the dramas of love.

From Flaubert, the Goncourts, M. Leconte de Lisle, and in general, from all purely 'artistic' writers (however modern, moreover, may be their basis of latent philosophy) it does not seem that M. Paul Bourget takes much, although he understands them marvelously.

But Stendhal has his whole affection. Stendhal is his passion, his vice, and sometimes his prejudice. Stendhal is the only writer anterior to the generation of 1850 whom he has admitted to his gallery. He always utters his name with a little mystery, like that of the god of a secret religion. 'Henri Beyle,' the name takes on for him the sweetness of a pet name—or the importance of a sacred and hidden name that is revealed only to adepts. He says 'Henri Beyle' as a devotee of Molière says 'Poquelin.' This cult is here very legitimate, Stendhal having employed, with more sureness, subtlety, boldness, and connection than any other writer, the instrument which M. Bourget has himself used to probe the most characteristic sentiments of his generation or to make them live in himself—analysis.

Thus we are led to notice two other characteristics of M. Paul Bourget's mind. This inquisitive person is an analyst and a pessimist (a 'melancholiac' if you prefer it). Let us not separate the two things for in him they are closely bound together. M. Bourget is very clearly one of those who are less preoccupied with the external world than with the world of the soul; less sensitive to the pleasures of seeing and rendering the forms of things or the various aspects of the human scramble than to that of decomposing sentiments and ideas into their primitive elements and of tracing one moral phenomenon to another until he finds one that is irreducible. Now, the spirit of analysis ends naturally in a great sadness. Why? Because this last irreducible element is always a fatal instinct or an unsatisfied desire. What M. Bourget ends by reaching in the depth of the souls he studies is always (whatever be the form it assumes and with whatever shades it may embellish itself on the surface) the feeling of the necessity of things—or of the disproportion between the ideal and the real, between our dream and our destiny. And that is sad.

There are, if I may so express myself, two degrees of this sadness. M. Paul Bourget tells us that all the sentimental states which he has analysed lead to pessimism. It is the specter of pessimism which he sees standing at the end of all the paths he has traced out in what Shakespeare calls the forest of souls. For Baudelaireism, even in its accommodations with the flesh, implies consciousness of its indignity, and a vision of universal sin. Dilettantism, that gift of imagining the most diverse moral lives with precision and sympathy, implies the impossibility of resting in any of them. Intellectual aristocracy has to pay for its existence by a painful sensitiveness in regard to all the vulgarities of real life. Cosmopolitanism, which shows you the immensity and the variety of the world, almost at the same moment makes you feel its monotony and its uselessness; the planet appears smaller to him who knows it better. Look at the state, to which exoticism, which is the picturesque form of cosmopolitanism, has led Pierre Loti. The scientific spirit condemns you to the spirit of a world governed by blind forces and which lacks goodness. And so on.—And if those various forms of seeing and feeling are very melancholy in themselves, the analysis of each of them doubles their sadness by showing us that they are incurable.—In brief, to know is to be sad, because all knowledge ends in the recognition of the unknowable and in that of the vanity of human beings. Judge, then, if M. Bourget can be light-hearted, not having to console himself the violent distractions, the life of action, and the robust temperament of his master, Stendhal.

M. Bourget has, however, denied that he is a pessimist. He is wrong! A pessimist is not necessarily a man who affirms the predominance of evil over good in the universe, nor a misanthrope, nor a hypochondriac, nor a man who has given up hope. Every man who reflects on human destiny and finds it unintelligible, and has neither Christian faith nor simple-minded belief in progress to comfort him, can be called a pessimist. The bare fact of understanding nothing in the world and of seeing no explanation of it is, when one thinks of it, sad enough. This does not prevent one from living like other people, from enjoying, when the chance offers, the sunshine, pure air, or even the society of men and women; but, during the moments when one thinks, it is hardly possible, without a positive faith, to be an optimist: there are too many absurd and useless sufferings, and on all sides, too thick a wall of night. M. Bourget denies in vain. His very style has a tone which one does not mistake; it gives forth a plaintive, lamenting, weeping sound. . . .

Doubtless the absence of positive belief and the spirit of analysis can turn into heedlessness in some people (look at Montaigne), but not in those whose sensibility to moral good and evil is exceptionally developed. Now M. Paul Bourget has one of these latter consciences. And that, I believe, is his last and most intimate characteristic. He himself defines and distinguishes between the moralist and the psychologist somewhere or other with much force: 'The moralist,' he says, 'is very close to the psychologist in the object of his study, for both are curious to reach the secret depths of the soul and desire to know the springs of men's actions. But to the psychologist this curiosity suffices. This knowledge has its end in itself. He sees the birth of ideas, their development, their combination, impressions of the senses resulting in emotions and in reasonings, states of conscience always in process of being made and unmade, a complex and changing vegetation of the mind and of the heart. Vainly does the moralist declare some of these states of conscience criminal, some of those complications contemptible, some of those changes hateful. The psychologist hardly understands what is meant by crime or contempt or indignation. . . . He even delights in the description of dangerous states of the soul which revolt the moralist; he takes pleasure in understanding base actions if those actions reveal an energetic nature, and if the profound labor which they manifest appears singular to him. In a word, the psychologist analyses solely in order to analyse, and the moralist analyses so as to judge.'

Well, then, whatever be the abyss M. Bourget pleases to dig between these two species of minds, if one cannot say that he himself is truly a moralist, he is not a pure psychologist either. At least he is a psychologist who is very much tormented by moral questions, very much moved, very anxious, sometimes frightened. He is habitually uneasy as to the consequences which the ideas he expounds may have on the happiness and moral well-being of humanity. He often exclaims (in more distinguished terms and without throwing up his arms, but rather with his hands over his eyes): 'Whither are we going?' All his inquiries into the original sentiments of his contemporaries serve him at the same time for his researches into the meaning and end of life. He takes it very seriously indeed. He is never humorous, nor even ironical or flippant. He ignores the smile. He is anti-Pagan and anti-Gallic. He has, what is almost always the mark of a Christian education, a liking for chastity. You will find often enough in him a vivid recollection of the Catholic faith of his childhood. He is, as I have said, as grave in the presence of love and its dramas as M. Dumas the younger. And that is why this disciple of Stendhal, that is to say of the most detached of analysts, once expressed in the most eloquent of his studies such an ardent sympathy for the author of Visite de Noces. On the whole, Baudelairism, Renanism and Beylism are habits and tastes of his mind, perhaps also, premeditated acquisitions of an artist who has made it his task to reflect and carry within himself the soul of a certain literary epoch. But in the depths of his heart and of his being there is, I think, a very painful concern about the moral life, an impossibility of confining himself to curiosity and speculation. Armand de Querne after his 'crime of love' is precisely M. Paul Bourget; and de-Querne is the Ryons of M. Dumas the younger—with his wit left out.

You will find all these characteristics of his criticism in M. Paul Bourget's novels, perhaps with something added.

First of all, there is that particular form of curiosity, that desire to have lived the most elegant life (morally and physically) that is known in his time, sometimes a certain dandyism, something also of a rather narrow and feminine delicacy. He loves 'modernity,' but only when it is aristocratic. As a matter of fact, it is neither among the people nor among the lower middle classes, but only among the idle classes whose sensibilities are still refined by all the delicate things of life that there could be found a species of love complex enough and rich enough in the finer shades to offer him material suited to his analytical faculties. Moreover, an innate taste led him toward this world, toward the life that is lived around the Arc de Triomphe, and toward the souls and bodies of the women who dwell there. Perhaps he has only confessed this taste with a touch of complacency. Some of his pages seem written by a novelist who has a weakness for London. There is a little fashionable Anglomania in his case. He has a very marked weakness for the fair foreigners who spend their winters in Paris. One of his first books, Edel, a melancholy and rather ingenuous poem, is above all a very modish poem. But it would be unjust and puerile to insist on this point.

The power of analysis, so remarkable in the Essais, is not less so in the novels. Nobody, I believe, since Madame de La Fayette, since Racine, since Marivaux, since Laclos, since Benjamin Constant, since Stendhal, has inferred with greater happiness, described with more exactness, linked together with more probability, or expounded with greater detail the feelings that a given person should experience in a given moral situation. At certain moments, and outside of the emotion which the drama itself can inspire, this assumes something of the special interest and appropriate beauty of a lesson in anatomy. The pages in which M. Paul Bourget explains to us why the heroine of Deuxième Amour refuses a new experience, or describes the pure adolescent love with which Hubert Liauran loves Madame de Sauves, and how by a delightful reversal of parts Thérèse treats him as if it were he who was yielding himself (Cruelle Énigme), or how in Crime d'Amour, the frankness and innocence of Hélène Chazel turn against her and only provoke the distrust of Armand de Querne, or by what sentimental logic Hélène comes to stain herself in order to be avenged on the man who has not believed her and in order that he may believe in her at last . . . all those pages—and how many others!—are accomplished examples of living psychology. In truth, I do not believe that any writer, not even Stendhal, has shown superior penetration in the study of 'the passions of love.'

Let us quote a little, at hazard, and for the pleasure of doing so: 'Like all romantic women, Hélène occupied herself with the delicacy of the pleasures common to herself and her lover as with a sentimental anxiety. What renders a woman of this class completely unintelligible to a libertine is that he is accustomed to separate the things of pleasure from those of the heart, and to enjoy pleasure under humiliating conditions; instead of which the romantic woman who is in love, not having known pleasure except when associated with the noblest exaltation, brings to her enjoyment the worship which she has for her moral emotions. Hélène came with an amorous piety, almost with a mystic idolatry, to the world of wild caresses and embraces.'

There are a hundred pages as good as this in M. Paul Bourget's three rather short novels and in his tales. That is a solid foundation for fame.

BRANDES (1842-)

Georg Morris Cohen Brandes was a brilliant student in his youth, but his race and his advanced opinions alike aroused prejudice in his native Denmark, and he spent long periods of his early manhood abroad, first in Paris and London, and afterwards in Berlin. Lacking academic recognition in Denmark, he became a free lance in criticism with a world-wide reputation, and this independent position in the upshot brought advantages which more than compensated for the bitter struggles of his earlier career. 'Literary criticism and literary history were for him, from the first, no academic studies, but instruments of intellectual emancipation; and his application of these instruments in his first public lectures, during the later sixties, to the petrified orthodoxy and conservatism of Copenhagen provoked the outbursts of contending anger and delight in which his stormy fame was born. He had learnt from Taine and Sainte-Beuve to trace the affinities between the individual writer of genius and his social milieu; but he added to all that they could teach him a vast command of the modern thought and culture of Germany, England, and Scandinavia, and the passion for individuality, the demand that a writer should be, before all things, himself, which he shared with his friend Ibsen.' So writes Professor C. H. Herford, of the University of Manchester, in a recent tribute to the influence of Dr. Brandes upon 'the whole cultivated world.' His Main Currents in Nineteenth Century Literature has become a well established classic of modern criticism.

MAIN CURRENTS IN NINETEENTH CENTURY LITERATURE

INTRODUCTION TO VOL. I

It is my intention in the present work to trace the outlines of a psychology of the first half of the nineteenth century by means of the study of certain main groups and movements in European literature. The stormy year 1848, a historical turning-point, and hence a break, is the limit to which I purpose following the process of development. The period between the beginning and the middle of the century presents the spectacle of many scattered and apparently disconnected literary efforts and phenomena. But he who carefully observes the main currents of literature perceives that their movements are all conditioned by one great leading movement with its ebb and flow, namely, the gradual fading away and disappearance of the ideas and feelings of the preceding century, and the return of the idea of progress in new, ever higher-mounting waves.

The central subject of this work is, then, the reaction in the first decades of the nineteenth century against the literature of the eighteenth, and the vanquishment of that reaction. This historic incident is of European interest, and can only be understood by a comparative study of European literature. Such a study I purpose attempting by simultaneously tracing the course of the most important movements in French, German, and English literature. The comparative view possesses the double advantage of bringing foreign literature so near to us that we can assimilate it, and of removing our own until we are enabled to see it in its true perspective. We neither see what is too near the eye nor what is too far away from it. The scientific view of literature provides us with a telescope of which the one end magnifies and the other diminishes; it must be so focussed as to remedy the illusions of unassisted eyesight. The different nations have hitherto stood so remote from each other, as far as literature is concerned, that they have only to a very limited extent been able to benefit by each other's productions. For an image of the position as it is, or was, we must go back to the old fable of the fox and the stork. Everyone knows that the fox, having invited the stork to dinner, arranged all his dainties upon a flat dish from which the stork with his long bill could pick up little or nothing. We also know how the stork revenged himself. He served his delicacies in a tall vase with a long and slender neck, down which it was easy for him to thrust his bill, but which made it impossible for the fox, with his sharp muzzle, to get anything. The various nations have long played fox and stork in this fashion. It has been and is a great literary problem how to place the contents of the stork's larder upon the fox's table, and vice versa.

Literary history is, in its profoundest significance, psychology, the study, the history of the soul. A book which belongs to the literature of a nation, be it romance, drama, or historical work, is a gallery of character portraits, a storehouse of feelings and thoughts. The more momentous the feelings, the greater, clearer, and wider the thoughts. The more remarkable and at the same time representative the characters, so much the greater is the historical value of the book, so much the more clearly does it reveal to us what was really happening in men's minds in a given country at a given period.

Regarded from the merely æsthetic point of view as a work of art, a book is a self-contained, self-existent whole, without any connection with the surrounding world. But looked at from the historical point of view, a book, even though it may be perfect, complete work of art, is only a piece cut out of an endlessly continuous web. Æsthetically considered, its idea, the main thought inspiring it, may satisfactorily explain it, without any cognizance taken of its author or its environment as an organism; but historically considered, it implies, as the effect implies the cause, the intellectual idiosyncrasy of its author, which asserts itself in all his productions, which conditions this particular book, and some understanding of which is indispensable to its comprehension. The intellectual idiosyncrasy of the author, again, we cannot comprehend without some acquaintance with the intellects which influenced his development, the spiritual atmosphere which he breathed.

The intellectual phenomena which condition, elucidate, and explain each other, fall of themselves into natural groups.

What I shall describe is a historical movement partaking of the form and character of a drama. The six different literary groups it is my intention to represent may be looked on as six acts of a great play. In the first group, the French Emigrant Literature inspired by Rousseau, the reaction begins; but here the reactionary are still everywhere mingled with the revolutionary currents. In the second group, the semi-Catholic Romantic school of Germany, the reaction is on the increase; it is more vigorous and holds itself more aloof from the contemporary struggle for progress and liberty. The third group, consisting of such men as Joseph de Maistre, Lamennais in his strictly orthodox period, Lamartine and Victor Hugo when they (after the restoration of the monarchy) were still mainstays of the Legitimist and clerical party, represents the militant, triumphant reaction. Byron and his English contemporaries form the fourth group. It is this one man, Byron, who produces the revulsion in the great drama. The Greek war of liberation breaks out, a revivifying breeze blows over Europe, Byron falls like a hero in the cause of Greece, and his death makes a tremendous impression on all the productive minds of the Continent. Shortly before the Revolution of July a change of front occurs among the great authors of France; they form the French Romantic school, which is our fifth group, a new liberal movement on the roll of whose adherents we find such names as Lamennais, Hugo, Lamartine, Musset, Georges Sand, etc. The movement passes from France into Germany, and in that country also liberal ideas are victorious. The writers forming the sixth and last group which I shall depict, Young Germany, are inspired by the ideas of the Greek war of liberation and the Revolution of July, and, like the French authors, see in Byron's great shade the leader of the liberal movement. The authors of Young Germany, Heine, Börne, Gutzkow, Ruge, Feuerbach, etc., prepare, together with the contemporary French writers, the great upheaval of 1848.

THE ROMANTIC SCHOOL IN GERMANY

INTRODUCTION TO VOL. II

There are many works to be criticized and classified, many personalities to describe. My aim will be to present these personalities and works in as firm and sharp outline as possible, and, without giving undue attention to detail, to throw light upon the whole in such a manner that its principal features will stand out and arrest the eye. I shall endeavor, on the one hand, to treat the history of literature as humanly as possible, to go as deep down as I can, to seize upon the remotest, innermost psychological movements which prepared for and produced the various literary phenomena; and on the other hand, I shall try to present the result in as plastic and tangible a form as possible. If I can succeed in giving shape, clear and accurate, to the hidden feeling, the idea, which everywhere underlies the literary phenomenon, my task will be accomplished. By preference, I shall always, when possible, embody the abstract in the personal.

First and foremost, therefore, I everywhere trace the connection between literature and life. This is at once proved by the fact that, whereas earlier Danish literary controversies (that between Heiberg and Hauch, for example, or even the famous one between Baggesen and Oehlenschläger) were kept entirely within the domain of literature and dealt exclusively with literary principles, the controversy aroused by the first volume of this work has entailed, quite as much from the nature of the work as from the irrationality of its opponents, the discussion of a multitude of moral, social and religious questions. The Danish reaction, feeling itself to be akin to the one I am about to depict and unmask, has attempted to suppress the movement which it recognized to be antagonistic to itself—but so far with little prospect of success. A French proverb says: Nul prince n'a tué son successeur. [No prince has slain his successor.]

When, however, the connection between literature and life is thus emphasized, the delineations and interpretations of men and their books by no means produce what we may call drawing-room history of literature. I go down to the foundations of real life, and show how the emotions which find their expression in literature arise in the human heart. And this same human heart is no still pool, no idyllic mountain lake. It is an ocean, with submarine vegetation and terrible inhabitants. Drawing-room history of literature, like drawing-room poetry, sees in human life a drawing-room, a decorated ballroom—the furniture and the people alike polished, the brilliant illumination excluding all possibility of dark corners. Let those who choose to do so look at things thus; it is not my point of view. Just as the botanist must handle nettles as well as roses, so the student of literature must accustom himself to look, with the unflinching gaze of the naturalist or the physician, upon all the forms taken by human nature, in their diversity and their inward affinity. It makes the plant neither more nor less interesting that it smells sweet or stings; but the dispassionate interest of the botanist is often accompanied by the purely human pleasure in the beauty of the flower.

As I follow the more important literary movements from country to country, studying their psychology, I attempt to condense the fluid material by showing how, from time to time, it crystallizes into one or other definite and intelligible type. The attempt is attended with extraordinary difficulty in this particular period of German literature, from the fact that the chief characteristic of the period is an absence of distinctly typical forms. This literature is not plastic; it is musical. French Romanticism produces clearly defined figures; the ideal of German Romanticism is not a figure, but a melody, not definite form, but infinite aspiration. Is it obliged to name the object of its longing? It designates it by such terms as ein geheimes Wort, eine blaue Blume, der Zauber der Waldeinsamkeit (a mystic word—a blue flower—the magic of the lonely woods). These expressions are, however, definitions of moods, and each mood has a corresponding psychological condition; my task is to trace back each mood, emotion, or longing to the group of psychological conditions to which it belongs. This group in combination constitutes a soul; and such a soul, with strongly marked individuality, represents in literature the many who were unable to depict their own character, but who recognized it when thus placed before them. I may possibly succeed in proving that the type does not escape us because the author may have chosen to paint landscape after landscape in place of delineating characteristic personalities, or because he confounds literature with music to the extent of at last entitling his poems simply Allegro or Rondo; but that, on the contrary, the distinctly peculiar qualities of these landscapes and the character of this word-music are symptomatic of a psychological condition which may be determined with considerable accuracy.

In the general introduction to this work

I have sketched the plan which I have proposed to myself. It is my intention to describe the first great literary movement of the century, the germinating and growing reaction, first elucidating its nature, then following it to its climax. Afterwards I shall show how this reaction was met by a breeze of liberalism blowing from the eighteenth century, which swells into a gale and sweeps away all opposition. Not that the liberal views of the nineteenth century are ever identical with those of the eighteenth, or that its literary forms or scientific ideas ever bear the eighteenth century stamp. Neither Voltaire, nor Rousseau, nor Diderot, neither Lessing nor Schiller, neither Hume nor Godwin rise from the dead; but they are one and all avenged upon their enemies.

Regarded as a whole, German-Romanticism is reaction. Nevertheless, as an intellectual, poetico-philosophical reaction, it contains many germs of new development, unmistakable productions of that spirit of progress which, by remolding the old, creates the new, and by altering boundaries gains territory.

The older Romanticists begin, without exception, as the apostles of 'enlightenment.' They introduce a new tone into German poetry, give their works a new color, and, in addition to this, revive both the spirit and the substance of the old fairy-tale, Volkslied, and legend. They exercise at first a fertilizing influence upon German science; research in the domains of history, ethnography, and jurisprudence, the study of German antiquity, Indian and Greek-Latin philology, and the systems and dreams of the Naturphilosophie all receive their first impulse from Romanticism. They widened the emotional range of German poetry, though the emotions to which they gave expression were more frequently morbid than healthy. As critics, they originally, and with success, aimed at enlarging the spiritual horizon. In their social capacity they vowed undying hatred to all dead conventionality in the relations between the sexes. The best among them in their youth labored ardently for the intensification of that spiritual life which is based upon a belief in the supernatural. In politics, when not indifferent, they generally began as very theoretical republicans, who, however, in spite of their cosmopolitanism, strove to elevate and strengthen German patriotism.

Unfortunately, their pursuit of all these worthy aims ended in comparative failure. Of all that the German Romanticists produced, little will endure—some masterly translations by A. W. Schlegel, a few of Tieck's productions, a handful of Hardenberg's and another of Eichendorff's lyrics some of Friedrich Schlegel's essays, a few of Arnim's and Brentano's smaller works, a select number of Hoffmann's tales, and some very remarkable dramas and tales from the pen of that eccentric but real genius, Heinrich von Kleist. The rest of the life-work of the Romanticists has disappeared from the memory of the present generation. Looking back on it from this distance, most of their endeavor seems to have ended in smoke. In the matter of language, with their intangible imagery, their misuse of words in expressing the strange, weird and mysterious, their archaisms and their determination to be unintelligible to the ordinary reader, they rather diminished than enriched the poetic vocabulary, rather corrupted than improved literary style. In the domain of poetry, Romanticism ended in hysterical piety and vamping. In the social domain it occupied itself with only one question, that of the relations between the sexes; and its ideas on this subject were, for the most part, so abnormal and morbidly unhealthy, that most of its passionate blows were dealt in the air. In dealing them, it was not humanity at large that the Romanticists had in view, but a few favored, aristocratic, artistic natures. In religious matters, these men, whose moral and poetical theories were at first so revolutionary, bowed their necks to the yoke the moment they saw it. And in politics it was they who directed the proceedings of the Congress of Vienna and prepared its manifestoes, abolishing liberty of thought in the interval between a religious festival in St. Stephen's and an oyster supper with Fanny Elsler. . . .

Friedrich Schlegel, the author of Lucinde, the free-thinking admirer of Fichte, who, in his Essay on the Idea of Republicanism, called the democratic republic, with female suffrage, the only reasonable form of government, is converted to Catholicism, becomes a mystic and a faithful servant of the Church, and in his later writings endeavors to promote the cause of reactionary absolutism. Novalis and Schleiermacher, who in their early writings display a mixture of pantheism and pietism, of Spinoza and Zinzendorf, steadily drift away from Spinoza and approach orthodoxy. In this later life Schleiermacher recants those Letters on Lucinde which he had written in a spirit of the purest youthful enthusiasm. Novalis, who in his youthful letters declares himself 'prepared for any sort of enlightenment,' and hopes that he may live to see 'a new massacre of St. Bartholomew, a wholesale 10 destruction of despotisms and prisons,' who desires a republic, and who, at the time when Fichte is prosecuted for atheism, remarks, 'Brave Fichte is really fighting for us all,'—this same Novalis ends by looking on the king in the light of an earthly Providence, condemning Protestantism as revolutionary, defending the temporal power of the Pope, and extolling the spirit of Jesuitism. Fouqué, the knight without 20 fear and without reproach, becomes in the end a pietist Don Quixote, whose great desire is a return to the conditions of feudalism. Clemens Brentano, in his youth the most mettlesome of poets, who 25 both in life and literature made war upon every species of convention, becomes the credulous secretary of a nun, a hysterical visionary; does nothing for the space of five years but fill volume after volume with the sayings of Anna Katherina Emmerich. Zacharias Werner is a variant of the same Romantic type. He starts in his career as a friend of 'enlightenment'; but soon a process of moral dissolution begins; he 35 first extols Luther, then turns Roman Catholic and recants his eulogy; in the end he becomes a priest, and as such displays, both in his life and in his sentimentally gross writings and sermons, a combination of coarse sensuality and priestly unction. 40

And Steffens—he who stormed the heaven of German Romanticism, carried the sacred fire to Denmark, and set men's minds in such violent uproar that he was 45 compelled to leave his country—what of him? what was he? An upright, weak character, with a brain charged with confused enthusiasms; all feeling and imitative fancy; no lucidity of thought or pregnant concision of style. It is literally impossible to read the so-called scientific writings of his later period; one runs the risk of being drowned in watery sentimentality or smothered by ennui. 'When,' says 50 Julian Schmidt, 'he expounded the Naturphilosophie in his broken German from the professorial chair, his mathematical calculations came out wrong and his experiments failed, but his audience was carried away by his earnestness, his almost religious solemnity, his naive, child-like enthusiasm.'

5 Naïveté was a quality that the Northerner of those days seldom lacked. In his best days, Steffens, captivated by the theories of the Naturphilosophie, took an innocent pleasure in tracing the attributes of the human mind in minerals, in humanizing geology and botany. But the Revolution of July turned his head. Inflamed by pietism, that elderly lady who for the last thirteen years had been the object of his affections, and for whose sake he had already more than once entered the lists, he closed his literary career with a series of feeble attacks upon the young writers of post-revolutionary Germany.

10 In this he was only following in the footsteps of his master, Schelling. Schelling, who, in marked contrast to Fichte with his clear doctrine of the Ego, dwells upon the mysterious nature of the mind, and bases not only philosophy, but also art and religion, upon the perception of genius, the so-called 'intellectual intuition,' displays both in his doctrine and in his want of method the arbitrariness, the lawlessness, which is the kernel of Romanticism. As 15 early as 1802, in his Bruno, he used the significant expression and future catchword, 'Christian philosophy,' though he still maintained that, in genuine religious value, the Bible is not to be compared with the sacred books of India—a theory which even 20 Görres champions in the early stage of his literary career. Having, like Novalis, at Tieck's instigation, made a close study of Jakob Böhme and the other mystics, Schelling began to philosophize mystically on the subject of 'Nature in God,' an expression appropriated by Martensen in his Spekulative Dogmatik. But when, shortly 25 afterwards, a patent of nobility was conferred on him (as professor at the University of Munich), and he was made President of the Academy of Science in Catholic and clerical Bavaria, the famous 'Philosophy of Revelation' commenced to 30 germinate in his mind. Soon the transformation was complete; the fiery enthusiast had become a courtier, the prophet a charlatan. With his mysteries, his announcements of a marvelous science, 'which had hitherto been considered impossible,' his refusal to print his wisdom, to do anything but communicate it verbally, and even then not in its entirety, he qualified himself for being called, after Hegel's death, to Berlin, to lend a helping hand to State religion in the 'Christian-Germanic' police-governed Prussia of the day, and to teach a State philosophy, for which, as he himself said, the only suitable name is Christology. Here it was that the young generation, the Hegelians of the Left, fell upon him and tore his mystic cobweb into a thousand pieces.

Yet Schelling is the least irrational of the Romantic philosophers. He is vehemently accused of heresy by Franz Baader, the reincarnated Jakob Böhme, the object of Kierkegaard's admiration; who reproaches him with setting the Trinity upon a logical balance-pole, and, still worse, with daring to deny the existence of a personal devil. The utterances of the others are in keeping with this. Schubert writes The Symbolism of Dreams—was not the dream the ideal of Romanticism?—occupies himself in all seriousness with interpreting them, happy in his persuasion that clairvoyance and visions are the highest sources of knowledge. The visionseer of Prevorst, whom Strauss, characteristically enough, began his public career by exposing, plays an important part in those days. Then there is Görres, who at the time of the great Revolution was 'inspired to triumphal song by the fall of Rome and the dissolution of the Holy Roman Empire,' and who afterwards took an active and honorable part in rousing German patriotic spirit during the struggle against Napoleon; this same Görres becomes the author of Christian Mysticism (a book which Kierkegaard read with shudders of awe), revels in the blood of martyrs, gloats over the agonies and ecstasies of the saints, enumerates the different aureoles, nail-prints, and wounds in the side by which they are distinguished, and prostrates himself in the dust, he, the old Jacobin, before the one true Catholic Church, chanting the praises of the Holy Alliance. To these add the politicians: Adam Müller, who, as Gottschall has aptly said, pursues in politics the quest of Novalis's 'blue flower,' who would fuse State, Science, Church, and Stage into one marvelous unit; Haller, who concealed his conversion to Catholicism in order to retain his appointments, and who, in his Revival of the Science of Statesmanship, bases this science upon theocracy; Leo (scathingly criticized by Ruge), who, in the same spirit, inveighs against the humanity of the age and its reluctance to shed the blood of Radicals; and Stahl, who, in his Philosophy of Law, compares marriage to the relation between Christ and the Church, the family to the Trinity, and the earthly right of succession to man's right to the heavenly inheritance. Taking all this together, one feels as if Romanticism ended in a sort of witches' Sabbath, in which the philosophers play the part of the old crones, amidst the thunders of the obscurantists, the insane yells of the mystics, and the shouts of the politicians for temporal and ecclesiastical despotism, while theology and theosophy fall upon the sciences and suffocate them with their caresses.

TOLSTOY (1828-1910)

Leo Tolstoy's literary career, which extended over the second half of the nineteenth century and overlapped into the twentieth, divides itself into three distinct periods: (1) his youth and early manhood as a dashing young artillery officer who attracted attention by his lively accounts of his campaigns in the Caucasus and the Crimea; (2) his happy middle years on his family estate at Yasnaya Polyana, where, with the help of his wife, he wrote the novels which won for him a world-wide reputation—War and Peace (1865-1868) and Anna Karenina (1875-1878); (3) the last thirty years of his life following the spiritual crisis of the early eighties, which culminated in his flight from home at the age of 82 and his death at a wayside railroad station (Astapovo). This last period is one of vehement religious, moral, and social propaganda, including his novel Resurrection (1899) and the treatise What is Art?, which after some twenty years' labor was published in 1898 and created a great sensation. Its point of view, though familiar enough in the middle ages, was a curious novelty in modern times. The chapters of it reprinted below are from the admirable translation of Tolstoy's friend Aylmer Maude and are taken from the volume edited by him entitled Tolstoy on Art, published in 1924 by Small, Maynard and Co., to whom we are indebted for permission to reprint.

WHAT IS ART?

Art is one of two organs of human progress. By words man interchanges thoughts, by the forms of art he interchanges feelings, and this with all men not only of the present time but also of the past and the future. It is natural to human beings to employ both these organs of intercommunication and therefore the perversion of either of them must cause evil results to the society in which it occurs. And these results will be of two kinds: first, the absence in that society of the work which should be performed by the organ, and secondly; the harmful activity of the perverted organ. And just these results have shown themselves in our society. The organ of art has been perverted, and therefore the upper classes of society have to a great extent been deprived of the effect that it should have produced. The diffusion in our society of enormous quantities, on the one hand, of those counterfeitings of art which only serve to amuse and corrupt people, and on the other hand, of works of insignificant exclusive art, mistaken for the highest art, have perverted most men's capacity to be infected by true works of art, and have thus deprived them of the possibility of experiencing the highest feelings to which mankind has attained, which can only be transmitted from man to man by art.

All the best that has been done in art by man remains strange to people who lack the capacity to be infected by art, and is replaced either by spurious counterfeitings of art or by insignificant art, which they mistake for real art. People of our time and of our society are delighted with Baudelaire, Verlaine, Moreases, Ibsens, Maeterlincks, in poetry; with Monets, Manets, Puvis de Chavannes, Burne-Joneses, Sticks, and Böcklins, in painting; with Wagners, Liszts, Richard Strausses, in music; and they are no longer capable of comprehending either the highest or the simplest art.

In the upper classes, in consequence of this loss of capacity to be infected by works of art, people grow up, are educated and live, lacking the fertilizing, improving influence of art, and therefore not only do not advance towards perfection, do not become kinder, but, on the contrary, possessing highly-developed external means of civilization, they yet tend to become continually more savage, more coarse, and more cruel.

Such is the result of the absence from our society of the activity of that essential organ—art. But the consequences of the perverted activity of that organ are yet more harmful. And they are numerous.

The first consequence, plain for all to see, is the enormous expenditure of the labor of working people on things which are not only useless, but, for the most part, are harmful; and more than that, the waste of priceless human lives on this unnecessary and harmful business. It is terrible to consider with what intensity and amid what privations, millions of people—who lack time and opportunity to attend to what they and their families urgently require—labor for ten, twelve, or fourteen hours on end, and even at night, setting the type for pseudo-artistic books which spread vice among mankind, or working for theaters, concerts, exhibitions, and picture galleries, which for the most part also serve vice; but it is yet more terrible to reflect that lively, kindly children, capable of all that is good, are devoted from their early years to such tasks as these: that for six, eight, or ten hours a day, and for ten or fifteen years, some of them should play scales and exercises; others should twist their limbs, walk on their toes and lift their legs above their heads; a third set should sing sol-feggios; a fourth set, showing themselves off in all manner of ways, should recite verses; a fifth set should draw from busts or from nude models and paint studies; a sixth set should write compositions according to the rules of certain periods; and that in these occupations, unworthy of a human being, which are often continued long after full maturity, they should waste their physical and mental strength and lose all perception of the meaning of life. It is often said that it is horrible and pitiful to see little acrobats putting their legs over their necks, but it is not less pitiful to see children of ten giving concerts, and it is still worse to see schoolboys of ten who as a preparation for literary work have learned by heart the exceptions to the Latin grammar. These people not only grow physically and mentally deformed but also morally deformed, and become incapable of doing anything really needed by man. Occupying in society the rôle of amusers of the rich, they lose their sense of human dignity and develop in themselves such a passion for public applause that they are always a prey to an inflated and unsatisfied vanity which grows in them to diseased dimensions, and they expend their mental strength in efforts to obtain satisfaction for this passion. And what is most tragic of all is that these people, who for the sake of art are spoiled for life, not only do not render service to this art, but on the contrary inflict the greatest harm on it. They are taught in academies, schools, and conservatoires how to counterfeit art, and by learning this they so pervert themselves that they quite lose the capacity to produce works of real art, and become purveyors of that counterfeit, or trivial, or depraved art which floods our society. This is the first obvious consequence of the perversion of the organ of art.

The second consequence is that the productions of amusement-art, which are prepared in such terrific quantities by the armies of professional artists, enable the rich people of our time to live the lives they do, lives not only unnatural, but in contradiction to the humane principles these people themselves profess. To live as do the idle rich people, especially the women, far from nature and from animals, in artificial conditions, with muscles atrophied or misdeveloped by gymnastics, and with enfeebled vital energy, would be impossible were it not for what is called art—for this occupation and amusement which hides from them the meaninglessness of their lives, and saves them from the dullness that oppresses them. Take from all these people the theaters, concerts, exhibitions, piano-playing, songs and novels, with which they now fill their time in full confidence that occupation with these things is a very refined, æsthetic, and therefore good occupation; take from the patrons of art who buy pictures, assist musicians, and are acquainted with writers, their rôle of protectors of that important matter art, and they will not be able to continue such a life, but will all be eaten up by ennui and spleen, and will become conscious of the meaninglessness and wrongfulness of their present mode of life. Only occupation with what among them is considered art renders it possible for them to continue to live on, infringing all natural conditions, without perceiving the emptiness and cruelty of their lives. And this support afforded to the false manner of life pursued by the rich is the second consequence, and a serious one, of the perversion of art.

The third consequence of the perversion of art is the perplexity produced in the minds of children and plain folk. Among people not perverted by the false theories of our society, among workers and children, there exists a very definite conception of why people should be respected and praised. In the minds of peasants and children the ground for praise or eulogy can only be either physical strength: Hercules, the heroes and conquerors; or moral, spiritual strength: Sakya Muni giving up a beautiful wife and a kingdom to save mankind, Christ going to the cross for the truth he professed, and all the martyrs and the saints. Both are understood by peasants and children. They understand that physical strength must be respected, for it compels respect; and the moral strength of goodness an unperturbed man cannot fail to respect, because his whole spiritual being draws him toward it. But these people, children and peasants, suddenly perceive that beside those praised, respected, and rewarded for physical or moral strength, there are others who are praised, extolled and rewarded much more than the heroes of strength and virtue, merely because they sing well, compose verses or dance. They see that singers, composers, painters, ballet-dancers earn millions of roubles and receive more honor than the saints do: and peasants and children are perplexed.

When fifty years had elapsed after Púshkin's death and, simultaneously, the cheap editions of his works began to circulate among the people and a monument was erected to him in Moscow, I received more than a dozen letters from different peasants asking why Púshkin was raised to such dignity? And only the other day a literate man from Sarátov called on me who had evidently gone out of his mind over this very question. He was on his way to Moscow to expose the clergy for having taken part in raising a monument to Mr. Púshkin.

Indeed, one need only imagine to one's self what the state of mind of such a man of the people must be when he learns from such rumors and newspapers as reach him, that the clergy, Government officials, and all of the best people in Russia, are triumphantly unveiling a statue to a great man, the benefactor, the pride of Russia—Púshkin, of whom till then he had never heard. On all sides he reads or hears about this, and he naturally supposes that if such honors are rendered to anyone, then without doubt he must have done something extraordinary—either some feat of strength or of goodness. He tries to learn who Púshkin was, and having discovered that Púshkin was neither a hero nor a general but a private person and a writer, he comes to the conclusion that Púshkin must have been a holy man and a teacher of goodness, and he hastens to read or to hear of his life and works. But what must be his perplexity when he learns that Púshkin was a man of more than easy morals, who was killed in a duel when attempting to murder another man, and that all his service consisted in writing verses about love, which were often very indecent.

That a hero, or Alexander the Great, or Genghis Khan, or Napoleon was great, he understands, because any one of them could have crushed him and a thousand like him; that Buddha, Socrates, and Christ were great he also understands, for he knows and feels that he and all men should be such as they were; but why a man should be great because he wrote verses about the love of women he cannot make out.

A similar perplexity must trouble the brain of a Breton or Normandy peasant who hears that a monument, une statue (as to the Madonna), is being erected to Baudelaire, and reads, or is told, what the contents of his Flours du Mal are; or, more amazing still, to Verlaine, when he learns the story of that man's wretched, vicious life, and reads his verses. And what confusion it must cause in the brains of peasants when they learn that some Patti or Taglioni is paid £10,000 for a season, or that a painter gets as much for a picture, or that authors of novels describing love-scenes have received even more than that.

And it is the same with children. I remember how I passed through this stage of amazement and stupefaction and only reconciled myself to this exaltation of artists to the level of heroes and saints by lowering in my own estimation the importance of moral excellence and by attributing a false, unnatural meaning to works of art. And a similar confusion must occur in the soul of each child and each man of the people when he learns of the strange honors and rewards that are lavished on artists. This is the third consequence of the false relation in which our society stands towards art.

The fourth consequence is that people of the upper classes, more and more frequently encountering the contradictions between beauty and goodness, put the ideal of beauty first, thus freeing themselves from the demands of morality. These people, reversing the rôles, instead of admitting, as is really the case, that the art they serve is an antiquated affair, allege that morality is an antiquated affair and assert that it can have no importance for people situated on that high plane of development which they opine that they occupy.

This result of the false relation to art showed itself in our society long ago; but recently, with its prophet Nietzsche and his adherents, and with the decadents and certain English aesthetes who coincide with him, it is being expressed with especial impudence. The Decadents, and aesthetes of the type at one time represented by Oscar Wilde, select as a theme for their productions the denial of morality and the laudation of vice.

This art has partly generated and partly coincides with a similar philosophic theory. I recently received from America a book entitled The Survival of the Fittest: Philosophy of Power, 1896, by Ragner Redbeard, Chicago. The substance of this book, as it is expressed in the editor's preface, is that to measure right by the false philosophy of the Hebrew prophets and weepful Messiahs is madness. Right is not the offspring of doctrine but of power. All laws, commandments, or doctrines as to not doing to another what you do not wish done to you, have no inherent authority whatever, but receive it only from the club, the gallows, and the sword. A man truly free is under no obligation to obey any injunction, human or divine. Obedience is the sign of the degenerate. Disobedience is the stamp of the hero. Men should not be bound by moral rules invented by their foes. The whole world is a slippery battlefield. Ideal justice demands that the vanquished should be exploited, emasculated, and scorned. The free and brave may seize the world. And therefore there should be eternal war for life, for land, for love, for women, for power, and for gold. (Something similar was said a few years ago by the celebrated and refined academician, de Vogüé). The earth with its treasures is booty for the bold.

The author has evidently by himself, independently of Nietzsche, come to the same conclusions which are professed by the new artists.

Expressed in the form of a doctrine these positions startle us. In reality they are implied in the ideal of art serving beauty. The art of our upper classes had educated people in this ideal of the superman,—which is in reality the old ideal of Nero, Sténka Rázin, Genghis Khan, Robert Macaire, or Napoleon, and all their accomplices, assistants, and adulators,—and it supports this ideal with all its might.

It is this supplanting of the ideal of what is right by the ideal of what is beautiful, that is, of what is pleasant, that is the fourth consequence, and a terrible one, of the perversion of art in our society. It is fearful to think of what would befall humanity were such art to spread among the masses of the people. And it already begins to spread.

Finally, the fifth and chief result is that the art which flourishes in the upper classes of European society has a directly vitiating influence, infecting people with the worst feelings and with those most harmful to humanity—superstition, patriotism, and, above all, sensuality.

Look carefully into the causes of the ignorance of the masses and you may see that the chief cause does not at all lie in the lack of schools and libraries, as we are accustomed to suppose, but in those superstitions, both ecclesiastical and patriotic, with which the people are saturated and which are unceasingly generated by all the methods of art. Church superstitions are supported and produced by the poetry of prayers, hymns, paintings, by the sculpture of images and of statues, by singing, by organs, by music, by architecture, and even by dramatic art in religious ceremonies. Patriotic superstitions are supported and produced by verses and stories (which are supplied even in schools), by music, by songs, by triumphal processions, by royal meetings, by martial pictures, and by monuments.

Were it not for this continual activity in all departments of art, perpetuating the ecclesiastical and patriotic intoxication and embitterment of the people, the masses would long ere this have attained to true enlightenment.

But it is not only in Church matters and patriotic matters that art depraves; it is art in our time that serves as the chief cause of the perversion of people in the most important question of social life—in their sexual relations. We nearly all know by our own experience, and those who are fathers and mothers know in the case of their grown-up children also, what fearful mental and physical suffering, what useless waste of strength, people suffer merely as a consequence of dissoluteness in sexual desire.

Since the world began, since the Trojan war, which sprang from that same sexual dissoluteness, down to and including the suicides and murders of lovers described in almost every newspaper, a great proportion of the sufferings of the human race have come from this source.

And what is art doing? All art, real and counterfeit, with very few exceptions, is devoted to describing, depicting, and inflaming, sexual love in every shape and form. If one remembers all those novels and their lust-kindling descriptions of love, from the most refined to the grossest, with which the literature of our society overflows; if one only remembers all those pictures and statues representing women's naked bodies, and all sorts of abominations, which are reproduced in illustrations and advertisements; if one only remembers all the filthy operas and operettas, songs and ballads, with which our world teems, involuntarily it seems as if existing art had but one definite aim—to disseminate vice as widely as possible.

Such are the most direct though not all the consequences of that perversion of art which has occurred in our society. So that what in our society is called art not only does not conduce to the progress of mankind, but more than almost anything else hinders the attainment of goodness in our lives.

And therefore the question which involuntarily presents itself to every man free from artistic activity and not bound to existing art by self-interest, the question asked by me at the beginning of this work: 'Is it just that to what we call art, to a something possessed by but a small section of society, should be offered up such sacrifices of human labor, of human lives, and of goodness, as are now being offered up?' receives the natural reply: 'No; it is unjust, and these things should not be!' Such is also the answer of sound sense and unperturbed moral feeling. Not only should these things not be, not only should no sacrifices be offered up to what among us is called art, but on the contrary, the efforts of those who wish to live rightly should be directed toward the destruction of this art, for it is one of the most cruel of evils that harass our section of humanity. So that were the question put: Would it be preferable for our Christian world to be deprived of all that is now esteemed to be art, and together with the false to lose all that is good in it? I think that every reasonable and moral man would again decide the question as Plato decided it for his Republic, and as all the early Church-Christian and Mahomedan teachers of mankind decided it, that is, would say, Rather let there be no art at all than continue the depraving art, or simulation of art, which now exists. Happily no one has to face this question and no one need adopt either solution. All that man can do, and that we—the so-called educated people who are so placed that we have the possibility of understanding the meaning of the phenomena of our life—can and should do, is to understand the error we are involved in, and not harden our hearts in it, but seek for a way of escape.

THE PROSTITUTION OF ART

The cause of the lie into which the art of our society has fallen was that people of the upper classes, having ceased to believe in the Church teaching (called Christian), did not resolve to accept true Christian teaching in its real and fundamental principles of sonship to God and brotherhood to man, but continued to live on without any belief, endeavoring to make up for the absence of belief—some by hypocrisy, pretending still to believe in the nonsense of the Church creeds; others by boldly asserting their disbelief; others by refined agnosticism; and others, again, by returning to the Greek worship of beauty, proclaiming egotism to be right, and elevating it to the rank of a religious doctrine.

The cause of the malady was the non-acceptance of Christ's teaching in its real, that is, its full, meaning. And the only cure lies in acknowledging that teaching in its full meaning. Such acknowledgment in our time is not only possible but inevitable. Already today a man standing on the height of the knowledge of our age, whether he be nominally a Catholic or a Protestant, cannot say that he really be-believes in the dogmas of the Church: in God being a Trinity, in Christ being God, in the scheme of Redemption, and so forth; nor can he satisfy himself by proclaiming his unbelief or scepticism, nor by relapsing into the worship of beauty and egotism. Above all he can no longer say that we do not know the real meaning of Christ's teaching. That meaning has not only become accessible to all men of our times, but the whole life of man today is permeated by the spirit of that teaching and consciously or unconsciously is guided by it.

However differently in form people belonging to our Christian world may define the destiny of man: whether they see it in human progress (in whatever sense of the words), in the union of all men in a socialistic realm, or in the establishment of a commune; whether they look forward to the union of mankind under the guidance of one universal Church, or to the federation of the world—however various in form their definitions of the destination of human life may be, all men in our times already admit that the highest well-being attainable by men is to be reached by their union with one another.

However people of our upper classes (feeling that their ascendancy can only be maintained as long as they separate themselves—the rich and learned—from the laborers, the poor and unlearned) may seek to devise new conceptions of life, by which their privileges may be perpetuated—now the ideal of returning to antiquity, now mysticism, now Hellenism, now the cult of the superior person (supermanism)—they have, willingly or unwillingly, to admit the truth which is becoming clear upon all sides voluntarily and involuntarily, namely, that our welfare lies only in the union and brotherhood of man.

Unconsciously this truth is confirmed by the construction of means of communication—telegraphs, telephones, the press, and the ever-increasing attainability of material well-being for everyone—and consciously it is affirmed by the destruction of superstitions which divide men, by the diffusion of the truths of knowledge, and by the expression of the ideal of the brotherhood of man in the best works of art of our time.

Art is a spiritual organ of human life which cannot be destroyed, and therefore, notwithstanding all the efforts made by people of the upper classes to conceal the religious ideal by which humanity lives, that ideal is more and more clearly recognized by man, and even in our perverted society is more and more often partially expressed by science and by art. During the present century works of the higher kind of religious art, permeated by a truly Christian spirit, have appeared more and more frequently both in literature and in painting, as also works of the universal art of common life accessible to all. So that even art knows the true ideal of our times and tends towards it. On the one hand, the best works of art of our time transmit religious feelings urging toward the union and the brotherhood of man (such are the works of Dickens, Hugo, Dostoevski; and, in painting, of Millet, Bastien Lepage, Jules Breton, Lhermitte, and others); on the other hand, they strive toward the transmission, not of feelings which are natural to people of the upper classes only, but of such feelings as may unite everyone without exception. There are as yet few such works, but the need of them is already acknowledged. In recent times we also meet more and more frequently with attempts at publications, pictures, concerts, and theaters for the people. All this is still very far from accomplishing what should be done, but already the direction in which good art instinctively presses forward to regain the path natural to it can be discerned.

The religious perception of our time—which consists in acknowledging that the aim of life (both collective and individual) is the union of mankind—is already so sufficiently distinct that people have now only to reject the false theory of beauty, according to which enjoyment is considered to be the purpose of art, and religious perception will naturally take its place as the guide of the art of our time.

And as soon as this religious perception which already unconsciously directs the life of man is consciously acknowledged, then immediately and naturally the division of art into art for the lower and art for the upper classes will disappear. There will be one common, brotherly, universal art; and then first, that art will naturally be rejected which transmits feelings incompatible with the religious perception of our time—feelings which do not unite, but divide men—and later that insignificant, exclusive art will be rejected to which an unmerited importance is now attributed.

And as soon as this occurs, art will immediately cease to be, what it has been in recent times, a means of making people coarser and more vicious, and it will become what it always used to be and should be, a means by which humanity progresses toward unity and blessedness.

Strange as the comparison may sound, what has happened to the art of our circle and time is what happens to a woman who sells her womanly attractiveness, intended for maternity, for the pleasure of those who desire such pleasures.

The art of our time and of our circle has become a prostitute. And this comparison holds good even in minute details. Like her it is not limited to certain times, like her it is always adorned, like her it is always saleable, and like her it is enticing and ruinous.

A real work of art can only arise in the soul of an artist occasionally, as the fruit of the life he has lived, just as a child is conceived by its mother. But counterfeit art is produced by artisans and handicraftsmen continually, if only consumers can be found.

Real art, like the wife of an affectionate husband, needs no ornaments. But counterfeit art, like a prostitute, must always be decked out.

The cause of the production of real art is the artist's inner need to express a feeling that has accumulated, just as for a mother the cause of sexual conception was love. The cause of counterfeit art, as of prostitution, is gain.

The consequence of true art is the introduction of a new feeling into the intercourse of life, as the consequence of a wife's love is the birth of a new man into life.

The consequences of counterfeit art are the perversion of man, pleasure which never satisfies, and the weakening of man's spiritual strength.

And this is what people of our day and of our circle should understand, in order to avoid the filthy torrent of depraved and prostituted art with which we are deluged.

CHEKHOV (1860-1904)

Anton Chekhov first became known to the western world as a playwright, but in Russia, although he was well known as the dramatist of the Moscow Art Theater, he had an earlier and more extended reputation as a writer of short stories. English and American story-writers have come to appreciate in Chekhov's work a subtler and more delicate technique than that of Maupassant, and a still more recent discovery has been his supreme charm as a letter writer. Chekhov's letters were first translated by Constance Garnett, and more recently by S. S. Kotliansky and Philip Tomlinson. Those given below are taken from the admirably arranged collection made by Louis S. Friedland, to whom, as well as to his publishers, Minton, Balch and Co., we are indebted for permission to reprint. The full title of Dr. Friedland's book is Letters on the Short Story, the Drama and other Literary Topics by Anton Chekhov.

THE MAN OF CULTURE

TO NIKOLAI CHEKHOV

Moscow, 1886.

You often complain that people 'don't understand you!' Goethe and Newton did not make this complaint.

I assure you as a brother and as a friend that I understand you and feel for you with all my heart. I know your good qualities as I know my five fingers; I value and deeply respect them.

You have only one fault, and the falseness of your position, and your unhappiness, and your catarrh of the bowels are all due to it. That is, your utter lack of culture. You see, life has its conditions. In order to feel comfortable among educated people, to be at home and happy with them, one must have a certain degree of culture. Talent has brought you into such a circle, you belong to it, but—you are drawn away from it, and you hover between cultured people and the next-door lodgers.

Cultured people must, in my opinion, fulfil the following conditions:

1. They respect human personality, and for this reason they are always kind, gentle and ready to give in to others.

2. They have sympathy not alone for beggars and cats. Their heart aches for what the eye does not see.

3. They respect the property of others, and therefore pay their debts.

4. They are sincere, and dread lying as they dread fire. They do not pose; they behave in the streets as they do at home; they do not show off before their humbler comrades. They are not given to empty babbling, and to forcing their uninvited confidences on other people. Out of respect for others, they more often keep silent than talk.

5. They do not disparage themselves to rouse compassion. They do not play on the strings of other people's hearts so that they may sigh and make much of them. They do not cry 'I am misunderstood,' or 'I have become second-rate,' because all this is striving after cheap effect, is low, stale, false.

6. They have no shallow vanity. If they do a pennyworth they do not strut about as though they had done a hundred roubles' worth, and do not brag of having the entry where others are not admitted. The truly talented always keep in obscurity among the crowd, as far as possible from advertisement. Even Kriloff has said that an empty barrel echoes more loudly than a full one.

7. If they have talent, they respect it. They sacrifice to it rest, women, wine, vanity. They are proud of their talent. Besides, they are fastidious.

8. They develop the æsthetic feeling in themselves. They seek as far as possible to restrain and ennoble the sexual instinct. What they want in a woman is not a bed-fellow. They want, especially if they are artists, freshness, elegance, humanity, the capacity for motherhood. They do not swill vodka at all hours of the day and night. They drink only when they are free, on occasion. For they want mens sana in corpore sano. [A sound mind in a sound body.]

And so on. This is what cultured people are like. In order to be cultured and not to stand below the level of your surroundings it is not enough to have read The Pickwick Papers, and memorized a monologue from Faust.

What is needed is constant work, day and 10 night, constant study, will. Every hour is precious for it. Come to us; smash the vodka bottle; lie down and read,—Turgeniév, if you like, whom you have not read.

THE ARTIST'S BUSINESS

TO A. S. SOUVORIN

Moscow, October 27, 1888.

In conversation with my literary colleagues I always insist that it is not the artist's business to solve problems that require a specialist's knowledge. It is a bad 25 thing if a writer tackles a subject he does not understand. We have specialists for dealing with special questions: it is their business to judge of the commune, of the future, of capitalism, of the evils of drunk- 30 enness, of boots, of the diseases of women. An artist must judge only of what he understands, his field is just as limited as that of any other specialist—I repeat this and insist on it always. That in his sphere 35 there are no questions, but only answers, can be maintained only by those who have never written and have had no experience in thinking in images. An artist observes, selects, guesses, combines—and this in it- 40 self presupposes a problem; unless he had set himself a problem from the very first there would be nothing to conjecture and nothing to select. To put it briefly, I will end by using the language of psychiatry: 45 if one denies that creative work involves problems and purposes, one must admit that an artist creates without premeditation or intention, in a state of aberration; therefore, if an author boasted to me of having 50 written a novel without a preconceived design, under a sudden inspiration, I should call him mad.

You are right in demanding that an artist should take an intelligent attitude to 55 his work, but you confuse two things: solving a problem and stating a problem correctly. It is only the second that is obligatory for the artist. In Anna Karenina and Evgeni Onegin not a single problem is solved, but they satisfy you completely because all the problems in these works are correctly stated. It is the business of the judge to put the right questions, but the answers must be given by the jury

according to their own lights.

TO A. N. PLESCHHEYEV

Moscow, October, 1889.

I am not afraid of those who look for a 15 tendency between the lines, and who are determined to regard me either as a liberal or as a conservative. I am not a liberal, not a conservative, not a believer in gradual progress, not a monk, not an indifferentist. I should like to be a free 20 artist and nothing more, and I regret that God has not given me the power to be one.
I hate lying and violence in all their forms, and am equally repelled by the secretaries of consistories and by Notovich and Gradovsky. Pharisaism, stupidity, and despotism reign not in merchants' houses and prisons alone. I see them in science, in literature, in the younger generation.
That is why I have no preference either for gendarmes, or for butchers, or for scientists, or for writers, or for the younger generation. I regard trademarks and labels as a superstition. My holy of 35 holies is the human body, health, intelligence, talent, inspiration, love, and the most absolute freedom—freedom from violence and lying, whatever forms they may take. This is the program I would follow if I were a great artist.

TO A. S. SOUVORIN

Moscow, April 1, 1890.

You abuse me for objectivity, calling it indifference to good and evil, lack of ideals and ideas, and so on. You would have me, when I describe horse-thieves, say, 'Stealing horses is an evil.' But that has been known for ages without my saying so.
Let the jury judge them; it's my job simply to show what sort of people they are. I write: you are dealing with horse-thieves, so let me tell you that they are not beggars but well-fed people, that they are people of a special cult, and that horse-stealing is not simply theft but a passion. Of course it would be pleasant to combine art with a sermon, but for me personally it is extremely difficult and almost impossible, owing to the conditions of technique. You see, to depict horse-thieves in seven hundred lines I must all the time speak and think in their tone and feel in their spirit; otherwise, if I introduce subjectivity, the image becomes blurred and the story will not be as compact as all short stories ought to be. When I write, I reckon entirely upon the reader to add for himself the subjective elements that are lacking in the story.

TWO LETTERS TO GORKY

To A. M. PYESHKOF (MAXIM GORKY)

Yalta, Dec. 3, 1898.

You ask for my opinion of your stories. My opinion? An unquestionable talent, and a real, a great talent at that. In the story On the Steppe, for instance, there is so much power that I even became envious that I was not its author. You are an artist, a clear-eyed man; you feel keenly, you are plastic, i.e., when you picture a thing you see it, and feel it with your hand. This is real art. Now you have my opinion, and I am very glad that I can express it to you. I am very glad, I repeat, and if we were to meet and speak for an hour or two, you would see how highly I value you and what hopes I have in your talent.

Shall I now speak of your defects? This is not so easy. To speak of the defects of a man of talent is the same as to speak of the defects of a big tree that grows in a garden; the main reality here is not in the tree but in the emotion aroused in him who looks at the tree. Isn't it so?

I shall begin by saying that you, in my opinion, have no self-restraint. You are like a spectator in a theater who expresses his delight so unreservedly that it prevents himself and others from listening. This lack of self-restraint is especially evident in the descriptions of nature with which you interrupt the dialogue; as one reads these descriptions one wishes they were more compact, shorter, say about two or three lines or so. The frequent mention of 'softness,' 'whisper,' 'velvety smoothness' etc., impart to these descriptions a certain floridness, monotony,—they cool one's ardor and almost tire one. The lack of self-restraint is felt also in the portrayal of women (Malva; On the Raft), and of love scenes. It is not a free swing, a broadness of the brush, but precisely the lack of self-restraint. Then, too, there is a frequent use of words entirely out of place in stories of your type. 'Accompaniment,' 'disc,' 'harmony,'—such words are disturbing. In the delineation of the intelligentsia there is something forced, as if you feel a sense of uncertainty. This is not due to lack of study of the intelligentsia; you know them, but it seems as if you do not know from what angle to approach them.

How old are you? I do not know you. I don't know where you came from and who you are, but it seems to me that while you are still young, you ought to leave Nizhni and for two or three years to live among, to rub elbows, as it were, with literary people and literature. Not in order to learn a different tune or to acquire more cunning or skill, but in order to plunge over head and ears in literature and learn to love it. Besides, the provinces make one prematurely old. Potapenko, Mamin, Ertel,—they are all excellent people. At first, perhaps, you will feel a sense of tedium in their company, but a year or two later you will grow accustomed to them, and they will repay you with interest for the unpleasantness and the discomforts of town-life.

Be well and happy. I warmly press your hand. Once more, thanks for your letter.

Yalta, Jan. 3, 1899.

... Apparently you have misunderstood me a little. I did not write to you of coarseness of style, but only of the incongruity of foreign, not genuinely Russian, or rarely used words. In other authors such words as, for instance, 'fatalistically,' pass unnoticed, but your things are musical, harmonious, and every crude touch jars fearfully. Of course it is a question of taste, and perhaps this is only a sign of excessive fastidiousness in me, or the conservatism of a man who has adopted definite habits for himself long ago. I am resigned to 'a collegiate assessor,' and a 'captain of the second rank,' in descriptions, but 'flirt' and 'champion' when they occur in descriptions excite repulsion in me.

Are you self-educated? In your stories you are completely an artist and at the same time an 'educated' man in the truest sense.

Nothing is less characteristic of you than coarseness; you are clever and subtle and delicate in your feelings. Your best things are On the Steppe, and On the Raft—did I write to you about that? They are splendid things, masterpieces; they show the artist who has passed through a very good school. I don't think that I am mistaken. The only defect is the lack of restraint, the lack of grace. When a man spends the least possible number of movements over some definite action, that is grace. One is conscious of superfluity in your expenditure.

The descriptions of nature are the work of an artist; you are a real landscape painter. Only the frequent personification (anthropomorphism) when the sea breathes, the sky gazes, the steppe barks, nature whispers, speaks, mourns, and so on—such metaphors make your descriptions somewhat monotonous, somewhat sweetish, sometimes not clear; beauty and expressiveness in nature are attained only by simplicity, by such simple phrases as 'The sun set,' 'It was dark,' 'It began to rain,' and so on—and that simplicity is characteristic of you in the highest degree, more so perhaps than of any other writer.

REALISM IN LITERATURE

TO M. V. KISELEV

January 14, 1887.

Even your praise of On the Road has not lessened my anger as an author, and I hasten to avenge myself for what you say about Mire. Be on your guard, and take firm hold of the back of your chair that you do not faint. Well, here goes.

It is best to meet every critical article with a silent bow, even if it is abusive and unjust—such is the literary etiquette. It is not the correct thing to answer, and all who do so are justly blamed for excessive vanity. But since your criticism is like 'an evening conversation on the steps of the Babinko lodge,' and as, without touching on the literary aspects of the story, it raises general questions of principle, I shall not be sinning against the etiquette if I allow myself to continue our conversation.

In the first place, I, like you, do not admire literature of the kind we are discussing. As a reader and a 'private citizen,' I am glad to avoid it, but if you ask my honest and sincere opinion about it, I shall say that it is still an open question whether it has a right to exist,—a question that has as yet not been settled. You and I and the critics of all the world have no such firm certainty as would give us the right to disown this literature. I do not know who is right: Homer, Shakespeare, Lope de Vega, the ancients generally who did not fear to grub in the 'dunghill,' but who were more stable in their moral relations than we, or the modern writers, fastidious on paper, but coldly cynical in soul and in their manner of life. I do not know who has bad taste: the Greeks, who were not ashamed to sing such love as really is in beautiful Nature, or the readers of Gaboriau, Marlitt, Per Bobo. Like the problems of non-resistance to evil, free-will, etc., this question can be settled only in the future. We can only think about it, but to solve it means to go beyond the limits of our competency. Reference to Turgeniev and Tolstoy, who avoided this 'dunghill,' does not clear up the question. Their aversion does not prove anything; there were writers before them who not only regarded sordidness as 'scoundrelly among scoundrels,' but held the same view of descriptions of muzhiks and clerks and all beneath the titular rank. And a single period, no matter how brilliant, does not give us the right to draw an inference in favor of this or the other tendency. Nor does reference to the corrupting influence of a given literary tendency solve the question. Everything in this world is relative and approximate. There are people who will be corrupted even by juvenile literature, who read with particular pleasure the piquant passages in the Psalter and the Proverbs of Solomon, while there are those who become purer the more they know about the evil side of life. Publicists, lawyers, physicians, initiated into all the secret human sins, are not reputed to be immoral; realistic writers are often more moral than archimandrites. And finally, no literature can in its cynicism surpass actual life; a wineglassful will not make drunk the man who has already emptied a whole cask.

2. That the world 'swarms with male and female scum' is perfectly true. Human nature is imperfect and it would, therefore, be strange to find only righteous people on this earth. But to think that the task of literature is to gather the pure grain from the muckheap, is to reject literature itself. Artistic literature is called so just because it depicts life as it really is. Its aim is truth,—unconditional and honest. To narrow down its functions to such a specialty as selecting the 'unsullied,' is as fatal to it as to have Levitan paint a tree and forbid him to include the dirty bark and the yellow leaves. I agree with you that the 'cream' is a fine thing, but a litterateur is not a confectioner, not a dealer in cosmetics, not an entertainer; he is a man bound, under compulsion, by the realization of his duty and by his conscience; having put his hand to the plow he must not plead weakness; and no matter how painful it is to him, he is constrained to overcome his aversion and soil his imagination with the sordidness of life. He is just like any ordinary reporter. What would you say if a newspaper reporter, because of his fastidiousness or from a wish to give pleasure to his readers, were to describe only honest mayors, high-minded ladies, and virtuous railroad contractors? To a chemist, nothing on earth is unclean. A writer must be as objective as a chemist; he must abandon the subjective line; he must know that dungheaps play a very respectable part in a landscape, and that evil passions are as inherent in life as good ones.

3. Writers are the children of their age, and therefore, like the rest of the public, ought to surrender to the external conditions of society. Thus, they must be absolutely decent. Only this have we the right to require of the realists. For the rest, you say nothing against the form and execution of Mire. . . . And so, I take it, I have been decent.

4. I admit that I seldom consult my conscience when I write. This is due to habit and the brief, compressed form of my work. Let us say that when I express this or that opinion about literature, I do not take myself into account.

5. You write: 'If I were the editor, I would have returned to you this feuilleton for your own good.' Why not go further? Why not go for the editors who print such stories? Why not denounce the Administration of the Press for not suppressing immoral newspapers?

The fate of literature would be woeful (both little and great literature) if you left it to the will of individuals. That's the first thing. In the second place, there is no police which we can consider competent in literary matters. I agree that we must have curbs and whips, for knaves find their way even into literature, but, think what you will, you cannot find a better police for literature than criticism and the author's own conscience. People have been trying to discover such a police since the creation of the world, but nothing better has been found. You would wish me to suffer the loss of one hundred and fifteen roubles and be censured by the editor. Others, among them your father, are delighted with the story. Some send letters of reproach to Souvorin, reviling everything, the newspaper, me, etc. Who, then, is right? Who is the judge?

6. Further, you write: 'Leave such writing to spiritless and unfortunate scribes like Okreits, Pince-nez or Aloe.'

May Allah pardon me if you wrote those lines sincerely. To be condescending toward humble people because of their humbleness does not do honor to the human heart. In literature, the lower ranks are as necessary as in the army,—so says the mind, and the heart ought to confirm this most thoroughly.

SCIENCE AND THE SPIRIT

TO A. S. SOUVORIN

Moscow, November, 1888.

In the November number of the Sieverny Vjestnik there is an article by the poet Merezhkovsky about your humble servant. It is a long article. I commend to your attention the end of it; it is characteristic. Merezhkovsky is still very young, a student—of science, I believe. Those who have assimilated the wisdom of the scientific method and learned to think scientifically experience many alluring temptations. Archimedes wanted to turn the earth round, and the present-day hot-heads want by science to conceive the inconceivable, to discover the physical laws of creative art, to detect the laws and the formulæ which are instinctively felt by the artist and are followed by him in creating music, novels, pictures, etc. Such formulæ probably exist in nature. We know that A, B, C, do, re, mi, fa, sol, are found in nature, and so are curves, straight lines, circles, squares, green, blue, and red. . . . We know that in certain combinations all this produces a melody or a poem, or a picture, just as simple chemical substances in certain combinations produce a tree, or a stone, or the sea; but all we know is that the combination exists, while the law of it is hidden from us. Those who are masters of the scientific method feel in their souls that a piece of music and a tree have something in common, that both are built up in accordance with equally uniform and simple laws. Hence the question: What are these laws? And hence the temptation to work out a physiology of creative art (like Boborikin), or in the case of younger and more diffident writers, to base their arguments on nature and on the laws of nature (Merezhkovsky). There probably is such a thing as the physiology of creative art, but we must nip in the bud our dreams of discovering it. If the critics take up a scientific attitude, no good will come of it: they will waste a dozen years, write a lot of rubbish, make the subject more obscure than ever—and nothing more. It is always a good thing to think scientifically, but the trouble is that scientific thinking about creative art will be bound to degenerate in the end into searching for the 'cells' or the 'centers' which control the creative faculty. Some stolid German will discover these cells somewhere in the occipital lobes, another German will agree with him, a third will disagree, and a Russian will glance through the article about the cells and reel off an essay about it in the Sievernny Viestnik. The Viestnik Evrope will criticize the essay, and for three years there will be in Russia an epidemic of nonsense which will give money and popularity to blockheads and do nothing but irritate intelligent people.

For those who are obsessed with the scientific method and to whom God has given the rare talent of thinking scientifically, there is to my mind only one way out—the philosophy of creative art. One might collect together all the best works of art that have been produced throughout the ages and, with the help of the scientific method, discover the common element in them which makes them like one another and conditions their value. That common element will be the law. There is a great deal that works which are called immortal have in common; if this common element were excluded from each of them, a work would lose its charm and its value. So that this universal something is necessary, and is the conditio sine qua non [indispensable condition] of every work that claims to be immortal. It is of more use to young people to write critical articles than poetry. Merezhkovsky writes smoothly and youthfully, but at every page he loses heart, makes reservations and concessions, and this means that he is not clear upon the subject. He calls me a poet, he styles my stories 'novelli,' and my heroes 'failures'—that is, he follows the beaten track. It is time to give up these 'failures,' superfluous people, etc., and to think of something original. Merezhkovsky calls my monk who composes the songs of praise a failure. But how is he a failure? God grant us all a life like his: he believed in God, and he had enough to eat and he had the gift of composing poetry. To divide men into the successful and the unsuccessful is to look at human nature from a narrow, preconceived point of view. Are you a success or not? Am I? Was Napoleon? Is your servant, Vassily? What is the criterion? One must be a god to be able to tell successes from failures without making a mistake.

GORKY (1868-)

'Maxim Gorky' is the pen-name of Alexei Maximovitch Pyeshkof, who was born at Nijni-Novgorod in miserable circumstances, which often compelled him to gain a scanty living in his childhood by begging and even by stealing. Driven out to work at an early age, he ran away from home to serve as cook's boy on a Volga boat and for years led the wandering life of a workman who was more than half a tramp. The material acquired in this strange fashion he turned to account in stories and sketches of vagabonds, which won him first Russian and then European fame. Exiled from Russia on account of his political sympathies, he came to the United States, where he met with a very chilling reception, and he then retired to the Isle of Capri, from which he was recalled on the outbreak of the European War. At the Russian Revolution, he threw in his lot with the Soviet Government, protected the intellectuals as far as he could, and served as assistant to the Minister of Education. Always a sympathizer with western ideals of progress and democracy, Gorky was bitterly disappointed with the outcome of the War and the Revolution, and withdrew from Russia, stricken with tuberculosis, to a German sanitarium. He has written short stories, novels and plays, all marked with a bitter sense of the wrongs of the outcast and oppressed; his method is uncompromisingly realistic, and his style is vigorous and direct. The following extracts from letters written at the time of Tolstoy's last flight from home and ensuing death are taken from Gorky's Reminiscences of Leo Nikolaevich Tolstoy, translated by S. S. Kotliansky and Leonard Woolf, and published by B. W. Huebsch, to whom we are indebted for permission to reprint.

TOLSTOY'S FLIGHT

I have just posted a letter to you—telegrams have arrived telling of 'Tolstoy's flight,' and now, once more, one with you in thought I write again.

Probably all I want to say about the news will seem to you confused, perhaps even harsh and ill-tempered, but you will forgive me. I am feeling as though I had been gripped by the throat and nearly strangled.

I had many long conversations with him; when he was living at Gaspra in the Crimea I often went to him and he liked coming to me; I have studied his books lovingly; it seems to me that I have the right to say what I think of him even if it be bold and differ widely from the general opinion. I know as well as others that no man is more worthy than he of the name of genius; no one was more complicated, contradictory, and great in everything—yes, in everything. Great, in some curious sense, broad, indefinable by words, there is something in him which made me desire to cry aloud to everyone: 'Look what a wonderful man is living on the earth.' For he is, so to say, universally and above all, a man of mankind.

But what always repelled me in him was that stubborn despotic inclination to turn the life of Count Leo Nikolaevich (Tolstoy) into 'the saintly life of our blessed father, boyard Leo.'

As you know, he had for long intended to suffer; he expressed his regret to E. Soloviev, and to Suler, that he had not succeeded; but he wanted to suffer simply, not out of a natural desire to test the resistance of his will, but with the obvious and, I repeat, the despotic intention of increasing the influence of his religious ideas, the weight of his teaching, in order to make his preaching irresistible, to make it holy in the eyes of man through his suffering; to force them to accept it—you understand, to force them. For he realized that ~~that~~ preaching is not sufficiently convincing; in his diary you will, some day, read good examples of scepticism applied by him to his own preaching and personality. He knows that 'martyrs and sufferers, with rare exceptions, are despots and tyrants'—he knows everything!—and yet he says to himself, 'Were I to suffer for my ideas, they would have a greater influence.' It was this in him that always repelled me, for I cannot help feeling that it was an attempt to use violence upon me, a desire to get hold of my conscience, to dazzle it with the glory of righteous blood, to put upon my neck the yoke of a dogma.

He always greatly exalted immortality on the other side of this life, but he preferred it on this side. A writer, national in the truest and most complete sense, he embodied in his great soul all the defects of his nation, all the mutilations we have suffered by the ordeals of our history; his misty preaching of 'non-activity,' of 'non-resistance to evil,' the doctrine of passivism, all this is the unhealthy ferment of the old Russian blood, envenomed by Mongolian fatalism and almost chemically hostile to the West with its untiring creative labor, with its active and indomitable resistance to the evils of life. What is called Tolstoy's 'anarchism' essentially and fundamentally expresses our Slav anti-Stateism, which, again, is really a national characteristic, ingrained in our flesh from old times, our desire to scatter nomadically. Up to now we have indulged that desire passionately, as you and everyone else know. We Russians know it too, but we always break away along the line of least resistance; we see that this is pernicious, but still we crawl further and further away from one another; and these mournful cockroach journeyings are called 'the history of Russia,' the history of a State which has been established almost incidentally, mechanically—to the surprise of the majority of its honest-minded citizens—by the forces of the Variags, Tartars, Baltic Germans, and petty officials. To their surprise, I say, because all the time we have been 'scattering'; and only when we reached places beyond which we could find nothing worse—when we could go no further—well, then we stopped and settled down. This is the destiny to which we are doomed, to settle in the snows and marshes, by the side of the wild Erza, Tchood, Mervy, Vess and Muroma.

Yet men arose among us who realized that light must come to us not from the East but from the West, and now he, Leo Nikolaevich, the crown of our ancient history, wishes, consciously or unconsciously, to stretch himself like a vast mountain across our nation's path to Europe, to the active life which sternly demands of men the supreme effort of their spiritual forces. His attitude toward science, too, is certainly national; one sees magnificently reflected in him the old, Russian village-scepticism which comes from ignorance. Everything is national in him and all his preaching is a reaction from the past, an atavism which we had already begun to shake off and overcome.

Think of his letter 'The Intelligentsia, the State, the People' written in 1905—what a pernicious, malignant thing it is! You can hear in it the sectarian's 'I told you so.' I wrote an answer to him at the time, based on his own words to me, that he had long since forfeited the right to speak of and on behalf of the Russian people; for I am a witness of his lack of desire to listen and to understand the people who came to talk to him soul to soul. My letter was bitter, and in the end I did not send it to him.

LEO TOLSTOY IS DEAD

A telegram came containing the commonest of words: 'is dead.'

It struck me to the heart: I cried with pain and anger, and now half crazy, I imagine him as I knew and saw him; I am tormented by a desire to speak with him. I imagine him in his coffin; he lies like a smooth stone at the bottom of a stream, and in his gray beard, I am sure, is quietly hidden that aloof, mysterious little smile. And at last his hands are folded peacefully; they have finished their hard task.

I remember his keen eyes—they saw everything through and through—and the movements of his fingers, as though they were perpetually modeling something out of the air, his talk, his jokes, his favorite peasant words, his elusive voice. And I see what a vast amount of life was embodied in the man, how inhumanly clever he was, how terrifying.

I once saw him as, perhaps, no one has ever seen him. I was walking over to him at Gaspria along the coast, and behind Yussupov's estate, on the shore among the stones I saw his smallish, angular figure in a gray, crumpled, ragged suit and crumpled hat. He was sitting with his head on his hands, the wind blowing the silvery hairs of his beard through his fingers: he was looking into the distance out to sea, and the little greenish waves rolled up obediently to his feet and fondled them as if they were telling something about themselves to the old magician. It was a day of sun and cloud, and the shadows of the clouds glided over the stones, and with the stones, the old man grew now bright and now dark. The boulders were large, riven by cracks and covered with smelly sea-weed; there had been a high tide. He, too, seemed to me like an old stone come to life, who knows all the beginnings and the ends of things, who considers when and what will be the end of the stone, of the grasses of the earth, of the waters of the sea, and of the whole universe from the pebble to the sun. And the sea is part of his soul, and everything around him comes from him, out of him. In the musing motionlessness of the old man I felt something fateful, magical, something which went down into the darkness beneath him and stretched up like a searchlight into the blue emptiness above the earth; as though it were he, his concentrated will, which was drawing the waves to him and repelling them, which was ruling the movements of cloud and shadow, which was stirring the stones to life. Suddenly, in a moment of madness, I felt, 'It is possible he will get up, wave his hand, and the sea will become solid and glassy, the stones will begin to move and cry out, everything around him will come to life, acquire a voice, and speak in their different voices of themselves, of him, against him.' I cannot express in words what I felt rather than thought at that moment; in my soul there was joy and fear, and then everything blended in one happy thought: 'I am not an orphan on the earth as long as this man lives on it.'

Then I walked on tip-toe away, in order that the pebbles might not scrunch under my feet, not wishing to distract his thoughts. And now I feel I am an orphan, I cry as I write—never before have I cried so inconsolably and in such bitter despair. I do not know whether I loved him; but does it matter, love of him or hatred? He always roused in me sensations and agitations which were enormous, fantastic; even the unpleasant and hostile feelings which he roused were of a kind not to oppress but rather to explode the soul; they made it more sensitive and capacious. He was grand when, with his boots scraping over the ground, as though he were imperiously smoothing its unevenness, he suddenly appeared from somewhere, from behind a door or out of some corner, and came toward you with the short, light, quick step of a man accustomed to walk a great deal on the earth. With his thumbs in his belt he would stop for a second, looking round quickly and with a comprehensive glance, a glance which at once took in anything new and instantly absorbed the meaning of everything.

'How do you do?'

I always translated these words into: 'How do you do? There's pleasure for me, and for you there's not much sense in it; but still, how do you do?'

He would come out looking rather small, and immediately everyone round him would become smaller than he. A peasant's beard, rough but extraordinary hands, simple clothes; all this external, comfortable democratism deceived many people, and I often saw how Russians who judge people by their clothes—an old slavish habit—began to pour out a stream of their odious 'frankness,' which is more properly called 'the familiarity of the pig-sty.'

'Ah! you are one of us! That's what you are. At last, by God's grace, I am face to face with the greatest son of our native land. Hail for ever! I now bow to you.'

That is a sample of Muscovite Russian, simple and hearty, and here is another but 'free thinkerish':

'Leo Nikolaevich, though I disagree with your religious-philosophical views, I deeply respect in your person the greatest of artists.'

And suddenly, under his peasant's beard, under his democratic crumpled blouse, there would rise the old Russian barin, the grand aristocrat; then the noses of the simple-hearted visitors, educated and all the rest, instantly became blue with intolerable cold. It was pleasant to see this creature of the purest blood, to watch the noble grace of his gestures, the proud reserve of his speech, to hear the exquisite pointedness of his murderous words. He showed just as much of the barin as was needed for these serfs, and when they called out the barin in Tolstoy, it appeared naturally and easily, and crushed them so that they shriveled up and whined.

One day I was returning from Yasnaya Polyana to Moscow with one of these 'simple-hearted' Russians, a Moscow man, and for a long time he could not recover his breath, but kept on smiling woefully and repeating in astonishment: 'Well, well, that was a cold bath. He's severe . . . pooh!'

And in the middle of it all, he exclaimed apparently with regret: 'And I thought he was really an anarchist. Everyone keeps on saying "anarchist, anarchist," and I believe it. . . .'

The man was a large, rich manufacturer, 10 with a great belly and a face the color of raw meat; why did he want Tolstoy to be an anarchist? One of the 'profound mysteries' of the Russian soul!

When Leo Nikolaevich wished to please, 15 he could do so more easily than a clever and beautiful woman. Imagine a company of people of all kinds sitting in his room: the Grand Duke Nikolay Mikhailovich, the house-painter Ilya, a social-democrat from Yalta, the stundist Patzuk, a musician, a 5 German, the manager of the estates of Countess Kleinmichel, the poet Bulgakov; and all look at him with the same enamored eyes.

He explains to them the teaching of Lao-Tse, and he seems to me an extraordinary man-orchestra, possessing the faculty of playing several instruments at the same time, a brass trumpet, a drum, harmonium, and flute. I used to look at him just as 15 the others did. And now I long to see him once more—and I shall never see him again.

ROMAIN ROLLAND (1866-)

Tolstoy's What is Art? had its germ in a letter he wrote in answer to an inquiry from his young disciple, Romain Rolland, as early as October, 1887. Rolland's chief interest was music, and he was distressed by his adored prophet's antagonism to modern art. In the full message of What is Art? Rolland found much to disconcert him, but he held to the position that 'Tolstoy's conception is fundamentally fruitful and vital, in spite of its Utopianism and a touch of puerility.' Romain Rolland's enterprise of 'the People's Theater,' to which his main contribution was a series of plays about phases of the French Revolution, was an attempt, not altogether successful, to apply to the French drama the theory of popular art his master Tolstoy had expounded. As was the case with Zola's novels, the plays Rolland wrote to illustrate his theory have proved less significant than the essay in which the theory was set forth. Part of this essay is reprinted below as translated by Barrett H. Clark, and published by Henry Holt and Co. in a volume entitled The People's Theater.

THE PEOPLE'S THEATER

The People's Theater is the key to a new art world, which art has hardly caught sight of. We have reached a parting of the ways, beyond which lies an almost totally unexplored land. Two or three more venturesome spirits have gone ahead. But the instinct of the people should have guided these artists. The people speak frankly, and their preferences leave no possible room for doubt. But what artist cares in the least what the public wants? They consider it contemptible not to feel contempt for the people.

Mocked at or disdained, little do the people care! For the last hundred years they have remained faithful to the entertainment so despised by the delicate: the circus, the pantomime, the burlesque, and the melodrama. That is, if not simple plays, these arouse simple emotions, simple pleasures—good and bad—but still simple, appealing to the soul through the senses.

In Greece the theater was popular. What were the plays of the Greeks? It has been fashionable of late to adapt the Greek tragedies. Ædipus the King has in this way been given new popularity. But the witty critics, wishing to show that they cannot be deceived, took great pains to point out that Ædipus was fundamentally nothing but melodrama (with a secret pride, no doubt, in having convicted Sophocles of his inferiority to the modern dramatists). They are not mistaken in calling the play melodrama: Ædipus is a melodrama, and one of the most horrible of its kind. The Oresteia is another, but not even M. d'Ennery would have dared write such sensational horrors as are found in this trilogy.

The Elizabethan drama of England was people's drama. From time to time certain of Shakespeare's plays are produced here. The critics can never sufficiently praise the marvelous acting, the exquisite setting, the able stage-management, the exquisite music, and the admirable translation (though sometimes they attribute to Shakespeare the inventions of the translator!): but they seem to insinuate that Shakespeare is very lucky indeed to be produced with all these elements of success, without mentioning the greatest of all: the prestige of age. They insinuate that A Midsummer Night's Dream is nothing but farce, and Macbeth a melodrama with ridiculous bloody ghosts, remorse, and all the sickly-conscious paraphernalia—a regular Ambigu 'melo.' And of course, people of taste cannot help laughing at the wholesale slaughter at the end of Hamlet. When King Lear is produced the audience is spared the mad ravings of the King and Cornwall's horrible atrocity to Gloucester.

Irony, contempt, or fashionable enthusiasm! This was the lot of the people's plays, and it still is. There is no doubt a great chasm between the sublime melodramas of Shakespeare and Sophocles, and our cheap manufactured products, all cut to a pattern. But without troubling to consider the scribblers who write melodramas—and they are worse than the rest because they rob the poor—let us study the type, and learn the true reason for its success.

'Take two sympathetic characters, one the victim, the other the sinister and hateful villain; introduce a few grotesque figures out of everyday life, a few timely political, religious, or social allusions; mix tears with laughter, and add a song with an easy chorus. Five acts in all and as few waits as possible.' Here is your recipe.

It is easy to criticize melodrama, but, as has been observed by M. Georges Jubin in a very intelligent little article on melodrama, 'even in making fun of it, you will have discovered the law of the People's Theater. You will learn that four things are necessary to please the people: the mixing of laughter and tears; the interlude; the presence of evil but with the hint that good will prevail; and a long evening's entertainment which is worth the price of admission. In other words: Mingling of pleasing and painful emotions, True realism, Simple morality, and Getting one's money's worth. The dramatist must think of this last point if he is in earnest, and wishes really to found a People's Theater.'

First, then, the necessity for varied emotions: the people come to the theater to feel, and not to learn. Since they give themselves up entirely to their feelings, they demand that the emotions offered them be varied, for prolonged sadness or gaiety would be too great a strain. They seek relief from laughter in tears, and from tears in laughter.

Second, the necessity for true realism. One of the principal reasons for the success of a melodrama lies in the scrupulous exactitude with which such and such a well-known place is reproduced: a cabaret, a market, a pawnshop, or the like.

Third, the necessity for simple morality. The popular public demands, not as a result of their simple-mindedness but as a sort of hygiene, some support for the innate conviction in every one of them that good will eventually triumph over evil. It is right that they should feel this, for it is a law of life and progress.

Fourth, the necessity for a square deal. There exists an implicit agreement on the part of dramatists and directors not to rob the public by keeping them shut up in a theater for four hours and giving them less than two hours' actual entertainment. The people come to the theater to see the play, and not, as in the ordinary play-houses, to exhibit themselves, to gossip, or to flirt.

Which of the two publics cares more about art? Are not the rules we have just outlined legitimate, human, and vital? It only remains to apply them with artistic integrity. The dramatists have only themselves to blame if modern melodrama, which is left to the first comer, is so stupid. Let them improve it! Let them stop writing the facile outmoded plays now in fashion, and turn their efforts to writing people's plays, ridding these of the accumulated crudeness that generations of unscrupulous purveyors have allowed to infest them; let them put truth and body into the form, and enbellish it with dignified French. They would derive no less benefit than the people themselves, for they would escape the fashionable and consequently the transitory, and come nearer to the eternal realities of mankind.

As a matter of fact, there is no form so difficult and so sublime as great poetic melodrama. A perfect specimen is the product of genius. The form cannot be reduced to rules. To put the great and simple passions into the breasts of great and simple human beings as universal as Romeo, Macbeth, Othello, and Cordelia, to extract from the naturally developed story or the conflict between human beings true tragic action, to write a play that blinds with its light and groans as from a convulsion of nature—no one can do this unless he is a superhuman creature, an Æschylus, a Shakespeare, a Wagner. For such, there is no rule.

It only remains to express the hope that our poetry may come a little nearer to the tragic in daily life, and extract from it the eternal elements, the mystery, the music of the soul. The greatest of our French dramatists—Balzac, a novelist by the way!—affords us a splendid example of this. Our modern life is teeming not only with tragic beauty, but with poetically fantastic forces, close akin to the legends of antiquity. Says Gabriele d'Annunzio: 'One has only to watch the confusing whirlwind of living things pass by, watch them in that spirit of fancy Leonardo speaks of when he advises his disciples to observe the cracks in the wall, the ashes on the hearth, the clouds, the mud, and to listen to the bells—to discover invenzioni mirabilissime and infinite cose.' [Most wonderful inventions and infinite things.] Life is for everyone, but how few know how to use it!

There is another type of drama which we may here consider, one in which Shakespeare excelled: the historical drama. The author of Henry IV and Richard III created a national epic covering English history from King John to Henry VIII, including the Wars of the Roses and Agincourt.

The historical play is a new type to us. Our French dramatists have neglected the form. There is a treasure-house of passions in our history, waiting to be thrown open to our actors as well as our public, who know so little of it, and that little so badly. France has perhaps the most heroic history of any since the days of Rome. Nothing that is human is foreign to her. From Attila to Napoleon, from the fields of Catalauni to Waterloo, from the Crusades to the Convention, the destinies of the world have been fought for and decided on her soil. The heart of Europe beat within the breasts of her monarchs, her thinkers, and her Revolutionary leaders. No matter how great this people has been in the realm of intellect it has been preëminently great in deeds. Action is the most sublime creation of France, its theater, its drama, its epic. France accomplished what other nations dreamed. We never wrote an Iliad, but we have lived a dozen; the Iliad of Charlemagne, of the Normans, of Godfrey of Boulogne, of Saint Louis, of Jeanne d'Arc, of Henry IV, of the Marseillaise, of the Corsican Alexander, of the Commune, and even in our own days, of Africa. Our heroes have touched the heights as often as our poets. No Shakespeare has celebrated their achievements; but the Bérnais at the head of his band, or Danton on the scaffold, have spoken and acted genuine Shakespeare. During her existence France has touched the heights of happiness and sunk to the depths of despair; her story is a vast Human Comedy, a series of dramas where strong wills command whole armies of passions. Each epoch is a different poem, and yet throughout them all, one is conscious of the persistence of indestructible characteristics, the destiny of a race: this is the grandiose and magnificent unity of the epic.

All this marvelous material remains untouched by French art; for we really cannot count the dime-novel dramas of Dumas the Elder, the sensational trifles of Sardou, and l'Aiglon! The only writers who, like Vitet, really understood the historical drama, were contemplative souls, who never intended their plays to be acted. 'There is something false, something insulting to the intelligence in the disproportionate attention paid nowadays to the historical anecdote, the trifling incident of the past at the expense of what is vital and living in history. It is not our intention to give the dilettante of this sort of history a frigid miniature, interesting as a matter of fashion and local color; we must rather resuscitate the forces of the past, and revive their motive power to action.' 'The drama of our day,' wrote Schiller, 'must combat the torpor, the sloth, the lack of character, and intellectual vulgarity of the day; it must therefore exhibit strength and character; it must stir and exalt the heart. Pure beauty is limited to the happy nations. When the poet addresses a generation of sick and troubled people, he must stir them with the greatest emotions.' He must offer them a heroic art.

May the People's Theater create a great historical drama in France! The aristocratic poets have failed, in spite of their efforts. This failure might have been expected, for plays of this sort demand the spirit of a whole nation; without it you cannot do other than write conventional poems, of interest only to the erudite members of an academy.

No other sort of play is better adapted to the Theater we are seeking to found. Without considering the communicative emotion which is invariably aroused in the people by witnessing actual events rather than by seeing fictitious adventures; without considering the illusion, more nearly complete than in any other literary invention; without considering the magnetic force of example, and of the action which irresistibly springs from action, historical drama enjoys the inestimable advantage of shaping the conscience and the intelligence of the people.

The majority of those who take it upon themselves to educate the people demand that the drama shall offer a cut-and-dried solution to the problems of the day. Leaving aside the fact that some problems cannot be solved at present, and that it would be most unwise to try to hasten their solution, there is nothing more fatal to education than to impose ready-made formulas on the people. What really matters is the development of their minds through the intelligence, and the training of the powers of observation. History will teach them to come out of themselves, and observe the souls of others—friends and enemies alike. They will once more find themselves in the past, where characters are much the same as they are now, only different in appearance, with the same vices and weakness as themselves; and these they can recognize and possibly guard against. The confession of their own faults will perhaps induce them to be lenient toward others. The perpetual train of varying ideas, customs and prejudices set before them may perhaps show them that their own ideas, customs and prejudices are not the center round which the world revolves, and that justice and reason cannot be founded upon a few pharisaical rules; may teach them to contemplate transitory things, and not mistake them for eternal.

But this knowledge of the past does more than instil lessons of tolerance: such indulgent scepticism is but the first step. The spectacle of change only increases the solidity of what remains unchangeable. It is one of the chief assets of history that it separates the rock from the sands that cover it. In place of the blind instinct of the mob, it furnishes the moral unity of the family, cemented by the triple bond of blood, thought, and trials shared. It need not of necessity awaken fanatic chauvinism, but only a spirit of fraternal solidarity among all the men of one nation. Let each individual realize the links binding him to the community, and may his life become richer from his knowledge of the lives that have been and are to be. With such a conscience, he will see more urgent reasons for action. The spirit which is evoked out of past centuries is for the centuries to come. If we would create strong souls, let us nourish them with the strength of the whole world.

The world—for the nation alone is not enough. A hundred years ago the enlightened Schiller said: 'I write as a citizen of the world. Early in life I exchanged my fatherland for humanity.' Almost a century ago, the serene Goethe said:

'National literature means very little today: world literature is at hand, and each one must labor to make it an accomplished fact.' And he added: 'If I am not mistaken, the French will reap the greatest benefit from the movement.'

Then let us realize his prophecy! Let us lead back the French to their own history, which is the source of a people's art; but let us take care not to exclude the historic legends of other peoples. Undoubtedly, our own history lies nearer our hearts, and our first duty is to develop it. But the great events and deeds of all the nations must find a place on our stage. As Cloots and Thomas Paine were elected members of the Convention; as Schiller, Klopstock, Washington, Priestley, Bentham, Pestalozzi, and Kosciusko were made French citizens through Danton's decree—let the heroes of the world become our heroes likewise. May France be their second fatherland, especially for the people's heroes. The People's Theater shall be open to everyone who is of or for the people. Let us construct in Paris an epic of all Europe.

We must also be careful not to remain merely the singers of the past. The new energy we shall generate must not be allowed to stand idle. Action must spring from the spectacle of action. Once we have gathered our forces and become conscious of our power, let us march forward! Armed with the greatness of the past, we shall strive to create the new man, a man of stalwart moral fiber and of truth. The story of past heroism, such as I have described it, is not a lantern hung from the rear end of a train, casting an uncertain light over the road that has been traveled; it is a lighthouse in the night, marking the position of the ship in the ocean whence it comes and whither it is going. Separated from the past, the present has no meaning, just as the past is without significance apart from the present. Both past and present must unite to give meaning to the greatest thing of all: Life. The life of all time must be consolidated into a unified whole, one being with a thousand bodies, and strive from every direction to attack the universe, which some day it will dominate.

I have thus insisted upon the historical drama because I confess to an especial fondness for it, and why should I not speak of what I know best? Besides, it was necessary to defend not the form itself (because we have no historical plays in France) but the disrepute into which some of the Romantics have thrown it. The historical drama is only one field open to our People's Theater. Let us open the way to others.

First among these is the social drama, with which a generation of vigorous dramatists have been so busily concerned. 10 Following in the footsteps of Ibsen, Björnson, and Hauptmann, poets of the north, Jean Jullien, Descaves, Mirbeau, Ancy, Hervieu, Brieux, François de Curel, and Emile Fabre have given sufficient proof 15 of the vitality of this type of drama, which is of all types the most needed nowadays, for it is rooted in the suffering, the doubt, and the aspirations of the present generation. It goes hand-in-hand with actual 20 deeds. There are those who criticize it for this very reason, claiming that it is no longer disinterested art. But I admire it because it is not, and I have furnished reasons for my preference. Happy is the 25 age of quiet, when quiet works may be written! But when the age is a troubled one, and the nation is in the throes of struggle, it is the duty of art to struggle with it, inspiring and guiding it, protect- 30 ing it, and combatting prejudice. I have heard people complain of the violent excesses into which art will fall if it takes this road. This is not the fault of art, but of the wrongs which it will have ex- 35 posed, which must be done away with. It is not the purpose of art to reconcile and pacify, but to intensify life, render it stronger, greater, and better. Art is the 40 enemy of all the enemies of life. If love and peace are its aim, there are times none the less when hatred is in order. 'Hatred is a good thing,' once remarked a 45 workingman of the Faubourg Saint-Antoine to a lecturer who had been bursting his lungs trying to prove that all hatred is bad. 'Hatred is just, for it rallies the 50 oppressed to give battle against the oppressor. When I see a man domineering over other men, my indignation is aroused, and I hate him. I hate him, and I feel that my hatred is right.' He who does not hate evil cannot love good, and he who can look at injustice without attempting to rectify it is neither a true artist nor a 55 true man. The gentlest of the poets, Schiller, he who took the most serene view of his own art, did not hesitate to plunge into the fray, and set himself 'the task of attacking vice, and wreaking vengeance upon the enemies of religion, morality, and the social order.' But in art it is not 5 necessary to combat evil with evil, but with light. The evil that is seen face to face, the evil that is conscious of being seen, is more than half conquered. It is the function of the social drama to throw the 10 imperious power of reason into the uncertain scales.

There are many other types of drama which up to the present have been seldom 15 seen in our theaters. The rural drama, the poem of Earth, impregnated with the odor of the fields and overflowing with peasant humor and rich language, is a precious mine. It preserves what is poetic 20 in the life of small communities and records for posterity their vanishing individuality. Pouvillon, in certain of his pastoral tragedies; Pottecher in his comedies of the Vosges country; the Swiss 25 René Morax in his vigorous and quietly sentimental plays of the Var district—these dramatists furnish us with splendid examples of this type of play. And finally come the greatest of these poets, Mistral, the Provençal Homer, whose language is 30 as harmonious as his ancient soul.

We must likewise make use of the rich Celtic treasure lying hidden in our soil, and bring to life once more the forgotten 35 legends and popular tales. Our plains and woods were once peopled: there is no part of our land without its collections of fabulous romances, its beautiful and quaintly humorous stories. The people of the large 40 cities have long since broken with the past; they no longer belong to the great family; but the country people are for the most part far different. You will find among them the purest types of long ago, 45 such as are sculptured on the portals of Gothic churches. Nor is the resemblance confined to externals: the races of today are morally close akin to those of past 50 ages, more so than you would think. Who knows in how many of their souls there still exists the forest of the fairies, of the Sleeping Beauty, of Lancelot and Guinevere, of Tristan and Iseult; of Puss in Boots, of Tom Thumb and the Four Sons of Aymon; and the echo of Roland's horn? 55 Let us revive the stories of the past. Who, be he old or young, does not take pleasure in hearing them? We still remember the stories of our youth and think regretfully of the time when we listened to them. But they are ever alive. We have been silently awaiting for eight centuries—ever since Marie de France—the return of the Blue Bird.

Legendary material in drama requires the aid of music. Music indeed has a most important part to play in poetic and rustic drama. L'Arlésienne is the finest example. We may say that music has not yet received the treatment in our drama which it deserves. The poets have dispensed with it, partly through sheer ignorance, and partly through fear and jealousy. Music and poetry are two wings of the lyric drama. He who neglects either, can fly only with great difficulty.

And why relegate pantomime, which is pure action, to the circus? The spectacle of action is a powerful spring to action, good as well as evil; it is absurd to neglect it. The circus at Rome is kept alive and pleasure derived from action—a pleasure we know little about nowadays, but one which is a fundamental need of all nations. The Greeks cultivated bodily as well as mental exercise. Let us give the body its proper place in art. Our Theater must be a Theater of men, and not merely of writers.

How many are the new types of drama which might flourish in our People's Theater! But it would be a vain task to describe the shadows of the future. Nothing counts but actual achievement, and it is not yet time for us to enter a new continent. Each may start forth on his quest; he is sure to return laden with booty. Let us dare to raise art to the height of that tragedy which is now being acted in the world at large. The words of Schiller on the occasion of the first performance of Wallensteins Lager (October, 1798) may well be our guide and inspiration: 'The new era which opens for us today will encourage the poet to leave the beaten path of yesterday, and transport you out of your everyday existence up to a higher, a nobler stage, not perhaps unworthy of this sublime hour when our efforts are all bent toward the future. Only a great subject is capable of stirring mankind to the depths. The mind, if fettered and cramped, degenerates, but man advances as his horizon widens. And now, at the end of this century, when reality itself becomes poetry, when we are witnesses of gigantic souls striving onward toward a great prize, when men fight for the highest interests of humanity, liberty, and power—now, I say, the art of the drama may evoke the shades of the past in order to take flight to more distant summits. It can do this, and it will unless it rests content to be an object of shame before the eyes of the whole world.'

We must not complain of our destiny. Fate has given us plenty to do. Ours is a happy age, for we have great tasks to accomplish. Happy the man who succumbs beneath the weight of so glorious a fatigue! This is far better than succumbing to the boredom of doing nothing at all, or sadly contemplating the work of others. Let us not say what the melancholy author of the Caractères (La Bruyère) was forced to say in his worn-out age: 'Everything has been said, and we have come too late.' Nothing has been said of our new society. Everything waits to be said. Everything waits to be done. To work!

MAETERLINCK (1862-)

Maurice Maeterlinck belongs to Belgium, having been born in Ghent, but his literary fame began in connection with the French Symbolist movement in poetry, and he has an international reputation, perhaps higher in the United States than in Europe, as a dramatist and essayist. His peculiar combination of agnosticism and mysticism, although frequently expressed in his poems and plays, naturally finds its fullest and clearest exposition in his essays, especially in one of his most recent volumes, The Great Secret, translated by Bernard Miall, from which we reprint part of the concluding chapter with the consent of its American publishers, the Century Company.

MODERN MYSTICISM

At the very beginning of the old religions, and especially at the beginning of that which seems to be the most ancient of all and the source of all the rest, there is no secret doctrine and no revelation; there is only the prehistoric tradition of a metaphysics which we should today call purely rationalistic. The confession of absolute ignorance as regards the nature, attributes, character, purposes, and existence even of the First Cause or the God of Gods is public and explicit. It is a vast negation; we know nothing, we can know nothing, we never shall know anything, for it may be that God Himself does not know everything.

This unknown First Cause is of necessity infinite, for the infinite alone is unknowable, and the God of Gods would no longer be the God of Gods, and could not understand Himself, unless He were all things. His infinity inevitably gives rise to pantheism; for if the First Cause is everything, everything partakes in the First Cause, and it is not possible to imagine anything that can set bounds to it and is not the Cause itself, or part of the Cause, or does not proceed from the Cause. From this pantheism proceeds in its turn the belief in immortality and the ultimate optimism, for, the Cause being infinite in space and time, nothing that is of it or in it can be destroyed without destroying a part of the Cause itself; which is impossible, since it would still be the nothingness that sought to circumscribe it, just as nothing could be eternally unhappy without condemning part of itself to eternal unhappiness.

Absolute agnosticism, with its consequences: the infinity of the divine, pantheism, universal immortality, and ultimate optimism—here is the point of departure of the great primitive teachers, pure intellects and implacable logicians, such as were the Atlanteans, if we may believe the traditions of the occultists; and would not the very same point of departure impose itself today upon those who should seek to found a new religion which would not be repugnant to the ever-increasing exactions of human reason?

But if all is God and necessarily immortal, it is none the less certain that men and things and worlds disappear. From this moment we bid good-by to the logical consequences of the great confession of ignorance to enter the labyrinth of theories which are no longer unassailable, and which, for that matter, are not at the outset put before us as revelations but as mere metaphysical hypotheses, as speculations of great antiquity, born of the necessity of reconciling the facts with the too abstract and too rigid deductions of human reason.

As a matter of fact, according to these hypotheses man, the world and the universe do not perish; they disappear and reappear alternately throughout eternity, in virtue of Maya, the illusion of ignorance. When they no longer exist for us or for anyone, they still exist virtually, where no one sees them; and those who have ceased to see them do not cease to exist just as if they did see them. Similarly, when God sets bounds to Himself, in order to manifest Himself and to become conscious of a portion of Himself, He does not cease to be infinite and unknowable to Himself. He seems for a moment to place Himself at the point of view or within the comprehension of those whom He has quickened in His bosom.

This last hypothesis must in the beginning have been, as it is at present and always will be, a mere makeshift; but there was a time when it became a sort of dogma which, eagerly welcomed by the imagination, soon completely replaced the great primitive negation. From that moment, 10 despairing of knowing the unknowable, man duplicated and subdivided and multiplied it, relegating the inconceivable First Cause to the inaccessible Infinite, and henceforth concerned himself only with 15 those secondary causes by which it manifests itself and acts.

He does not ask himself, or rather he does not dare to ask, how, the First Cause being essentially unknowable, its manifesta- 20 tions could be considered as known, although it had not ceased to be unknowable; and we enter the vast vicious circle in which mankind must resign itself to live under penalty of condemning itself to an 25 eternal negation, an eternal immobility and ignorance and silence.

Unable to know God in Himself, man contents himself with seeking and questioning Him in His creatures, and above 30 all in mankind. He thought to find Him there, and the religions were born, with their gods, their cults, their sacrifices, their beliefs, their moralities, their hells and heavens. The relationship which binds 35 them all to the unknown Cause is more and more forgotten, reappearing only at certain moments, as it reappeared, for example, long afterwards, in Buddhism, in the metaphysicians, in the ancient mys- 40 teries and occult traditions. But despite this oblivion, and thanks to the idea of this First Cause, necessarily one, invisible, intangible, and inconceivable, which we are consequently compelled to regard as purely 45 spiritual, two of the great principles of the primitive religion, which subsequently permeated those religions which sprang from it, have survived, deep-rooted and tenacious of life, secretly repeating, beneath all out- 50 ward appearances, that the essence of all things is one and that the spirit is the source of all, the only certitude, the sole eternal reality.

From these two principles, which at bot- 55 tom are only one, proceeds all that primitive ethic which became the great ethic of humanity; unity being the ideal and sovereign good, evil means separation, division, and multiplicity, and matter is finally but one result of separation or multiplicity. To return to unity, therefore, 5 we must strip ourselves, must escape from matter, which is but an inferior form or degradation of the spirit.

It was thus that man found, or believed that he had found, the purpose of the un- knowable, and the key of all morality with- out, however, venturing to ask himself why this rupture of unity and this degradation of the spirit had been necessary; as though we had supposed that the First Cause, 15 which might have kept all things in the state of unity, in its undivided, immobile, and supremely blessed bosom, had been condemned, by a superior and irresistible law, to movement and eternal recommencement.

These ideas, too purely metaphysical to nourish a religion, were soon in India itself covered by a prodigious vegetation of myths, and gradually became the secret of the Brahmins, who cultivated them, devel- 20 oped them, and complicated them, to the verge of insanity. Thence they spread over the face of the earth, or returned to the place whence they had set forth; for while it is permissible to attempt the chronological localization of a central source, it is impossible for us to determine where they rose to the surface in the ages before the dawn of history, unless we refer to the theosophical legends of the Seven 35 Races, which we might perhaps accept if we were supplied with documents less open to criticism than those which have hitherto been offered to us.

At all events, it is easy enough to follow 40 the progress of these ideas through the world known to history; whether they went hand in hand, or one following another, through India, Egypt, and Persia; or found their way into Chaldea and pre-Socratic Greece by means of myths or contacts or migrations unknown to us; or especially in the case of Hellas, through the Orphic poems, collected during the Alexandrian period, but dating from legendary ages, and containing lines which, as Emile Bur- 45 nouf observes in his Science of Religions, are translated word for word from the Vedic hymns.

As a result of the Egyptian bondage, the Babylonian captivity, and the conquest of Cyrus, they reached the Bible, changing their shape to harmonize with the Jewish monotheism; but in secret they were preserved, almost undefiled, by oral transmission, in the cabala, in which the En-Sof, as we have seen, is the exact reproduction of the Hindu Unknowable, and leads to an almost similar agnosticism, pantheism, optimism, and ethic.

These ideas, stifled beneath the Bible in the Jewish world, and in the Greco-Roman world beneath the weight of the official religions and philosophies, survived among the secret sects, and notably among the Essenes, and also in the mysteries; reappearing in the light of day about the beginning of the Christian era, in the Gnostic and Neoplatonic schools of philosophy, and later on in the cabala, when they were finally put into writing; whence they passed, more or less distorted, into the occultism of the middle ages, of which they constitute the sole foundation.

We see, accordingly, that occultism, or rather the secret doctrine, variable in its forms, often extremely obscure, above all during the middle ages, but almost everywhere identical as to its basis, was always a protest of the human reason, faithful to its prehistoric traditions, against the arbitrary assertions and pretended revelations of the public and official religions. To their baseless dogmas, their anthropomorphical manifestations of the divine, illogical, petty, and unacceptable, they opposed the confession of an absolute and invincible ignorance of all essential points. From this confession, which at first sight seems to destroy everything, but which leads, almost of necessity, to a spiritualistic conception of the universe, it was able to derive a metaphysics, a mysticism, and a morality much purer, loftier, more disinterested, and above all more rational than those which were born of the religions which were stifling it. One might even prove that all that these religions still have in common on the heights where all are united—all that could not be debased to the level of the material requirements of an over-long life—all that is to be found in them that is awe-inspiring, infinite, imperishable, and universal—they owe to that immemorial metaphysic into which they struck their first roots.

It would even seem that in proportion as time removes them from this metaphysic the spirit leads them back to it; thus, to value only the two latest religions, without mention of all that they borrowed from it more directly, we find that the God the Father of Christianity and the Allah of Islam are much nearer to the En-Sof of the cabala than to the Jahweh of the Bible; and that the Word of St. John, which is not mentioned in the Old Testament or the synoptics, is merely the Logos of the Gnostics and the Neoplatonists, who themselves obtained it from India and Egypt.

Is this, then, the great secret of humanity, which has been hidden with such care beneath mysterious and sacred formulæ, beneath rites which were sometimes terrifying, beneath formidable reticences and silences: an unmitigated negation, a stupendous void, a hopeless ignorance? Yes, it is only this: and it is as well that it is nothing else; for a God and a universe small enough for the little brain of man to circumnavigate them, to understand their nature and their economy, to discover their origin, their aims and their limits, would be so pitiful and so restricted that no one would resign himself to remain eternally as their prisoner. Humanity has need of the infinite, with its corollary of invincible ignorance, if it is not to feel itself the dupe or victim of an unforgivable experiment or a blunder impossible of evasion. There was no need to call it into existence, but since it has been raised out of nothingness it must needs enjoy the boundlessness of space and time of which it has been vouchsafed the conception. It has the right to participate in all that has given it life, before it can forgive it for bringing it into the world. And it is not able thus to participate save on the condition that it cannot understand it. Every certainty—at all events, until our minds are liberated from the chains that fetter them—would become an enclosing wall on which all desire to live would be shattered. Let us therefore rejoice that we know of no further certainties beyond an ignorance as infinite as the world or the God Who is its subject.

After so many efforts, so many experiments, we find ourselves precisely at the point from which our great teachers set out. They bequeathed to us a wisdom which we are hardly beginning to clear of the rubbish that the centuries have left upon it; and beneath this rubbish we find intact the proudest confession of ignorance that man has ever ventured to pronounce. To a lover of illusion this means but little; to a lover of truth it is much indeed. We know at last that there has never been any ultra-human revelation, any direct and irrecusable message from divinity, no ineffable secret; and that all man believes himself to know of God, of His origin and His ends, he has drawn from his own powers of reason. Before we had interrogated our prehistoric ancestors we more than suspected that all revelations, in the sense of the word understood by the religious, were and will always be impossible; for we cannot reveal to anyone more than he is capable of understanding, and God alone can understand God. But it was easy to imagine that having, so to speak, been witnesses of the birth of the world, they ought to know more of it than we do, since they were still nearer to God. But they were not nearer to God; they were simply nearer to the human reason, which had not as yet been obscured by the inventions of thousands of years. They are content with giving us the only landmarks which this reason has been able to discover in the unknowable: pantheism, spiritualism, immortality, and final optimism; confiding the rest to the hypotheses of their successors, and wisely leaving unanswered, as we should leave them today, all those insoluble problems which the succeeding religions blindly attacked, often in an ingenious manner which was none the less arbitrary and sometimes childish.

Need we again recapitulate these problems?—the passage from the virtual to the actual; from being to becoming; from non-existence to existence; and the descent of the spirit into matter—that is, the origin of evil and the ascent from matter to spirit; the necessity of emerging from a state of eternal bliss, to return thither after purification and ordeals whose indispensable nature is beyond our comprehension; eternal recommencements, to reach a goal which has always fled us, since it has never been attained, although in the past men had as much leisure to attain it as they will ever have in the future.

I might increase beyond all measures this balance-sheet of the unknowable. To close the account it is enough to add that the question which rightly or wrongly causes us the greatest anxiety—that which concerns the fate of our consciousness and our personality when absorbed by the divine, is likewise unanswered, for Nirvana determines nothing and specifies nothing, and the Buddha, the last interpreter of the great esoteric doctrines, himself confesses that he does not know whether this absorption is absorption into nothingness or into eternal blessedness. 'The Sublime has not revealed it to him.'

'The Sublime has not revealed it to him'; for nothing has been revealed and nothing has been solved, because it is probable that nothing will ever be capable of solution, and because it is possible that beings whose intellect must be a million times more powerful than our own would still be unable to discover a solution. To understand the Creation, to tell us whence it comes and whither it goes, one would have to be its author; 'and even then,' asks the Rig-Veda, at the very source of primordial wisdom: 'and even then, does He know it?'

The Great Secret, the only secret, is that all things are secret. Let us at least learn, in the school of our mysterious ancestors, to make allowance, as they did, for the unknowable, and to search only for what is there: that is, the certainty that all things are God, that all things exist in Him and should end in happiness, and that the only divinity which we can hope to understand is to be found in the depths of our own souls. The Great Secret has not changed its aspect: it remains where and what is was for our forbears. At the very beginning they managed to derive from the unknowable the purest morality which we have known, and since we now find ourselves at the same point of the unknowable, it would be dangerous, not to say impossible, to deduce other lessons therefrom. And these doctrines, of which the nobler portions have remained the same, and which differ only in their baser characteristics, in all the religions whose various dogmas are at bottom only mythological translations or interpretations of these too abstract truths, would have made man something that as yet he is not, had he but had the courage to follow them. Do not let us forget them: this is the last and the best counsel of the mystical testament whose pages we have just been turning over.

ANDREYEF (1871-1919)

Leonid Nikolaivich Andreyef was an ill-starred man of genius whose personal misfortunes were in some cases mixed up with the misfortunes of his country during the last half-century. During his unhappy youth he three times attempted suicide, and the hardships of his college days are reflected in the title of his first article, The Hungry Student. The sufferings of his countrymen in the Russo-Japanese war are mirrored—not without exaggeration—in his story, The Red Laugh, and the internal disorders of the time find echoes in The Seven Who were Hanged. In drama he was strongly affected by the French Symbolist movement and attained considerable success at the Moscow Art Theater with a new type of play, in some respects suggested by the previous work of Maeterlinck, but possessing strongly marked personal characteristics. Although a sympathizer with the liberal movement in Czarist Russia, he was vehemently opposed to Bolshevism, and fled to Finland, where he died in great distress of mind and body on September 12, 1919. Just before his death he was planning a visit to America, and it seemed an added irony to the many misfortunes of his lifetime that his symbolic play He Who Gets Slapped should, two years after his death, have attained a sensational success when put on the stage by the Theater Guild of New York.

The essay reprinted below was originally published in the 'Wild Rose' Almanac of Petrograd in 1912, and was translated for the New York Times in 1919 (issue of October 5) by a young Russian actor named Manart Kippen. It is a plea for a revival of symbolist drama, which had gained its first vogue in the last decade of the nineteenth century through the latest plays of Ibsen and the earlier work of Maeterlinck, whose connection with the French Symbolist school of poetry has been already noted. In a volume of essays published in 1896 Maeterlinck gave the new type of drama a definite formula and a name—"the static drama," i.e. the play without violent action or a plot made up of overt incidents, relying for its interest on the portrayal of the changing moods of the soul. The following paragraph has often been quoted as the best exposition of the view of this new school:—

'I admire Othello, but he does not seem to me to live the august, everyday life of a Hamlet, who had the time to live because he does not act. Othello is admirably jealous. But may it not be an ancient error to think that it is at the moments when we are possessed by such a passion, or by others of equal violence, that we really live? I have come to think that an old man sitting in his arm-chair, simply waiting in the lamplight, listening without knowing it to all the eternal laws which reign around his house, interpreting, without understanding it, all that there is in the silence of the doors and the windows and in the low voice of the light, undergoing the presence of his soul and of his destiny, inclining his head a little, without suspecting that all the powers of this world intervene and hold watch in the room like attentive servants, not knowing that the sun itself sustains the little table on which he leans his elbows over the abyss, and that there is not one star of the sky nor one power of the soul which is indifferent to the movement of an eyelid that falls or of a thought that rises—I have come to think that this motionless old man is living, in reality, with a deeper, more human, and more general life than the lover who strangles his mistress, the captain who wins a victory, or "the husband avenging his honor."'

Early in the present century, however, Maeterlinck abandoned this view, and surprised his followers by the production of a drama full of stirring incident, Mona Vanna (1902). In an essay on modern tragedy published soon afterwards, he said:—

'When the curtain rises, the high intellectual desires we bring with us are suddenly transformed; and the thinker, the moralist, the mystic or the psychologist in us gives place to the instinctive spectator, to the man who is electrified negatively by the crowd, and who wants to see something happen on the stage. However strange this transformation or substitution may be, it is incontestable; it is evidently part of mob psychology, an undeniable faculty of the human soul, which is endowed with a special organ, primitive and almost unchangeable, for thinking, enjoying, and suffering emotion en masse.'

Andreyef, in a series of plays begun in 1906, attempted, with varying success, to revive the abandoned method of the symbolist drama, and the essay printed below is an effort in the same direction.

THE MODERN THEATER

Does the theater need action on the stage in its accepted form of treatment and movement, the form which is not only accepted by all theaters, but declared absolutely indispensable to its salvation? I permit myself to reply to this heretic question, No! Such action is not necessary, inasmuch as life itself, in its more dramatic and tragic moments, departs ever further from outward action, only to go into the depths of the soul, into that quiet and external immobility of living experience—the intellect.

While I was re-reading the memoirs of Benvenuto Cellini I was astonished at the great number of events in the life of this medieval artist-adventurer. How many escapes, murders, surprises, loves, and friendships! Indeed, our average contemporary in his entire life does not see so many killings as Cellini used to come upon in the short journey from his house to the city limits. Then step over a few centuries and look at life before you—even at Nietzsche, the most tragic hero of our times. Where are events in his life—action, movement? There is none. In his youth, when he moved about in the uniform of a Prussian soldier, he was least dramatic. The drama begins from that moment in his life when he entered into the quiet of inaction in his room. Here begin the poignant appraisal of all values, the tragic struggle, the break with Wagner—and alluring Zarathustra.

But what about the stage? The stage is powerless and dumb. It is subservient to the unchangeable law of action—cannot give this near and important and most necessary Nietzsche, but instead it offers in great quantity that which has already been lived through, an empty Cellini with his property swords.

Life has gone within, and the stage has remained on the outside. Understand this and you will understand why for several decades past not one drama has reached the height of the contemporary novel (there is no comparison); why Dostoevski did not write one drama; why Tolstoy, of such strong depth in his novels, was in his drama so primitive; why shrewd Maeterlinck dressed his thoughts up in trousers and made doubt run all over the stage. Follow my thought to the end and you will understand why our charmingly theatric Ostrofsky—well supported in his lifetime—is no longer needed, and why our untheatric Chekhov is so much needed. I do not say that events are lacking, that no one is in action, that history has ceased its flow. No; yesterday is sufficiently fertile of events. There are still enough murders and suicides, complex delusions, skilled active combinations of alive and moving struggles with physical force, with arms—and firearms! But the dramatic value of all this has run low. Life has become psychological, if one may express himself so—has become aligned with primitive fears. Along with the everlasting heroes of the drama, love and hunger, comes a new hero, the intellect. Neither hunger nor love nor ambition; thought, human thought with all its sufferings, joys and struggles—there is the true hero of contemporary life! It has taken first place in the drama.

Even poor playwrights and the poor public of our time have begun to understand that the external appearance of the struggle, no matter how much blood is spilled on the stage, is the least dramatic phase of the struggle. Not that moment when a workman goes out into the street is the dramatic moment, but when his hearing first receives the words of a new life, when his yet feeble, timid, inert thought suddenly rears itself like an enraged horse, and with a sudden spring forward carries the rider away into a glittering land of wonders. Not that moment is dramatic when on the demand of a manufacturer soldiers have already arrived and made ready their guns, but the moment in the quiet of his sleepless nights when the manufacturer struggles between two truths, and can accept neither one, either with his conscience or with his strained intellect.

And it is with modern love as with every deep self-manifestation. From its external expression love's action now goes into the depths, having a semblance of immobility. This is a very interesting detail.

Formerly the hero spoke a monologue for many of his important thoughts and feelings, but the present realistic drama destroyed this sufficiently sorry possibility of getting into the depths. The monologue is abolished. In short, no matter what cunning and tricks of illusion playwrights have recourse to, they no longer dare revert to the monologue, even though feeling the need of a short one. The monologue is an affectation, it does not resemble life. But this does resemble life—to perform action without stopping, to gossip uninterruptedly like a merry parrot, and not once to think with any depth for more than twenty seconds. The playwrights copy from examples of the masters the same old portrait of life without noting that the life-likeness has long been lost, that they do not depict a living face but merely copy an old picture.

Genius has deserted the drama, for how could genius with its mighty swing possibly find place in the sadly crowded condition of the stage! Any attempt for genius to spread its wings more widely proves fatal. The more depth and spirit there is in it, the less theatric it becomes. Not only genius, but middling talents find the modern stage too cramping, too crowded; it is necessary for them to squat and jabber away in an infantile manner in order to conform to the theater.

Because, alongside the inevitable action, our contemporary theater desires also to present a spectacle, must the contemporary theater present a spectacle? I permit myself again to answer, decidedly, No! This reply is a matter of course. To the degree that action is visible and spectacle overrules, to that degree must writers of genius or talent abandon the stage to spectacle instead of to the unseen spirit of man, with its majestic riches unseen by carnal myopic vision. Today only the commercial traveler wanders diligently over the world, while Leo Tolstoy, with his world-drama, remains seated, immovable for a quarter of the century. And since they have begun to slay our heroes and our prophets, not with stones but with written or printed sheets of paper, where is there then a place for spectacle?

And what tricks does not the gifted playwright resort to, oppressed as he is by the modern stage? There is the diabolical machinery of Hauptmann's Sunken Bell, the modest and altogether unnecessary Imatra of Naidenov, and an ever-present samovar. Grant the samovar; even with the samovar our spectacle is still at its worst. For, after all, the samovar is the action. While they bring it in, brew the tea, and are pouring a cup of tea the attention of the spectator has been distracted, for not only our contemporary theater, but our public are devoted to the spectacular. At every step they immolate the very purpose of production on the altar of their idol, offering up their souls for the unnecessary body. It is amusing to hear that we should give the stage over to the dance, or reduce the actor to comparative immobility on the stage. This only brings about gradations of color; thus they very gently and softly cut out the author's tongue, imagining that this operation will make sensation enough.

Consider this well and you will understand the long list of failures which are the lot of our most costly productions, and the reason why poor ones are often successes and why the best plays are tossed about from manager to manager and never produced, while dramatists grow weaker and weaker; why only a dumb person does not cry aloud at the impoverishment of dramatic literature.

You know, of course, that between the symbolists and the robust realists there has been a fierce struggle for possession of the stage. You know, of course, that at the present moment in literature realism has conquered. But has it occurred to you to note that this triumph comes somehow at the same time as the impoverishment of dramatic literature and the decline of the theater? Even as an extravagant landowner, feeling low in his mind, kills off the tillers of his soil in order to get more fresh air, and then at once falls into a helpless condition of hunger and distress, so did the public and the theater itself enthusiastically destroy symbolism on the stage. Suddenly we have hunger and anguish; where is the drama?

Oh, how good it is to breathe the clear air of realism! But where is the drama? Where have the dramatists gone? I, at least, am very hungry and very tired. And what is the nature of our silenced symbolism, by whose death the air has been purified, but there is nothing left to eat? Compromise is its name. In but few instances has symbolism in the theater become a dictator by the unalterable laws of individual creative power; more often it has been used merely as a resource to force a live thought upon the stage, playing the part of a smuggler and his goat smuggling Brussels lace across the boundary line. Limited by the demands of action and spectacle, the dramatist has been unable to incarnate on the stage every image of the refined complex modern spirit, pierced by world thought, created by costliness of new life-experience, opening fountains of new and most profound tragedy anciently unknown. He has been unable because the flesh does not have the new experience of the spirit, and so the smugglers have had a chance to exhibit themselves on the stage with a heavy pack of illicit stylish figures, bare-footed persons, enigmatic ones without name or parentage, galvanized but not brought to life—pierrots and harlequins, designedly and intentionally made-up blind, deaf and dumb, made-up devils, gnomes, fairies, and frogs. The blind stumble over decorative settings; devils fall through traps; harlequin groans like a living man; bare-footed creatures go dancing beyond the grave, and some very portly one tries unsuccessfully to turn into a shadow. This whole naïve masquerade means only one thing, that Thought stifles on the stage, that Spirit is dying on the boards!

As in every compromise, this distinguished dual contraband symbolism satisfied neither side and had to die. The weighty and carnal figure, the shaven and active actor of triple dimensions crushed public and author. They wished to bend him about like a rubber doll, to place him in poses found only in geometry. In order to kill his ability to speak with a living voice, they gave him to drink of vinegar and gall, but he did not speak like a true phantom from the other world. The actor humbly accepted the new yoke, but for all his efforts he was unable to turn himself into vapor, or air, or a real frog. Then the public began to feel the falsity of the performance, and went off whistling. The author also began to feel that by such roundabout means he could not take the fortress of the modern theater. He had either to break down the Bastille or to be a prisoner in it.

For a while, the theater became richer spiritually, more meaningful, even glorious. But regarded from the outside it had an appearance of folly, the machinery had worked loose and begun to squeak. The further existence of this compromised form became impossible. With her oily, angry smile that old beggar-woman, the realistic drama, adjusted the bones of the actor, tightened the screws and nuts, and had a smoke with Ostrofsky to purify the unclean Maeterlinckian air. And so, after the impoverishment of our dramatic literature, we are still waiting for the renaissance.

Not only the theater perishes, but also the public. Which of the two pulls the other into the hole? The theater the public, or the other way about? It is very difficult to say, but in either case it does not much matter: let us call it reciprocal action. But it does matter that the modern spectator, though he attend the theater assiduously, has lost the power to see the absurdity of it, and is unable to cope with the sensations going on before him. I have not time to discuss his extremely interesting psychology, which deserves detailed examination, but I will indicate a few points:—

Never were so many demands made on the theater, just as it was never before necessary for the individual to gratify so many desires. Suppose I am a woman and want to know how to dress? I go to the theater to learn this from the actresses and the other women in the audience. Suppose I have grown heavy of thought, and want stimulation? I go to the theater. Suppose my eyes have become tired because of the lack of color in our home life, of the sameness and weariness of our streets, and I wish to go sight-seeing, to fill my eyes with a view of the sky and the sea, with strange and eternal beauty? I have not time to travel and I have not the money, so, unconsciously, I go to the theater to get my vision of color and joy. Whether I want laughter or sadness, whether emotion or peace, I go to the theater for all. I demand everything from the theater; I damn the theater for everything.

With all this, what an absurdity is our ordinary theater with its stupid and confused staff and its varied and contradictory currents flowing from the auditorium to the stage—disconcerting the actors, making them suffer. At one moment a wise man may begin to listen intently while twenty fools begin to yawn or cough and snore. There are plenty of fools; the wise man shivers in unbearable torment, because to the wise there is nothing more sorrowful than the joy of fools.

There are many dramas that give offense to those who want peace, distraction, and amusement; but there are too few dramas that offend those who hunger for emotion. One person may love to listen to beautiful speech, but it only annoys the chatterer. One may understand everything and yet complain that this is very little—that there is not enough food for the mind. Another may understand absolutely nothing, yet he also complains and calls out 'nonsense!'

It is true that every theater willingly (more often reluctantly) caters to the taste of its own public. Yet here the insolvency of modern serious drama asserts itself with particular force. The lower the theater is in artistry and in idealistic aim, the more it is absurd, the more encouraging are the receipts, and vice versa. The more passionate and painful the theater's quest—and now every serious theater is compelled 10 to seek far and wide—the less hope there is for it to gain 'its own public' and durable success. Plays vary in spirit and in structure, wrestle with one another, enfeebling the actor, throwing him about from an extreme of realism to an extreme of symbolism, now rewarding him with flesh and blood, now taking away even his own shadow. Shaking up the actors, these various plays also agitate and shake up the 20 audiences, placing a question mark before every new production. How and where is it to collect 'its own public,' harmonious and responsive, when the theater is being torn to pieces within itself?

There are always some authors and some distinguished pieces which still draw receipts, but there is very little here to console the theater. Observe the plays which run a hundred nights, or twice that, and you will be convinced that these are by no means the strongest productions, but those 30 most easily available, and therefore usually disjointed, unintelligent and empty. Very often they have the savor and appearance of very good plays, but this is a delusion, since well-disposed spectators (who don't know why they go), charmed and convinced by the success of well chosen and interesting actors, give the theater that peculiar atmosphere wherein shortcomings are not noted, where little merits achieve exaggerated credit, and everything generally is in full bloom. Small receipts shape the doom of any play that lasts but ten performances. What a shame, what a merciless condemnation of the whole system of the modern theater—these first perform- 15 ances!

Not many people go to the theater with conscious discernment; the majority go because everybody else goes. And even he who goes with a purpose does not definitely know, does not even imagine what awaits him; usually they have promised to astonish him with something very unexpected; 'so-and-so' designed the scene, 'so-and-so' composed the music; and 'so-and-so' managed 25 the production; everything is 'so-and-so' and 'so-and-so.' Whether all this will give pleasure or pain is apparent to nobody. But the theater still purposely thickens the mystery, not comprehending that the thicker the mystery, the more it attracts an unrepresentative and inimical audience. Is it surprising that many serious-minded people have given up going to the theater altogether?

CROCE (1866-)

Benedetto Croce was hardly known in the English-speaking world, except to a few specialists, until Douglas Ainslie in 1909 unearthed the new philosopher at Naples and constituted himself his prophet and translator. Croce's Estetica had been published in 1901, but had attracted little attention outside of those philosophical or critical circles familiar with Italian. Mr. Ainslie translated the Complete System of the Philosophy of the Spirit and other works of the master, including a condensation of his most important thoughts on the subject of æsthetic theory, entitled The Essence of Aesthetic, originally prepared to celebrate the inauguration of the Rice Institute at Houston, Texas, in 1912. The extract which is given below is taken from 'The Book of the Opening of the Rice Institute,' with a few corrections made by Mr. Ainslie for an edition of The Essence of Aesthetic subsequently published in London. Croce thought this might prove of use to 'young folk and others who wish to study poetry, and art in general, seriously.'

In 1920 Croce was the recipient of the Nicholas Murray Butler gold medal awarded by Columbia University for the most original and important contribution to philosophy during the previous five years. He was Minister of Education in the Giolitti Cabinet appointed after the end of the War, and is still a member of the Italian Senate.

'WHAT IS ART?'

I will say at once, in the simplest manner, that art is vision or intuition. The artist produces an image or a phantasm; and he who enjoys art turns his gaze upon the point which the artist has indicated, looks through the chink which he has opened, and reproduces that image in himself. 'Intuition,' 'vision,' 'contemplation,' 'imagination,' 'fancy,' 'figurations,' 'representations,' and so on, are words continually recurring, like synonyms, when discoursing upon art, and they all lead the mind to the same conceptual sphere, which indicates general agreement.

But this reply of mine, that art is intuition, obtains its force and meaning from all that it implicitly denies and distinguishes from art. What negations are implicit in it? I shall indicate the principal, or at least those that are the most important for us at this present moment of our culture.

It denies, above all, that art is a physical fact: for example, certain determined colors, or relations of colors; certain definite forms of bodies; certain definite sounds, or relations of sounds; certain phenomena of heat or of electricity—in short, whatsoever be designated as 'physical.' The inclination towards this error of physicizing art is already present in ordinary thought, and as children who touch the soap-bubble and would wish to touch the rainbow, so the human spirit, admiring beautiful things, hastens spontaneously to trace out the reasons for them in external nature, and proves that it must think, or believes that it should think, certain colors beautiful and certain other colors ugly, certain forms beautiful and certain other forms ugly. But this attempt has been carried out intentionally and with method on several occasions in the history of thought: from the 'canons' which the Greek theoreticians and artists fixed for the beauty of bodies, through the speculations as to the geometrical and numerical relations of figures and sounds, down to the researches of the æstheticians of the nineteenth century (Fechner, for example), and to the 'communications' presented in our day by the inexpert, at philosophical, psychological and natural science congresses, concerning the relations of physical phenomena with art. And if it be asked why art cannot be a physical fact, we must reply, in the first place, that physical facts do not possess reality, and that art, to which so many devote their whole lives and which fills all with a divine joy, is supremely real; thus it cannot be a physical fact, which is something unreal.

This sounds at first paradoxical, for nothing seems more solid and secure to the ordinary man than the physical world; but we, in the seat of truth, must not abstain from the good reason and substitute for it one less good, solely because the first may have the appearance of a lie; and besides, in order to overcome what of strange and difficult may be contained in that truth, to become at home with it, we may take into consideration the fact that the demonstration of the unreality of the physical world has not only been proved in an undisputable manner and is admitted by all philosophers (who are not crass materialists and are not involved in the strident contradictions of materialism), but is professed by these same physicists in the spontaneous philosophy which they mingle with their physics, when they conceive physical phenomena as products of principles that are beyond experience, of atoms or of ether, or as the manifestation of an Unknowable; besides, the matter itself of the materialists is a supermaterial principle. Thus physical facts reveal themselves, by their internal logic and by common consent, not as reality, but as a construction of our intellect for the purposes of science. Consequently, the question whether art be a physical fact must rationally assume this different signification: that is to say, whether it be possible to construct art physically. And this is certainly possible, for we indeed carry it out always, when, turning from the sense of a poem and ceasing to enjoy it, we set ourselves, for example, to count the words of which the poem is composed and to divide them into syllables and letters; or, disregarding the æsthetic effect of a statue, we weigh and measure it: a most useful performance for the packers of statues, as is the other for the typographers who have to 'compose' pages of poetry; but most useless for the contemplator and student of art, to whom it is neither useful nor licit to allow himself to be 'distracted' from his proper object. Thus art is not a physical fact in this second sense either; which amounts to saying that when we propose to ourselves to penetrate its nature and mode of action, to construct it physically is of no avail.

Another negation is implied in the definition of art as intuition: if it be intuition, and intuition is equivalent to theory in the original sense of contemplation, art cannot be a utilitarian act; and since a utilitarian act aims always at obtaining a pleasure and therefore at keeping off a pain, art, considered in its own nature, has nothing to do with the useful and with pleasure and pain, as such. It will be admitted, indeed, without much difficulty, that a pleasure as a pleasure, any sort of pleasure, is not of itself artistic; the pleasure of a drink of water that slakes thirst, or a walk in the open air that stretches our limbs and makes our blood circulate more lightly, or the obtaining of a longed-for post that settles us in practical life, and so on, is not artistic. Finally, the difference between pleasure and art leaps to the eyes in the relations that are developed between ourselves and works of art, because the figure represented may be dear to us and represent the most delightful memories, and at the same time the picture may be ugly; or, on the other hand, the picture may be beautiful and the figure represented hateful to our hearts; or the picture itself, which we approve as beautiful, may also cause us rage and envy, because it is the work of our enemy or rival, for whom it will procure advantage and on whom it will confer new strength: our practical interests, with their relative pleasures and pains, mingle and sometimes become confused with art and disturb, but are never identified with, our æsthetic interest. At the most it will be affirmed, with a view to maintaining more effectively the definition of art as the pleasurable, that it is not the pleasurable in general, but a particular form of the pleasurable. But such a restriction is no longer a defense, it is indeed an abandonment of that thesis; for given that art is a particular form of pleasure, its distinctive character would be supplied, not by the pleasurable, but by what distinguishes that pleasurable from other pleasurable, and it would be desirable to turn the attention to that distinctive element—more than pleasurable or different from pleasurable. Nevertheless, the doctrine that defines art as the pleasurable has a special denomination (hedonistic æsthetic), and a long and complicated development in the history of æsthetic doctrines: it showed itself in the Græco-Roman world, prevailed in the eighteenth century, reflowered in the second half of the nineteenth, and still enjoys much favor, being especially well received by beginners in æsthetic, who are, above all, struck by the fact that art causes pleasure. The life of this doctrine has consisted of proposing in turn one or another class of pleasures, or several classes together (the pleasure of the superior senses, the pleasure of play, of consciousness of our own strength, of criticism, etc., etc.), or of adding to it elements differing from the pleasurable, the useful, for example (when understood as distinct from the pleasurable), the satisfaction of cognoscitive and moral wants, and the like. 10 And its progress has been caused just by this restlessness, and by its allowing foreign elements to ferment in its bosom, which it introduces through the necessity of somehow bringing itself into agreement 15 with the reality of art, thus attaining to its dissolution as hedonistic doctrine and to the promotion of a new doctrine, or at least to drawing attention to its necessity. And since every error has its element of truth (and that of the physical doctrine has been seen to be the possibility of the physical 'construction' of art as of any other fact), the hedonistic doctrine has its 25 eternal element of truth in the placing in relief the hedonistic accompaniment, or pleasure, common to the æsthetic activity as to every form of spiritual activity, which it has not at all been intended to deny in absolutely denying the identification of art 30 with the pleasurable, and in distinguishing it from the pleasurable by defining it as intuition.

A third negation, effected by means of the theory of art as intuition, is that art is 35 a moral act; that is to say, that form of practical act which, although necessarily uniting with the useful and with pleasure and pain, is not immediately utilitarian and hedonistic, and moves in a superior 40 spiritual sphere. But the intuition, in so far as it is a theoretic act, is opposed to the practical of any sort. And in truth, art, as has been remarked from the earliest times, does not arise as an act of the will; 45 good will, which constitutes the honest man, does not constitute the artist. And since it is not the result of an act of will, so it escapes all moral discrimination, not because a privilege of exemption is ac- 50 corded to it, but simply because moral discrimination cannot be applied to art. An artistic image portrays an act morally praiseworthy or blameworthy. Not only 55 is there no penal code that can condemn an image to prison or to death, but no moral judgment, uttered by a rational person, can make of it its object: we might just as well judge the square moral or the triangle immoral as the Francesca of Dante immoral or the Cordelia of Shakespeare moral, for these have a purely artistic 5 function; they are like musical notes in the souls of Dante and of Shakespeare. Further, the moralistic theory of art is also represented in the history of æsthetic doctrines, though much discredited in the com- 10 mon opinion of our times, not only on account of its intrinsic demerit, but also in some measure, owing to the moral demerit of certain tendencies of our times, which render possible that refutation of it on 15 psychological grounds, which should be made—and which we here make—solely for logical reasons. The end attributed to art, of directing the good and inspiring horror of evil, of correcting and ameliorating cus- 20 toms, is a derivation of the moralistic doctrine; and so is the demand addressed to artists to collaborate in the education of the lower classes, in the strengthening of the national or bellicose spirit of a people, in 25 the diffusion of the ideals of a modest and laborious life, and so on. These are all things that art cannot do, any more than geometry, which, however, does not lose anything of its importance on account of its inability to do this; and one does not see why art should do so either. That it cannot do these things was partially per- 30 ceived by the moralistic æstheticians also, for they very readily effected a compromise with it, permitting it to provide pleasures that were not moral, provided they were not openly dishonest, or recommending it to employ to a good end that empire over 35 souls which it possessed through its hedonistic power to gild the pill, to sprinkle sweetness upon the rim of the glass containing the bitter draught—in short, to play the courtesan (since it could not get rid of its old and inborn habits) in the 40 service of holy church or of morality: meretrix ecclesiæ [courtesan of the church]. On other occasions they have sought to avail themselves of it for purposes of instruction, since not only virtue but also science is a difficult thing, and art could remove this difficulty and render 45 pleasant and attractive the entrance into the ocean of science—indeed, lead them through it as through a garden of Armida, gaily and voluptuously, without their being conscious of the lofty protection which they were preparing for themselves. We cannot now refrain from a smile when we talk of these theories, but should not forget that they were once a serious matter, corresponding to a serious effort to understand the nature of art and to elevate the conception of it; and that among those who believed in it (to limit ourselves to Italian literature) were Dante and Tasso, Parini and Alfieri, Manzoni and Mazzini. And the moralistic doctrine of art was and is and will be perpetually beneficial by its very contradictions; it was and will be an effort, however unhappy, to separate art from the merely pleasing, with which it is sometimes confused, and to assign to it a more worthy post; and it also has its true side, because, if art be beyond morality, the artist is neither this side of it nor that, but under its empire, in so far as he is a man who cannot withdraw himself from the duties of man, and must look upon art itself—art, which is not and never will be moral—as a mission to be exercised, a priestly office.

Again (and this is the last and perhaps the most important of all the general negations that it suits me to recall in relation to this matter), with the definition of art as intuition, we deny that it has the character of conceptual knowledge. Conceptual knowledge, in its true form, which is the philosophical, is always realistic, aiming at establishing reality against unreality, or at reducing unreality by including it in reality as a subordinate moment of reality itself. But intuition means, precisely, indistinction of reality and unreality, the image with its value as mere image; the pure ideality of the image; and opposing the intuitive or sensible knowledge to the conceptual or intelligible, the æsthetic to the noetic, it aims at claiming the autonomy of this more simple and elementary form of knowledge, which has been compared to the dream (the dream, and not the sleep) of the theoretic life, in respect to which philosophy would be the waking. And indeed, whoever, when examining a work of art, should ask whether what the artist has expressed be metaphysically and historically true or false, asks a question that is without meaning and commits an error analogous to his who should bring the airy images of the fancy before the tribunal of morality: without meaning, because the discrimination of true and false always concerns an affirmation of reality, or a judgment, but it cannot fall under the head of an image or of a pure subject, which is not the subject of a pure judgment, since it is without qualification or predicate. It is useless to object that the individuality of the image cannot subsist without reference to the universal, of which that image is the individuation, because we do not here deny that the universal, as the spirit of God, is everywhere and animates all things with itself, but we deny that the universal is rendered logically explicit and is thought in the intuition. Useless also is the appeal to the principle of the unity of the spirit, which is not broken, but on the contrary strengthened by the clear distinction of fancy from thought, because from the distinction comes opposition and from opposition concrete unity.

Ideality (as has also been called this character that distinguishes the intuition from the concept, art from philosophy and from history, from the affirmation of the universal and from the perception or narration of what has happened) is the intimate virtue of art: no sooner are reflection and judgment developed from that ideality, than art is dissipated and dies: it dies in the artist, who becomes a critic; it dies in the contemplator, who changes from an entranced enjoyer of art to a meditative observer of life.

But the distinction of art from philosophy (taken widely as including all thinking of the real) brings with it other distinctions, among which that of art from myth occupies the foremost place. For myth, to him who believes in it, presents itself as the revelation and knowledge of reality as opposed to unreality,—a reality that drives away other beliefs as illusory or false. It can become art only for him who no longer believes in it and avails himself of mythology as a metaphor, of the austere world of the gods as of a beautiful world, of God as of an image of sublimity. Considered, then, in its genuine reality, in the soul of the believer and not of the unbeliever, it is religion and not a simple phantasm; and religion is philosophy, philosophy in process of becoming, philosophy more or less imperfect, but philosophy, as philosophy, is religion, more or less purified and elaborated, in continuous process of elaboration and purification, but religion or thought of the Absolute or Eternal. Art lacks the thought that is necessary ere it can become myth and religion, and the faith that is born of thought; the artist neither believes nor disbelieves in his image: he produces it.

And, for a different reason, the concept of art as intuition excludes, on the other hand, the conception of art as the production of classes and types, species and genera, or again (as a great mathematician and philosopher had occasion to say of music), as an exercise of unconscious arithmetic; that is, it distinguishes art from the positive sciences and from mathematics, in both of which appears the conceptual form, though without realistic character, as mere general representation or mere abstraction. But that ideality which natural and mathematical science would seem to assume, as opposed to the world of philosophy, of religion and of history, and which would seem to approximate it to art (and owing to which scientists and mathematicians of our day are so ready to boast of creating worlds, of fictiones, resembling the fictions and figurations of the poets, even in their vocabulary), is gained with the renunciation of concrete thought, by means of generalization and abstraction, which are capricious, volitional decisions, practical acts, and, as practical acts, extraneous and inimical to the world of art. Thus it happens that art manifests much more repugnance toward the positive and mathematical sciences than toward philosophy, religion and history, because these seem to it to be fellow-citizens of the same world of theory or of knowledge, whereas those others repel it with the brutality of the practical world toward contemplation. Poetry and classification, and, worse still, poetry and mathematics, appear to be as little in agreement as fire and water: the esprit mathématique and the esprit scientifique, the most declared enemies of the esprit poétique; those periods in which the natural sciences and mathematics prevail (for example, the intellectualism of the eighteenth century) seem to be the least fruitful in poetry.

And since this vindication of the allogical character of art is, as I have said, the most difficult and important of the negations included in the formula of art-intuition, the theories that attempt to explain art as philosophy, as religion, as history, or as science, and in a lesser degree as mathematics, occupy the greater part of the history of æsthetic science and are adorned with the names of the greatest philosophers. Schelling and Hegel afford examples of the identification or confusion of art with religion and philosophy in the eighteenth century; Taine, of its confusion with the natural sciences; the theories of the French verists, of its confusion with historical and documentary observation; the formalism of the Herbartians, of its confusion with mathematics. But it would be vain to seek pure examples of these errors in any of these authors and in the others that might be mentioned, because error is never pure, for if it were so, it would be truth. Thus the doctrines of art, that for the sake of brevity I shall term 'conceptualistic,' contain elements of dissolution, the more copious and efficacious by as much as the spirit of the philosopher who professed them was energetic, and therefore nowhere are they so copious and efficacious as in Schelling and Hegel, who had so lively a consciousness of artistic production as to suggest by their observations and their particular developments a theory opposed to that maintained in their systems. Furthermore, the very conceptualistic theories are superior to the others previously examined, not only in so far as they recognize the theoretic character of art, but also carry with them their contribution to the true doctrine, owing to the claim they make for a determination of the relations (which, if they be of distinction, are also of unity) between fancy or imagination and logic, between art and thought.

And here we can already see how the very simple formula, that 'art is intuition,'—which, translated into other symbolical terms (for example, that 'art is the work of imagination'), is to be found in the mouths of all those who daily discuss art, and also in older terms ('imitation,' 'fiction,' 'fable,' etc.) in so many old books,—when pronounced now in the text of a philosophical discourse, becomes filled with a historical, critical, and polemical content, of the richness of which I can hardly here give any example. And it will no longer cause astonishment that its philosophical conquest should have cost an especially great amount of toil, because that conquest is like setting foot upon a little hill long disputed in battle. Its easy ascent by the thoughtless pedestrian in time of peace is a very different matter. It is not a simple resting-place on a walk, but the symbol and result of the victory of an army. The historian of æsthetic follows the steps of its difficult progress, in which

(and this is another magical act of thought) the conqueror, instead of losing strength through the blows that his adversary inflicts upon him, acquires new strength through these very blows, and reaches the desired eminence, repulsing his adversary, yet in his company. Here I cannot do more than mention in passing the importance of the Aristotelian concept of mimesis (appearing in opposition to the Platonic condemnation of poetry), and the attempt made by the same philosopher to distinguish poetry and history: a concept that was not sufficiently developed, and perhaps not altogether mature in his mind, and therefore long misunderstood, but which was yet to serve, after many centuries, as the point of departure for modern æsthetic thought. And I will mention in passing the ever-increasing consciousness of the difference between logic and imagination, between judgment and taste, between intellect and genius, which became ever more lively during the course of the seventeenth century, and the solemn form which the contest between Poetry and Metaphysics assumed in the Scienza Nuova of Vico; and also the scholastic construction of an Æsthetica, distinct from a Logica, as Gnoscologia inferior and Scientia cognitionis sensitivæ, in Baumgarten, who, however, remained involved in the conceptualistic conception of art and did not carry out his project; and the Critique of Kant directed against Baumgarten and all the Leibnitzians and Wolffians, which made it clear that intuition is intuition and not a 'confused concept'; and romanticism, which perhaps better developed the new idea of art, announced by Vico, in its artistic criticism and in its histories than in its systems; and finally the criticism inaugurated in Italy by Francesco de Sanctis, who made art as pure form, or pure intuition, triumph over all utilitarianism, moralism, and conceptualism (to adopt his vocabulary).

But doubt springs up at the feet of truth, 'like a young shoot,'—as the terzina of father Dante has it,—doubt, which is what drives the intellect of man 'from mount to mount.' The doctrine of art as intuition, as imagination, as form, now gives rise to an ulterior (I have not said an 'ultimate') problem, which is no longer one of opposition and distinction toward physics, hedonistic ethic and logic, but within the field of images itself, which sets in doubt the capacity of the image to define the character of art and is in reality occupied with the mode of separating the genuine from the spurious image, and of enriching in this way the concept of the image and of art. What function (it is asked) can a world of pure images, without philosophical, historical, religious or scientific value and without even moral or hedonistic value, possess in the spirit of man? What is more vain than to dream with open eyes in life, which demands, not only open eyes, but an open mind and a nimble spirit? Pure images! But to nourish one's self upon pure images is called by a name of little honor, 'to dream,' and there is usually added to this the epithet of 'idle.' It is a very insipid and inconclusive thing; can it ever be art? Certainly we sometimes amuse ourselves with the reading of some sensational romance of adventure, where images follow images in the most various and unexpected way; but we thus enjoy ourselves in moments of fatigue, when we are obliged to kill time, and with a full consciousness that such stuff is not art. Such instances are of the nature of a pastime, a game; but were art a game or a pastime, it would fall into the wide arms of hedonistic doctrine, ever open to receive it. And it is a utilitarian and hedonistic need that impels us sometimes to relax the bow of the mind and the bow of the will, and to stretch ourselves, allowing images to follow one another in our memory, or combining them in quaint forms with the aid of the imagination, in a sort of waking sleep, from which we rouse ourselves as soon as we are rested; and we sometimes rouse ourselves just to devote ourselves to the work of art, which cannot be produced by a mind relaxed. Thus either art is not pure intuition, and the claims put forward in the doctrines which we believed we had above confuted, are not satisfied, and so the confutation itself of these doctrines is troubled with doubts; or intuition cannot consist in a simple act of imagination.

In order to render the problem more exact and more difficult, it will be well to eliminate from it at once that part to which the answer is easy, and which I have not wished to neglect, precisely because it is usually united and confused with it. The intuition is certainly the production of an image, but not of an incoherent mass of images obtained by recalling former images and allowing them to succeed one another capriciously, by combining one image with another in a like capricious manner, joining a horse's neck to a human head, and thus playing a childish game. Old Poetic availed itself above all of the concept of unity, in order to express this distinction between the intuition and vain imagining, insisting that whatever the artistic work, it should be simplex et unum [simple and one]; or of the allied concept of unity in variety—that is to say, the multiple images were to find their common center and dissolve in a comprehensive image: and the æsthetic of the nineteenth century created with the same object the distinction, which appears in not a few of its philosophers, between imagination (the peculiar artistic faculty) and fancy (the extra-artistic faculty). To amass, select, cut up, combine images, presupposes the possession of particular images in the spirit; and imagination produces, whereas fancy is sterile, adapted to external combinations and not to the generation of organism and life. The most profound problem, contained beneath the rather superficial formula with which I first presented it, is, then: What is the office of the pure image in the life of the spirit? or (which at the bottom amounts to the same thing), How does the pure image come into existence? Every inspired work of art gives rise to a long series of imitators, who just repeat, cut up in pieces, combine, and mechanically exaggerate that work, and by so doing play the part of fancy toward or against the imagination. But what is the justification, or what the genesis, of the work of genius, which is afterward submitted (a sign of glory!) to such torments? In order to make this point clear, we must go deeply into the character of imagination and of pure intuition.

The best way to prepare this deeper study is to recall to mind and to criticize the theories with which it has been sought to differentiate artistic intuition from merely incoherent fancy (while taking care not to fall into realism or conceptualism), to establish in what the principle of unity consists, and to justify the productive character of the imagination. The artistic image (it has been said) is such, when it unites the intelligible with the sensible, and represents an idea. Now 'intelligible' and 'idea' cannot mean anything but concept (nor has it a different meaning with those who maintain this doctrine); even though it be the concrete concept or idea, proper to lofty philosophical speculation, which differs from the abstract concept or from the representative concept of the sciences. But in any case, the concept or idea always unites the intelligible to the sensible, and not only in art, for the new concept of the concept, first stated by Kant and (so to say) immanent in all modern thought, heals the breach between the sensible and the intelligible worlds, conceives the concept as judgment, and the judgment as synthesis a priori, and the synthesis a priori as the world becoming flesh, as history. Thus that definition of art leads imagination back to logic and art to philosophy, contrary to intention; and is at most valid for the abstract conception of science, not for the problem of art (the æsthetic and teleological Critique of Judgment of Kant had precisely this historical function of correcting what of abstract there yet remained in the Critique of Pure Reason). To seek a sensible element for the concept, beyond that which it already contains in itself as concrete concept, and beyond the words in which it expresses itself, would be superfluous. If we persist in this search, it is true that we abandon the conception of art as philosophy or history, but only to pass to the conception of art as allegory. And the unsurmountable difficulties of the allegory are well known, as its frigid and anti-historical character is known and universally felt. Allegory is the external union, the conventional and arbitrary juxtaposition of two spiritual acts, a concept or thought and an image, where it is assumed that this image must represent that concept. And not only is the unitary character of the artistic image not explained by this, but, in addition, a duality is purposely created, because thought remains thought and image image in this juxtaposition, without relation between themselves; so much so, that in contemplating the image, we forget the concept without any disadvantage.—indeed, with advantage,—and in thinking the concept, we dissipate, also with advantage, the superfluous and tiresome image. Allegory enjoyed much favor in the Middle Ages, that mixture of Germanism and Romanism, of barbarism and culture, of bold imagination and of acute reflection; but it was the theoretic presumption and not the effective reality of that same medieval art which, where it is art, drives allegory away or resolves it in itself. This need for the solution of allegoristical dualism leads to the refining of the theory of intuition, in so far as it is allegory of the idea, into the other theory, of the intuition as symbol; for the idea does not stand by itself in the symbol, thinkable separately from the symbolizing representation, nor does the symbol stand by itself, representable in a lively manner without the idea symbolized.

The idea is all dissolved in the representation (as said the æsthetician Vischer, to whom, if to anyone, belongs the blame of so prosaic a comparison in so poetic and metaphysical a theme), like a lump of sugar melted in a glass of water, which exists and acts in every molecule of water, but is no longer to be found as a lump of sugar. But the idea that has disappeared, the idea that has become entirely representative, the idea that we can no longer succeed in seizing as idea (save by extracting it, like sugar from sugared water), is no longer idea, and is only the sign that the unity of the artistic image has not yet been achieved. Certainly art is symbol, all symbol—that is, all significant; but symbol of what? What does it mean? The intuition is truly artistic, it is truly intuition, and not a chaotic mass of images, only when it has a vital principle that animates it, making it all one with itself; but what is this principle?

The answer to such a question may be said to result from the examination of the greatest ideal strife that has ever taken place in the field of art (and is not confined to the epoch that took its name from it and in which it was predominant): the strife between romanticism and classicism. Giving the general definition, here convenient, and setting aside minor and accidental definitions, romanticism asks of art, above all, the spontaneous and violent effusion of the affections, of love and hate, of anguish and joy, of despair and elation; and is willingly satisfied and pleased with vaporous and indeterminate images, broken and allusive in style, with vague suggestions, with approximate phrases, with powerful and confused sketches: while classicism loves the peaceful soul, the wise design, figures studied in their characteristics and precise in outline, ponderation, equilibrium, clarity; and resolutely tends toward representation, as the other tends toward feeling. And whoever puts himself at one or the other point of view finds crowds of reasons for maintaining it and for confuting the opposite point of view; because (say the romantics), What value has an art, rich in beautiful images, when it does not speak to the heart? And if it does speak to the heart, what does it matter though the images are not beautiful? And the others say, What is the use of the shock of the passions, if the spirit do not rest upon a beautiful image? And if the image be beautiful, if our taste be satisfied, what matters the absence of those emotions which can all of them be obtained outside art, and which life does not fail to provide, sometimes in greater quantity than we desire? But when we begin to feel weary of the fruitless defense of both partial views; above all, when we turn away from the ordinary works of art produced by the romantic and classical schools, from works convulsed with passion or coldly decorous, to fix our eyes upon the works, not of the disciples, but of the masters, not of the mediocre, but of the supreme, we see the struggle cease and find ourselves unable to call the great portions of these works romantic or classic or representative, because they are both classic and romantic, feelings and representations, a vigorous feeling which has become all most brilliant representation. Such, for example, are the works of Hellenic art, and such those of Italian poetry: and art: the transcendentalism of the Middle Ages became fixed in the bronze of the Dantean terzina; melancholy and suave fancy, in the transparency of the songs and sonnets of Petrarch; sage experience of life and badinage with the fables of the past, in the limpid ottava rima of Ariosto; heroism and the thought of death, in the perfect blank-verse hendecasyllabics of Foscolo; the infinite variety of everything, in the sober and austere songs of Giacomo Leopardi. Finally (be it said in parenthesis and without intending comparison with the other examples adduced), the voluptuous refinements and animal sensuality of international decadentism have received their most perfect expression in the prose and verse of an Italian, d'Annunzio. All these souls were profoundly passionate (all, even the serene Lodovico Ariosto, who was so amorous, so tender, and so often represses his emotion with a smile); their works of art are the eternal flower that springs from their passions.

These expressions and these critical judgments can be theoretically resumed in the formula, that what gives coherence and unity to the intuition is feeling: the intuition is really such because it represents a feeling, and can only appear from and upon that. Not the idea, but the feeling, is what confers upon art the airy lightness of the symbol: an aspiration enclosed in the circle of a representation—that is art; and in it the aspiration alone stands for the representation, and the representation alone for the aspiration. Epic and lyric, or drama and lyric, are scholastic divisions of the indivisible: art is always lyrical—that is, epic and dramatic in feeling. What we admire in genuine works of art is the perfect imaginative form which a state of the soul assumes; and we call this life, unity, compactness and fulness of the work of art. What displeases us in the false and imperfect forms is the struggle of several different states of the soul not yet unified, their stratification or mixture, their vacillating method, which obtains apparent unity from the will of the author, who for this purpose avails himself of an abstract plan or idea, or of extra-æsthetic, passionate emotion. A series of images which seem to be, each in turn, convincingly powerful, leaves us nevertheless deluded and diffident, because we do not see them generated from a state of the soul, from a 'study' (as the painters call it), from a motive; and they follow upon and crowd one another without that precise intonation, without that accent, which comes from the heart. And what is the figure cut out from its background in a picture or transported and placed against another background, what is the personage of drama or of romance outside his relation with all the other personages and with the general action? And what is the value of this general action if it be not an action of the spirit of the author? The secular disputes concerning dramatic unity are interesting in this connection; they are first applied to the unity of 'action,' when they have been obtained from the external definitions of time and place, and this finally applied to the unity of 'interest'; and the interest should in its turn be dissolved in the interest of the spirit of the poet in the ideal that animates him. The negative issue of the great dispute between classicists and romanticists is interesting, for it resulted in the negation of the art which strives to distract and illude the soul as to the deficiency of the image based upon abstract feeling, upon practical violence of feeling, upon feeling that has not become contemplation, and equally in the negation of the art which, by means of the superficial clearness of the image, of drawing correctly false, of the falsely correct word, seeks to deceive as to its lack of inspiration and its lack of an æsthetic reason to justify what it has produced. A celebrated sentence uttered by an English critic, and become one of the common-places of journalism, states that 'all of the arts tend to the condition of music'; but it would have been more accurate to say that all the arts are music, if it be thus intended to emphasize the genesis of æsthetic images in feeling, excluding from their number those mechanically constructed or realistically ponderous. And another not less celebrated utterance of a Swiss semi-philosopher, which has had the like good or bad fortune of becoming trivial, discovers that 'every landscape is a state of the soul'; which is indisputable, not because the landscape is landscape, but because the landscape is art.

Artistic intuition, then, is always lyrical intuition: this latter being a word that is not present as an adjective or definition of the first, but as a synonym, another of the synonyms which can be added to those that I have mentioned already, and which, all of them, designate the intuition. And if it be sometimes convenient that it should assume the grammatical form of the adjective, instead of appearing as a synonym, that is only to make clear the difference between the intuition-image, or nexus of images (for what is called image is always a nexus of images, since image-atoms do not exist any more than thought-atoms), which constitutes an organism, and as organism has its vital principle, which is the organism itself,—between this, which is true and proper intuition, and that false intuition which is a heap of images put together in play or in calculation or for some other practical purpose, the connection of which, being practical, when considered from the æsthetic point of view, shows itself to be not organic, but mechanistic. But the word lyric is redundant save in this explanatory or polemical sense; and art is perfectly defined when simply defined as intuition.

11. 9. Freyja, the noblest of the goddesses, who divides the slain with Odin. The feather-dress was a flying equipment peculiar to her.

48. Brisings, 'Twiners', the dwarfs who fashioned the famous necklace.
12. 56. Wanes, water-deities incorporated with the older Scandinavian mythology by the seafarers. They seem to have originated on the Baltic and the southern shores of the North Sea; Freyja was one of them.

By a treacherous offer to give Siegfried special protection, Hagen had persuaded Kriemhild to mark this spot by a little silken cross, which she sewed on Siegfried's tunic and thus unwittingly brought about her husband's death.

 32. leopard, signifying the temptations of the flesh.
 40. motion first. The Middle Ages believed that the world was created in the Spring, when the sun was in the constellation Aries, and placed Christ's incarnation and crucifixion at the same time of the year.
 45. lion, signifying the vice of pride.
 49. wolf, symbol of avarice.
 70. Sub Julio. Virgil was born in the time of Julius Caesar.
 74. I sang, in the Æneid.

 107. Camilla, etc., characters in the Æneid.
 53. 13. Sire of Silvius, Æneas.
 28. Chosen Vessel, St. Paul.

 55. 18. the good of intellect, the knowledge of God.
 51. One of the most famous lines in Dante and difficult to translate: Non ragionam di lor ma guarda e passa.
 60. the Great Refusal made. Another famous line, though there has been much dispute about the particular person indicated.
 56. 99. marish, marsh, the vada livida of Æneid VI. Dante is not afraid to combine classical mythology with Christian doctrine.
 117. like the bird at his recall. A simile from hawking, suggested by Æneid VI, 309.
 57. 53. One, Christ, who, according to the medieval belief, freed the Patriarchs on his descent into hell.

 121. Electra, etc., classical heroines and heroes, from whom Saladin, the Saracen Sultan (1137-93), famous for his virtue and generosity, stands apart.
 131. The Master, Aristotle. Other classical philosophers follow, with two Arabians, Avicenna and Averroës, the latter celebrated for the Commentary on Aristotle.
 b. 2. contracted rim. Dante's Hell is a contracting spiral of circles descending to the center of the earth.
 6. encircles, with his tail a certain number of times to indicate the circle to which the soul is condemned. See line 11 below.

 99. companion band, mouths of the Po delta.
 60. 101. this one, Paolo Malatesta, her companion in Hell, who fell in love with her after her marriage to his brother, Gianciotto, Lord of Rimini. According to one story, Francesca had expected to marry Paolo, and was tricked into marrying his elder brother, who was deformed, while Paolo was a handsome and attractive youth.
 102. the mode. Gianciotto caught the two lovers together and killed them both as they lay in each other's arms, so that they had no opportunity for repentance.
 106. Cain, the first murderer, whose name is used here to signify the circle in Hell to which murderers are condemned.
 120. vague, rather, doubtful, dubbiosi, i.e., the desires which the lovers felt before they acknowledged to themselves and each other that they were in love.
 121. woe of woes. This famous passage, the thought of which is derived from Boethius, is reproduced by Tennyson in Memoriam: 'A sorrow's crown of sorrow, Is remembering happier things.'
 123. Teacher, probably Virgil, though it may be Boethius.
 128. Launcelot. The old romance tells how Guinevere took Launcelot by the chin and gave him a long kiss in the presence of Gallehaut, who had brought them together.
 140. the other, Paolo.
 142. And fell. Again a famous line and difficult to translate: E caddi come corpo morto cade. It is an effective close to an episode which Dante has narrated in 70 lines with such loving care and artistic concentration that later poets have tried in vain to render the tragedy at much greater length. The story has often been treated since in poetry and drama, notably in recent plays by Stephen Phillips in English and by Gabriele d'Annunzio in Italian.

b. 1. Florence. In the intervening cantos, during which Dante has descended from the second to the eighth circle, he has taken the opportunity of scarifying some of his political and personal enemies in Florence, who are further referred to in these opening lines.

9. Prato. Probably a reference to the Cardinal of Prato who about the time when Dante was writing rebuked the Florentines for their misdeeds and threatened them with condign punishment.

26. He, the sun.

27. What time, the evening.

61. 34. bears avenged, the prophet Elisha. See II Chronicles II. 11-12.

41. the theft unlock, reveal the sinner hidden within the flame, as Elijah was hidden in the chariot of fire.

54. Eteocles and his twin-brother Polynices, according to the classical story, fought for the kingship of Thebes and killed each other. The bodies were burnt on one pyre and the flames refused to commingle—a symbol of their undying enmity.

57. neither went in ire. They are united in suffering divine punishment, as they were united in their anger against the Trojans, whom they overcame by the treacherous device of the wooden horse. This led to the fall of Troy and the flight of Æneas, who went to Italy and laid the foundations of the Roman state.

62. Deidamia, espoused by Achilles and deserted by him through the wiles of Ulysses and Diomed, who persuaded him to take part in the expedition against Troy.

63. Palladium, the sacred statue of Pallas Athene, upon which the safety of Troy depended, and which was stolen from the city by the wiles of Ulysses and Diomed.

74. Greek. Virgil speaks either because he knows Greek, of which Dante is ignorant, or because in the Æneid he has celebrated the exploits of the Greek heroes.

84. he, Ulysses, whose end was unknown.

85. the mightier. Ulysses is more powerful in death, as he had been in life, than Diomed.

ancient. The medieval scholars believed that Ulysses and Diomed had been in hell for twenty-four centuries.

62. 105. other islands, in the Mediterranean, Corsica and the Balearic Isles.

107. narrow pass, the Straits of Gibraltar, where the ancients placed the Pillars of Hercules.

111. Ceuta, an African fortress opposite Gibraltar.

124. morning-tide, to the east, so that the bow was headed for the sunset—the west.

128. the other pole, the Antarctic, as they were keeping to the left.

ours, the North Pole. They had arrived at the Equator.

133. a mountain, imagined by Dante, identified by some commentators with Plato's Atlantis, by others with Dante's Purgatory.

b. Purgatorio. After descending to the lowest depth of Hell at the center of the earth, Dante under the guidance of Virgil ascends the other way to the surface of the Southern Hemisphere, and again sees the light of the stars. The early Cantos of the Purgatorio recount his admission and the people he met on the lower slopes of the Mountain. They implore the goodwill of Dante to obtain remembrance and intercession for them among the living.

13. The Aretine, Benincasa da Laterina, a judge of Arezzo, assassinated by Ghin di Tacco, a notorious robber whose relatives he had condemned to death.

15. the other, another Aretine, drowned in the marshes of the Arno while pursuing his enemies, the Bostoli, who also killed Federico Novello, mentioned in the next line.

18. Marzucco, a citizen of Pisa, who proved his fortitude by forgiving the assassin of his son, or, according to another story, by slaying him.

19. Count Orso, of the Alberti of Florence, killed by treachery.

22. Pier de la Brosse, Court Chamberlain of Philip of France, executed under the false accusation of Maria of Brabant, Philip's second wife.

24. consort with baser herd, in the pit of the Inferno reserved for false accusers.

29. In one text, Æneid VI. 372, where Virgil questions the efficacy of prayer.

63. 37. Top of Judgment, the Highest, i.e., the Divine Judgment.

38. in a moment. The intercession of the living achieves in a moment the expiation which in Purgatory the dead souls themselves accomplish more slowly.

42. was not. The prayers of Virgil and his pagan friends were ineffectual because they were disunited from God.

57. interrupted. The sun has set and Dante's form no longer casts a shadow; they must wait till sunrise.

61. Lombard. Sordello, the leading Italian poet before Dante, was born near Mantua (Virgil's own city) in Lombardy.

76. Hostel of woe. This vigorous invective is suggested by the contrast between the affection of Virgil and Sordello, born in the same place, though hundreds of years apart, and the citizens living in the same Italian city at the same time, riven by political and personal enmities, of which Dante himself had been a victim.

88. Justinian, Roman Emperor and Lawgiver. But what advantage is the Justinian Code if there is no Emperor to administer it and secure Italian unity?

91. gentry . . . devout, the clergy.

97. German Albert, Albert of Austria, elected Emperor in 1298, but too much taken up by home affairs to pay attention to Italy.

106. Capulet and Montague, factions of Verona, made familiar to English readers by Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet. The factions mentioned in the next line are those of another Italian city, Orvieto.

111. Santafiora, a Siennese county notorious for disorder; secure is ironical.

64. 125. Marcellus, a fierce opponent of the imperial authority of Julius Caesar.

127. My Florence. Dante now turns his ironical digression from Italy in general to his native city.

135. 'Shoulder to the wheel.' The original means rather, 'I undertake the burden,' but is difficult to translate exactly. Dante is ridiculing the eagerness of the Florentine democracy to interfere in affairs of state.

144. November . . . October. Dante may be referring to the political overturn of the autumn of 1301, which led to his banishment from Florence, but more probably he has in mind the general instability of Florentine government, which was accused of making a law in the evening and repealing it the next morning in the proverb: Legge fiorentina, fatta la sera e guasta la mattina.

166. where lays hold, by the knees.

182. little innocents, infants who died unbaptized and, according to the medieval belief, found their place with the just pagans, in Limbo as described above in Inferno II.

65. 207. shades nocturnal, literally, the darkness of night, which prevents ascent, as man cannot climb to higher spiritual levels without the illumination of divine grace.

After climbing the heights of Purgatory, Dante arrives on the morning of the seventh day at the entrance to the Terrestrial Paradise, where Virgil (excluded as a pagan) leaves him and Beatrice assumes the task of guide.

At the beginning of the Paradiso Dante warns those who are not versed in philosophy and theology not to venture upon the heavenly voyage with him, as their little barque may be lost amid the overwhelming waves. This warning has in general been heeded by the ordinary reader, who is likely to find the high themes of the last part of the Divine Comedy beyond his grasp. The final passage here quoted relates the climax of the story, the revelation to Dante of the Divine Glory.

66. 42. Argo, the first ship, which with its shadow startled the god of the sea, according to the medieval count, in 1223 B.C., or about twenty-five centuries before the date of Dante's vision.

62. Three rings, symbolizing the Three Persons of the Godhead.

77. In very likeness, the Incarnation.

91. stars. All three parts of the Divine Comedy end with the same word, stelle. At the end of the Inferno Dante and Virgil climb from the interior of the earth and see the stars. At the end of the Purgatorio, he is purified and ready to ascend to the stars. At the end of the Paradiso his desire and will are one with the Divine Love which moves the sun and the other stars.

PETRARCH: LETTERS

68. a. 3. Lapo da Castiglionchio, a famous lawyer and contemporary of Petrarch, who died in 1381.

69. a. 22. Mount Ventoux is not really very high or very difficult. The modern tourist may run over it by road in an automobile. But the travelers of the middle ages avoided mountains and forests, believing them to be haunted by robbers, and wild beasts, and worse. Petrarch seems to have been about the first modern to climb a mountain for the sake of the view, and his achievement is interestingly recorded in his own words.

25. Dionisio da Borgo San Sepolcro was an Augustinian monk, professor of divinity and philosophy in the University of Paris, the friend and confidant of Petrarch, who confessed to him his passion for Laura and received from him a copy of St. Augustine's Confessions, in addition, no doubt, to spiritual counsel as to his love of a married woman.

BOCCACCIO: THE DECAMERON

81. a. 7. these noble ladies. Boccaccio goes on to tell how the seven ladies, with three young gentlemen of their acquaintance, took refuge from the plague in an estate about two miles from Florence, now identified with the Villa Palmieri, on the slope of Fiesole, and recently in the ownership of James W. Ellsworth, an American capitalist and art collector, who died there in the spring of 1925. Finding all there to their satisfaction, they agree to pass the time in the telling of stories to each other. A leader is appointed for each day, and each of the company tells a story when called upon, making, in all, the hundred stories of the ten days or Decameron. The story reprinted in our text is the last, and, as many have thought, the best. Petrarch was so fond of it that he translated it into Latin, and from his Latin Chaucer took the Story of Griselda, putting it into the mouth of the Clerk of Oxford in the Canterbury Tales. Chaucer adds to this, one of his most charming tales, a warning that no English husband should be so foolhardy as to try his wife's patience in this fashion, 'for in certain he shall fail.'

b. 52. half tierce, half way between 9 a.m. and noon, i.e., 10.30.

84. b. 13. romagnole, coarse cloth.

FROISSART: EDWARD III'S INVASION OF FRANCE

Edward III, who married Philippa of Hainault, claimed the French throne through his mother Isabella, sister of Charles IV, king of France, who died without a son, and was succeeded by Philip VI, the next heir in the male line. Edward, accompanied by his eldest son, the Black Prince, who was only sixteen, invaded France in assertion of his right to the Crown in 1346, and won an important battle at Crecy, as Froissart relates in our text. The siege of Calais, which followed, lasted about a year. The Black Prince won a brilliant victory at Poitiers in 1356, and took prisoner the French king, but the death of both the father and son in 1376-77 left France still unconquered.

143. a. 4. no employments but those of leisure. So the French text, nulles occupations que oysives is correctly translated. This is the famous passage which Shakespeare made use of in The Tempest II, i. It is interesting to compare the translation Shakespeare found in Florio's version, which reads as follows: 'It is a nation, would I answer Plato, that hath no kind of traffic, no knowledge of letters, no intelligence of numbers, no name of magistrate, nor of politic superiority; no use of service, or riches, or of poverty; no contracts, no successions, no dividends, no occupation but idle.' Florio's rather loose rendering of the last phrase evidently led Shakespeare into misunderstanding:—

'No kind of traffic

Would I admit, no name of magistrate;

Letters should not be known, riches, poverty,

And use of service, none; contract, succession,

Bourn, bound of land, tilth, vineyard, none;

No use of metal, corn, or wine, or oil;

229. a. 45. The intervening chapters here omitted relate how Candide, being caught making love to the fair Cunégonde, was kicked out of the castle, and after many and painful adventures recovered his mistress, only to be separated from her again. Coming into the company of Cunégonde's brother, Candide asked her hand in marriage, and his proposal being received with insult, he whipped out his rapier and left the brother for dead. He also met Pangloss, who after an unfortunate love affair with a servant girl, Pacquette, fell at Lisbon into the hands of the Inquisition and was hanged for heresy. Candide thereupon fled to the New World.

238. a. 15. plenum, materia subtilis. These are technical terms in the philosophical system of Leibnitz, which Voltaire in this passage, and indeed in the whole story, is turning to ridicule.

The breast was powerful, broad, and arched; the arms and thighs were full, and softly muscular; the feet were elegant, and of the most perfect shape; nowhere, on the whole body, was there a trace either of fat, or of leanness and decay. NIETZSCHE: ZARATHUSTRA'S PROLOGUE

397. a. 3. Zarathustra, the Persian name of the philosopher generally known as Zoroaster. The religion he developed from more ancient myths prevailed in Persia from the sixth century B.C. and is represented in modern Persia and India by Parseesim. It laid stress upon the sun as the source of light and heat, and was highly developed on the moral and spiritual side. Nietzsche used the name of Zarathustra as a symbol for his own opposition to Christianity, which he regarded as a faith of submission and slavery. According to Nietzsche's idea, man should direct his course, not with reference to a future life beyond the grave, but with a view to the development of a higher form of humanity, whom he called 'the Superman.' The 'dreadfullest sin' (p. 399) is not to blaspheme God (for according to him the God of Christianity is dead), but to blaspheme the earth, on which man must work out his own destiny. What is lovable in man is that he is a transition to a higher humanity ('an over-going') and that he is willing to sacrifice himself (his 'down-going') that he may help forward the coming of the Superman upon the earth. He sacrifices himself by thought and labor and invention, for these contribute not to his own advantage, but to the development of a superior race.

401. Zarathustra consoles the rope-dancer because he is a symbol of the adventurous spirits who sacrifice their lives and are forgotten. He buries him, because a dead tradition belongs to the past and is superseded. So Zarathustra himself goes on to give his message to the living, if they will receive it. But he knows that the herd will always prefer traditional doctrines of consolation and comfort, and will resent the teaching of anyone who destroys their conventions ('breaks up their tables of values'). The law-breaker, however, is in his view the creator (p. 403).

404. The title, 'Beyond Good and Evil', implies the superseding of conventional standards, and incidentally Nietzsche expresses his disagreement with many judgments usually accepted. His first tilt is against the convention of 'nationalism' or patriotism; he suggests that modern democracy will conduce to the leveling of national distinctions and prejudices, and by the reduction of the masses to wage-slaves, will give an opportunity for the development of leaders who will rule by superior skill and insight (pp. 404-405).

b. 10. not a philosophical race. For the purpose of making his point, Nietzsche in this paragraph identifies philosophy with metaphysics. As a revolutionary dreamer, he naturally disliked the English tendencies to conservatism and practical commonsense. Bacon, as the founder of modern inductive science, and Darwin, as its greatest recent exponent, come in for severe castigation, for what most people regard as their distinguishing virtues—their determination to base theories upon observed facts instead of deducing metaphysical conclusions from abstract principles. Nietzsche's paradox, of course, involves the condemnation of the fundamental methods of modern science.

411. b. 5. of English origin. Nietzsche may be historically correct in ascribing to English influence the origin of French liberalism of the eighteenth century, 'The Age of Reason,' which opened with Montesquieu and culminated in Voltaire, but he exaggerated the importance of the initial impulse in order to emphasize his depreciation of the English thinkers and open the way to the appreciation of French characteristics in the following chapter.
